The mind grows from within.—This is indeed the definition that has been given us of instinct; it is from within! And so of all upon this planet; it is from within. That the human mind is a real substance, as the body is, is found by its dependence upon perfect nutrition, from its freedom from pain, and its continued growth after the body has ceased to grow. This occurs about the twentieth year, when the osseous system has become fully matured. How long the mind may continue its growth we do not know. Within five years past, while preparing a volume for the press, on "Longevity," I hav collected a list of more than six thousand centinarian cases, and ranging all the way up to two hundred and seven years. The body thrives best from pure air, perfect food, appropriate exercise, and uninterrupted nutrition. And, similarly, the mind "grows by what it feeds on," but it only increases in the direction of manhood when it is enabled to do its own thinking on all subjects, and to discriminate between truthful and false ideas.

The human will.—There is much error prevalent among Christians, mesmerists, and modern mediums on this mental function, all of them ignoring the truthful idea of selfhood and self-control, upon which our humanity is dependent. The human will is the power of choice in the use of means or methods. It is the same in all minds, as personality and selfhood are the same. To surrender these is witchcraft. In no sense is the mind free and independent so really as it is from the possibility of control by any other mere will. And nothing sooner shows how ignorant certain classes are when they speak of one "will" as stronger than another. The necessity of a will or choice at all implies human ignorance. Hence of omniscience no "will" can be affirmed, as no "choice" can be necessary where there is this absolute perfection in knowledge. Mere volition has no power beyond the brains exercising it. And Mesmer was deceived in this regard by not knowing what is due to the laws of association, and the established relations such as exist between the ox and its owner, and the hunter and his faithful dog.

Jesus is reported to hav unwittingly admitted, that his cures (Mark i, 41) were not wrought by his "will," but were self-induced, when he said, "According to your faith be it unto you" (Mat. ix, 28). No "god" or "spirit," no mesmerist nor miracle worker, has any power except that with which he may chance to hav become invested by the dominant ideas in the faith and confidence of the people.

The law of self-induction.—This law of psychology the author first announced in New York, under the name of Pathetism, in 1840. And Webster, in his quarto American Dictionary, on this term explains that it is "another name for mesmerism," whereas the scientific experiments in my lectures from 1836 to 1850 were proof of the utter falsehood of the mesmeric theory. In that theory I never believed. My method was confined wholly to ideas, and it ignored mesmerism and theology. And speaking of it, here is what a Boston editor (Hon. Elizur Wright) said: "LaRoy Sunderland is well known as transcending all who hav attempted to explain to us the mysteries of the human mind. No lecturer has ever attracted such crowds or held them by such a spell! No one has ever produced results so magical, doing with no visible means far more than all others hav done with them" (Boston Chronotype, November 10, 1847).

Manifestly, were sinners "converted" by the "will," as is alleged of "God" on high, no "prayers" nor "preaching" would be necessary. But all the so-called "means of grace" are for drilling the mind into the habit of certain ideas, and false as they are, we see in Christianity and Methodist "revivals' what a power they become over the ignorant masses.

All sermons, hymns, and prayers are sensational, and excite faith, fear, hope, and joy; and controled by this law, they kill (Acts v, 1) or cure, as the case may be. Certainly, it was "saving faith" that instantly killed Ananias and his wife. And it was this same Christian idea that cured and crazed Miss Eva Briggs, a Lawrence girl, who was claimed to have been relieved of hip disease recently by the faith-cure at Old Orchard, and now has been taken to an insane asylum, crazed by her religious excitement.

I giv this recent case as I find it quoted in the papers. And I hav before me a volume of similar cases of "miraculous cures," and "miraculous deaths," all caused by sensational ideas, or "saving faith," whichever term you like the best. And if it should suit the editor's pleasure, I will ere long giv his readers my views of "the trance," whence hav come "visions and revelations from the Lord," and in modern times we hav "messages" from the dead.

Ideas supreme in power.—My limits in this contribution do not permit that elaboration which the importance of this subject demands. But I will state a few of its aspects that I think must be understood without argument:

1. The power of ideas is controled by this law of selfhood, as is manifest in self-nutrition, self-control, and self-induction, in sudden death, by faith, fear, love, or joy. I could fill a volume with the statements of cases of persons in sound health who hav been instantly killed by the sensational excitement of faith, fear, or joy. Nor is it possible for the human mind to hav any knowledge of any power purely mental above that which instantly annihilates the vital system, when the victim falls dead as suddenly as if smitten upon the head with a sledge-hammer. And surely a power like this is sufficient for all the cures called "miraculous," and also all the healing of disease attributed to pills, powders, and medical nostrums. It is sufficient for inducing all the "revival" phenomens, and all that makes up the "Christian experience." And this is "the power" that induced the trance of Paul, when he imagined himself in heaven, and had his "visions and revelations from the Lord."

2. This power of ideas is creativ, disintegrating, materializing, and precipitating new parts, shapes, forms, and colors in the fœtus, corresponding, with the (unconscious) idea in the maternal mind. Dr. Joslin narrates an account of a child born with one hundred and twenty small-pox pustules, filled with purulent matter. The mother never had small-pox, nor was she ever exposed to it except by a sensational idea of it in her own mind. Here was the real materialization and creation by the chemism in the mother's mind. Thousands of similar cases could be given; and I might here refer to what are known as occult phenomena in India, where persons sink into a state resembling death, and are buried for a month or more, and yet are resuscitated when more dead than alive. And when ideas are conjugated in two minds (of "adepts") a thousand miles apart, materializations and creating occur when, as the modern mediums style it, "the conditions are favorable"—a statement indeed that we may find a use for in the whole of things. I think favorably of Mr. A. P. Sinnett's book on "The Occult World," as I hav myself witnessed similar phenomena, and am sure that our Spiritual friends are deceived when they admit their materializations as proof as to the personal identity of those now dead.

3. And is not our living humanity itself the resultant phenomena from the dual (male and female ideas) forces in the whole of things? And whether we say "death, and what then?" or "birth, and what then?" the answer to both these problems must be the same. We hav no mental powers for knowing. There is a vast difference between what we know and what we merely hope for and believe. Any one who has reached thirty years of age may be truly said to hav forgotten more than he now knows. And is not this the order of humanity throughout the whole of human life? Learning new ideas and forgetting, as in common sleep, the emblem of the final sleep that wipes out our consciousness and memory of this life forever, in Humanity's lap to rest!

The "Freethought Directory."

A GOOD IDEA.

J. W. Matthews, of Indianola, Ill., writes: "I for one heartily indorse this movement. Now, if the Freethinkers thus registered will consider themselvs introduced to each other, and get up a friendly correspondence all over the country, I think it would hav a beneficial tendency." The "Freethought Directory" will be much larger than at first intended, some thirty pages, and I cannot get it out before Nov. 15th. So, friends, continue to send in your names and address for the book. H. L. GREEN.

Replies to More Christian Arguments.

The following two letters hav been sent us for publication. They readily explain themselvs:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Sept. 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you a letter received some two years since, which I never answered because it entered into a field too broad for me, so much so that I did not feel competent to do so. Since reading the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER and your answers to W. M. Whitehead's questions, I concluded to send you Mr. Breed's letter, thinking an answer to it would be of value to your numerous readers. Hav followed you around the world, and read you otherwise to great profit, and I will read your answer to Mr. Breed with great interest should you think it worthy of publishing, which I hope you may, for he is a very popular divine at St. Paul, our neighboring city.

Yours respectfully, B. M. SMITH.

MR. BREED'S LETTER.

ST. PAUL, Dec. 30, 1880.

B. M. SMITH, Sir: Your very frank and courteous letter should hav been answered before this, except that the time has been lacking. It is evidence not only of an honest mind, but of a friendly spirit that you do not deal at all in sarcasm or scorn. And I do not mean to indicate that such characteristics belong exclusivly to unbelievers. But no matter to which side the man may belong who calls his opponent hard names or "throws mud," as we say, the practice is contemptible, and ministers only to hard feeling and further strife.

There are several things in your letter to which you will permit me to refer.

It is very evident that your mind is not at rest, because you use the language not of conviction but of doubt. You are "more than half convinced," etc. You speak of those who are "hungering and thirsting for something better," as though you included yourself in the number. Such is always the characteristic of the mind which rejects Jesus; it cannot settle on anything but a negativ. And what is a negativ? Nothing. You doom yourself to unrest! You say that the only evidence for the life of Jesus is found in the New Testament. Hav you forgotten the writings of the apostolic fathers—men who lived and wrote in the very same age as Josephus, and some of whom had conversed with the apostles themselves? Hav you forgotten that the writings of the very enemies of Christianity—such as Celsus and Porphyry, who lived in the second century, and whose knowledge of Christ's life was as complete as our knowledge of the war of 1812, and that of Celsus, removed no further from it—that their writings demomstrate the facts of Christianity which you doubt?

But considering only the writings of the four evangelists, they hav been examined by Simon Greenleaf, D.D., the ablest of all authorities on "Evidence," in a large book, by the very rules of evidence which obtain in law courts, and the conclusion reached that their testimony is reliable and to be accepted. Yet when you rule out these four witnesses and their four histories, you do just as I should do were I to rule out the published histories of the Revolution and of George Washington, and then deny their existence because other historians did not speak of them. Moreover, if your rule is to challenge all histories of men and nations written by their friends and admirers, how many histories of any sort will you hav left? Who will receive the testimony of any enemy, anyway?

You reach the conclusion that the character of Christ is a fabrication, which grew up little by little—perhaps founded upon that of Judas of Galilee. Hav you ever compared it with other fabrications? Do they possess its symmetry or unity? Suppose it is an intellectual creation (whether by growth or otherwise), then you are forced to the conclusion that such men as the followers of Judas created an ideal not only much more grand than their own characters, but holier, more loving, more lofty intellectually than anything earth has ever seen. Is that reasonable? Can the stream rise so high above its source?

You say that people to-day are disposed to attach importance not to what a man believes, but to what he does. Let me ask if it is possible for a man to act without any reference to religious belief? or if our belief does not always control our action?

Finally, you wish me to direct my talents to the elevation of mankind, and not so much to dogmas. I do not know exactly what you mean by either term. But if by the elevation of mankind you mean teaching the ignorant, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and comforting the sorrowing, it will be worth your while to make careful examination (as I hav done) on this point, and you will find that four-fifths of the support of all the schools not under state patronage, four-fifths of all the support of orphan asylums, hospitals, and other kindred institutions are derived from Christian people, and flow from the church of Christ.

I do not know you personally, and am therefore ignorant of facts; but my observation has taught me that a deterioration in life often precedes and accounts for a failing in faith.

I do not say it has been so with you, as I am not acquainted with you. I hope your unbelief may be pardoned, and that the holy spirit may bring you back to light and rest again.

Very truly, DAVID R. BREED.

REPLY.—We make no profession of superior ability in meeting the arguments and inquiries of our opponents, but in so far as we are able we cheerfully defend what seems to us to be truth, and point out what appear to be the mistakes and errors of our ecclesiastical friends who entertain views entirely different from ours.

It is pleasing to see that the Rev. Mr. Breed writes in a friendly spirit, and that he keeps up at least an appearance of fairness. He condemns calling hard names and mud-throwing, which is commendable in him to do, and we wish it might always be acted upon by his brethren of the cloth, for it cannot be forgotten that many clergyman hav said false and very unkind things about those who presume to differ from them on the tenets of supernaturalism. Whenever a professional clergyman shows a disposition to be fair and gentlemanly it is refreshing and givs encouragement to the belief that humanity and civility will, occasionally at least, crop out and rise superior to religious dogma. This spirit of fairness is quite right in the reverend gentleman. But that he entertains some errors is not at all difficult to perceive. We will mention a few points wherein we think he is in error. Here are some of them:

1. Mr. Breed argues that because Mr. Smith appears somewhat unsettled and in doubt, he is in error. He says, "Such is always the characteristic of the mind which rejects Jesus," and condemns those "who are hungering and thirsting for something better." He is clearly wrong in this position. An unsettled mind is no indication of error. Doubt leads to agitation and investigation. If no doubt is indulged in as to the errors of past ages of superstition and ignorance, no new truths wlil be brought to light. If no uneasiness is felt at the blinding exactions of dogma, inquiry and science will not lead us to new treasures of nature and reason. Those are the most settled in their convictions, the least inquiring for something better, who are most sunken in gross darkness and superstition. The fetish worshiper is fully satisfied that he is right; he firmly believes his stupid objects of adoration are potent and watchful, and he would of course strongly condemn those "hungering and thirsting for something better." It is the same with the worshipers of many gods, and who bow down to those gods in the form of idols. They are perfectly at rest in their mode of belief, and scorn those who hunger and thirst for something better. In like manner it is with all believers in supernaturalism and ecclesiastically prescribed lines of thought—those who believe in personal gods who beget sons upon human females, and then cause the same sons to be put to death for their own gratification.

There hav been many such personal gods and begotten sons believed in, the believers in them are just as sure that they hav the only truth in the world worth having as that they exist. They are supremely contented with the doctrins which they hav accepted; they want nothing better nor higher; they are positiv that everybody who thinks differently from them is in the dark, and loaded down with error; and they scorn all who giv way to an appetite for higher truth, and hunger and thirst for something better. With this class of self-satisfied believers who accept whatever is handed out to them by their ecclesiastical teachers and mind-keepers without daring to raise an objection or a dissenting voice, they will remain settled; they will not doubt; they will make no inquiry; they will not seek or desire anything better. They believe that the dogmas taught from two to four thousand years ago possessed the whole truth; that they are perfect, and that no new discoveries can be made, and no further advances taken. They want nothing higher, and will not tolerate those who hunger and thirst for higher things. It is different with those who are not satisfied with the old husks of theology and creed, and seek always for the best that is to be had, and are not content so long as higher and better truths are to be learned. Mr. Breed may ally himself with those who are perfectly contented and settled, but Mr. Smith and ourselvs will be numbered with those who "hunger and thirst for something better"—the truest and best that is to be had.

2. Mr. Breed dissents from the claim that there is no authority for the existence, or for the life and doctrins, of Jesus, save the four gospels in the New Testament. If he knows of any historian who corroborates those four gospels, and makes it clear that such a person existed, taught the doctrins attributed to him, and performed the remarkable miracles with which he is credited, it is a great pity he does not produce him. If he knows of any such reliable writer within a hundred years from the time Jesus is said to hav lived, we urge him to bring him forth. We hav recently had something to say upon this subject, and it seems hardly necessary to go the ground all over again. But we will make the assertion, and challenge proof to the contrary, that there is no reliable writer, no credible history, that substantiates the claims of those four gospels. We further showed that those four gospels, as such, were wholly unknown by the Christians of the first century, unknown by the Christians of the second century, and that it was not until more than three quarters of the second century had passed away that those four gospels were so much as named or quoted? If Mr. Breed can show that the contrary is true, will he be so so kind as to do so? Thus while the four gospels which are wholly relied upon for the Christian story were unknown till the year 181, the numerous spurious gospels written before and after were denounced and rejected as spurious and unworthy of belief. This leaves the authenticity of the gospel story in a most unfortunate dilemma. And shirk it and evade it as much as Mr. Breed and his brother clergymen please, the great damaging truth still remains—the four gospels is all there is to depend upon, and there is nothing to corroborate them. The books of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John clearly were not written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. The world has been deceived in this matter. A lot of forgers hav led the world astray. Spurious gospels are all there is to depend upon, and an original of any one of them was never seen by any of the apostles or early fathers of the church. If there is one who ever claimed that he had seen the original of either of the four, will Mr. Breed be kind enough to point him out? The truth is that copies of copies of spurious gospels are all that the world has to depend upon to uphold the belief that a virgin bore a child without the aid of a natural father, that this miraculously begotten son performed such miracles as raising dead persons to life, and of himself rising from the dead and ascending bodily above the atmosphere surrounding the earth. The copies of copies of forgeries and spurious stories is indeed the worst possible foundation for such improbable and impossible claims to rest upon.

And just granting for the moment that the four gospels were written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, what credibility can attach to their narrativs when they attempt to write an account of what took place when they were not present, and report sermons, the delivery of which they did not hear? Matthew did not hear the Sermon on the Mount, for he had not then been called as a disciple. It takes a man of remarkable memory to correctly report a speech or sermon thirty years afterward, even if he heard it; but when he did not hear it it requires a still smarter man, for he has to draw wholly upon his own imagination. Again, how could Matthew possibly know what Joseph dreamed fifty years before the story was written? How could Luke know what kind of a vision Mary had more than fifty years before, and when he was not present? If Matthew and Luke wished to establish the alleged fact that Jesus was by blood a lineal descendant of the house of David, why did they giv the genealogy of Joseph in order to prove that of Jesus? Does that prove it at all? And then if they gave the genealogy of Joseph correctly, why did they disagree so widely, one giving twenty-eight generations, and the other forty-two, with an entirely different line? Can both be true? If one is true, which is it? and is not the other false? Could John write the truth when he so totally differed from the other three writers in the character of Jesus, in what he said, in the miracles he performed, the length of his ministry, the number of times he visited Jerusalem? Could the four tell the truth when they told an entirely different story in scores of instances? Can truth contradict itself and prove itself a lie? It is mournful, too, that this record called the New Testament has been changed more or less in the copying and different renditions that hav been made to the number of thirty-two thousand. Can much respect be had for a story that has been changed so many times? Ah, Mr. Breed, what you choose to denominate "history," and to hav palmed upon the world as divine truth, is most defectiv, unreliable, and unworthy of credit.

3. Mr. Breed cites Celsus and Porphyry as proofs of the truth of Christianity. They are indeed a weak prop for the mythical system to lean upon. They both wrote expressly to prove that Christianity is untrue, and their tetimony was so damaging to the false claims that had been set up that their writings were entirely destroyed by Christians, so that a single paragraph has not come down to us save a few that Origen quoted of Celsus in order to reply intelligibly to him. A system must indeed be reduced to great straits to be driven to prove itself true by witnesses who totally deny its truth.

4. Mr. Breed attempts to prove the validity and truthfulness of the four canonical gospels by Simeon Greenleaf, D.D., whom he is pleased to call "the ablest of all authorities on 'evidence.'" We do not know how able the reverend doctor of divinity was upon "evidence," for we hav never read what he says in his "large book;" but if he has really succeeded in finding any real evidence that Jesus lived save what is contained in the four canonical gospels, or if he can find the slightest proof that either of those four gospels was written by the persons whose names they bear; if he can find any evidence of any person who ever saw the original manuscripts from the hands of the evangelists; if he has any evidence that these four gospels were read, mentioned, or known of by any one before Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, well along in the last quarter of the second century, he is earnestly requested to produce it. Simeon Greenleaf, D.D., was a theologian—a clergyman; one who makes his livelihood by endeavors to induce people to believe that Jesus really lived, that he was begotten by a ghost, that his mother was a virgin both before and after the begetting process, that Jesus never had a natural father, like most of the other people who hav lived in the world, that he performed impossible miracles, and that he ascended away up into the upper atmosphere, or entirely beyond the atmosphere, where he is engaged at sitting at the right hand of his ghostly father, and at preparing mansions for those who can be induced to giv credence to the story. Mr. Greenleaf, being a doctor of divinity, was doubtless fond of money. Many of the fraternity evince that kind of love. They find filthy lucre very convenient to meet the wants of life, and it has been discovered that they will not toil to any great extent, even to save souls from an eternal burning hell, unless they are paid the cash in advance, or hav a reasonable prospect of getting it. They will not preach without money. Their standing motto is, "No pay, no preach." This they act upon with decided unanimity. Now Simeon Greenleaf, D.D., no longer has uses for money, as nearly fifty years ago he departed this life and went where, possibly, he has been able to test the truthfulness of the system of religion he toiled so earnestly to defend; but if any of those clergymen who admire him, any D.D. who thinks Greenleaf, D.D., established the fact that such a person as Jesus of the gospels had a real existence, and that the four gospels were really written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and were known or alluded to before the year 181, they can doubtless be able to make a good sum of money by producing from Greenleaf or any body else the proof so greatly needed and desired. There is a great number of persons who would willingly giv large sums of money if undoubted proof of the kind indicated can be given. We are not able to giv very much, but think we might safely offer one thousand dollars reward if the lost and missing proof can be produced. Possibly Mr. Breed will undertake the contract.

5. It will hardly do to giv implicit confidence to the mythical characters who it is claimed saw Jesus and his disciples, for upon examination they will be found to be dissipated into thin air. These claims were undoubtedly gotten up by the authors of the gospel story; and it could hardly be expected that men capable of inventing the four gospels which Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John assuredly did not write, would hav failed to speak of some of the fathers who at least had seen some of the apostles. Testimony of that kind will be found weak and unreliable. When scrutinized closely it vanishes.

6. Mr. Breed asks "if it is possible for a man to act without any reference to religious belief." We answer, We think it is. Although the majority of human beings hav a religious belief of some kind, there are many who hav no settled religious belief, while taking the whole world over there is but about one in ten who even professes to believe in the religion called Christianity. But human incentivs, the natural emotions of human character, are more activ and will act sooner than religious belief. If almost any man who has no fixed religious belief sees a fellow-being drowning, or a house on fire with human beings in it likely to burn to death, or if he sees a child playing upon a railroad track with the rushing train rapidly approaching, he will do his utmost to save those thus in imminent danger, without stopping for a moment to think what his religious opinions are about gods, devils, or hells. When soldiers are upon the battle-field engaged in deadly conflict with a common foe they rush into the hottest of the fight, where the danger is the greatest, and without stopping a moment to mouth a prayer, to engage in a religious rite, or to think whether they hav a religion or not. Human impulses are stronger than religious impressions, and men never stop in cases of emergency to consult the latter.

7. The Rev. Mr. Breed, in conclusion, says, "My observation has taught me that a deterioration in life often precedes and accounts for a failure in faith;" or, in other words, that those who believe in the doctrin of Christian theology lead better lives than those who do not. This is unkind and untruthful in every sense of the word. Its untruthfulness is most apparent, whether the pages of history are examined, whether travels are extended to the countries of all religions, or whether our country is made the field of our search. By perusing the pages of history it will be found that believers in Christianity hav taken more human life, hav caused the blood of their fellow-men to flow far more profusely, than the believers in any other system of religion. They hav persecuted unbelievers more cruelly, hav applied torture for exercising the sacred right of opinion, hav used worse and more implements of agony, hav applied their hellish inventions in prison cells and underground dungeons; they hav tortured on the rack, they hav burnt at the stake, and practiced many other horrible modes of torture and death a thousand times over more than the believers of any other system of religion, and far more than all of them added together. Buddhism, the greatest system of religion in the world, which has existed six hundred years longer than Christianity, and had twice the number of adherents, has never persecuted on account of its religion; it has never proselyted by the sword; it has never burnt at the stake, and has never used implements of torture in the name and doctrins of its great founder. Christians hav done all this for centuries.

We hav within the past twelve months visited the lands where Mohammedanism, Brahmanism, Zoroastrinism, Buddhism, Confucianism, and Shintoism are strongly believed in, and where Christianity has little or no foothold, and we found those people more honest, more moral, more disposed to lead upright lives, freer from frauds and deep designs against their fellow-beings; less of cheating and swindling, less of intemperance, less of prostitution, less of crimes which take them to prison and make them outcasts in the world, than is found in Christian nations. This is positivly true and cannot be disproved.

It is not found that professors of Christianity in our own country lead any better lives, are any more human or sympathetic, exhibit any more charity, are any more kindly disposed, any less inclined to lechery and licentiousness, any more moral in any way, than those who make no profession of Christianity and do not pretend that they hav been "born again." As a rule an unprofessor of Christianity will perform a kindly act, will do a good deed to a fellow being, as willingly and as disinterestedly as the professor. Even the teachers of Christianity, those who claim to act upon a commission from the throne of God, somewhere above the clouds, to break the bread of life to the faithful, and to act the part of the good shepherd, and lead the lambs of the flock to the fold of safety and protection, prove themselvs to be as carnal-minded, as sinful, as much addicted to the lusts of the eye, the lusts of the flesh, and the pride of life as any other class of men we hav among us. We hav published authentic accounts of nearly a thousand clergymen in our country who within the past six years hav been guilty of various crimes dishonorable to themselvs and to the human race, particularly the crime of adultery and licentiousness; these being the cases that hav been reported by the secular press of the country. There is no profession, whether lawyers, doctors, or teachers, who hav proved themselvs to be half so bad in the directions named as these professed meek and lowly disciples of Christ and self-constituted teachers of the masses; and it is probable not one in ten of the cases of their licentiousness and adultery is brought to the light. Far the larger proportion of these are "hushed up" and kept from public knowledge.

No, Mr. Breed, it will not do to undertake to establish the claims of Christianity, or to show that unbelievers are wrong, upon the ground of the superior purity and sinlessness of its professors. It is most untrue, in the face of history, observation in other countries and religions, and even a casual glance at our own country, that those who doubt the truthfulness of Christian claims are any more immoral than Christians, or that "a deterioration in life precedes and accounts for a failing in faith." If a belief in Christianity is sure to make its professor moral and pure, how is it that so many Christian teachers and communicants easily fall victims to lust and crime? If the belief in Jesus and his religion makes them sinless and pure, they must be arrant hypocrits. Unbelievers are certainly no more sinful in these directions than believers, and it is a species of clerical impertinence to insinuate it.

Perhaps we hav replied to the reverend gentlemen's arguments; and if we hav given satisfaction to himself and Mr. Smith we are truly glad. If we can perform other work in a similar direction, we will cheerfully address ourselvs to it.

Anthony Comstock.

This individual is out in the North American Review for November in an article praising his Society for the Suppression of Vice, and boasting of the work it has performed, the hundreds he has arrested, and the tons of obscene matter he has seized. It is the same old story over again, mere boast and bombast. He makes strong assertions that he never uses means of decoy, and that no one has been requested by him to do otherwise than the business the victim was engaged in, and that sealed letters hav never been violated; he repeats the frightful charges about the mass of bad matter sent to school girls and boys, all of which are false.

Comstock has unquestionably done much good in driving indecent publications out of the market, but this was principally accomplished under the old state laws, showing the new oppressiv and dangerous statues which Congress passed at his instance to be wholly unnecessary. He dilates upon the number of evil-doers he has brought to justice, but he says nothing about the innocent persons he has sent to prison and disgraced, the agony and ruin he has needlessly brought upon many, nor the diabolical spirit of bloodhoundism and fiendishness he has evinced, in which qualities he has rivaled Matthew Hopkins, the witch-finder, in England, two hundred and fifty years ago, who caused hundreds and thousands of innocent but unfortunate persons to be brought to the most intense sufferings, and the most horrible deaths. This modern Matthew Hopkins says nothing of his insolent officiousness, the perjuries he has committed, the persons he has persistently tried to ruin; he inveighs loudly against "the blasphemy of Infidel publications," which he reckons in with "the vile schemes for corrupting the rising generation." When he obtains all the power he desires he will probably make renewed efforts to suppress all Infidel publications, as he has many times boasted he would do. His will is ample in this direction, but his power is not yet adequate to the undertaking.

O. B. Frothingham follows in reply to Comstock, giving him first all the best praise possible for his earnestness and the good work he has done, but further on criticizing Comstock's modes, expressing fears of evils that may arise from societies and individuals to prescribe what others may read and possess, and particularly condemning Comstock's methods to decoy and his threats to put down Infidelity. He hoped the Society for the Suppression of Vice would not be a permanent necessity, and that it may be superseded.

The Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley completes the symposium, speaking, of course, wholly in praise of Comstock's modes and purposes, and sees nothing to criticize or condemn. There are two sides to this matter, and it is to be regretted that misrepresentation and falsehood are persistently employed in misstating facts. We would all rejoice in the good that has been done, had not so much evil and cruelty and oppression been blended with it.

Beecher's New Departure.

On another page we giv the account of Beecher's withdrawal from the Congregational Association with which he was connected for a third of a century together with his confession of faith which he entertains at the present moment, or rather what he wishe the world to accept as his belief. It is gratifying to all Liberal minds that Mr. Beecher has had the moral courage to place himself squarely upon the record in denying the existence of hell and the truth of the doctrin of the atonement—of justice being appeased by the innocent tasting death for the guilty. He sees that quality to be not godlike nor loveable.

But thousands will regret that Mr. Beecher could not hav shown more honesty, and gone farther in stating what he does not believe. He has a great mind. Few men hav stronger organizations than he, but he has more than once exhibited the quality of falseness. It is one of the grandest things in a man's character not to deny the truth Had he, when arraigned before the bar of justice for his deflections from a virtuous life, possessed the sterling truthfulness to confess his fault and acknowledge his error, instead of perjuring himself daily for two weeks, the world would hav thought far more of him, and would readily hav forgiven him, and blessed him with renewed love. But he was not capable of rising to the grandest situation which a man can occupy. He was false to himself, and false to the world.

So it is to be feared he is now when he attempts to tell his countrymen what he believes. It is clear to many that he claims to believe what he does not believe. We, for instance, cannot think he believes in a personal God, in the divinity of Jesus Christ—not being begotten by a natural father like other men; in miracles, beginning with the creation of the universe from nothing, and in the government of a personal something called Divine Providence. We do not think Beecher believes in supernaturalism, or in any of those things. He has too often expressed his convictions upon the subjects for it to be held for a moment that he believes them. If he could only hav been grand enough to rise and be bravely honest in this business, and told all he does not believe, he would be more honored to-day, and more revered in all coming time. He has misimproved one of the grandest opportunities of his life.

Bright's Lecture.

There will be a complimentary benefit for Charles Bright before the Liberal Club on Friday evening, Oct. 27th. Mr. Bright will giv his lecture, "Scientific Morality." There will also be special addresses by Wakeman, Andrews, Palmer, and others. A rich treat may be expected. Mr. Bright has been with us for a few weeks, and has won golden opinions by his ability and eloquence. He is one of our best lecturers, and is thoroughly advanced and radical. He has the courage of his opinions. He has been doing a noble work in Australia, to which he now returns. The Liberals of America should giv him a cordial welcome, and make him feel that we appreciate his noble services for our cause in a far-off continent. Let all come and bring their friends with them to the lecture.

THE disagreeable task of moving is now pretty well accomplished, though we hav not become fully settled yet. We are pleased with our new quarters, and hav much better and more room than before. We hav added considerably to our stock of books, and hope to see an increased demand for them. We are prepared to fill orders for libraries, public and private, and to furnish books of all kinds on the best terms. We trust our friends will remember that our address is now 21 Clinton Place, and that, as remarked, we wish to fill numerous orders for books.

MR. BEECHER has formally declared his disbelief in hell and the atonement, but he still holds on to Christ as the only begotten son of God, and believes in the immaculate conception. That is to say, he thinks the Virgin Mary was just as innocent as Elizabeth Tilton. ANTICHRIST.

What Are Brains?

HOW ARE THEY MADE? AND WHAT IS THAT WHICH SURVIVES THEIR USE AND LOSS WHILE IN THE BODY DURING PHYSICAL LIFE?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav prepared what follows to show that the brains of animal life are but an organ of the body, and that the doctrins of "reflex actions" and the "combustibility of organic life" are self-destructiv. Also that, from the standpoint of substance and materiality, a future life is predicated; and that the real substance, life, force, or whatever terms we may apply to existence and organization, is the controling, organizing, and developing principle. That as we are sure of the use of five senses, there must, also, from the peculiarities of structure, etc., be a grand controling and combining sense in man of "consciousness," and to some extent to all animal life below him, until it (consciousness) finally disappears, and the life principle of the earth only is seen. The vital properties which reside in organized bodies, or living bodies, are characterized by what is termed a "molecular arrangement" not producable by ordinary physical attractions and laws. Matter thus organized consists of solids, usually so disposed in a network of laminæ and filaments as to hav fluids of various natures to take up the intervening spaces, and in which the various forms of solids are separated into somewhat distinct organs. "Texture or tissue" is the anatomical term by which such assemblages are distinguished; of these the cellular is most elementary, being the only make-up of several, and a partial component of all the others.

Although the phenomena which are designated as vital are never found apart from organization and are held by some naturalists as identical with it, yet in the order of succession vital actions necessarily stand to organization, or organic structures, in the relation of antecedents; for the production of even the most rudimentary forms and textures implies the previous operation of life-combining tendencies or "vital affinities." The origin and early tendencies of these vital forces and combinations into the present developed structures are beyond the scope of the most astute mind. The data upon which to build a positiv philosophy are too conflicting and irreconcilable, and while the state of science safely rejects the supernaturalism of the theologian, it is equally safe to say that the origin is beyond the knowledge of man, and has baffled the most profound thinkers of all times; but it is a certainty that life is the product only of life; that every new plant or animal proceeds from some pre-existent being of the same form and character.

The experiments upon animals by vivisection for the purpose of ascertaining the peculiar functions of the various parts of the animal economy, hav been so conflicting that much of the testimony is of no value. It has, however, led to a knowledge of a more thorough character as regards the nervous structure and the characteristics of the matter of which the brain is composed.

Man is organized with five senses, as usually taught, but upon a careful observation of his nervous structure it will appear that neither of them has a direct connection with the cerebrum. Of the sense of hearing it will be seen that the nerves terminate in the cerebellum. In fact, all the lines of communication emanate from this part of the head. Hearing, seeing, tasting, smelling, and the general sense of feeling all hav their origin in that part of the head which is the seat of animal life, or what may be termed the motiv power of organic life. The connection that is formed between these various nerve structures and the brain proper is by a fibrous material radiating from the surfaces of the ganglions and by that means envelope the convolutions of the brain, analogous to the wires of a number of telegraphic lines, and their office seems to be to inform the brain of what the eye sees, the ear hears, the tongue tastes, etc. For instance, the eye receives through the optic nerve an image which has been impressed upon the retina by means of the crystalline lens. The light which has become focalized makes its impression as a heat picture. This picture is of no account, however, until conveyed by the optic nerve into the part from which the nerve emanates, and until the impression is conveyed by means of the telegraphic wires or fibers from the cerebellum to the cerebrum; and it is equally clear that the whole structure of the cerebrum is brought into contact with this picture, but the image is seen or felt upon the retina. In fact if the whole brain could be removed from the head, and the retina and optic nerve left unimpaired, and the picture observed from without by another, it could be seen as upon the retina, and not in any part of the brains. This brings us to see that the cerebrum, or brain, is, after all, but a secondary contrivance for registering the impressions that are taken in by means of the nervous channels of the body, and are distinguished by the consciousness according to the feelings which each class of nerves generate by their molecular actions.

The especial feature that I wish to introduce here is this: Whatever knowledge of external nature we hav comes through the sense of feeling. We feel everything; we feel morally, intellectually, and selfishly, or animally, according to the states of mind and body. And in the same way we feel every thought and every emotion. Phrenologists hav divided the brain into various departments and organs, and hav made distinctions between the intellect and the selfish and animal propensities, but it is only a distinction of words. The school boy feels his way to the solution of a problem that has baffled his skill in figures, and delights with exuberance of joy when he has gained the victory of solution; and in the same way the inventor, by experimentation and comparing of thoughts which convey feelings of certainty or doubt, eventually arrives at the truth, and when it comes it has been by a process of feeling from the beginning to the end of it.

It is a very significant fact that the brains are the last arrangement in the combination that leads from the inner consciousness or life to the external world around us, and that often are the actions so slow along the communicating channels that a great deal of injury is done to the body before the person is aware of it. The nerves are able to transmit or receive impressions only about two hundred feet per second, which is too slow to prevent injury from contact with fire, frost, etc.

The principle of life, or, in man, his consciousness, must be something more and different from brains, which, by physiology, is clearly shown to be only an organ to receive impressions. There are thirty-two pairs of nerves of similar anatomical origin and composition, which are used to receive and communicate motions and sensations, and they are divided into distinct systems. But the important question is, how do they retain these impressions for years? and by what means are they (the impressions) remembered, when we are taught that not a particle of any nerve, fiber, tissue, bone, muscle, or brain will last but several years at most? If the whole body is subject to decay and change at least once in seven years, there must be something of a more permanent character about it than its anatomical structure.

That thing is the life-principle which existed in the animalcule or germ, which took up its residence in the female ovum, from which the body was built up, and not excepting the brains themselvs, and which germ always has manifested its ceaseless life through the organization of the human body. So that although your body has changed continually during a long life, and thereby has discharged every particle of its materials, brains and all, several times, the same life-germ that wiggled like a tadpole (and had its appearance) has now added to its proportions materially by a more complete organization, and is now equal, or perhaps superior, to its progenitors. That germ inherited the peculiarities, both mentally and physically, of its parents, and those parents from antecedent progenitors, and so on back into the oblivious past, beyond the possibility of anything but a partial conjecture of the origin of mankind or of animal life on this planet.

It is quite plain to perceive, then, that all this talk about "brain waves," and about what the brains do in the way of originating memory and life, is an error, as the brain, like all the rest of the physical body, was built up by slow efforts of the life-principle, contained in the germ; and just as the acorn contains the undeveloped oak, or the chestnut the undeveloped chestnut-tree, so does the human germ contain the undeveloped man or woman, or animal germ of some other department of animal life. Life and matter are co-eternal, but the life is the controling force; and when scientists tell us that matter developed life they are asking us to believe that the engin is pulling the load instead of the steam.

One word more about the doctrin of reflex action, recording ganglia, etc. Dr. Draper, and most others of the Materialistic medicos, assert that "the cerebrum originates the nervous force, and also that it becomes the repository of every species of nervous manifestation. In the registering ganglia thoughts and impressions are stored away, the previous existence of which is almost forgotten, until by some incident they are recalled in all their pristin vigor and clearness." Again, "The cerebellum is the binding-room of the printing-house of the brain, in which the plates and pages that hav been formed in the engravers', compositors', and press-rooms, or ganglia, of the establishment, are placed in proper form and relation to each other, so as to form a book which may be boxed up with other works taken from the repository, or cerebrum, and sent down the dumb-waiter, or spinal cord, to fill an order received through the telegraph, or afferent nerve, by the railroad of the efferent nerve." This is a splendid analogy, and in good illustrativ phraseology of the doctor's idea; but the misfortune is that by his own theory of the "combustibility of organic life," the one theory destroys the other. The physiologist of the present day demonstrates by experiments which we cannot refute that the oxidation of the materials introduced into the system as food is one of the essential conditions for the maintenance of life. And of course it follows that because the various substances are a necessary sustaining power, the body to which they administer must be constantly throwing off the substance of this necessary supply, and of course these brains, nerves, muscles, fibers, tissues, bones, ganglia, etc., are constantly wasting away and being restored by new brain, ganglia, etc. Now, if this be so, how can the new ganglia, by any incident, recall an event of a record made upon the old materials, which hav become worn out and wasted away? The idea is absurd. This, then, establishes the fact of a soul or life-principle independently of the worn-out materials which it used to maintain itself and grow upon, and which regulates and controls all the ganglia and nerves, etc.

What is reflex action? When a body is thrown by any force against another body, such as a ball against the side of a house, it will rebound away; or if the sun shine upon a smooth surface it will reflect any object in some other direction, according to the angle of incidence; but the reflex action in such case must take place immediately and as a result of the force or impingement of the body it strikes. It is just so with the reflex action of a nervous force; its action must be immediate. You might as well expect to throw a ball against a house and hav it stick fast and at some future time rebound, or hav the sun shine upon a person or the water and hav his reflection at some future time after he had walked away, as to expect the reflex action of the ganglia to account for the manifestation of the mind. In the language of Robert, "It won't do, gentlemen; it won't do."

Will our friend, T. Winter, and his school of thinkers, please examin into and see what originates brains and what they do in life? I might add that the doctrin of reflex action cannot account for direct action. A reflection must correspond in nature and appearance to that which produced it. It (the ganglia) cannot reflect something which it (they) did not receive; or, in other words, all new thoughts and actions are a direct contradiction of the latest-taught ideas on the subject of mind from a Materialistic standpoint. And it follows that if the life-principle can survive the wasting materials of the body during this life there is no good reason why it may not continue to exist where the old body is entirely worn out and rejected. Donkey Editorials.

The New York Times has a funny editor, whose fun consists in maintaining some ludicrous absurdity with an air of solemn earnestness, as, for instance, attempting to show that nobody has seen the comet, or that a human baby was kidnapped and educated by a cow.

It has also a solemn and philosophical editor, whose business it is to speak as an oracle on all disputed questions. But there is nothing in the editorial columns to signify whether an article has been written by the funny editor as a sample of absurdity or by the philosophic editor as the profoundest wisdom; and sometimes we are greatly puzzled, on the first reading, to tell whether the article was meant for profound fun or profound wisdom. Both writers are equally profound and grave, and sometimes it is difficult to tell which is the more absurd.

For example, the following passage in the Times, which the pressure of duties prevented our noticing when it first appeared, would be recognized by the most intelligent readers as one of the solemn efforts of the funny man—the dignified clown of the Times:

> When a person steps out of the ranks of comfortable and common-place humanity and gets off somewhere by the side of the road and labels himself Positivist, Freethinker, Atheist, etc., the world speedily sets him down as an ass, and in nineteen cases out of twenty the world is right. The twentieth case is usually one of simple lunacy.

If this was an effort of the clown of the Times, it would be well for his employers to confine him to subjects more nearly on the level of his capacities, and to hand over such subjects as science and religion to writers who are capable of discussing them sensibly, for there are some sensible writers whose thoughts appear in the columns of the Times.

The article from which we quote was written with such apparent mock-heroic earnestness that the majority of readers would take it for a fair specimen of the principles and ability of the Times.

That paper is thus editorially committed to the position that all such men as Ingersoll, Paine, Hume, Valtaire, Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, Haeckel, Humboldt, and a majority of the most eminent scientists of to-day are ninety-five per cent of them jackasses, and the remaining five per cent lunatics; and thus the donkey editor has settled the question.

If Mr. Jones, of the Times, can stand such nonsense as this, and continue to pay salaries to donkey editors who discredit respectable journalism, let him go on; it is not our funeral! B.

Montaigne, the essayist, took his son in front of a crucifix once, and said: "You would reform the world; behold the fate of a reformer!"

What Is Character?

It is not that which possesses unlimited wealth, seeks high places by fair means or foul, and arrogantly lords it over the lowly. It is not that which flaunts in velvets and laces and jewels, simpering frivolous persiflage, or drawling fashionable nonsensicalities. It is not that which pays ostentatiously to the calls of charity, striving for distinction by handsome presentations, yet at heart begrudging the poor a penny. Nor does it consist in the sanctimonious whinings of insignificant duties, or the maudlin pratings of prudence, a word so dwarfed by its puritanic disciples, there is not pith enough left in it to afford a clever theme, even for the ingenious pen of an Emerson. Nor yet is it that which fills the midday air with shrieks unearthly when a truth of nature is unveiled, yet in the security of privacy shaming silence with its vulgarisms. The names of such as these hav no claim to character. They are mere nonentities, rotting in oblivion as soon as consigned to their nativ element, and making despicable even the stone that bears them.

To love knowledge, to climb the hights, to descend the depths, to explore the sides, at whatever cost, at whatever risk; to search for truth wherever it may be found, and honestly, daringly, defiantly express it—this is character. To manfully work for liberty here, and then go where liberty is not; to be given stones when hungering for bread; to destroy with cyclonic ruthlessness false images, and receive as a meed the prison, the torture, and the stake; to liv a life of vicarious expiation, be buried in the cerements of calumny, and in a hundred years the remains be disniterred (the purifying breath of time having bleached to spotless whiteness the sullied robes) and embalmed in the universal love of all nations—this is character. After having served as paving stones for the feet of an existing generation, to be rehabiliated, to be crowned kings of grand principles, queens of noble sentiment, to be greeted by posterity as the paladins of truth, the honor-scarred defenders of right, the paragons of history. An Open Letter to Rountree from Eimina.

FRIEND M. J. ROUNTREE: I comply with thy request and "rise to explain" why I take the ground of Atheism. First and foremost, I cannot find one single proof of the existence of a god, and next I do not see any need for one.

Men created gods out of their ignorance, and why should we believe in the "infinit" Deity of the civilized nineteenth century any more than in those of heathen lands or the gods of Greece and Rome who dwelt on Mount Olympus? All this talk about not being able to grasp the infinit is only going around the subject. What we want to know is where the idea of gods originated and on what it is founded. We find every time we trace it back that it is only a name for causes that are wrapped in mystery—only a name for the unknown—only a word to express "I don't know," just as Spiritualists use the word spirit in explanation of phenomena they cannot divine the wherefore of.

And why call it "dogmatic hardihood" to assert there is no God any more than to assert that no man can liv on after his head is cut off or his heart taken out? If I assert that in the middle of the earth dwells a race of people who far surpass those on its surface, it is my place to prove it possible for them to be there—to giv at least one proof of their existence; therefore god-creators must prove the gods to be. And why deem it a want of "sympathy" when one denies the impossible?

Gods are impossible, unnatural, and wholly inconceivable. Now suppose there is a God, just for a moment; may I ask, then, where he is and why he is (not she), and what real enjoyment such a lonely being can hav? What happiness is possible to any existence that has no wants, no hopes, no desires, or aims?

Is it a want of sympathy that labors to kill off all superstitions and absurdities—that wishes only truth and reality to prosper? God is the great central superstition, and as long as we leave this tree to grow, and only lop off a limb here and there, we fail to kill the grand source of the disease. We nourish the fountain, and only clean out a few cesspools.

Atheism may be "impatient of contradiction," but it is that indignant, virtuous impatience that longs for error and delusion to giv place to truth and reality. It is such slow work to uproot wrong and establish right that I often feel almost out of heart trying.

I had worked tooth and nail against the monstrous evil of tobacco-using for thirty years before I heard of one man who, because of my labors, had laid down his pipe. Those of my own blood, those near and dear to me, used the filthy weed in spite of continual remonstrance. But did it discourage me? No, it only rendered me more "impatient" to kill the foul fiend. If I had the last tobacco-seed to-day I'd grind it to powder and burn it to cinders, even though millions were offered me as its purchase money, and this, too, as much as I want more means to kill gods with.

"Impatient of contradiction!" Yes, when we see so much of wrong, of error, of false belief everywhere, and spend a lifetime trying to sow truth and right in its place, how can we help being impatient?

I do feel a deep sympathy for all who suffer, and if I were a god I'd exterminate all misery as far as it was possible for it to be done. But as I am not I can only do my little toward killing the gods who create evil, and teaching poor misguided humans how to avoid a few of the pitfalls by which they are surrounded.

When I see great, strong, brutal men whipping poor, ignorant, badly-born and badly-reared children I wish for a little godly power to pour into the parental brain the knowledge that children are just what their heredity and training make them; and if the whip is deserved the parent's back should feel the blow. One of the pious God-believers of this place often whips his child the whole length of the street, right here in Snowville, forcing us all to hear its pitiful shrieks and appeals for mercy. What but a belief in a cruel and revengeful God creates cruel and revengeful parents?

"Injustice often conquers,
Pain curses every hour;
The good and true and beautiful
Are trampled like the flower.
You say he is our father—
That which he wills doth stand;
If he is thus almighty,
Why don't he lend a hand?

What is this monarch doing
Upon his golden throne?
To right the wrong stupendous,
Giv joy instead of moan?
With his resistless majesty,
Each force at his command,
Each law his own creation,
Why don't he lend a hand?

Alas, I fear he's sleeping,
Or is himself a dream—
A bubble on thought's ocean,
Our fancy's fading gleam!
We look in vain to find him
Upon his throne so grand,
Then turn your vision earthward,
'Tis we must lend a hand."

Truth—A Poem in Three Parts.

PART FIRST.

Our answer to the learned Cyrus Smith.
It proves that his religion is a myth.

PART SECOND.

By evolution let us if we can
Learn the true origin of worlds and man.

PART THIRD.

If orthodox religion you despise,
What will you giv us in the place of lies?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Truth is the most important subject in the universe; hence the absolute necessity of a truth-seeker's newspaper, where all denominations get an impartial and equal hearing, such as no other paper in this world does giv. Extensiv, indeed, are the heavens! Where do they begin? Where do they end? What is their extent? Can angels answer the question? Hav angels traveled the vast circuit? Can angels measure the bounds of space? No. It is boundless, it is unknown, it is amazing all.

How charming, then, to reflect that truth is as great as the heavens—as extensiv as the skies! Transporting reflection! Let us indulge thee once more; and while we think over the past, present, and future victories of truth over myth and falsehood add one to the number of advocates of truth.

CANTO I.

Truth is what all mankind desire to know;
To find the truth, alas! where shall we go?
Go to the perfect, never-erring rules—
Nature, philosophy, and reason's schools.
Master all sciences the truth to find,
This most important maxim mind:
However learn'd in human creeds in youth,
Use common sense or never find the truth.

All Christian creeds were once but pagan frauds,
Consisting of a trinity of gods.
The ancient heathen gods and all their deeds
Were changed to Hebrew, then to Christian, creeds.
Gods, heaven, hell—man's fall—god's plan
Were all the fancies from the fears of man.
The Christian's Bible-books mankind did make,
Their heathen origin who can mistake?

From Bible tales came Brother Smith to know
That gods make devils, sin, and endless woe?
Will learned Cyrus tell us if he can
About man's fall, the devil's, and God's plan?
'Tis our ambition perfect truth to find
From Smith's infallible inspired mind!
The Bible pharisees, indeed, we know
Better and wiser than all men below.

Do Bible devils new'days get in hogs?
Does good St. Patrick banish snakes and frogs?
No, Christian creeds are getting more sublime!
The gods are getting wiser all the time!
Will some learned orthodox, some stupid dunce,
Be kind enough to answer us at once?
Are all things possible with gods, do tell,
Can gods make Infidels believe in hell?

Gods, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and dreams
Can't save us all. This is the truth, it seems,
For Jesus came a bloody sword to bring;
Christ givs us hell, and its infernal sting.
All Jewish gods are not so bad as he,
From inspiration all mankind may see.
If man is God's, will some good Christian tell
Why Jesus God don't save all souls from hell?

Is it the truth—to save all souls gods tried?
For this grand purpose hav gods lived and died?
And hav their deaths and all their efforts failed?
What hav their mummeries and myths availed?
But few are saved—gods Jesus Christ did tell!
And all mankind deserve to go to hell!
Mankind begin to see the Bible frauds;
That snakes and devils are outwitting gods.

CANTO II.

Were trees and fruits perfected in the shade
Before the sun and moon and stars were made?
Is it the truth gods did make man with dust?
Believe this fable or be damned we must.
May it not be a biblical mistake
From Adam's rib gods did a woman make?
Was no dust left to make dear mother Eve?
This Bible tale can any fool believe?

Eve ate an apple—it digested well!
For this sweet apple must we go to hell?
This is not truth. You see the truth below,
Mankind fall up instead of down, we know.
Progression is the skeptic's holy word,
This is no fiction, fable, or absurd.
This is the truth—the perfect honor bright!
So help us, Yahweh! this is truth and right!

Did the gods know Eve would their apple eat,
And that would all the plans of gods defeat?
If hell and brimstone are the gods' best plan,
Who is to blame, the maker or the man?
We sometimes question who the deuce made gods!
Who knows that Bibles are not myths and frauds?
Without the Bibles and the devils too,
What would God's holy clergy find to do?

God's holy clergy soon would turn to tramps!
For many of them now are private scamps!
Is it the truth that gods delight in blood?
Is it the truth—the fable of the flood?
Is it the truth—Saint Jonah and the whale?
Will devils always over gods prevail?
Is it the truth, Lot's wife turned into salt?
No, 'tis a lie; for she was not in fault.

What fool believes that Baalam's ass did talk?
And snakes at first upon their tails did walk?
Is it the truth the sun did once stand still?
That God's elect should murder, slay, and kill?
Is it the truth the moon at noon shone bright
So gods could see to help the Jews to fight?
Was infants' blood by gods in torrents spilled?
By holy bears were little children killed?

Were virgins saved, male population slain?
To-day do gods delight in human pain?
Do Hebrews liv in the most dreadful fire?
Do unbelievers now and then expire?
Is it the truth from God's inspired pen
That lions eat none but ungodly men?
Such cruel gods and holy Bible lies,
And infant murder, who can help despise?

CANTO III.

Did Hebrew poets ever raise the dead?
Is it the truth, Ezekiel's dung-made bread?
Saint Samson's hair, his foxes, and his lies
Skeptics and Infidels indeed despise.
Is it the truth the gods did leave their thrones
To pregnate Mary without flesh or bones?
Is it the truth that gods and virgins can Produce a god without the aid of man?

God-making business is a pagan view
That never was and never will be true.
God-making business in God's holy word
To human reason is the most absurd.
Is it the truth, or is it Bible lies,
That Yahweh's blood and bones did both arise?
If God and Christ are absolutely one,
Christ is God's father, and God is Christ's son.

Is it the truth one God can ever be
By any process multiplied to three?
Is it the truth gods always are the same?
Is it the truth gods never were to blame?
If hell and devils both are God's designs
Is it a wonder that gods changed their minds?
Is this the reason gods do now relent
For making man? And do they still repent?

To show what truth is we will first explain
What is not truth, and make the subject plain.
It is not truth that gods did make themselvs;
Gods made by man, truth says, upon the shelves.
Is it the truth, that dear old Bible rule,
Believe in gods or be proscribed a fool?
Is it the truth gods said, "Let us make man?"
Is it the truth gods made a brimstone plan

Truth seekers, spurn all cruel, man-made gods,
For science proves them only myths and frauds!
Is it the truth from nothing gods did make
All that exists, including brimstone lake?
Did gods make all things by a single word?
Did gods make devils? Heavens, how absurd!
Did gods make evils, and did gods relent?
Did gods make brimstone, and did gods repent?

Is it the truth a war in heaven was waged
In which the gods of heaven were engaged?
Is it the truth God's savages did rebel?
Did Mumbo Jumbo's banish them to hell?
Great gods, how many seas of blood were spilled?
How many trillions of gods angels killed?
Dear Brother Smith, please tell us all about
Who drove the rebels and the devils out.

Letters from Friends.

ERIE, PA., Oct. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Last week I asked Mr. House to get me two copies of "Crimes of Preachers." Some of my acquaintances hav seen or read the book, and all were astonished at the horrible arraignment. I inclose you $1 for four more copies. I wish every family could hav one. Perhaps their homes would be more carefully guarded.

Respectfully yours, D. M. JOHNSON.

ROSWELL, N. M., Sept. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6.50—$5 for "A Truth Seeker Around the World." I hav been a subscriber for your paper for four or five years, and hav intended to hav the books ever since they were spoken of, but circumstances hav prevented until now. I am glad that you hav returned safely home again. I wish you as long life, as much good health, as much happiness, and as much prosperity as any man that takes your paper or ever read it.

Yours for the truth, SAMUEL CUNNINGHAM.

ALLIANCE, O., Oct. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I received your notice last evening. No, I do not want my paper stopped. I knew my time was up, but I was not quite prepared to meet it when I should, but I am now, and send herewith $2—one for the rest of this year and one to commence the next year with. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the first number you printed in Paris, Ill., all the way through till now. I wish I could do more for it, but circumstances are against me. I hav helped get you a few subscribers. My next birthday will count seventy. If I liv I want THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours truly, JAMES HARTLEY.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., Oct. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I notice I am about a month behind. Please excuse me. We hav a sort of independent Liberal club in this town, which has been in existence about two years. We hav had a good attendance at our meetings, and I am confident we hav done considerable good. The churches hav tried hard during that time to make conversions, but hav failed entirely, while the Liberal sentiment has steadily gained ground, and we intend to keep hammering away. I am glad to know you hav returned home safe and sound, and I hope I may sometime be fortunate enough to meet you.

Truly yours, E. CARPENTER.

SAGINAW CITY, MICH., Oct. 6, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Your card came to hand. I am heartily glad to hav you become acquainted with me, for many hav told me that I am not like anybody else. I hav followed you closely since Anthony's first attack, through his mock trial, and your imprisonment in jail and at Albany. Hav been in deep sympathy with you, in sorrow and joy, all around the world, on Jordan's muddy banks, and in the bare bull-cart under a scorching tropical sun, to the happy reception at home. As I could not hav the privilege of partaking of that welcome love-feast, I thought of the substantial three dollars which would soon become due. I will now inclose two dollars for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and postage on the books.

My respects to yourself and wife, and the faithful Eugene. The friend of free government,

W. G. ELMER.

CARLISLE, WARREN CO., IA., Oct. 10, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry you were under the necessity of sending me notice that my time had expired. You need not be afraid to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to your patrons here in Carlisle. We will never desert you without due notice. We are all true to the cause of Freethought and liberty of speech. We hav no Liberal League established here yet; but we hav a fair sprinkling of out-spoken Liberals, notwithstanding there are four churches in our town of only four hundred inhabitants. But we are holding them level in the management of our schools; we hav a Liberal principal teacher.

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor. I admire the course you hav taken in battering down orthodox and fighting for man's liberty. Enough of this. You will please find post-office order for $5.50, to be applied as directed. Yours truly, M. GUISINGER.

P. S.—In evidence of the growth of Liberalism, and the passing away of superstition, we find the following inscription on the monument of Charles Hastings (in the cemetery of this place), who was a practical Freethinker: "'Neath the shade of this beautiful tulip repose is sweet. No faith in the blood of priests, nor in the Jewish mythical monster, God."

PLATTSBURGH, N. Y., Oct, 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I heartily approve of Mr. Green's suggestion to inquire into the manner in which Stephen Girard's will is being carried out. But a few months ago I heard a clergyman boast that through a flaw in the will the church people had been enabled to steal the institution, and were running it to suit themselvs. He said the hand of God directed him to leave out one word so that the Christian people of this country could stop the bitter stream of Infidelity pouring forth from that institution; that the Bible was now taught as the standard of morals interpreted by a pious Methodist layman. I could not help thinking it a handy thing for Christians that they had a god upon whom they could lay all their deviltry. He exposed his ignorance or untruthfulness when he said that Infidelity was ever taught there, the terms of Mr. Girard's will being such that no religious or anti-religious teaching was to be allowed. No doubt the congregation took it all in, and devoutly thanked God that the chance to steal a dead Infidel's property had been improved. Who ever knew them to leave such an opportuity unimproved. As Col. Ingersoll, in one of his political speeches, says of the politicians: "They steal everything they can get their hands on, and, my God! what hands." I hope the Liberals of this country will take an interest in this matter, and, if necessary, contribute liberally toward righting this great wrong to one of their number. W. L. WEVER.

NAPLES, N. Y., Oct. 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Of course I want THE TRUTH SEEKER, for more reasons than I will be able to write on this small sheet.

In the first place, it is the paper for the masses. I would not say anything against other Liberal papers, and wish more were published and more read; at the same time I believe more people will read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that it is better calculated to rouse the people from their lethargy and stimulate thought than any other paper with which I am acquainted. Nor is this all; I believe that many of the Liberal papers are indebted to THE TRUTH SEEKER for their existence, for had it not been for the old pioneer, religious would still be read by hundreds who are now the readers of Liberal papers. It was the plowshare of the old TRUTH SEEKER which first broke up the ground and rendered it possible for these later papers to flourish. God bless the old TRUTH SEEKER, and if he has an eye to business he will. And when I go up to the gate of the holy city I shall take one along, and as soon as St. Peter sees it you'll see him begin to fumble for the big key.

Since I hung up my new decalog at the late Watkins Convention the ministers hav been preaching at me and writing letters to me and giving me fits. Well, its nothing more than I expected. I console myself by the reflection that "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." When ministers get mad it may be taken for granted that some live Liberal has been to work. So many full, and I may say fair, reports of the Watkins Convention seem to gravel the kidneys of the ministers, and so they must giv the Liberals an overhauling. Yours truly, JOHN PECK.

MEMPHIS, MO., Oct. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Some of our Materialistic friends appear to be about as dogmatic as the sectarians of the churches. They declare in the most positiv manner that there is no proof that man livs at all after what we call death. It would be much more modest and philosophical for them to say, We hav seen no proof of such a thing.

A distinguished astronomer is said to hav declared it to be dangerous to pronounce the word impossible outside of positiv science. We know that twice five ever did and ever will equal ten. Every one who can count can verify it. But because we can't see the spiritual man leave the physical body at the moment the heart ceases to beat is no more proof that there is no immortal part than the fact that our inability to see electricity in its quiescent state proves that it does not exist. So far as my observations hav extended, those who affirm with so much vehemence that man consists wholly of flesh, blood, and bones, that all his mental attributes result entirely from his physical organization, seem to take good care not to investigate the phenomena of modern Spiritualism. It looks as if they feared if they paid any attention to the subject that they could no longer repeat so heartily their favorit formula, "Death ends all." And such persons seem not to know that many of the most eminent scientists of the age, after exhaustiv investigations, avow themselvs Spiritualists.

The cause of this stolid repugnance to the idea of a future life is to be found in the diabolisms of Christianity; the pictures of either hell or heaven, drawn by a hireling priesthood, are disgusting to every clear head and sympathetic heart which was not distorted in childhood. STEPHEN YOUNG.

WELLAND, ONT., CAN., Oct. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just returned from Norwich, where I hav been visiting amongst my old friends for a month. It is a good country, and the people are good staunch Christians, as we know them to be who hav been brought up in that faith, and never know anything else, and abounds in Christian charity, if you know what that is. And I suppose there is no man that has a better right to know than yourself. I had to be careful and watch my opportunities to say a word at variance with their creed. I did manage sometimes to get in a few wedge-shaped words which I thought might possibly set them thinking a little, though to them it is a very up-hill job to think of anything that is at variance with the tradition in which they hav been brought up. I don't suppose there is a TRUTH SEEKER comes to any post-office within ten miles of them, but I did succeed in getting one man to express a willingness to take THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, and he actually gave me fifty cents to pay for it, so please do not fail to send it to him, as it is quite likely to prove a good missionary. I hope soon to be able to send you more. Charge it to me at present. My opinion is that there is not one sensible person in fifty who can read THE TRUTH SEEKER three months that would like to giv it up; and if they do not become converts to its creed their faith in their ortho-dox creed will become considerably weakened. With some it takes a longer time than with others to unlearn or get rid of those views that hav been impressed upon their youthful minds, and hav become like a second nature in them.

I will conclude, and with feelings of sincere friendship remain Yours truly, JOHN RAY.

WESTFIELD, N. Y., Sept. 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I see that you cannot get your journey into three volumes, making it necessary to publish a fourth. I hav been delighted in reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER your travels in different countries, and I am very glad I subscribed for the three volumes, two of which I hav already received. I cannot do without the fourth volume.

I hav observed that in your descriptions of the religions of different countries there is but little difference in the superstitions to which they are all devoted. They all worship something; they pray to something unknown; they hav their temples, their priesthoods, their ceremonies. All these only vary a little in form. They are all the same thing, Christianity not at all excepted. Although brought up in strict orthodoxy, and belonging many years to the Baptist church, I now renounce it all. Lately I hav been reflecting upon this idea of worship. I am satisfied that the worship of anything personal is degrading; no matter how high or glorious a being is, if he is tangible, or is capable of being seen, felt, or can occupy any local spot in the universe, he is not entitled to any worship any more than we are from creatures below us. The only god who is adorable, and it requires no prostrations and self-abnegation to properly regard him, is Principle. All there is in the universe, all life, all consciousness, all matter, all intellect, whether of gods or men, are amenable only to principle. Here is where the awful mistake is made in the world. Oh, the ocean of tears shed, the sacrifice of millions upon millions of money, the wretchedness entailed upon the world by this idea, that somewhere in the universe there is a personal being high above us to whom we owe something! If there is any such being he is under the same obligations to this other god, Principle, as we ourselvs are, and he must govern himself accordingly, and he is held accountable in the same way.

I am very glad you hav arrived home all safe, and hope you will be spared to do a large amount of labor for Liberalism yet in the future.

Yours truly, S. G. MCEWEN.

BOTLAND, KY., Oct. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please accept my thanks for sending the paper after my subscription had expired. I am am almost compelled to say that I could hardly do without it. I find so much information in its columns that when I receive a number I cannot lay it aside until I hav perused every page. I can truly say it was the main instrumentality in pointing me to the truth. Until I saw a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER I believed all the miraculous, unnatural, and impossible stories in the "holy Bible;" since then I hav renounced supernaturalism in toto. My belief in the Bible was, I suppose, owing more to circumstances than anything else. I liv in what is called a Christian community—a land of Bibles, churches, and Sunday-schools—a village where it is hardly known that a great number of intellectual persons hav found that the Bible is but the work of man, and that a god had no more to do with the conception of Jesus than he did with the thousands who hav lived and died in all ages past, and that a god never inspired man to write a word of the Bible. I had much rather believe that Paine was inspired by God to write his "Age of Reason" than to believe some portions of the Bible were inspired, for Paine tells the truth as I understand it, and that is more than I can say for parts of the good book. I accept the teachings of the Bible only when they are in accordance with common sense and nature. I recognize one god, i. e., the whole material universe. I believe it to be eternal; I believe it has always existed in some form and will never cease to exist. I cannot conceive of a power over or superior to nature. I cannot believe the universe was made of nothing in six days a few thousand years ago. According to my belief, life and death are entirely holocryptic, owing to unknown and hidden laws of nature yet to be discovered. Great minds are constantly discovering some law or force of nature that was unknown hundreds of years ago. Scientific investigation has revealed many things to be natural that were once considered miraculous.

The mind of man is incomprehensible. Nothing is beyond the power of its ability to comprehend when there is volume enough in aggregation for the purpose, and I fully and truly believe the time will come when all the laws of nature that are now hidden will be found and explained, and the phenomena that are now shrouded in mystery will be as clear and plain as that which we now understand. I am not over-anxious about that which I know nothing about. I came into the world with no effort of mine; I go out in the same way. If my soul or mind had an existence before I was born (which is as natural to conclude as it is that it exists after I die) the great cause which produced and took care of it before it came into my possession will surely care for it after I die; and as I hav no evidence of a mind existence in the past ages, so I see no use in there being one in the future. I had much rather believe that a dreamless, everlasting, unbroken sleep awaits me that affords no fear than to think of a future life of excruciating torments forever and ever. If beyond this life there is a state of existence now shut from our vision, the best way to prepare for it is by attending to the duties of this life. "One world at a time" is sufficient.

Let us direct all our energies to self-improvement, and let reason be our teacher; we should study to find the hidden laws of nature and improve thereby. All the evil we experience is due to and governed by natural causes, so by studying nature we can generally overcome and remove those evils after we acquaint ourselvs with their nature and relations. The present is our, and is much better than the past; but the golden age is in the future.

As I hav made this letter longer than I had intended, I will close for this time. ARTIE.

SUNDAY LAW IN CALIFORNIA.

MODESTO, CAL., Oct. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I would call attention to the article below, taken from the Wasp, of San Francisco, upon the subject of the odious "Sunday law." The gist of the article may be summed up in a few lines. A determined effort is being made to commit the Republican party in favor of the law and in opposition to the Democrats, who go for repeal.

Frank Pixley, of the Argonaut, suddenly becomes a saint, and now uses his brains, his courage, and his conscience for the "better observance of the Sabbath."

The Sacramento Record-Union has also gained the choir of which Pixley is professor, and with the aid of railroad monopolists are in full chorus, "Holiness-to-the-Lord plank in our platforms!" And, like seraphim and cherubim, they continually do cry. I hope before next November's benediction and doxology they will see their error and cry for something different than this sacred music, and go back to those principles which they taught for so many years, that it is not the duty of every man to uphold the "Sunday law;" that it is not necessay for him to believe in God, the Christian religion, the gods Jupiter, Josh, or in the prophets Jeremiah or Joe Smith, but simply to keep "ecclesiasticism out of politics," their paws out of our treasury, and their clerical noses out of our public schools. The Sabbath is the entering wedge. With it our churches hav become rich and powerful, and with its aid they hav worked their own ambitious ends and aims, but I assure you not for the conversion of man and woman to the grand type of character of Jesus of Nazareth, but that they must accept the divinity of minister and priest, and look upon them astheir superior and a higher order of beings than all things else. By the aid of Sunday they get our youths and educate them up to these false doctrins, which undoubtedly mold their conduct through life. Napoleon has truly said, "Let me d ucate the youth, and I will govern the country." Therefore let us, as Liberals, unite in abolishing the sacredness of the Sabbath, and let our motto always be, "Perfect freedom to worship or work whenever the people may deem fit, always recognizing one day as a legal holiday." Inclosed find $3 for one year's subscription.

[The following is the article referred to from the Wasp. It is surmounted by a picture representing Pixley in the character of Jesus Christ, a halo around his head, blessing little children. A small dog in the foreground seems also to be sharing the bene diction.—ED. T. S.]

PIXLEY AS JESUS BLESSING LITTLE CHILDREN.

"Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, fo of such is the kingdom of heaven."

In this pic-ture our lit-tle readers are shown how the good Mis-ter Pix-ley call-ed the boys and girls to-geth-er the oth-er evening at Child-ren's Hall and taught them pol-it-ics, which means how to get to Sac-ra-men-to as a del-e-gate "at large" because a wicked man once said of him that the state pris-on yawn-ed before him and the ward-en stalked be-hind, and Mis-ter Pix-ley wants to show that the war-den has not yet caught on.

He told the lit-tle boys how sin-ful it is to be wick-ed on the Sab-bath day, and said once there was a bad boy who was wick-ed on that day, and there was a great big Dem-o-crat which had eyes like sau-cers, and it came out of the woods and ate the bad boys all up ex-cept his soul, which went to Rome and was stuck with a red-hot pitchfork by the pope

Mis-ter Pix-ley told the lit-tle boys and girls that it was wick-ed to drink beer and eat pret-zels and Bo-log-na sau-sage, and that all Dutch-men ought to be kill-ed and their cor-ner gro-cer-ies sold and the mon-ey giv-en to the rich.

When the lit-tle boys that were at Child-ren's Hall the oth-er eve-ning grow up to be men and hav two votes a-piece we hope they will go to the pri-ma-ries and work for Mis-ter Pix-ley and the an-gels; and then when they die they will be Re-pub-li-cans and go to the state con-ven-tion.

The ring which you see in the pic-ture, a-round Mis-ter Pix-ley's head, shows that he is a good and ho-ly man. It is a brand-new ring.

Yours as ever, A. A. GILMOUR, M.D.

ADRIAN, MICH., Oct. 11, E. M., 282.

MR. EDITOR: On arriving at home, and, taking up THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 9th, I noticed a little article signed by our mutual friend J. W. Kenyon, of Jackson, Mich., in which he gave the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a little account of the semi-annual meeting of the State Association of the Spiritualists and Liberalists at Pine Lake. He tells us there was a slight attempt made to drop the word Liberal from the name, but it was tabled very quickly. Then, addressing himself to the Liberals, he says: "The cause of this feeling is because you do not turn out to the meetings and help to fight the enemy. You must know that Spiritualism is doing a work that you cannot do, reaching those you cannot reach. I cannot see why the Infidels (so-called) cannot see the truth of Spiritualism." Then he goes on to tell us about some astounding and convincing tests that they had there of the truth of Spiritualism that it was his pleasure to witness.

Now, Mr. Editor, allow me to say to our Spiritual and Liberal friend, Mr. Kinyon, that while we believe that Spiritualism has done a good work in calling the attention of many minds from the church to that of Spiritualism, which is one step in the direction of losing their faith in the superstitious rituals of the Christian mythology, but as some of their best lights hav declared that Spiritualism is no test of character, neither is it any reformation in and of itself, but that it adapts itself to the condition of those that accept it. We who hav been close observers of its workings for a number of years can bear witness to the truth of this testimony from its leading exponents; and hence we don't care to fritter our time away when we come many miles at a great expense with something that don't seem to make its devotees any better. As regards the truthfulness or untruthfulness of Spiritualism, we think it is all time wasted in discussing this matter in public conventions; and hence, as this state association has most fully assumed the position of a Spiritual meeting, our interest in it, as of it, is not so great as we were in hopes it would hav been when the association was legalized at Battle Creek two years ago last March. Spiritualism, as explained by its best exponents, means simply that we are dead in person, and that when this body dies the spirit still livs on, and that, the conditions being favorable, it can communicate with its friends on earth.

Liberalism as adopted by the American Liberal League means an entire separation of church and state. Hence the great difference between the meaning of these two words would seem to portray such a difference in the ultimate object, that it would be hard to hav them work together in harmony; and so the Liberals, seeing this, as Liberals, are willing that their Spiritual friends should hav their own way as formerly, and they quietly giv up the association to them to run it to their own liking, and so it seems from friend Kenyon's report of the Pine Lake meeting. They had some grand Spiritual tests there that were very convincing to the faithful. This part of his report put me in mind of some of the meetings of the early Christians, when the faithful would be all gathered together in one place, with Jesus in their midst, when they would hav great displays of his wonderful mediumistic powers. Then again in other places, with other environments, he could not do many mighty works because of their unbelief. What kind of a feeling may be manifested at the annual meeting next spring time only can tell; but I trust there will be no division. Indeed, judging from the past, I can't see as there is any danger. I hope and trust that the time will soon come, in this state, when the truly moral, intelligent Freethinkers, regardless of every sect or ism, yet embracing all the truly Liberal from all sects and isms, can come together in the capacity of a state convention, to consider secular matters as belonging to this present life, in this present world; and if our Spiritual friends will help us here and now, we will agree to help them on the other side, if in the future we find that we are still living and that there is still work to do.

And now, in closing, as friend Kenyon givs the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER notice that he will answer calls from the East from Spiritual societies or Liberal Leagues, or wherever there are no societies, if parties will furnish him a hall and advertise, I will say that I will be willing to do the same within the radius of my own state, if the winter is not too cold and my health will permit. My object will not be to build up any sect or ism, nor yet for the love of Jesus, but simply for the cause of mental liberty that leads to human progress. S. D. MOORE.

[Brother Moore is an earnest worker in our ranks, and we cheerfully recommend him to all our Michigan friends. We hope they will giv him all he wants to do.—ED. T. S.]

SPIRITS ON THE RAMPAGE.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Sept. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It looks very much as if a fearful hornet's nest hath been stirred up in your sacred den, and perhaps they are disembodied hornets; but be that as it may, they seem very venomous, and would doubtless sting the life out of your old Infidel correspondent, Thomas Winter. But all their venom and abuse falls harmlessly on this aged rock of unbelief. Why, what man of bold Materialistic grit can be disconcerted at the wild vaporings of a whole army of ghostists? Fire off your wads, ye dealers in tricks which are dark and highly deceptiv. You are powerless to impair this fearless advocate of Materialistic philosophy. And there is another thing you cannot do: you can show no proof to convince a sound Materialist that where life is extinct it is still existing. No, no; a thousand times no. It is true, my brain is not inflated with any unnatural speculations, therefore those imponderable phenomena which enter so largely into the make-up of Spiritism are useless to me. As a first-class Infidel, I cannot see it. Perhaps if the lady Colby could only lend me her very smart and beautiful peepers I might be able to see spirits darkly. Some of those awful nice, wise, and extremely civil Spiritists should be a little bit charitable and loan this benighted Materialist a small dose of their ponderable brains or some organ whereby this sturdy old unbeliever could hav just one peep, or one square look, into the famous and fabulous summer land, and right there and then hold some sweet and holy confab with the most refined lady spooks, which might be the means of bringing about a high-tone polish and exquisit refinement quite equal to the "consensus of the competent."

Oh for the all-penetrating optics of the mediumistic spook-dealer, whose powers of vision are so utterly telescopic, enabling such prodigies of the unnatural to see right through a stone fence into the very center of wonder and blunder land—de shining shore! But no more spook talk at present. Wait until I get the right grade of organism, a la Spiritism, then I'll burst on the world like a soap-bubble.

Spiritualists in general, please don't get mad and tear your shirts; keep cool and pull down your vest. Winter is an honest old Infidel, and perhaps some fine morning he might wake up and be a first-class spook—a member of the celestial poultry, with gauzy wings, etc. But, Mr. Editor, these awful brainy people of phenomenal proclivities call loudly for explanation and proof to sustain my anti-supernatural basis. Who, I ask, ever knew any individual who was once dead positivly ever to come back to life again? Every past story to that effect is a priestly falsehood. Also, if millions hav the strongest desire for an eternal perpetual existence, does that imply that nature hath so provided? Nothing of the kind. All animal life is on a par as to production, life, and death; there are different degrees of brain power growing from the advantages of education and other environments. But no matter how highly trained, the man is mortal still; he is born mortal, livs mortal, and dies mortal, and all the sophistry in the whole world can never make him immortal.

I also flatly deny that any land exists where disembodied humanity eternally exists. It's a burlesque on all natural laws, and there are thousands of scientific men who will indorse my sentiments. I stand firmly and squarely on the great plain of nature, and if I am wrong nature itself is wrong. That false idea of a dual life is the outgrowth of speculativ superstition very far back, of a primitiv and undeveloped species of animal, which might be called a man in embryo, whose child-like ideas are altogether out of place in this age of superior knowledge. Superstition hath raged amongst illiterate people for many ages; but is it ever to rule and blind the masses for the benefit of pious frauds and clerical bummers? No, no. The time is rapidly coming when mankind will not only detect shame, but suppress them as an outrage on simple credulity. Mr. Editor, it is a pretty clear proof that much weakness exists, otherwise so many devotees of Spiritualism would not kick, rave, squirm, and bet so heavily against one old Materialist. It is proof enough that bluster and brass are the factors of this illogical buncombe. They evidently fear that the solid truth, as found in nature, may strike their shadowy props and shake the whole miserable phantom and cause it to vanish in something much thinner than nothing.

Once for all, I emphatically deny that man hath two lives or can realize a second state of existence. Man is nothing but an evolution from a lower grade of creature, and begins life with his first drawn breath and ends it with his last. Now, sir, I shall take no further notice of superstitious cavilers and make no reply to their scurrilous scribbling. Those who like my views will sustain them, and those who do not are at liberty to reject them. I am a sincere friend to humanity, free from shams and hypocrisy.

Yours truly, T. WINTER.

JOSEPH COOK met with a painful accident on his way to Japan. During the prolonged continuance of most vehement meteorological disturbances and electrical discharges and phenomena, accompanied by irregular and violent undulations and movements of the saline aqua, he was abruptly impelled from his insecurely established footing on the superior deck to a recumbent position on the deck subjacent The boardness of the deck, aggravated by the nailness of the spikes, dismembered the cartilaginousness of the enribbed sides. The injuries caused by the fallness of the fall were skillfully ensurged by the chirurgeon, and in the near To-be, the ecrocharmiliated antichism resultant from the saline-aquatic porphyritic blendings will leave no residue of their one-time hereness in the system of the sufferer, who will remember them only by their ever-present goneness.

Hero-Worship.

BY ALHAZA.

"Nearer, my God, to thee."

Come, holy truth, our brother let us own,
The lowly zoophyte, rooted to a stone;
Let us not rise, like Plato, with a star,
To love a spirit floating from afar.
From Emerson's sweet mouth such thoughts hav flown,
And bees might hover round that aged brow.
But lo! an Indian seer is passing now,
A sparkling zone he clasped around the world,
While truth's bright flag the fragrant breeze unfurled.

What art thou, love? We know we love our chief.
His words are calm, his kind reproofs are brief;
Say, where was love when chaos yet was rife?
What sign of life?
Some buds were there, and bright with pearly dew
And Eros came, while heaven filled his view;
He nursed each blossom with his balmy breath,
And life awakened beauteous, sleeping Death.

How he would sigh, that pale enamored youth!
He could not rest, he loved the spirit of truth.
No rack had they in that melodious grove,
No thumb-screws tortured the yearning spirit of love;
While 'mid the flowers the scented night wind grieves,
And sighs its requiem o'er the faded leaves.

Then Orpheus came; a tender lute he bore,
Like gales that whisper Bennett's Indian lore;
Gentle his love of every herb and flower;
How thrilled the rocks, beneath his magic power!
Now there is music in the lion's roar,
An angel's song the bulbul, murmurs o'er.
All nations caught the spirit of his strain,
And tyrants sought to smother it, in vain.
He sung of freedom, friendship, love, and truth,
And perfumed isles that bloom in endless youth;
Embalmed each holy thought DeSilva gave,
On India's soil by many an ancient grave,
Sweet counsel to the palmer, when did rave
This foe, as wakens a hyena's cry,
Who deems his midnight howlings victory.

Men of the Hour.

HON. CHARLES J. FOLGER,

NOMINATED FOR GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

After one of the most bitter factional struggles ever engaged in by the Republican leaders of New York Mr. Folger has been nominated for the high office of governor. The President's political strength in his own state has been demonstrated, and the weakness of Gov. Cornell, with all the machinery and patronage of a great state at his command, made plain. But now that the family quarrel is over the astute leaders will all fall in line, no doubt, and present an unbroken front to the opposition.

Charles J. Folger is a nativ of Nantucket, Mass., where he was born on the 16th of April, 1818. He went with his parents, when a boy, to Geneva, Ontario county. He graduated with honors at the Geneva college in 1836, and three years after he was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court at Albany, and entered upon the practice of his profession at Geneva. His advancement was rapid, and in 1844, under the old Constitution, he was appointed judge of the Ontario Court of Common Pleas, and was also master and examiner in chancery. In 1851, he was elected county judge of Ontario county, and held that office for four years. At that time he was known as a Silas Wright Democrat, but with a considerable number of his party who disagreed on the slavery question, he allied himself with the Republicans, identifying himself with the party in the most pronounced manner. It was in the fall of 1861 that he was first elected to the state Senate, and so popular was he in his district that he was re-elected in 1863, 1865, and 1867, serving eight years in succession and acting as president pro tem. of the Senate for a long time. An acknowledged leader of his party, he was a power in the state conventions. When Mr. Folger's senatorial term expired in 1869, President Grant appointed him United States sub-treasurer in New York city, and he continued to hold the position until 1870, when he was elected judge of the Court of Appeals. In May, 1880. Governor Cornell designated him as chief justice, and he was afterward nominated and elected as such in the fall of the same year. In October, 1881, he was confirmed as secretary of the treasury. While in the state legislature he was known as the persistent opponent of jobbery.

Judge Folger's chance of election is considered rather more than doubtful by many who are in positions to know of the amount of influence operating for and against him. Greenbackers, Anti-Monopolists, and many disaffected Republicans hav arrayed themselvs on the side of Cleveland, and the pulpit has also tailed on to a considerable extent. Dr. Crosby, perhaps more influential than any other Christian minister in New York, in a letter to the Anti-Monopoly organ, Justice, declares himself, for various reasons, opposed to the choice of Folger for governor. Whether or not the support of such a man as Crosby has shown himself to be by his aid and indorsement of Comstock in his persecution of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER would be of any moral advantage to either candidate, is a matter concerning which there is likely to be a difference of opinion; but the number of voters he will carry with him is unquestionably large. It will be regarded by many as a hopeful sign when men like Dr. Crosby are at last seen to be on the side of the people as against "bribery, fraud, and the tyranny of the money power," which Folger is popularly supposed to represent.

Beecher's New Departure.

Henry Ward Beecher astonished the meeting of the New York and Brooklyn Association of Congregational churches in the Park Congregational church, Brooklyn, last week, by withdrawing from membership. He had been assigned to open the discussion on the subject of "Spiritual Barbarism." He said that this subject had not been selected by him. He supposed it was intended to open the discussion on those forms of holding spiritual truths which might be called barbaric, not in an offensiv sense, but as representing the primitiv and ignorant methods of looking upon spiritual life. But it had occurred to him that this subject might hav been selected on account of his expression of views in the North American Review last August, in which he had described some theological doctrins as barbaric. As this article had led to many inquiries and comments concerning his own theological views, he thought this a good opportunity to stat e those views more fully than he had ever done before, especially as he had determined to close his remarks with withdrawal from membership in the association.

He said he felt, as a Christian gentleman, that it was not right for him to lay upon anyone the responsibility of his peculiar position. His views had not materially changed in forty years. Although they had developed, the development was all on the original lines. During that period he had often felt that his ministerial brethren were called upon to bear an undue share of responsibility for him, and now he had definitly determined not to keep this association or its members in such a position, and that his defense should be no further part of their duty. He believed that he should not be any less in sympathy with them, but rather in closer bonds of love. He would do anything for them or their churches, even more freely and heartily than before; but it was right that he alone should be called upon to explain his own views and doctrins, and that no one else should be answerable for them. He then stated some views of the nature of God, as set forth in the Westminster Confession. He said the eternal decree of God, as set forth, to create a large part of men and angels for the purpose of eternal torment was barbaric, as putting a monster in the place of a loving father. Such doctrins he rejected with an impetus that touched the very foundation of his soul. The doctrin of man's total inability to obey the laws of God he also rejected, as well as the gross and physical representations of future punishment. He believed in future punishment thoroughly, but he believed the wholesome and restraining influence of that doctrin had been largely destroyed by substituting the slaughter-house notion, the gross, carnal, corrupting, and diabolical notion of hell. That, he said, was barbaric.

He regarded the whole doctrin of original sin as founded on the fall of Adam as barbaric. That was the conception of men who were ignorant and uneducated on the subject.

He then proceeded to state formally what he did believe at a much greater length than he had stated his views of what he did not believe. He expressed in strong language his full belief in a personal God, and utterly repudiated all Pantheism, and also the theory of Matthew Arnold that God is nothing but a tendency, a mere blind power not within ourselvs. He believed, although he could not pretend to explain it, in the doctrin of the trinity. He thought he saw analogies in the higher developments of nature. In the lowest forms of existence everything was single. In the higher forms not only were mind and matter united, but each soul included a multitude of faculties. Man had a physical nature, and also a mental, moral, and spiritual nature more or less developed. He saw no reason why, in the highest range of being, there might not be a unity composed of three persons really distinct yet really one. Of course, he said, we could not understand this, but that did not prove that it was not true. He made no attempt to divide the functions, offices, and work of the trinity. All his own thought and faith were concentrated upon Jesus Christ. So literally did he believe Christ to be divine that he could not really pray to any other being. He sometimes tried to pray to the father, but always ended by addressing his prayer to Christ. His faith, therefore, in the divinity of Christ was stronger than words could express. Yet he believed that Christ, in taking the elements of human nature, became subject to all the laws that govern man: that he renounced not only external glory, but also the knowledge and wisdom which he otherwise had; that when Christ was a child he had only the knowledge of a child, and grew in knowledge as literally as he grew in stature. His belief in the absolute divinity of Christ lay at the very foundation of all his creed.

He also believed in divine providence, both general and special. He believed in answer to prayer. He thought there were millions of prayers that were not answered, because they ought not to be; but that millions of prayers were answered, not merely by reaction upon the soul of the person praying, but in other ways. He believed in miracles, because he believed they were just as possible to-day as they ever had been if only the same circumstances should happen. He emphatically believed in the two great miracles of the New Testament, the miraculous conception and the resurrection of Jesus Christ. He thought there was nothing in all these things that was inconsistent with science or philosophy. He had always been accustomed to keep up with the state of science in its developments, and he accepted it cordially; nor did it ever disturb his faith in these fundamental things, although it increased his want of faith in some of the old formal interpretations and creeds. He then passed to the inspiration of the Bible, concerning which he said that he could accept most every word contained in the Confession of the American Presbyterian church. The inspiration there stated was not that of the book, but that of the men who wrote the book. He did not believe in verbal inspiration, but he believed in the direct influence of God upon the souls of men who wrote the different books of the Bible, although in very different degrees.

Thus far Mr. Beecher proceeded without interruption, but when he passed to the subject of the atonement he was interrupted with many questions. The result of his statement upon the whole was that he did not believe in the theory of substitution, or in the doctrin that all punishment which belonged to the human race or any part of it was concentrated upon the head of Christ. He held that human souls may only be saved through suffering, and that Christ, as the representativ of the divine nature on earth, suffered beyond all others for the sake of men, and as an exhibition of the eternal love of God and of God's willingness to suffer in order to save men.

This part of his statement appeared to giv the least satisfaction to the association, although several members expressed their approval. He closed with a few words on the subject of future punishment, repeating in substance what he had said before. He then formally bade the association farewell, assuring the members of his continued love and of his belief that they would not be separated from him in heart or in sympathy, and that they and he probably could work together in more complete harmony without having any special ecclesiastical relation.

Mr. Lloyd offered a resolution requesting Mr. Beecher to reconsider his withdrawal, which was referred by unanimous consent to a committee consisting of Dr. H. M. Storrs and the Rev. W. C. Stiles.

Thomas G. Shearman, one of the lay delegates of Plymouth church to the association, when asked concerning the significance of this step of his pastor, said:

"Plymouth church does not withdraw from the association. This is only Mr. Beecher's withdrawal of his personal membership. He is not delegated by the church, and is not necessarily a member on account of his ministerial office. He has belonged to this association thirty years. Several other ministers, members of the association, are in sympathy with him. The denomination permits its ministers perfect liberty in this matter. Some ministers do not belong to any association. Some belong to Presbyterian associations. Mr. Beecher's chief difference of views is with reference to the doctrins of the atonement and of future punishment. It is now agreed that a minister is not to be excluded from the pastorate of a Congregational church by reason of holding these views of future punishment. That has been decided by two councils, one in Connecticut and the other in Illinois, representing fifty churches. It was unanimously held that such views are not a ground for refusing fellowship to a church or its pastor. Among the Congregational ministers whose faith is similar to Mr. Beecher's are the Rev. Newman Smyth, of New Haven, the successor of Dr. Leonard Bacon, and the Rev. John M. Whiton, of Newark. I hav no reason to think that Mr. Beecher's expression of his views will create any dissension in Plymouth church. He has expressed pretty much the same views at various times in detail, although never all at one time."

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 20, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

12mo, EXTRA CLOTH, PRICE $1.00.

We hav here a work, the need of which has long been felt by all intelligent women, and especially by mothers and teachers, conveying to girls that special knowledge so important to them, but which, for proper reasons, must be omitted altogether from the general and school physiologies. Written in a careful and entirely unobjectionable manner, it is so plain and practical as to be easily understood, and its perusal is sure to leave an impression of the importance of the subject on the minds of the readers. It discusses the physiology of woman; the proper relation of dress to comfort and health: the age of puberty; menstruation; some of the diseases of women, their causes and prevention; something about marriage and motherhood, and many other topics of importance.

The special attention of mothers and teachers is called to this book, with the hope that they will read it, and convey to their daughters or girls in their charge the information given; or, better still, after reading, place it in the hands of the girls for whom it was written. EXTERNAL APPLICATION, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician, who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of those who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

[From the Star Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.]

TO INVALIDS AND OTHERS: The Banner seldom indorses any doctor or medicin, but it is free to say to all interested that Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., is not only a skilful and reputable practitioner, but one of the most successful physicians in the United States.

Gems of Thought.

It is more pleasant to think as those around us do than it is to combat their views and deny their statements. Love, harmony, peace, and purity are very desirable blessings, but they must be won and not compulsory. Law, force, discord, and war are slowly dying out. Civilization has killed the devil, put out the fires of hell, humanized all the gods, and now it is fast eliminating strife and combat from the world.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Innumerable tracts and pretty stories impress upon us that Sabbath-breaking is rather worse than stealing, and leads naturally on to Materialism and murder. Less than a hundred years ago, sacrilege was punishable in France by burning, and murder, by simple decapitation.—Clifford's Ethics of Religion.

Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much wishing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. . . . What some men lament of, we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men, to reassume the ill-deported care of their religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to join and unite in one general and brotherly search after truth.—Milton's Areopagitica.

Chesterfield: I do not admire Mr. Locke.

Chatham: Nor do I; he is simply too grand for admiration. I contemplate and revere him. Equally deep and clear, he was both philosophically and grammatically one among the most elegant of English writers. What would you think, my lord, if you discovered in Newton a sentence in the spirit of Shakspere?

Chesterfield: I should look upon it as a wonder, not to say a miracle; Newton, like Barron, had no feeling or respect for poetry.

Chatham: His words are these: "I don't know what I may seem to the world; but, as to myself, I seem to hav been like a boy playing on the seashore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me."—Lander's Imaginary Conversations.

Atheism claims the right to think and the right to speak the thought, without any penalty being imposed upon the thinker. It denies that there is any subject so sacred that it should not be investigated; any assertion so authoritativ that it may not be tested. While Christianity proclaims that hell is the preordained punishment for unbelief in doctrins incapable of verification by experience, Atheism asserts that unbelief is a duty where evidence is insufficient, and that faith in dogmas relating to the unknown is foolish credulity. While Christianity deifies the unknown, Atheism studies it, and offers to truth but one homage, the homage of investigation.—Annie Besant's Gospel of Atheism.

You hav no right to hold an opinion on any subject whatever till you hav used the utmost thought, study, and care to make sure that the opinion is true. You hav no right to an opinion because it is your opinion. If there were only a vagrant law in the intellectual realm, the great majority of opinions that are walking up and down the earth would be arrested for lack of "visible means of support" You hav no right to hold an opinion, I say, simply because it is yours, because you hav inherited it, or because you hav chosen to adopt and patronize it.—M. J. Savage.

If the rule of providence in this life be one of injustice, there is no reason to believe that a future life, under the same providence, will be differently ordered, so as to be just and happy; and if this order of the present life be right, there can be no need of a future life as a scene of reparation. Our "wish" to be rid of what is bad and painful, and secured in what is good and pleasant, of course, does not affect the argument. The existence of a "wish" does not imply that it will ever be gratified.—N. R. Waters.

The God wish is not the true God.—Carlyle.

Dugald Stewart allows himself to rank among nine proofs of the immortality of the human soul—each individually rather weak, but taken together, "sufficient to establish the truth they are brought to prove"—the discordance between our moral judgments and feelings and the course of human affairs. And even Burns avails himself of the argument, in his immortal Dirge, "Man was made to mourn." The most of his reflection is that piece are natural, powerful, and pithy, but in the verse

> "Yet let not this too much, my son,
> Disturb thy youthful breast;
> This partial view of human kind
> Is surely not the last!
> The poor, oppressed, honest man
> Had never scarce been born,
> Had there not been some recompense
> To comfort those that mourn,"

I much fear me that "the high chief of Scottish song" has fallen into cant, or, as Carlyle would say, "has spoken from the truth outwards"—an infirmity that the sage and seer of Chelsea was himself not altogether free from. Alas! what preacher or poet, or even philosopher, is free from it? As Horace observes, Nerno omnibus horis sapit [No man is wise at all hours]. We must be patient with one another and make a liberal allowance for human weakness.—C. W. C.

Those who hav resources within themselvs, who can dare to liv alone, want friends the least, but, at the same time, best know how to prize them the most. But no company is far preferable to bad company, because we are more apt to catch the vices of others than their virtues, as disease is far more contagious than health.—Colton's Lacon.

Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? there is more hope of a fool than of him. . . . . The sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason.—Proverbs xxvi, 12 and 16.

Odds and Ends.

Coming episode: The gothic style of hand-writing now so popular among young ladies, may hav its disadvantages It is said that a young man who received a specimen of it could not tell, for the life of him, whether it was, "Yes, with pleasure," "No, thank you," or a sketch of a picket fence.

Cook: "Madam; may I ask you for my testimonials?" Mistress: "What do you expect me to write, you worthless creature? Surely you can't expect me to say that I am satisfied with you." Cook: "Isn't necessary. Only write that I remained with you three months. That will be my best recommendation."

"I should so like to hav a coin dated the year of my birth," said a maiden lady of uncertain age to a male acquaintance. "Do you think you could get one for me?" "I'm afraid not," he replied. "These very old coins are only to be found in valuable collections." And yet he cannot see why, when he met the lady the next day, she didn't speak to him.

Speaking of spiritual consolation, and the comforting assurance that the eternity of the just shall be blessed, a Chicago clergyman told a story the other day that is worth printing. There was an old lady in his church who was noted for her penuriousness as well as her piety, and while talking with her about her hopes of the hereafter, he asked:

"Mrs. S——, did you ever stop to think what will gratify you most in heaven?"

'Oh, yes," she replied, "it will be such a cheap place to liv in."

The kangrew ain't much ov a recommend for the factory which made him, or maybe he knu in himself when the riginal diergrams was in the safe, and rakin up such organs as wuz lef over he made his ownself. He looks in the face like a shaller goose and when you see him walkin' on his narrativ you don't blame nachur for givin him that expression. His legs mus been made on dif'rent tables, cauz the last iz long as a torchlite pechesin but the front ones haz got too much shortnin in. Sum kangrews has their cloze made so tha kin carry thare familys round in thare overskurts, but if I wuz a boy kangrew ide rather paddle mone kanew. Kangrews wear mustaches like cats, but a mule kin giv em a yard start on the ear question an' beet em like sicksty.

It is related that a Buffalo man who had been in the coffee business for several years was led to believe that he was a sinner, and to come out on the side of religion. The morning after he had taken this step he reached his factory to find business suspended, and upon demanding an explanation his son replied:

"Well, father, I didn't know what to do. I didn't suppose after what you said last night that you would mix any more beans with the coffee. I presumed it would make a difference."

"Yes, it will make just a little difference," calmly observed the old man. "We hav heretofore been mixing one barrel of beans to four of coffee, havn't we?"

"Yes."

"Well, take out a few of the beans—about two quarts, I guess."

Look out, backslider, whar you walkin,'
Make a misstep, shu' you bo'n;
I tell you what, it's no use talkin,'
Ef you slip up, chile, you gone.
De road is full er stumps and stubble,
Ruts and sinkholes eberywhar';
I spec' dey'll gib you heap er trouble,
Ef you don't stop foolin' dar.
It's dark as pitch an' mighty cloudy,
Spec de debbil's walkin' roun,'
Fus' thing you know he'll tell you "howdy"—
Lif' his hoof an' stomp de groun'.
Man, can't you see a sto'm a brewin',
Hear de awful thunder peal!
Look! blazen lightnin' threatnin' ruin—
Oh, backslider, how you feel?
Drap on yo' knees and go to prayin';
Ax de Lawd to help you out.
Chile, tell him you's a lam' a strayin'—
Done got los' an' stumblin' 'bout,
An' den you'll see the stars a gleamin'—
Luminatin' all de way,
'Bout ten thousan' twinklin' beamin'—
Smack until de break er day.
But ef you fail de debbil get you,
Fetch you slap right in yo' eye.
You'll feel mos' like er grapeshot hit you,
Drapped from half way to de sky!

A citizen called recently at the water registrar's office and introduced himself and his business by saying: "I'm Misther Jerry Muldoon, and I carries fifty votes. My cellar is full of water, and my hins will be drowned if it isn't fixed; so I want you to fix it." Mr. Muldoon was informed that nothing could be done for him there, when he again remarked, "I carries fifty votes, d'ye moind, and I want the water out of my cellar." "But we hav nothing to do with such matters," said the official; "you should employ a plumber to attend to it, Mr. Muldoon." This suggestion did not appear to strike the caller favorably, for he again declared: "I want you to understand that I carries fifty votes- fifty votes, you see—and I want you to fix my cellar. The water is in it, and my hins will be drowned if it isn't got out." There was some further conversation of this kind, and Mr. Muldoon was finally recommended to see the mayor in regard to the cellar, when he departed. Two or three days later he reappeared. "I come again to see about that cellar," said he; "I'm Misther Muldoon, you know, and I carries fifty votes. My cellar's worse than ever." "But we told you the other day, Mr. Muldoon, that we can do nothing about it here." "Yes, but I carries fifty votes, and my cellar must be fixed, or my hins will all be drowned." "Well, Mr. Muldoon, did you see the mayor about the matter?" "Indade I did," replied Mr. Muldoon. "And what did the mayor say?" "What did he say, is it? 'Misther Muldoon,' says he, 'why don't you kape ducks!'"—Boston Journal.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Vol. 9. No. 43. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, October 28, 1882. { NO. 21 CLINTON PLACE, NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE gallows is now mentioned by a Kentucky paper as "the rope route to heaven."

A BOSTON deacon is to be put under disciplin for inserting in his dry goods advertisment: "High, low, jack, and the game."

PROF. TYNDALL has built himself an iron house at Hind Head, on the Hampshire Downs, within a walk of Aldworth, Mr. Tennyson's residence.

"HADN'T I better pray for rain to-day, deacon?" said a Binghamton minister, Sunday. "Not to-day, dominie, I think," was the prudent reply; "the wind isn't right."

A LONDON paper demands "live preaching," and says the ministers should "pitch into" the vices of their hearers. Nonsense! A preacher likes to be popular as well as other folks.

Two church missionaries, William F. John and John Williams, and their wives, are being tried at Sierra Leone, in Africa, for the wilful murder of a nativ girl by flogging and other ill-treatment.

THE excavations for a lock on a caual which is being made near Mons, in Belgium, hav brought to light the bed of an ancient river, in which hav been found bones of mammoths and other animals.

THE length of the submarine cables in the whole world is estimated to be 64,000 miles, and their value to be $202,000,000. The length of all the wires in the world would reach forty-eight times around the earth.

THE Rev. Mr. Waite, of Savoy, Mass., wrote a letter to "Darling Truey," and, as the person thus lovingly addressed is a giddy girl of twenty, who had accompanied the parson to a camp-meeting, Mrs. Waite is trying to get a divorce.

SINCE it was discovered that a family at Logan, Kan., had lost five servant girls in succession by marriage the state commissioner of immigration is overwhelmed with letters from Eastern maidens, asking the speediest means of reaching that house.

THE comet has brought thousands of North Carolina negro sinners to repentance. They regard it as a forerunner of the world's end, and are making their preparations accordingly. This is a fair specimen of the effect of unusual phenomena of nature upon ignorant minds.

HIGH French authorities hav found by experiments on animals that while small doses of arsenic seemed to do good at first, they resulted ultimately in poverty of blood, and that a post-mortem disclosed in the liver, lungs, and kidneys the characteristics of fatty degeneration.

EVANGELIST BARNES has finished his revival work in Cincinnati, and acknowledges that he has failed to do much good to the sinners of that city. "I hav had night after night the same audience of Christians," he says, "but my mission is to reach sinners." If Mr. Barnes can not find sinners enough to satisfy him among Christians, it is hard to say where he should look for them.

WE hav news from London of the cremation of the bodies of two English ladies who died some years ago. Now that this way of disposing of the dead has been begun there, we shall doubtless hear of its practice in other cases. We hav accounts from time to time of cremation in Germany and in Italy, and there hav been several examples of it in the state of Pennsylvania.

PROF. GOULD leaves the Newton Theological Seminary, a Massachusetts Baptist institution, because his views hav swerved from Calvinism. These cases are becoming so common that they longer cease to excite remark. Probably in view of the general unbelief which pervades the ranks of the clergy they had better forswear the whole theory and no longer hang on the antiquated errors.

IN the old times when people traveled by diligence in France one traveler was killed in every 335,000, and one wounded in every 30,000. Now, when they travel by rail, one is killed per 5,178,590, and one wounded per 580,450. Railway traveling is thus nearly twenty times as safe as traveling by diligence.

THE director of Fine Arts in Paris has authorized an old woman who claims to hav a divining rod to dig in the vaults of the church of St. Dennis for the buried treasure of the cathedral, which disappeared during the Revolution. She has deposited a sum of money as security, and is prosecuting her researches by the aid of what appears to be an ordinary divining rod. So far, although workmen hav dug down to a depth of five feet, they hav discovered nothing.

MR. HAMMOND, engineer and general manager of an important Brazilian railroad, bears strong testimony to the value of coffee as a preventiv against miasmatic fevers. He instances the case of Father Vaughan, who, on a journey through a most unhealthy country from Panama to the river Platt, considered that he owed his health to taking strong coffee, and mentions that since the nativs in pestilent districts in Ecuador hav taken to drinking it the death rate has fallen considerably.

BOSTON has heretofore taken the lead of the Eastern cities in the number of applications for divorce from chains matrimonial, but Philadelphia seems to be now striving for this bad preeminence. Of the cases docketed at the September term of one of the courts of that city forty-seven were for divorces growing out of matrimonial infelicity. Some of the other courts are also burdened with the same complaints, showing plainly that the matrimonial current is not altogether a smooth one in the City of Brotherly Love.

ALTHOUGH the Congregationalists hav a large and prosperous weekly paper in Boston, which bears the name of their denomination, some of the brethren are so far from pleased with it that they want to establish a rival paper. This has been talked about for some time, but has not taken very definit shape until now, for the lack of cash capital. It is now said that enough money has been raised, and that the learned Joseph Cook is to be invited to the editorial chair. If the person named is to be the editor of the proposed new paper, it will undoubtedly contain more lies and slanders than any other paper in the country.

THE Rev. Obadiah Huse was eighty, and had been in the ministry half a century, when he was shocked by reading that he was "a pretentious old humbug." That assertion was made by the president of the Women's Educational Aid Association of Evanston, Ill., and was coupled by the specific charge that Huse had appropriated to his own use some money collected for the society. He promptly sued for damages. On the trial over twenty women, from rich philanthropists to poor laundresses, testified that he had borrowed from them without ever repaying, and in some of these cases his conduct amounted to swindling. He lost the suit.

MRS. STOW, a San Francisco dress reformer, has informed the police that on Jan. 1st she will begin to wear trousers in public, and she demands protection in case street crowds insult her. But the chief of police seems to think that it will be his duty to arrest her, on the ground that her conduct would be disorderly. As to the form of the proposed garment, Mrs. Stow says: "My trousers are made with a plait, and descend just to the line of beauty in the calf of the leg, just where the dresses of young girls come; and if young girls wear their dresses there, why should not old girls adopt the same fashion?" She is advised by a lawyer that California has no law under which she can be prevented from dressing in that fashion.

A CHURCH-MEMBER in Memphis was disciplined for his sins and turned out of church. Instead of being humbled by this process and brought to a state of penitence, his anger was excited at the pastor and the church people. When communion day came round this ex-brother wanted to be allowed to partake of the sacrament, and made his application to the pastor. The pastor refused him, whereupon the ex-brother threatened the servant of the Lord with a horsewhipping. On being told to come and do his worst, he went for the pastor, but was astonished to find himself in receipt of a sound thrashing. The minister is exultant over the victory he gained, and the ex-brother is recovering from his bruises.

THE French astronomers who hav just arrived in this city on their way to Florida to observe the transit of Venus, hav brought with them a very complete outfit of scientific instruments, which hav been passed free of duty through the Custom House. They intend to apply in their observations the photographic method, known since the transit of 1874 as the American method, and which, it is believed, will giv more trustworthy results than any other plan yet devised. The French hav sent out seven other expeditions to various parts of the world to observe the transit, and astronomers hav also started from the other principal European countries and from the United States for the same purpose. The transit does not occur until Dec. 6th, but it is requisit that the astronomers should be on the ground, and hav all arrangements made in due time.

THE writing of a letter to the wife of a member of his church was what brought the Rev. J. C. Sullivan, of Salem, O., to his downfall. "My precious darling," he said in the course of several pages of equally tender sentiment, "I can never be reconciled to the cruel circumstances that prevent our enjoying each other's society. I feel like defying all the rules and circumstances of society; and, indeed, if I did not fear that it would cause you more perplexity and anxiety by my coming to see you and walking on the street whenever I had the opportunity, I would certainly do so regardless of the gossip of the people. As I came down from the church this evening and saw no light in your window, such a sense of loneliness came upon me that I could hardly bear up under it. Oh, my sweet pet, if you can think of any way that I can come to you at any time I hope you will tell me; and if there is any place that you can meet me at any time, I will be willing to do so." The husband found the letter.

IF the story which comes from Alexander, in Texas, is true, a Texas revival is hardly more to be desired than an earthquake. The statement is made that a noisy man disturbed the meeting which Evangelist Penn was holding in hopes that he might be able to convert some of the wicked Alexanderites. Penn prayed for divine punishment on this disturber of his peace, whereupon the man is said to hav dropped dead. From Alexander Penn went to Lampasas, where a giddy girl giggled and disturbed the devotions. Penn prayed that the Lord would punish her, whereupon she upset a kerosene lamp, and, according to the veracious Texan who sends the account, was burnt to death. The next judgment which followed in the wake of this evangelist's march was a sudden and unexpected tornado. This overturned the gospel tent and overwhelmed the affrighted congregation, being almost as destructiv as a railroad disaster in its results of maiming and killing. The panic is described as having been dreadful in the extreme. As the place where the tent stood was flooded to the depth of two feet, most of the congregation became as wet as if they had been baptized by immersion. Such an evangelist as Penn must be more of a terror than a blessing to the community he invades. Why not utilize the prayer power of such a man to run railroad trains, clear up wild land, etc.?

BEECHER is under indictment for breach of contract to write a "Life of Christ" for Samuel Wilkeson, publisher. The agreement was made fourteen years ago, Beecher signing a contract to furnish the manuscript in eighteen months, and receiving $10,000 for his signature to the same. He broke his agreement, it is alleged, hence the suit.

Twenty Days in California.—Continued.

After reaching the valley below, we found a fine farming country, and passed some very pleasant localities. One of these is a small place called Kellogg's, a place of considerable resort in the summer season. The hotel is a commodious one, capable of accommodating a large number of pleasure-seekers, who often patronize it. A few miles more of our agreeable ride brought us to Fossville, the home of the noted stage-man, and a pleasant little village, The general keeps a house of entertainment, where his passengers are supplied with a first-class dinner. We agreed that we had not partaken of a better dinner in many a day. His wife and daughters seem to understand how to keep a hotel as well as the husband, son, and father know how to drive a stage. When next we took the coach we had the general himself for driver, and we found that he filled the programme laid down for him.

THE PETRIFIED FOREST.

From Fossville to Calistoga there are two routes, one the direct road, the other by way of the Petrified forest, one of the curiosities of California. A part of our number, filling one stage, took the former route, the remainder the other. By the direct road it is about six miles to Calistoga; by the Petrified Forest it is two or three miles farther.

Let me give you a brief description of this noted relic of the past. What is termed the Petrified Forest consists of three or four hundred trees, or parts of trees, now prostrate on the earth, and covering some thirty acres of ground, somewhat up the mountain side, but not very high above the level of the valley. These trees all fell in one direction, the tops toward the valley, and the roots turned up toward the mountain top. It would seem they fell together by some terrible force of nature in the form of a tornado, and by some other process they have been converted into stone. They are now partially covered by earth, but one noble specimen of a tree, nearly seventy feet in length and eleven feet through, at the base, is pretty much uncovered. From the large size we are led to think the growth must have been the celebrated red-wood of California, which sometimes attains to the enormous proportions of thirty feet in diameter. This tree records a growth of eleven hundred years, the grains or layers to that number being distinct and easily counted. There are in a distance of three hundred feet thirty-six of these prostrate monarchs, though not all so large or perfect as the one just mentioned. Many are broken, and others nearly covered. Many portions of these trees of stone have been taken away to be added to museums of curiosities in various parts of the world. It is, indeed, a wonder how this ancient forest of fallen trees thus became converted into solid stone. Many theories have been advanced upon the subject; but the one most accepted is that after having been laid prostrate by some terrible cyclone a neighboring volcano—perhaps Mount Helena—threw out a flood of fire and lava charged with saline and mineral matter, submerging these enormous trees, and thus gradually changing them to stone. Considerable quantities of petrified charcoal are also found here, indicating that a portion of the forest was subjected to a degree of heat sufficient to char the wood before the process of petrifaction took place. The portion of the stone which was once charcoal seems quite different from that of the uncharred wood, and can be crumbled or broken apart much easier than other portions more thoroughly converted into stone. This fact seems to indicate that the fallen wood was acted upon by a high degree of heat before the petrifying process had advanced far. The largest log mentioned has its bark on in a pretty perfect state, though now all is solid rock. The ground in places is covered with petrified chips and fragments of trees. One is thrown into a reverie of wonder at the marvelous history these fallen monarchs of the forest must have had in the ages long past. An unknown number of centuries have come and gone since these mammoth trees were in their infant state and started upon their wonderful and eventful career.

Here is also a growth which attracts some attention. It is somewhat in the form of a Druidic temple, twenty feet in diameter and fourteen feet high. It seems to be composed of the trunks of the petrified trees; but how they came into the position they now occupy is a matter of unlimited speculation.

CALISTOGA,

Twenty-six miles from the Geysers, is reached in an hour's ride from the Petrified Forest, and appears a fine and flourishing town. It is well laid out, and makes a pleasant home for those whose fortune has brought them here. It is a place of considerable resort by reason of its warm and medicated springs. Many invalids come here on account of these curative waters and baths, and much benefit is said to be imparted by them. We had an hour here, passed in the pleasant company of J. C. Weybright, a patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who resides three or four miles from the village, and who, having had a letter from me, and thus being apprised of my expected visit, met us here. He urged us to stop over and make a visit to his place, and also to deliver a lecture in the village; but we felt that time would not permit, and that we must hurry on our way back to the city. Friend Weybright is engaged at vine growing for raisins, this part of the state being one of the noted vine regions of California. Hereabouts thousands of acres are in vines, which look very flourishing, though they go several months together without rain. I notice that the vines are usually about six feet apart, in rows running each way, so that they are easily cultivated by horse. They are not staked nor trained on trellises as they are in many parts of the world, but grow up like low bushes, three or four feet high, and are cut back every year. Many farmers turn their attention almost exclusively to the culture of the vine.

Calistoga is the northern terminus of the California Pacific Railroad, the southern terminus being at Vallejo, on the northwestern portion of San Francisco Bay. The first point passed on our southern ride is St. Helena, a small village not far from the road. Here the valley becomes narrow, little more than a ribbon, but soon again broadens out many miles in width. Not far from the village are located the White Sulphur Springs, also a resort of those in search of health, who often remain here for weeks for the benefit to be derived from the medical waters. A good hotel is said to be kept there for the accommodation of guests, with small cottages for those who prefer to live more by themselves. Not far away is Mount St. Helena, the highest peak in the neighborhood, having an altitude of 4,343 feet. From its summit a magnificent view is said to be obtained of the mountain ranges, the luxuriant valleys, and even of the Pacific.

The Soda Springs lie again to the south, in Napa county, and east of Napa City, and give out a constant supply of natural soda water, the white stone building standing in proud prominence one thousand feet above the level of the valley, to the left, as we speedily roll along down the Napa River. This place is also noted for the fine view it affords, Vallejo, and even San Francisco and its shipping, being seen when the air is clear. There are said to be twenty-seven springs here in all, though only about a fourth part of them are made use of. A bottling establishment is over one of them, in which four hundred dozen of bottles are filled per day and shipped to all parts of the world. This should, perhaps, be considered the Saratoga of California. A beautiful pagoda is built over one of the springs, the solid stone pillars and floor forming an appropriate setting for the natural stone basin, from which flows an abundant supply of medical waters from another of nature's laboratories. Within easy reach of this lovely retreat are said to be growing orange-trees, loaded with golden fruit, through the rich dark foliage of the groves of which are to be seen glimpses of the brilliant blossoms of the oleander, and also roses and jasmine; above all soars the towering pines, which lend majesty to the abundant loveliness.

The Napa valley is one of the most fertile in the state. It is about forty-five miles in length and irregular in breadth. It contains about 450,000 acres, and nearly equally divided between valley and upland. The soil is of the richest description, and produces abundant crops. The fields are now teeming with golden grain—wheat, barley, and oats—save where it has been cut, and hundreds of shocks show the prolific yield afforded to requite the husbandman's toil. The long season here without rain makes the grain harvest a period free from apprehensions of wet weather. The grain can stand in shocks for ten or twenty weeks without danger from rain.

Napa City is a beautiful town, a short distance from the railroad, its highest houses being seen above the tops of the plentiful trees. It is said to be a stirring business place, though its beautiful cemetery, with its fine monuments and tombs, in which its citizens take pride, would seem to indicate quiet. Two or three miles away, and on the opposite side of the railroad, but in full view of the cars, is a state insane asylum, a fine-looking and extensive edifice, capable of accommodating from twelve hundred to fifteen hundred patients. I learn that some more than a thousand patients are now confined there.

The ride from Napa to Vallejo is beautifully diversified between level plain and knobs and ridges not far away. The hills are gray and sere, but the valley abounds in fertility, the area seemingly divided between the culture of grain and the vine, the latter increasing upon the former.

At Vallejo we make a very slight halt, and are soon transferred to the fine steamer to take us to San Francisco. Here I chanced to fall in company with two somewhat distinguished Liberal women—Mrs. Slocum and Miss Clara Foults, a female lawyer of considerable ability. We reached San Francisco by the time the shades of evening had set in, feeling highly pleased with our trip to the Geysers and all the beautiful country and scenery we had witnessed.

MORE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

I have, in all, spent three or four days looking about the Golden Gate city, taking in the many interesting features which attract attention. A part of this time I have been accompanied by my friend H. W. Walker, who has seemed to take pleasure in escorting me about and showing me the interesting features of the town. I will not mention these wholly in the order visited, but as they now present themselves to me. The first shall be

THE UNITED STATES MINT,

One of the handsomest buildings in the city, and situated on the northeast corner of Fifth and Mission streets. It comprises two high stories and a basement. The portico is supported by six fluted columns of elegant design. The architecture is Doric. It has a frontage of two hundred and seventeen feet on Fifth street and one hundred and sixty-one feet on Mission. From its roof rise two chimneys one hundred and forty-two feet in hight. These are doubtless for the purpose of carrying away beyond possibility of inhalation the fumes of the metals and chemicals used in the process of smelting and refining. Coining was commenced in San Francisco in 1854, in a smaller building in another part of the city, but in 1874, this grand structure being completed, the business was removed to this edifice. About two hundred and fifty persons are employed the premises in the various branches of the business conducted here, millions of dollars in silver and gold being turned out each month. Through the kindness of the superintendent we were allowed to look over the establishment as thoroughly as we desired. The edifice is of dressed stone, the upper portion being Oregon freestone and the basement of granite.

It is no small curiosity to see the different processes, from the refining to the finishing up of the coins, weighing and counting them ready to be sent away for Uncle Samuel's favored children to put in circulation. I shall not undertake to describe all these processes, but will be content to give you some points of information.

Crude bullion is received at the mint and is operated on in the following manner: The bars of silver—or d'ore, as they are called from the fact that they usually contain a certain percentage of gold, copper, lead, and other metals, though silver predominates in much the largest proportion—are received, weighed, and numbered in the receiving department, and then are turned over to the melter and refiner, who causes each bar to be melted separately, thoroughly mixed, and poured into square bars, an assay being taken from the top and one from the bottom of the melt while in a molten condition. The bullion is purchased according to the assay and weight after melting. Gold deposits are received and treated in the same manner. The melter and refiner then causes one hundred and fifty pounds of d'ore bullion to be melted with fifty pounds of gold deposits, or amounts of each in that proportion, to be thoroughly mixed and to be poured into large tanks filled with cold water. The metal falls to the bottom in small flaky particles; this is called "granulating," and is done in order to obtain a thin surface for the acid to act upon in the process of refining. The water is drawn off and the granulated particles of the metals are placed in boxes and taken to the refinery. Here they are placed in porcelain jars and the silver dissolved in nitric acid. The solution of nitrate of silver is then drawn off by means of a gold syphon—that metal not being acted upon by nitric acid—and emptied into a large vat of brine or very salt water, which, being constantly stirred, precipitates the metal in chloride of silver, the cholric acid in the salt taking the place of the nitric acid. It is then reduced to a metallic form by diluted sulphuric and zinc granulations in proper proportions. The silver is then pressed in cakes, dried, melted, and poured into 800 or 1,200-ounce bars. Two assays are taken from each melt, one from the bottom, the other from the top, and the fineness ascertained. The usual purity is 998—1,000 being absolute purity. An exact weight of each bar is taken, a computation is made, and the necessary amount of copper as alloy is added to reduce the metal to the standard fineness, which is 900 for both gold and silver coins, ten per cent of the coinage of each being copper. The ingot melter then melts the pure metal and the alloy together, thoroughly mixing them, and then casting the same into ingots. A silver dollar ingot is twelve inches long, one and a half inches wide, and one-half an inch thick. There are thirty-five ingots in a melt. After the nitrate of silver is drawn from the porcelain jars, the gold that was contained in the granulations, and which of course the nitric acid could not dissolve, is then removed and refined by boiling in sulphuric acid, after which it is treated in the same manner as refined silver.

Mr. Alexander Martin, melter and refiner in this mint, has had twenty-two years' experience in refining the precious metals in our mints, and he thoroughly understands everything connected with the department. Jacob Stadtfeldt, the gold ingot melter, is one of the best in the United States; he has had twenty-five years' experience. John Feix, foreman of the refinery, has been employed in our American mints for thirty years. Probably he knows as much about the refining of the precious metals as any man in the world. The facts here presented were kindly furnished me by Mr. La Blanc, employed here in the mint.

The refining of gold is largely performed in the furnaces, and by the aid of flues. All the baser metals are comparatively oxidized by the aid of heat, or, in other words, "burnt out," whereas gold does not so oxidize, and may be exposed to the action of fire for an indefinite period of time without being converted into an oxide. I was told, however, that if the heat of the furnace is too intense the gold is converted into a vapor, and is carried off up the chimney, and is often deposited in a metallic state upon the roof. This was news to me, as I was not aware that gold could so be subjected to a process of distillation. Probably the process must be very slow.

The machinery in the mint for rolling out the strips from which the coins are cut with a die and punch, as well as the stamping or milling, is of a very perfect description. The engine is one hundred and fifty horse-power, and one of the finest in the world. With the gold coins and silver dollars every piece is weighed and brought to the exact weight before it is stamped. This is done by women, of whom large numbers are employed in the mint. The reducing of the weight is effected by filing and sand-papering. The precious dust is all carefully saved, and in the course of a year this, with the other waste of the establishment, amounts to a large sum. The entire institution is managed in an excellent manner, and kept as neat as a pin. The officials were very polite, and allowed me all the privileges I could ask for, save, perhaps, carrying away a good-sized box full of the yellow coins, but they were not giving out bags of coin the day I called upon them. This mint gives excellent situations for superintendents, assistants, overseers, foremen in the different parts, and the entire corps of employees. The pay is good, and the labor by no means excessive. I made up my mind I would rather own the mint, its contents and business, than any other establishment I have seen in the city.

THE CUSTOM HOUSE

Is another government establishment which I had occasion to visit a number of times. My stereopticon and views were sent there for examination, to see if I would have any duties to pay upon them. As the tariff on that class of goods is forty per cent, and as the goods had cost some five hundred dollars, I naturally was a little anxious to learn how much duty I would be obliged to pay. I am pleased to be able to say that I found the officials and assistants in the Custom House very genial and accommodating, much more so than is often the case with government employees. I found that in consequence in part of my having used the apparatus in Yokohama, and more particularly because they are "tools of trade," to be used to illustrate lectures, no duties applied to them, and they were admitted free. They were also very obliging and generous with the curios, paper goods, and other articles of Japanese manufacture I brought home with me. They admitted all free of duty. Thereby I felt that I had been saved the unpleasant duty of paying out some two hundred dollars, which would have been the amount to disburse had I been forced to pay the regular tariff. It is so usual in such places to meet with short and crusty replies that the obliging and gentlemanly treatment received here was duly appreciated. How much pleasanter this world would be than it is now if everybody would treat everybody else with courtesy and politeness.

MANUFACTURES.

I called at several of the manufacturing establishments of this flourishing city, and was pleased to find so much enterprise and industry manifested here. The West Coast Furniture Manufactory is doing a very large business, employing some two hundred hands, and turning out a vast amount of beautiful furniture, which is shipped all over the state, up and down the coast, as well as to the islands of the Southern Pacific. They have the late improvements in manufacturing machinery, such as band-saws, dove-tailing machines, etc. The latter perform the work of fifteen men, and do it beautifully. The woods used is this manufactory are many of them quite new to me, and several kinds are very showy. Among them are Toa, South Sea Tamano, Sardwish, Trimavasa, Mexican laurel, California laurel, Oregon ash, tiger-wood, etc. Some are very hard; some are showy, and admit of a fine finish. The establishment is doing itself great credit in the great quantity of beautiful work it is turning out.

Adjoining this establishment is the "Seal Rock Tobacco Works." I have no special affection for tobacco, and think if every plant of it in existence should suddenly die, and every tobacco seed refuse to grow, the world would not meet with a very serious loss; but as this company has built up a large business, which bids fair to grow still larger, I could hardly do less than walk in and look at them; and as many of you are chewers and smokers, I cannot well do less than tell you a little about this particular tobacco establishment.

The company is from Lynchburg, Va.; has been here less than two years; uses six thousand pounds of tobacco per day; works two hundred and fifty hands. Its weekly pay roll is $1,000. It keeps on hand at all times $100,000 worth of the raw material, and the same amount of the manufactured goods. The average price of the manufactured article is sixty cents per pound. All kinds of manufactured tobacco are turned out. Male and female hands are employed, and they work complacently side by side, wrapping up the leaves of the nicotine, the males being principally negroes from Virginia. Some of the stock is dipped in a mixture of licorice, etc., to make it sweet and dark, while some is wrapped in the natural state. Copperas, glucose, and other substances are used in the manufacture of this filthy weed. As I stood looking at the scores of busy hands preparing this narcotic herb, adding the mixture to make the certain brands, I could not help thinking how many thousands of people will engage in chewing it; how uncleanly and ridiculous the habit, and how much better the world would be if the baneful qualities of tocacco had never been discovered or used. The pressing is done by hydraulic power, and is applied very quickly. A fifty-pound box is pressed in two minutes. The plugs are made long and short, from two ounces to a pound. When I meditate upon the uncleanly habit of using the weed, and realize the uselessness of it, perhaps I am like the Pharisee who thanked his God that he was not sinful like other men. I am very glad that I never contracted the habit of using tobacco.

We visited one of the large canning establishments where California fruits are put up in immense quantities, and where hundreds of hands are employed in the business. We did not see so much of the details of the business as we otherwise would have done had the man in charge evinced more courtesy. As it was, he was so boorish and ungentlemanly that we did not press our investigations. There are several canning establishments in the city. California surpasses all countries in the world for fruits, and must necessarily excel in fruit canning.

We called at the ice manufactory, and were much interested in the process employed and the results obtained. I will not now undertake to tell how many thousands of feet of pipe are employed for conveying ammonial gas, which absorbs the warmth in water, thus congealing it into ice. The chamber where the freezing is done is about fifty by twenty-five feet, and some sixteen feet in hight. The water is allowed to trickle down somewhat slowly, the freezing process taking place promptly, and by the addition of layer after layer of ice the chamber becomes ultimately full of solid ice, containing in all some hundreds of tons. I have almost forgotten how many hours are required to complete the freezing, but think it is about thirty. The ice is easily gotten out in large cakes, and besides supplying the city, the ships in the harbor are also supplied, and large quantities are shipped up and down the coast and to the Pacific islands. A large engine is employed to perfect the freezing process. I have seen large bodies of ice in my time, but I do not remember having ever seen such a mass of pure, congealed crystal.

I called to see a patron in the large machine shop for making stamps, mills, crushers, etc, for mining purposes, the same conducted by Joshua Hendry. Here are quartz mills, rock breakers, ore feeders, battery mortar, battery irons, battery stamps, with hydraulic machinery of all kinds, with saw mills for lumber, and all the machinery thereunto pertaining. It is a busy establishment, and here machines of various patterns and styles are kept on hand, so that all desires could be pleased.

OTHER IRON ESTABLISHMENTS.

There are in the same quarter of the city a great number of iron manufactories and machine works of a wide range in character. Here milling machinery and appliances are gotten up for all conceivable purposes. Much more of this kind of work is done here than at all other points on the Pacific coast, and all evinces the spirit of industry and enterprise which prevails here. Among the large iron working establishments of this active city, I will mention a few. The Fulton Iron Works, Hinckley, Spiers & Hays, proprietors, have three hundred men employed; use two hundred and fifty tons of iron per month, and their annual business amounts to $800,000. They are now completing a sixty-stamp mill for Mexico, with two Corliss engines, twenty-four inch bore, and forty-eight inch stroke, with six boilers fifty-four inches in diameter and sixteen feet long; thirty-six five-inch pans; eighteen eight-feet settlers; four rock breakers, etc. They are also making a twenty-stamp mill for the Total Wreck Mining Company of Arizona, with Corliss engine, twenty-inch bore, forty-eight inch stroke, with four boilers, forty-four inches in diameter, sixteen feet long; fourteen five-inch pans, and seven eight-feet settlers. Also a number of engines, boilers, etc., for smaller mills. Also a Corliss engine with thirty-inch bore, forty-eight inch stroke, with ten boilers for the Pacific Iron and Nail Company, about commencing business in Oakland.

The Golden State Miners' Iron Works are also turning out a great deal of heavy work. They employ eighty men, and use one hundred tons of iron per month. The largest job they have on hand at present is extensive dredging machinery for the Panama Canal. It appears that they are able to do the work cheaper, even, than it can be pone in Pittsburgh, or any other point East, even when the difference of freight is taken into consideration. The whole thing will be completed, ready for shipment in August. The company have eight engines and four boilers, and under favorable circumstances handle fifteen hundred cubic yards of material in an hour.

The Pacific Iron Works, Rankin, Brayton & Co., proprietors, cover two fifty-vara lots; number of workmen employed, one hundred and seventy-five; amount of coal and wrought iron consumed monthly, two hundred and fifty tons. They manufacture all kinds of mining machinery; plants for gold and silver mills, water-jackets, smelting furnaces, hoisting works, and pumping machinery, Wheelock's automatic cut-off engine, Walker's compound steam pump, Howell's improved white furnace, Pacific patent revolving dryer, ore crushers, concentrating machinery, sample works, etc. The water-jacket smelting furnaces are used for galena silver and copper ores, and embrace many features of practical utility, covered by letters patent, and not possessed by others. It is said no other furnace can compare with them for durability and capacity for uninterrupted work. More than sixty of them are now running on the Pacific coast, giving satisfaction in all cases.

The Etna Iron Works, Pendergast, Smith & Co., manufacture iron castings and machinery of all kinds. They employ about one hundred hands, and use one hundred and twenty-five tons of iron per month.

The Union Iron Works, Prescott, Scott & Co., employ six hundred men, and use from twenty-four to thirty thousand tons of rough material in the year.

I could not, of course, take time to visit all the iron and machinery works of the city; but it must be admitted that for a young city San Francisco has done wonders in this direction, as well as in many others. These numerous busy establishments give steady employment to great numbers of workmen, and dispense every month hundreds of thousands of dollars to merchants and traders of the city.

MARKETS AND EXCHANGES.

The markets of San Francisco are well worth visiting. In a land where nature has been so prodigal of her benefits, nowhere, perhaps, in the world may be witnessed such a display at all times of the year, fish, flesh, fowl, tubers, fruits, and vegetable, as to be seen in the various markets appropriated to the sale of each. From the South in early March come strawberries, and as the season advances so do the fruits keep pace; until late in autumn they are supplied with luxuries from countries lying north. Thus in this city of plenty its fruit stalls, its vegetable stalls, and meat stalls may be seen heavily laden with the fatness of the earth, and at seasons when in other parts Jack Frost reigns supreme.

California Market was opened August 1, 1867, and occupies a space from Pine to California streets, between Kearney and Montgomery streets. Here is to be found at all seasons of the year offered to families and consumers a full and splendid display of comforts and delicacies of all kinds.

Center Market is situated at the southeast corner of Dupont and Sutter streets, and was opened in July, 1874. It is one hundred and thirty-seven and a half feet by two hundred feet, with entrances on both Sutter and Dupont streets.

New Metropolitan Market, on the southeast corner of New Montgomery and Mission streets, and the San Francisco Market, running from Clay to Merchant street, between Mongomery and Sansome streets, are the other institutions of like nature. The wholesale market where the vegetable and fruit are disposed of by wholesale, and where the retail dealers of the city obtain their supplies, is a busy place in the morning. Through the center is a wide roadway, through which heavily loaded wagons are driven, and on the sides are wide stalls or divisions into which wagons drive to unload. Perhaps one hundred tons of vegetables are sold here every day, and fruit in proportion.

I visited the Merchants' Exchange and the Produce Exchange, and received some figures as to the amount of business transacted therein, but as I failed to set them down my memory is too treacherous to permit me to give them accurately. The amount of business, however, is very large. At the Produce Exchange the membership is set at very high figures, as the advantages thereby derived are very great. Here immense amounts of grain change hands, hundreds of thousands of bushels being sold at a single operation. Here every morning dealers who are members gather in at ten o'clock, and thirty or sixty minutes are used in effecting private sales, which are often very extensive. Every member has his desk, perhaps with his samples of grain and produce, and the place is a very busy one, with the bargains that are effected. At the appointed time auction sales begin, when a certain number of hundreds of bushels of a certain grain are offered to the highest bidder. The bids are sometimes lively. In the public way very large quantities of grain in the aggregate are sold, and to be shipped to various parts of the world. As a grain-growing state California cannot be excelled.

LIBRARIES.

San Francisco is well supplied with these very useful institutions, and some of them compare favorably with similar institutions in much older cities.

The Mercantile Library Association, situated at 216 Bush street, was organized January 24, 1853, and contains fifty thousand volumes, and is the largest and best assorted library in the state. The building is elegant and substantial, and constructed of brick and iron. In the commodious reading-room are kept the principal periodicals of the world.

The Free Public Library occupies what was formerly known as the Pacific Hall, over the California Theater, on Bush street, between Kearney and Dupont streets. It is supported by the levy of a tax authorized by the Board of Supervisors for the city and county. It contains about 25,000 volumes, with a circulation of 40,000 volumes per month. Tickets to remove books are issued on form of application, the same being signed by some responsible person.

Odd Fellows' Library Association was organized December 30, 1854, and reorganized May 21, 1870. It contains 38,000 volumes, with an annual circulation of over 100,000 volumes. The various departments of literature are well represented here, as well as many works considered rare. A comfortable reading-room contains the leading periodicals of the times, and is usually crowded with intent readers. The institution is mainly supported by the lodges of the city. Its doors are always open to members of the order from all parts of the country. It is said to be the largest and best conducted library belonging to a similar order or organization in any part of the country.

The San Francisco Law Library was started in September, 1865, and was first located in the third story of the City Hall; then in the Exchange Building on the northeast corner of Washington and Montgomery streets. From this latter place it was removed to rooms No. 27 and 28 in Montgomery Block, a large edifice containing between one and two hundred rooms. The library contains 22,500 volumes, chiefly of law books, and is also well supplied with books of legislative and political record, and works of references, which include bibliographs, encyclopedias, dictionaries, directories, gazetteers, history, travels, discovery, etc.

The Masonic Library numbers 1,271 volumes, and are such as are more particularly connected with Masonry. It is situated in the Masonic Temple at the corner of Post and Montgomery streets.

The Mechanics' Institute Library contains 30,000 volumes, among which are said to be very rare tomes. On its shelves is a complete set of the British Patent Reports, 3,538 volumes, all well bound and dating from 1617. This set is considered of great value. Here are also many other valuable works, including the Pyramids of Egypt, Arabian Antiquities, Hogarth's Works, a complete set of Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society of London, Russell's Naval Architecture, Transactions of the Linnean Society of London, Encyclopedia Britannica, Knight's Cyclopedia, and a great collection of scientific works.

There are seven daily newspapers published in San Francisco, the Chronicle, the Morning Call, the Examiner, the Alta-Californian, the Abend Post (German), the Evening Bulletin, the Evening Post. Chief among the weekly papers, besides the weekly editions of those just named, are the Argonaut, the News Letter, Pacific Life, Spirit of the Times, the Wasp, etc.

San Francisco is well supplied with schools, among which are a High School for each boys and girls, a Latin School, the Lincoln Grammar School, Denman Grammar School, Rincon Grammar School, Washington School, Union Grammar School, Broadway Grammar School, Clarke's Point Grammar School, Spring Valley Grammar School, Hayes' Valley Grammar School, Cosmopolitan School, and several others.

Of Hospitals, the city has five, the German Hospital, San Francisco Female Hospital, San Francisco Lying-in and Foundling Hospital, City and County Hospital, French Hospital.

Of asylums there are also five, the Protestant Orphan Asylum, the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum, with the Almshouse and benevolent and charitable societies.

THE FIRE DEPARTMENT

Is claimed to be equal to any in the world. The force of the department consists of over three hundred men. The apparatus consists of twelve steam fire engines, five ditto in reserve; twelve tenders, two-wheeled, six ditto (reserve); five four-wheeled hose-carriages, one ditto (reserve); four hook-and-ladder trucks, one ditto (reserve); one chief engineer's buggy, one assistant-chief engineer's buggy, and seventy-two horses.

Throughout the city are 55 cisterns, having a capacity of 2,011,856 gallons, and not less than 1,346 hydrants, together with 39 large gongs, 32 small gongs, one bell weighing 4,500 pounds, four weighing 2,000 pounds each, one weighing 800 pounds, and two of 300 pounds each.

One hundred and twenty miles of wire are used for telegraphing, one hundred of which is run on poles, and the balance on the housetops. There are 361 stations, duly numbered, and when an alarm is given at either one of these stations the exact locality of the fire is at once made known at headquarters.

STEAMSHIP LINES.

San Francisco is also well supplied in this direction. Being the half-way house of call, commercially speaking, between the orient and the occident, it is a point from which steamers of every build are constantly departing, while perhaps nowhere else in the world is such complete system apparent and such strict regard observed as to time of both departing and arriving.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company I have already spoken of. The fine steamers in this line ply to Japan and China, and to the Sandwich Islands, New Zealand, Australia, and to Panama. It has eight steamers in all; but owing to some mismanagement, the stock of the company is worth much less than a few years ago.

The Oriental and Occidental Steamship Company is the one I patronized from Yokohama to San Francisco. The steamers of this line run only to and from Japan and China. They are employing four or five large steamers.

The boats of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company ply between Victoria, British Columbia, and Puget Sound. Two boats run in this line. San Diego and southern ports, four boats run in this line. Eureka, Humboldt, etc., are reached, and two steamers are here employed.

Other routes occupy some fourteen steamers, large and small.

Steam ferries across the bay to Oakland and other points are one of the institutions of this enterprising city. Most of them run in connection with railroad lines.

THE DOCKS

Of the city are also worthy of notice. With its immense import and export trade San Francisco necessarily needs extensiv dock facilities.

The California Dry Dock is capable of accommodating the largest ocean-going steamers. It is located at Hunter's Point, about four and a half miles from the city. Its length is 416 feet; width, 90 feet; depth of water on sills in spring tide, 24 feet; at neap tide, 22 feet.

The Balance Floating Dry Docks are situated near the first, and are capable of receiving first-class vessels of 1,500 tons register.

Besides these there is a marine railway slip for vessels of no more than 800 tons burden.

The Mission Rock Grain Dock and Warehouses are located on an island, about six hundred yards from the city front, near the wharf of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and connected with the shore by a steam ferry. The island covers an area of about fourteen acres, with sufficient depth of water to load and float ships of the largest class. Trips to the warehouses are made by ferry-boat every half hour (free), from the landing at the foot of Second street.

Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Express, instituted in 1851, has a world-wide reputation. Its quarters comprise a series of well-arranged departments, whence parcels may be forwarded all over the United States, and, in fact, to any part of the world. They connect with western companies, and have agencies in many important eastern cities. They also have six or eight European agencies.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Among these may be named the New City Hall, the Old City Hall, the Industrial School, the House of Correction, the County Jail, the United States Mint, the United States Sub-Treasury, the Custom House, San Francisco Stock Exchange, Merchants' Exchange, the Masonic Temple, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Appraisers' Building, the Safe Deposit Block, the Art School.

I might mention the churches, for the city is blessed or cursed—according to the standpoint from which one judges—with a goodly lot of them, but my inclination is so faint in that line that I will pass them by with slight notice. Suffice it to say that San Francisco has a Trinity church, Grace church, a Calvary church; St. Luke has one; St. Ignatius is well enough off to have one; St. Mary has a cathedral; St. Francis, a church; St. Patrick, a church; while the Jews have a fine synagogue; many others I have not mentioned. I did not put myself to the trouble to look up the high-salaried clergymen who exhibit their talents in these magnificent god-houses, being more anxious to make the acqaintance of honest and skilful mechanics. I, however, did see the capacious church or tabernacle in which the Rev. I. S. Kallock preaches, and I had the opportunity of looking upon the holy man himself. He looks like a jolly, worldly sort of a fellow who enjoys a generous dinner, a horse-race, and is a good judge of female loveliness. I believe he thinks a good deal more about this world than the one that is said to succeed it.

PLACES OF AMUSEMENT

Should not be overlooked. They before have been in part incidentally alluded to, though not in detail. The city boasts of an opera house; and among the theaters are the California Theater, the Baldwin, the Bush Street Theater, the Standard, the Fountain, the Adelphi, the Bella Union, the Tivoli Garden, the Winter Garden, the Vienna Garden, and Woodward's Gardens. I visited the Baldwin and the Tivoli Gardens, and found myself duly amused, but cannot speak from personal experience of the others.

I visited

WOODWARD GARDENS,

For the theater there is not in operation during the day, which was the time of my calling. The grounds are very interesting and well worthy of a visit. The late R. B. Woodward commenced the laying out of these gardens in 1860, after having visited the Eastern states and Europe, and three times subsequently, not only to obtain information, but to procure valuable works of art and antiquity, fine educational types of natural history, a large and well-selected library, and all the treasures of art and science, together with a daily increasing number of specimens that form the high reputation of the four museums—the Zoographicon, the Art Gallery, the Marine Aquarium, Conservatories, Plant-Houses, Menageries, and Statuaries. The entire expenditure has been from $50,000 to $100,000 annually, while scarcely a day passes but what some new curiosity is added to the already vast collection of beasts, birds, and fishes, and these from the most distant parts of the world. On Saturday and Sunday an afternoon performance is given in the very capacious auditorium, supplied with a large stage. At the time of my visit a company of young men and women were enjoying themselves on roller-skates.

For promenading purposes the capacious grounds are almost unsurpassed. The asphaltum walks are kept in fine order, as they wind around the ornamental flower-beds, the lake, the cages for animals, and the almost ceaseless variety of rare vegetation.

The Museum of Zoology, contains a fine collection of birds and beasts, principally American, placed in cages duly classified and numbered. Among the buildings, departments, etc., are the Rotunda, the Conservatory and Orangery, the Art Gallery, the Marine Aquarium, Tropical Greenhouses, the Conchological Gallery, the Menagerie, the Fox Inclosure, the Engine House, the Bear Pit, the Monkey House, the Donkey Inclosure, the Amphitheater, the Promenade, the Camera Obscura, Large Animal Cage, Large Animal Inclosure, the Aviary, the Deer Inclosure, the Cattle Inclosure, the Gymnasium, the Swings, the Kangaroo House, the Great Aviary, the Fountain, and Large Pavilion, in which are the Skating Rink, Music Hall, Orchestrion, and numerous restaurants. Besides these, near the last-named building, are the Condor Aviary, the Geological and Ethnological Museums, etc. Within the grounds is a colossal bust of Washington, mounted on a concrete pedestal twenty-five feet in hight. Flowers, foliage, and ferns, meet the eye at every turn. There are few more interesting places to pass a few hours.

Closing Word from Mr Whitehead.

STONE, PA., Oct. 20, 1882.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: When I asked the questions which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 16th I had no intention of entering upon a discussion relativ to the merits of the Christian religion and the credibility of the Bible. I hav no such intention now. You and I entertain opinions that are almost diametrically opposit. Both of us cannot be right; both may be equally wrong. Nothing that either might say on the questions at issue between us can in any way affect the real truth. My real object was to gain light on what I considered to be some of the difficulties of Liberalism. You cannot deny but that it is attended with many difficulties. But, as before stated, I am not after a discussion, and will not stop to enumerate the difficulties of Infidelity nor say anything of your reply to my last letter, although a great deal might be said in opposition. I thank you for answering the questions propounded, and subscribe myself, Your friend,

W. M. WHITEHEAD.

REPLY.—It seems our friend gracefully throws up the sponge and declines longer to discuss the merits of Christianity. Perhaps he has chosen the wiser course. There is really not much to be said in defense of the mythical and unauthentic character of Christianity in the early centuries. There is a weakness—a lack of connection—in the proof that must be painful to the thinking and investigating Christian devotee. There is really no history worthy of the name that givs assurance that such a person as Jesus had an actual existence, especially the Jesus of the gospels. If there was an obscure man by the name of Jesus, who itinerated and wandered about the country, followed by some illiterate fishermen, and was finally executed for setting up some claims to the throne, there is no earthly probability that such a character as Jesus of the gospel ever lived; who was begotten by a ghost upon the body of a little virgin Jew girl, who performed miracles, raised people from the dead, raised himself from the dead and then ascended bodily up above the atmosphere surrounding the earth. There is no history testifying that such a person existed; there is nothing upon which to base such a claim, save what are called the four gospels, and we hav plainly shown that those had no existence, or were not known till the closing part of the second century. There is nothing to show that Peter or Paul, or any of the disciples who are claimed to hav lived at the time Jesus did and to know him, ever said a word about Jesus having no natural father, about his mother being a virgin, about his performing wonderful miracles, like raising people from the dead, about raising himself from the dead, about his ascending, physically and bodily, up and away from the earth. No claim was set up for any of these impossible things until the second century, when the wily "fathers" deemed that the new system of religion needed those supernatural qualities to make it popular with the superstitious masses who demanded those marvelous and most extraordinary features. This is, no doubt, the reason why the miracles and supernatural parts of the story were invented and handed out to the credulous masses as the revealed word of Heaven. There is certainly no proof nor probability to the contrary. This is a vital point to the claims of Christianity. Here is where the system is fearfully weak, and here is where proof is needed which is wholly unable to be furnished. If Christians can furnish such proof they assuredly would do so without urging from us; and that they do not do so is sure proof that they cannot. If they cannot furnish this important proof they ought, like honest men, to acknowledge their inability and confess that their system of religion is without historic reliability, and that myth and falsehood are all it has to rely upon.

Mr. Whitehead certainly appears to be a man of sufficient intelligence to see this, and he ought to hav honesty enough to confess this patent truth. Why should he or any other man still hold on to that as divine which has nothing to sustain it save the erroneous assertions of unknown persons, who, if they lived, are not known to possess truth, candor, and reliability.

He is clearly correct when he says that he and we entertain different opinions, almost diametrically opposed; that both of us cannot be right. There is no chance for an argument between us on these propositions. One of us must be in the wrong. The claims of Christianity are true or they are false. We feel positiv that our friend is in the wrong and that the claims of Christianity are false. We claim that we hav established this by the strongest kind of proofs, and we think too highly of Mr. Whitehead's intelligence to believe for a moment that he cannot clearly perceive it. The trouble is, he was reared in the belief that Christianity is what it pretends to be. Perhaps his livelihood depends upon sustaining the defectiv system (we imagin he is a preacher), and it is a herculean task to throw away at once the teachings and dogmas instilled into our minds in the days of our childhood, and it is not a pleasant thing for a man to separate himself from long-sustained associations; to be ostracized by those who hav for years yielded love and respect, but this is the sacrifice and homage which truth demands, and no honest person, whether clergyman or otherwise, ought to evade this duty.

Mr. Whitehead seems still to find some difficulties and obstacles on the part of Liberalism, though he fails to giv the slightest indication what the difficulties are. It is to be regretted he did not state what they are, for possibly they are more imaginary than real, and such as can easily be dispelled. There is perhaps nothing in the world but what has more or less difficulties connected with it. For instance, the simple matter of breathing air and drinking water, as essential as they are to our health and existence, are not wholly free from difficulties. The lungs are often compelled to take in noxious vapors, injurious gases, deleterious and poisonous air, and the water we drink is often charged with impurities, with earthy and mineral substances in solution, which are not unfrequently detrimental to health. So, perhaps, there is no function connected with our organization, no feature of our existence or the phenomena of nature, that has not some difficulties connected with it. But because such is the case it does not follow that we should discontinue breathing the atmosphere nor drinking the purest water we can obtain; that we should hesitate to use any of the functions of our being, or that we should not use any of the provisions of nature. Though we may often find difficulties in our path, we should not sink before them, but rather rise superior to them, and valiantly overcome them.

So far as we are concerned, we see no difficulties in Liberalism, or at least nothing to deter a brave and candid spirit. Liberalism is only another name for naturalism, and everything pertaining to nature is freer from difficulties than anything else in existence. Liberalism is easy to believe because it is so natural, so easy, and so true. It is the claims of supernaturalism, of ecclesiasticism, of myths, of superstitions—monstrous demands about gods and devils—that are so replete with difficulties. To accept them a man has to throw away his reason, stifle the spirit of investigation, close his eyes to the light of truth, and swallow like a young robin whatever is given, without a question or clear perception. Here is where the principal difficulties are to be found. If these are only bravely cast aside, the light of truth will be sure to shine clearly, and all difficulties and doubts will flee away.

We thank Mr. Whitehead for his courtesy and gentlemanly conduct, and we hope he will continue in the search of truth, and that he will hav the honesty and candor to accept it when found. May he become an intelligent and clear-sighted Liberal.

Delay in Filling Orders.

The confusion and broken-up condition attendant upon moving has prevented our filling orders with usual promptness. We beg our friends and patrons to be considerate under the circumstances, and we promis, as soon as we are fully settled in our new quarters, to again fill orders promptly. The past week has been a very busy one with us.

It has been announced in the Index and other papers that B. F. Underwood is soon to start out on a grand and "cultured" lecturing tour. Inasmuch as it has become "coarse and low" to oppose theology and the Bible, and as his mind has passed through a course of mental evolution, a question has been raised in this corner of the moral vinyard whether the "cultured" gentleman will go forth under the auspices of the Bible Society, or the Young Men's Christian Association, and whether he desires the "tag-rag and bobtails" to come out and hear him. If he no longer opposes Christianity and theological dogmas, he ought to get a large hearing from the Christian element.

Tadpole Liberalism.

Dear Bennett: I smiled over the transfixing of Wm. Emmette Coleman on your free lance last week. But the holding of this malformed, unfinished creature up to the Liberal public gaze was a painful sight. You should hav waited an age or two, till he had grown presentable Starting as a kind of jelly-fish Liberal, his struggle with existence has developed him up only to the tadpole stage, while millions of his race hav shed their tails and taken to the free air and solid earth long ago. He can only wiggle with his caudal propeller yet, even in the sea of thought. I hardly know what his small baby-frog croakings mean. Do you? It seems to me I hav heard something of the kind, ages ago, in some stage of my biological development; but now, in the higher gift of clear, rugged English speech, I hav forgotten the language of the toady. I shall hav to get some modern amphibian to interpret Mr. Coleman's polliwog (nowhere near arrived yet to polyglot).

Your mention of H. Clay Neville, aforetime correspondent of the Index, brought up a flood of recollections. Neville is a very dear souvenir of mine. I had to defend him from the cold neglect of a heartless world a few years ago. His wisdom cried in the streets, when no man regarded. I regarded. I translated him, and set him right before the Liberal public. I got him understood, and just as soon as he was understood he was satisfied, and never peeped more. He was the "O Czar of Ozark," who went howling up and down the Mississippi Valley, and publishing his wailings in the Index, after this distressing fashion:

> I think that skepticism is already spreading faster than conservativ Liberalism could desire. The new gospel of liberty is making more converts than it has wholesome provisions for. To inculcate doubt merely on the great question of religious belief, without educating the heart and conscience to a higher conception of right, is not making any progress toward a better life. The world needs its conscience elevated and strengthened more than it needs theology demolished. Liberalism needs its moral standard adjusted more than it needs a fresh supply of new recruits. There is yet much good in Christianity for the world; and conservativ Liberalism will be careful how it deals with this venerable faith lest it make untimely attacks on a religion which it is not prepared to supplant.

Now this is stuff off the same piece with the weaving and weeping of this latter day saint, Coleman. Wm. Emmette succeeds H. Clay beautifully. His style of croak is very much the same. He is a tardy survival of the same fossilized age. Spawned out of the same ooze, he is just about equal to the products of the same Clay. He, too, is so sorry for the Christians, for Jesus and the Bible. Christianity has always been so tender toward its own children, and especially toward other people's children! In its preaching of the gospel to every creature, it has preached so carefully, with so much consideration for the feelings of its hearers! Whenever there was a mechanic's vise lying around it has always been so kind to the thumbs of those who could not convert easily. If any one saw the stars with a different twinkle from the Christian system, he immediately saw stars with a Christian club over his head, and was kindly granted free admission to the fireworks. And, generally, if anybody invented anything, improved anything, or discovered anything that the prophets hadn't foretold, or Jesus taught, or the Bible recorded, Christians gently and affectiontely burnt him up. "For these and all other blessings, good Lord," don't let us "abuse Jesus, and the Bible, and Christianity, and pollute the pages of Liberal literature, and disgrace Freethought oratory in large measure." ("In large measure" is good. It is one of the witticisms of H. Clay, and that is why I knew these two beauties are twin polliwogs.)

These hav been the practices and policy of Christianity in the past, but the whirligig of time has brought about changes. It is our turn now. Christianity is the under dog in the fight. We all remember its history, but nobody thinks now of serving Christians the same sauce. No Freethinker proposes to put Christians through a course of thumbscrew, and rack, and fagot. All the revenge he cares to take is to twit them of their crimes and enjoy the flinging away of their old, worn-out, theologic toggery, the unloading of their creeds, the smashing of orthodox baggage, and the rollick and rout generally along the whole line of retreat. The printing-press and the platform were invented expressly that we might "jaw back," now that our turn has come; but Mr. Coleman won't allow us this poor privilege. He would set Comstock's bloodhounds on us, and suppress our press so that "Jesus, the Bible, and Christianity" may hav a dignified gala-day march of it in good order down into oblivion, holding on to their supremacy and their tyranny till their last fatal plunge is taken. He would not hav their feelings hurt by any reminders of their savagery in the days of their power. That's what Coleman's screed amounts to. He is sorry for the Christians, and begs us stalwart, unforgetful, unforgiving Infidels not to be too hard on them. He has made no headway himself in fearless, robust Liberalism, so he calls us all to a halt. He has not survived, and so the whole conquering Liberal army must "trend" to his level. ("Trend" is another quite too superlativ word that the pseudo esthetes do much affect.) Well, let's don't. Let's let them up to please Mr. Coleman.

He writes all this to Mr. Underwood as to a congenial spirit. He knows this bird-of-a-feather to a charm. Underwood, too, if he ever got beyond the tadpole stage, is relapsing back to it. He, too, croaks and talks polliwog talk, and don't want poor Christians hurt. He is growing a manifest tadpole tail. He don't like "bob-tails" as far as he has got, He can't liv on good, solid, Liberal land; and strong. stirring, Freethought air doesn't agree with him; so he takes to a warm puddle with the polliwogs—and with tails.

I hope Neville is "on this bank and shoal of time" yet, if not on the right bank of the Mississippi. As soon as he hears the blast of these young frog-horns he will rise out of the earth if he is underground, or descend from the air if he is there, and make a trio of delectable polliwogs in a puddle together. There will be the starting-point of a conservativ, Christian-fearing Liberal League, such as Dr. Monroe, of the Age, is not "sanguin" about.

I would like to treat Mr. Coleman's fulmination seriously, but he utters his platitudes of sympathy for the poor, "abused Jesus, Bible, and Christianity" in such a solemn way, and wants us Freethinkers to stop persecuting them, with such saut, saut tears in his eyes, that it makes me laugh. If I could be serious in the matter, I would say, Seriously, Mr. Coleman, I wouldn't be got up so finically; I would not be projected for a lifetime on the fainting edge of existence, just going to "die of a rose in aromatic pain." I wouldn't be so awfully esthetic, so cultured within an inch of my life, for all the kid-gloves that nanny-goats bought and sold and skinned hav ever made. I would remind him that "a cat with mittens catches no mice." The common proverbs of the common people express their contempt for him when they say, "I would be a man, or a mouse, or a long-tailed rat!" I would be something. I wouldn't be nothing. I wouldn't liv on the border line between substance and the inane. I would place firm foot on solid earth. I would cultivate an intimate acquaintance with stern, rugged nature, and not be afraid of a spatter of mud. I would hav some influence. I would write to be read and talk to be heard. I would not talk only just sheer unmitigated nonsense. As it is, what he writes has no more effect than an idle breeze through a dry tree. Nobody pays the least attention, except to laugh at him. Here is the sentence that Emerson passes on such as he:

> Alas! that one is born in blight,
> Victim of perpetual slight:
> When thou lookest on his face
> Thy heart saith, "Brother, go thy way!
> None shall ask thee what thou doest,
> Or care a rush for what thou knowest,
> Or listen when thou repliest,
> Or remember where thou liest,
> Or how thy supper is sodden."

Now we look for a proclamation from the three polliwogs to a bemuddled world. Tee Cee Lee.

We hav received from the Doerflinger Book and Publishing Co., of Milwaukee, Wis., a copy of the Freidenker-Almanach (Freethinker's Almanac) for 1883. Not being acquainted with the language of the Faderland, we are unable to catch on to the full significance of all contained in this little brochure, but can confidently recommend it to our many and esteemed German patrons as worthy of their notice.

The Right of Contract.

The only freedom which deserves the name is of pursuing our own good in our own way, so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs or impeach their efforts to attain it. Each is the proper guardiau of his own health, whether bodily, or mental, or spiritual. Mankind are greater gainers by suffering each other to liv as seems good to themselvs than by compelling each to liv as seems good to the rest.—John Stuart Mill.

The question of the regulation of the liquor traffic is one which many Liberals do not care to hav discussed through the Freethought press and from the platform of the League and of the secular convention. They think it is a subject with which we, as Liberals, should hav nothing to do. But in this they are much mistaken. From truly Liberal men and women must come in the future, as it has in the past, the genuin, rational temperance work. No attempt to wean men from the use of intoxicating liquors can be successful which does not build upon the enduring basis of science and order all its methods in harmony with Liberty. Neither the crusade-revival red-ribbon-reformed-drunkard-prayer-and-psalm way of going at it, nor the knock-him-down-with-a-club argument, will avail any more than they hav in the past to prevent the mighty evils flowing from the use of the various excessivly strong stimulants. It is these considerations, with others, which hav induced me to lay before your readers, in a somewhat extended form, my answers to my various critics. I commend to the careful consideration of them all the quotation found at the beginning of this article, put there, not as the utterance of authority, but because I esteem it to contain, in brief compass, the essential thesis of the Republican, the Freethinker, and the Free-Drink advocate. "Each is the proper guardian of his own health, whether bodily, or mental, or spiritual," says Mill, and I am in full accord with him. This is the extent of my offense; no more.

Now I want Mrs. Everest, C. H. Cook, "Liberta," and J. A. Hallock to deny and disprove the truth of Mill's postulate. If they do not succeed in doing this, then they hav no quarrel with me. "But," they will say, "you require us to prove a negativ." Precisely, and that is the same task we giv to pope and king, to priest and plantation overseer. All these usurpers deny man's right to the control of himself. But in the denial they affirm the right of an external authority to control individual thought and action. The standing challenge of the Republican, the Freethinker, and the Abolitionist to them is to prove this monstrous assumption. And this is just my challenge to the prohibitionist. King and pope hav never been able to establish in the court of equity the legitimacy of their claim of authority over the minds and liberties and lives of men; and the potent moralist will be no more successful in his attempt to prove his right to regulate the moral and bodily health of his neighbors. I warn my critics that I shall tolerate no verbal jugglery with my primal postulate, and that they must face the issue squarely, either admitting or denying the right of private judgment. They cannot deny the right of individual choice in one direction and not deny it in all. Fundamental principles cannot thus be warped and disturbed to suit the interests of sects. And yet this is precisely what professed Liberals and alleged Republicans do when they attempt to defend the principles and methods of prohibition. But logic and common sense invariably trap them. There is no secure stopping-place between reason and Rome; neither is there between liberty and despotism.

Now to my critics individually. My esteemed friend, Annie Everest, is much confused. She asks, "Are not all laws prohibitory?" No; not in the sense in which we speak of prohibitory legislation. The law does not prohibit me from purchasing a knife at the hardware store. But if I kill or mutilate any person with that knife, then the law steps in to restrain or punish me. The law can only cognize overt acts, or such as amount to overt acts, violent threats, etc.

"Self-defense demands prohibition of adulterated food or drink." Who denies this? Not I, certainly. The purchaser has a natural right to get that which he thinks he is buying. He may be entirely wrong in his estimate of the qualities and effects upon himself of that which he is procuring; but in that, as in all things else, we hav no right to attempt to force him to think as we do. To admit our right to do that is to stab Freethought in the house of its friends and deliver ourselvs, bound hand and foot, into the clutches of the Christian majority. And all adulterations should be curbed. Ground peas are less injurious than coffee; but putting them in the coffee and selling the whole mixture for genuin Java is adulteration and fraud nevertheless.

Now to Prof. Cook. First, as to terms used, Brother Cook speaks of "temperance prohibition laws." This is a most unfortunate and bewildering expression. Temperance is purely individualistic in its initiativ, but both personal and social in its effects; that is, you cannot by law make a man temperate; but by being temperate yourself you not only benefit yourself but exert a beneficent influence upon those with whom you come in contact. Temperance is of the individual, not of the state. The individual is primary, not the state. The individual can be drunk or sober, the state cannot. Talk of prohibition and the state, and I will not demur to the terms used. But temperance and the state are just as ill-assorted as are morals and the state, and I know that my friend Cook wants nothing of the latter. You say, "From what you say against prohibition, am I not logical in inferring that your general rule is that no human being should be driven or forced to do anything or prohibited from doing anything he wants to do?" I am a little surprised that Prof. Cook, usually so clear in his thought and ready in his apprehensions of principles, should be so confused in the very alphabet of self-government. Each man's liberty ends where that of another begins. Each man has a right to do whatever is not an infringement of the equal right of any one else to do the same thing. I hav a right to my life, but it would be the very quintessence of absurdity to say that the possession or assertion of the right logically gave me the right to deprive Brother Cook of his. The affirmation of my right to my apples logically carries with it the denial of my right to steal his apples. Is his question answered?

Again, "Let me say here that it is as clear to me as that two and two are four that human beings hav a natural and just right to protect each other from the bad or evil effects of all uses, habits, or actions." With the consent of each other, yes; against the refusal, never. Or would Brother Cook force his advice and services upon his friend, nolens volens? There is a proverb to the effect that proffered service has not the sweet smell of new-mown hay, and I should suppose that forced service would be still more malodorous.

Brother Clark has started out to carry the principle of state interference to its logical conclusion—to take it into every closet of the physical life and, though he hesitates a little here, into the brain itself; for it is self-evident that when you deny to a man the expression and practicalization of his thought you hav, in effect, circumscribed his liberty of thought. In a word, Prof. Cook denies the thesis of Mill, and hereafter through life has no guide but the ever-shifting weathercock of majorities. Why our friend should complain of the treatment he has in past years received at the hands of Christians, is more than I can tell. They had, according to Prof. Cook, a perfect right to suppress that which they deemed to be productiv of evil. And the gentleman does not seem to hav profited by the lesson either, for he appears just as eager to compel others to act as he thinks on the subject of heredity, etc., as he is to compel the people of Kansas to act as he thinks on the subject of liquor-drinking. But where, then, would be the liberty, in love for which the professor so zealously contends?

As to what our friend says relativ to "protection, prevention, defense," being synonymous with "prohibition," I will briefly say that that is the old song of the usurper of human rights; that only in liberty is there protection, prevention, and defense; that men never gain that security which they giv up their liberties to obtain; that the "innocent wives, mothers, and children" will be benefited by repeal of existing legislation denying freedom and property rights, not by the enactment of more laws perverting choice and limiting growth; that there is not a single fact going to show that intemperance is decreasing through the operation of any kind of statute law, and that there is nothing more obnoxious to the spirit of a genuin protection than the attempt to perform the impossible. It brings all just laws into contempt through its own continued and flagrant violation.

Compare the past with the present—one hundred years ago with to-day. How many total abstainers were there then? What has wrought the great change? Law? No, it is enlightenment. The prohibitionists hav cause and effect transposed. It is public opinion which has made the law, not the law which has molded public opinion. Men and women, perceiving the evils of intemperance, hav sought a remedy, and for the most part they hav groped blindly. It is a prevaling popular fallacy that law is the great panacea for all social ills, and our sumptuary friends are but a portion of the victims of the almost universal craze. Will Mr. Cook be kind enough to giv me the name of some total abstainer who is such through the operation of any statute law? Just name one, please, professor; only one; not that I deem this a "test," but simply to show the complete scarcity of results of the tyrannous legislation of the past thirty-five years.

Mr. Cook's eleventh paragraph I hav disposed of in commenting on his fourth, and I only pause now to say that I take no position analogous to that he assumes for me, to the effect that there should be no human law to limit any man's action. I believe in the protection of personal and property rights, and that is why I oppose prohibition. I do not believe in murder, arson, robbery, or rape, and I know that the right of self-defense against all of these inheres in each man by virtue of his being, and that for convenience he can delegate the exercise of this right to an organization we call government. Is that clear? Well, then, hav I not shown where "human law is right, just, and compatible with human rights?" But how does that help the cause of prohibition? Do not get confused now. Bear in mind always that the state can do that only which the individuals composing the state had a right to do prior to and independent of the existence of all states. To illustrate, Prof. Cook sees his neighbor, Carl Schmidt, cruelly assaulted by a rough, and he immediately rushes to his assistance. Good. He had a right to offer his help on the spot. His neighbor's natural rights had been invaded. It needed no "law" to justify Mr. Cook's action. But, again, Carl Schmidt is seen by Prof. Cook in the act of purchasing a glass of beer. Imbrued with his old idea of "protection," up rushes the prohibitory professor and knocks the glass from Schmidt's hand. The barkeeper and Schmidt both glare at my venerable friend for a moment, and then they simultaneously "reach" for him. Good again. I like to see boycotters get boycotted. Nothing against the professor, but when he gets entirely off his base and acts like a Christian by trying to make people do as he thinks they ought, it is time for a little awakening.

Next our friend gets hold of Demands of Liberalism, and he evidently thinks he has a big "find." Let us see. Prohibitory, are they? Yes, they are of the same genus as all just laws—not of the Comstock and sumptuary kind. All that I hav said previously applies to this objection. When the church secures the exemption of her property from taxation she virtually prohibits others from enjoying their religion as cheaply as she does hers. The same as to the chaplain clause, and so on to the end of the chapter. We demand the prohibition of this unjust action. But the prohibition of the invasion of another's right is something entirely different from legislation prohibiting the freedom of individual action within the sphere of self. And our friend says that if you repeal a law you prohibit its execution. I am much surprised that he should stoop to such a trivial play upon a word, for that is all to which this paragraph concerning the Demands of Liberalism amounts.

In conclusion, Brother Cook, I do not "despair to search," for I know that one good thing is coming out of this prohibitory Nazareth. A sumptuary wave is sweeping over the country, and its course will not be stayed for some time; but the discussion provoked thereby will do much to enlighten the people and disgust them with statecraft. The storm will be a violent one, but it will purify "a stagnant and death-laden atmosphere." The discussion of prohibition will serve to open the eyes of men and women upon tariff, compulsiv taxation, usury, officery, and other legalized crimes.

I shall hav very little to say in reply to "Liberta," for his article covers almost the identical ground bounded by Prof. Cook's, and my reply to the latter shall also—save on one or two points—be my answer to my anonymous correspondent. "Liberta" is, in common with most anonymous writers, much more inclined to declamation, vituperation, and abuse than to calm reasoning and dispassionate argument. But let that pass for the present.

"The principle of prohibition involves the restraint by law from the doing of that which is a crime per se as well as that which is a crime because forbidden." "That which is a crime because forbidden!" Phew! Will "Liberta" tell me how the "law" can make a crime of that which is not itself a crime? It was once a crime to help fleeing black men on their way from slavery to liberty; but it was only a manufactured crime; that is, no crime. When shall we be done with such disgusting legal gammon? "Liberta" knows, as does every other moderately intelligent man, that the class of enactments, of which the Prohibitory liquor law is a fair sample, are in their very nature and every principle entirely different from the natural laws against murder, theft, arson, etc.; and this attempt to identify, or make to appear as the same, the vitally Calvinistic principles underlying the two classes of legislation, is simply a piece of petifogging utterly unworthy of any one but a writer who carefully conceals his name and abuses his opponent.

And "liberty itself was born of prohibition." The desire for liberty is itself the parent of all natural laws, which are the only just laws, and the fact of liberty, such as we hav had, was born of that desire, not of prohibition. Statute law is the result, not the cause, of certain human aspirations. Man first had the desire to be secure in his person and property or he would never hav enacted laws prohibiting murder and theft. But as man cannot be free when his life may be arbitrarily taken away at any moment by an irresponsible power, and when his earnings are not his to dispose of as he sees fit, we readily perceive those laws which "Liberta" seeks to confuse in our minds with the real prohibitory statutes, were all the children of liberty, rather than its parents, as "Liberta" groundlessly assumes. It is simply wonderful, this faculty which the Prohibitionists possess for getting the cart before the horse. And now I bid "Liberta" farewell. His personalities I shall let pass. We expect such from men who step into the arena of debate armed with the club of force.

"This is characteristic of Mr. Walker. He is always attempting to drag down Liberalism by attacking the principles held dear by a large number of our best and worthiest friends," avers Mr. J. A. Hallock. Thank the gentleman for his good opinion. He continues to race through nearly a third of a column in the usual irresponsible, wild, hit-or-miss way, saying, among other things, that "if he [Walker] will persist in taking into the stomach a substance that will steal away his brains and make him a senseless, raving, dangerous animal," etc.

The cowardly insinuation, for he did not dare say anything more definit, contained in this is also very characteristic of those who believe in, as C. M. Overton says, a system of "injected righteousness." I scorn to make any denial of this implied charge. Those who know me need no assertion of mine, and those who do not are interested only in my principles and teachings.

Continues the Exira gentleman: "This idea of Mr. Walker's is a borrowed one from the Democratic platform of last year, and possesses just about as much patriotism and true philanthrophy as the party has been able to muster for the last quarter of a century." If he could not get a chance to make political capital against the Democratic party out of every subject under discussion, your average Republican editor or ex-editor would be inconsolably miserable. I do hate to take away this last prop and support of the virtuous Mr. Hallock, but truth compels me to say that I hav been unalterably opposed to all prohibitory legislation during the nearly seven years that I hav been "dragging down Liberalism." Still it is good old Democratic doctrin, all the same; this, that there are some things with which the state has no business to meddle. Of course it is entirely opposed to the principles of the later Republican party, but then that fact only makes it worse for the said later Republican party. But we cannot depend upon any old party for earnest reform work.

When Mr. Hallock comes to revise the chart of his Liberalism he will discover that this idea of mine is indeed not original, that it is only one expression of the principle of individual choice and responsibility underlying the whole Freethought protest against a superimposed authority; and that it is he himself who is drifting from his anchorage in the secure but stagnant harbor of the church out into the tempestous ocean of practical reform with neither compass nor anchor aboard, with a mutinous crew and an old leaky craft, and, worse than all, having himself no faith that he will ever reach a harbor where force is not the regnant principle in moral shipbuilding and launching.

Now, as to "sumptuary." When you wish to stir a Prohibitionist to the very depths, just remark to him that he favors a sumptuary law, or that prohibition says to the citizen that he shall not drink certain beverages. With righteous indignation he will tell you, as "Liberta" and Mr. Hallock do me, that it is no such thing, that prohibition does not dictate what the citizen shall drink, but simply prescribes what he shall not manufacture and sell.

This is a distinction with a vengeance, but the difference is in favor of the admitted sumptuary law, for while the latter only assumes to regulate the habits of the citizen by prescribing certain rules by which he is to abide; the former not only does this, in effect and interest, but takes one step further in the direction of despotism and interferes with the primary right of contract, saying that the citizen shall not sell and buy certain articles, for no one but a shyster or very ignorant person would for a moment contend that when you forbid the sale of a certain article you do not in that inhibition necessarily lay an interdict upon the purchase of that article. This is one of the thinnest of all diaphanous subterfuges. "Liberta" says that sumptuary laws were "either for economic purposes or to foster some particular trade or industry." This is misleading. Webster says that "sumptuary" means "relating to expenses; regulating expenses or expenditure;" "sumptuary laws or regulations, such as restrain or limit the expenses of citizens in apparel, food, furniture, or the like." Is not that the intent of those who enact such laws, and their effect if enforced? Why do you seek to pass such laws if you do not intend and expect thereby to change the habits of the citizen and limit or prohibit his expenditures in the matter of drink? You profess to wax mightily wroth when we say that your laws, if enforced, will hav the very effect you intend them to hav. How honest you are!

Why, the only definition of a "prohibitionist" to be found in Webster's dictionary is this: "One who favors prohibitory duties in commerce." Does not this show the common source of all these various ideas and words as applied in the English language? In fact, tariff robbery, license robbery, sumptuary robbery, and prohibitory robbery are only differently colored strips torn from the same piece of striped cloth, and they all bear the same tell-tale stamp, "Invasiv paternalism."

And Mr. Hallock also is troubled about the word "sumptuary." Now, I am going to let the Minneapolis Pioneer-Press finish this answer for me, and I hope that Mr. Hallock will be satisfied with the Republicanism of the witness.

A correspondent had thus sung the same old song: "You call it sumptuary. A sumptuary law declares what a man shall eat and drink. [Take notice, "Liberta."] Prohibition declares what he shall not manufacture and sell; certainly such a law is not sumptuary."

Then the editor puts Mr. Reeves under his finger and crushes him in this effectual and remorseless manner: "Let us dispose of the shallow pretense that prohibition of the manufacture and sale of certain beverages does not interfere with the natural right of the citizen to drink what he chooses. To purposely deny the sole means to an end is to purposely deny the end. The express and sole purpose and effect of prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages is to prevent their use as beverages by making it impossible to obtain them. To prohibit the means by which these beverages can be obtained is, in intention and effect, to prohibit the use of such beverages. It is essential to any clear understanding of the issues involved to get rid of this absurd pretense, which is the main element of confusion in all prohibition logic, that to prohibit the manufacture and sale is not to prohibit the drinking of alcoholic beverages. When it is once understood that in purpose and effect prohibition is the arbitrary interference of the state with the oldest primal right of every citizen to drink what he chooses, the confusion resulting from putting the liquor traffic in the foreground will disappear. However much the advocates of total abstinence from all intoxicating fluids may be disposed to involve the assistance of the law, when it is a mere question of closing saloons and rumholes, and the subject is artfully presented to them, exclusivly on that one side, they are likely to take a different view of the legitimacy of such state interference when it is presented nakedly, for what it is, as simply an assumption by the state of the right to prescribe what beverages its citizens shall or shall not drink, or, in other words, the right of the majority to regulate the beverages of the minority. If the prohibition were written out in these words, to wit: 'It shall be unlawful for any citizen of this state to drink ale, beer, wine, cider, or any other beverage containing any proportion of alcohol,' the men are few, and those few very bigoted or stupid, who would not at once recognize such a law as a wholly unwarrantable assumption of force and an intolerable piece of despotism."

Mr. Hallock will please bear in mind that this thorough exposure of prohibition sophistry and vindication of natural right is not "from the Democratic platform of last year," but is from an editorial in the leading Republican paper of the northwest, west of Chicago. How does the gentleman like the dose, so far as it has gone? It will now be in order for him, in accordance with his usual tactics, to accuse the Pioneer-Press of "dragging down" Republicanism. Such an accusation would be just as much in place as the one he leveled against me.

The anti-prohibitionist labors to upbuild a commonwealth of men and women who go in the right way, though no legal fence prevents them from choosing the wrong, rather than a state composed of automatons who dance just as their masters pull the strings, having neither the power nor the experience necessary to a choice between the right and the wrong. We battle for individual choice and mutual agreement, that is, for the sacred right of contract. And we squarely and distinctly challenge all the paternalists, all the medicin-men of the state, to dislodge us from our impregnable position. We are not here to attack the character or impugn the motivs of any disputant, but should he deecend to that method of warfare he need not be surprised, nor should he complain, if against him we use every weapon of logic, sarcasm, and ridicule. Come, gentlemen, quit your abuse and meet us fairly on the issue. And if you cannot do this, you confess yourselvs beaten at the outset. If we Liberals cannot among ourselvs discuss this question dispassionately and without aspersing each others' motivs, who can? The question before us is, "Is prohibition in harmony with the basic principles of Freethought?" I answer, "No."

A Criticism of "Is Mind Material."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 26, 1882, was begun a discussion of the subject "Is Mind Material?" The same was closed by the second article, published Sept. 2d. Mr. Hale, the author, states that he wrote four different articles, which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER during the fore part of last year. I was not a reader of the paper at the time his first two articles were published, and as I gave a number of my first papers to a friend, I hav not the privilege of referring to any of those articles, and therefore I will not extend my remarks further than to notice the arguments set forth in his two articles of recent date.

Mr. Hale states that he took the position, 1st, That mind was (is) an immaterial spiritual (entity); 2d, That it is the I am that I am, the thinking, reasoning myself; 3d, That thought is a volition of the mind, as is walking or speaking a volition of the physical organs; 4th, That I hav the control of my own will, my own thought, my own actions; 5th, That mind is the power that governs every act of our lives, etc.

In support of No. 1, Mr. Hale tells us that the mind often kills the body, and thus the material organization has committed suicide. (I will remark here, by way of explanation, that he has been pleased to use the term "organization" in a sense in which I may hav occasion to prefer using the term organism.) Now, if he means that what he calls "the I am that I am" (the mind) has the power to come to the conclusion at any time "just for fun," or because it can, and this wholly independent of any outside influence or force, to put itself into such an excited state as to kill the body, or, as he puts it, "the effect destroys the cause of its existence," I deny it; but if he simply means that the mind may be so highly excited as to cause death, disorganization, then I agree with him, for this is a proof that the mind is material. This illustrates the principle, which he acknowledges, that "every effect must hav a cause," and he should know, also, and perhaps does, that every effect in its turn becomes a cause. If, then, an outward force or cause is brought to bear upon the mind to such a degree as to produce the most intense excitement, that is, an abnormal or violent action of its different organs, a disorganization will be the result, the effect, and here this effect becomes a cause. A cause of what? A cause of the destruction of the body, that is, a complete destruction of the man as an organism. Also a destruction of the body will result in a destruction of the mind. Why? Because they are inseparably connected. The mind and body may be considered the chief divisions of the man; but they do not exist independent of each other, they are dependent one upon the other for its existence; they are mutual in their make-up. Science at present seems to point to the fact that the brain and nerves are the chief organs employed in thought; then they are the mind, the intellect, the brain being the great nervous center or seat of thought from which the nerves or ramifying cords extend to all parts of the body, thus mutually connecting body and mind. This being the case, a destruction of either body or mind must necessarily result in the destruction of the other, and the very fact that this is the case goes to prove that they are mutual in their make-up. It is now apparent that if Mr. Hale had proved the assertion he made, and I admit it, he would hav proved just what he intended to deny.

For fear I should be misunderstood I will explain a little farther. I hold the brain to be the leading organ of the mind. Its leading functions seem to be mental. Here the nerves center and deposit their influence, and, as well, take it from or carry it outward, and thus the mind appears to some extent, or some part of it at least, to be located in or distributed through the body. Let the nerves be injured, as by indiscretion, and just in proportion will the intellect be found to be injured. The truth of this position is further substantiated by the following practical test, to wit: It has been observed in some cases where the head has been instantly severed from the body that the body performed intelligent actions in the way of resistance and in manifestations of pain. If this be true, the body must possess, to some extent, or contain in some measure, intellect or mind, for intelligence or thought cannot exist apart from it.

Further, Mr. Hale states that "we see life, instinct, if not reason," manifest in some of the lower animals. I agree with him that many of them reason, and therefore hav mind. I will bring up from this standpoint, then, a practical example to prove the truth of my position. Take, for example, the common hare, and when its head is severed from the body, does not the latter, by its vigorous leaps and agonizing struggles, giv unmistakable evidence of severe pain? Now, I ask, can a body or organism experience and manifest pain and at the same time possess no intelligence whatever? The answer is certainly no, because, as above stated, intelligence proves intellect, and hence the truth of my position.

Now for the summing up. I hold the brain, located in the head or upper part of the body, to be the principal, but not the sole, organ of mind. I hav shown the mind to be thoroughly diffused through or connected with the body, as outwardly observed. It follows, then, that they are dependent one upon the other for existence, and that the destruction of one must result in the destruction of the other; that is, the disorganization of the living organism, and this upon the materialistic hypothesis. Again, I say, Mr. Hale's assertion is in favor of Materialism.

In conclusion, I will remark that I intended to notice both articles, but I hav written already more than I aimed to, and as the whole question hinges upon the point I hav noticed, I will pass the rest by. I may hav occasion before long to notice Mr. H. le's last article, published the 2d of September. Mr. Hale will not understand this as a challenge, but simply my objections, briefly stated, to his position.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1882.

Response to a London Christian's Argument.

The following letter from a gentleman of London, with whom we hav had some business transactions, is worthy of attention:

LONDON, ENG., Sept. 30, 1882.

D. M. BENNETT, Sir: Yours to hand. I am pleased to hear that you found your goods all right; I knew they were all right. There is no doubt you are placed in a very awkward position, as a little knowledge is dangerous in science as in theology and relativ knowledge of character. Your views and mine are very different, but that will not lessen my appreciation of the best side of your nature. But, Bennett, my friend, you must be careful what you do; it is a hard thing in this world to go through it without a base and a rock. The young, particularly, want to become enamored of that which is pure and noble. I hav in vain looked around for an antidote against the folly of youth, but I find nothing acts so well as simple faith in Christ. I hav had a large experience in the world, and mingled with all classes of society, but I find more sobriety and pureness of heart among Christian people than I do apart from them. Evidence to me, which I hav, is everything in that direction. I do not look to renegades or others who are what they do not represent. I'm sick of the rascality of the masses, and if it were not for the influence of Christian teaching I would wish to be out of the world. However, I hav no time now to enter into a discussion; but, Bennett, it seems to me you are trying to pick out all the false people and pit them against those who are true and faithful. In all grades of society there always has been and always will be hypocrits, but that says nothing against simple and pure Christianity. I hav seen beautiful instances of calm resignation to the reverses of fortune, as well as beautiful peacefulness in the hour of death. Voltaire shrieked with horror when his end was approaching, and Tom Paine would hav given worlds had he not written his "Age of Reason." My friend, your acquaintance through antagonism with Christian thought and feeling precludes you from estimating its value. It is always easy enough if one is so inclined to rake up filth and dirt even out of palaces laden with precious stones, but that does not alter the gems that are therein.

Yours faithfully, W. C. HUGHES.

REPLY.—The forgoing is a prelude to a business letter, the writer being the gentleman who manufactured the stereopticon, views and accompanying apparatus, which we purchased in London for the purpose of illustrating our lectures. We had with him several limited discussions upon religious subjects, and though he has to considerable extent a scientific turn of mind, he still seems not a little at fault upon theological matters. We hav made the remark to him that he is a better judge of magic-lanterns and artistic views than of the intricacies and absurdities of theology, which remark undoubtedly contains not a little truth.

Like most persons who would be champions of the character of Christianity, our friend seems to hav a decided tendency to be in the wrong, and for this reason we hav deemed it proper to reply to some of his errors. Indeed, whenever we attempt to discuss with a devotee of the Christian system we find nearly always the same unpleasant task lying before us—we find our opponents in deep error, and greatly in need of the light of truth to overcome and dispel their errors. In replying to friend Hughes we told him we had not time then to answer the theological part of his letter, but would do so in the columns of our paper; hence the following:

1. Our friend says we are "placed in an awkward position, as a little knowledge is dangerous in science as in theology." There need be but little discussion on this proposition. Of course a little knowledge is not so good as a large measure, but a little is better than none at all. There is no condition so awkward as total ignorance and thorough bigotry—a fatal contentment to remain in error, lured by the delusiv belief that truth is found. We can none of us better employ our time than in increasing our knowledge, and in divesting our minds of the darkness and errors which for hundreds of years theology and superstition hav been throwing around the world.

2. Our friend deplores the misfortune of having "to go through the world without a base and a rock." It is true every person should stand upon a firm foundation where he will not sink and swamp in the mire and overwhelming morasses of superstition and theological error. The best base we can find to stand upon is the firm rock of TRUTH as it is in nature. It is infinitly superior to the delusiv and insecure ground of revelation and supernaturalism—that of which there is and can be no proof. Millions hav floundered and struggled upon that insecure standing-ground, only to sink in the worst forms of superstition and ignorance to which mankind hav been dupes.

Whenever nature is set aside in favor of supernature, when the supernatural has precedence of the natural, a bad state of things exists, and the worst of darkness and error is the consequence. It is the most important of all that we find the firm rock of truth to stand upon, and are not content with the quicksands of revealed religion and a belief in infuriated gods and devils. Above all things let us be founded upon nature, for there is nothing so true, nothing so great; nothing can rise superior to it, nothing can in anywise equal it.

3. Our friend speaks of "the pure and noble," and infers that "more of it is found in Christianity than elsewhere." The pure and noble are always grand, always to be revered and bowed down to as vastly superior to the unclean, the vile, and the base. To be pure is to possess a clean character, to be just with all men, to do deeds of kindness and mercy to the needy, the low, and the humble; to abstain from base and unclean actions, and everything of a defiling character. To be noble is to delight in elevated deeds, to despise that which is low and groveling, mean and debased. Men can take a high or low stand in life according to their natures, and the manner in which they are trained in childhood and youth.

If, however, our friend means there is more of the pure and noble in Christianity than in other forms of religion, he is assuredly mistaken. The assumption that devotees of the Christian religion are any more pure, any more noble, any more self-sacrificing, any more devoted to faultless lives, than the devotees of other religions, is wholly unsustained by proof. Christians are as great lovers of wealth, of opulence, of grandeur and display, as any other people in the world. They are as dishonest, as wily, as designing, will exhibit as much meanness and hypocrisy to gain their ends and defraud a fellow-being, as any people in the world. There is no more cruelty, heartlessness, selfishness, falsehood and lying in existence than is found in Christian nations.

4. Our friend says he "has in vain looked around for an antidote against the folly of youth, and nothing will do so well as a simple faith in Christ." This is simply an error. So far as Christ taught pure morals and an upright life and his teachings are lived up to, they prove an antidote to the follies of youth precisely the same as do the moral teachings of Zoroaster, Buddha, and Confucius, who at least taught morals as pure and faultless as those of Jesus. There is nothing very peculiar in the moral code of Jesus that is not found in the teachings of others. It is found that the devotee of any great teacher is partial to his particular teacher, and claims him to be superior to all others. The followers of Zoroaster regard their great teacher as the most remarkable and true the world has known. It is the same with the followers of Buddha; they consider him the most divine teacher, the utterer of the purest morals, the best being in every sense of the word, who ever appeared upon the earth. It is impossible to convince the believers in Buddha that another person so godlike, so faultless, so pure as he ever lived. They are entirely sure that a faith in Buddha is of far more consequence than faith in any other being.

It is again the same with the followers of Confucius. His moral teachings hav influenced the lives of many millions of people, and to-day not less than one hundred and fifty millions of the inhabitants of China aim to square their lives by the high moral maxims which he uttered twenty-three hundred years ago. They hav good reason to think their moral teacher has never had an equal. They take great pride in him, and they take pleasure in pointing to his moral teachings and his almost faultless life.

So it may be said of the 150,000,000 to 250,000,000 who acknowledge themselvs the followers of the Arabian prophet. His Koran and his moral instructions hav been the guide to his followers for more than twelve hundred years, and they stoutly insist that he was superior to all other teachers of the world. It is not strange, in view of the adoration which the devotees of each of these great teachers pay to their captains and leaders, that the followers of Jesus should do the same, and imagin that their savior, or their demi-god, is superior to all other saviors and demi-gods who hav been believed in by others. It is not strange that the claim should be set up that "faith in Christ" is superior to faith in any other person.

5. Our friend says he "finds more sobriety and pureness of heart among Christian people than apart from them." This, again, will not stand close investigation. A thorough examination proves the claim unfounded. Christian nations and Christian people are not more moral, not more sober, not more pure, than the believers in other religious systems. He says he "has had a large experience in the world, and has mingled among all classes of society," but he must admit that our age is greater than his, that we hav also visited many countries which he has never seen, and hav mingled among the believers of more systems of religion than he has known. We shall hav to insist that our experience has been greater than his. We hav not only passed two periods in his own country and city, but we hav visited nearly all lands, and witnessed the conduct and customs of nearly all peoples. As the result of our observations, we can say that in the religious country of England—the first Christian country in the world—we hav seen more insobriety, more crime, more impurity, more prostitution, than in any other country we visited during our late tour around the world. Yes, we may say still more, and speak within the bounds of truth; we saw in the Christian city of London, in a single night, more crime, more insobriety, and more evidences of prostitution than in the six months we spent in the pagan countries of Asia. By the statistics of prisons in those countries, many of which we visited, we learned that, in proportion to population in Christian and pagan countries, there are but about ten per cent of the number of prisoners incarcerated for stealing, robbery, highwaymanism, and murder in the pagan countries than there are in the Christian nations of Europe and America. It is most untrue that Christians are any purer, abound more in chastity and sobriety, than the votaries of other systems of religion. Of course, there are pious and devoted Christians, and so there are millions of pious and devoted Buddhists, of Brahmanists, of Confucians, and of Mohammedans. It is very egotistical and self-conceited for any people to boast of their superior morality and purity, and unless the claim is founded in truth, such boasting is almost insufferable. Our friend's own countryman, Sir Rutherford Alcock, who was minister plenipotentiary for twenty years at Pekin, the capital of China, which afforded him the best of opportunities for learning the vices and excesses of the Chinese people, in comparing them with the vices of English people, stated that while the Chinese spend, on an average, about twenty-two cents per capita for opium to smoke, the average paid out by the inhabitants of Great Britain for intoxicating drinks is over twenty-five dollars per capita; thus conclusivly showing that the Christian people of Great Britain pay more than a hundred times as much for intoxicants as do the pagan people of China. We saw missionaries and physicians who hav resided for thirty years in a Chinese city of nearly two millions of people, who assured us that during that protracted period they had not seen more than one intoxicated person in a year. Can any person who has lived in England for a quarter of that period say anything of the kind? We traveled across the Pacific ocean with several missionaries who had passed several years in China, and the testimony of more than one who had resided eight years in that country was that they did not see an intoxicated person during the eight years they lived in pagan China. The fact is, there is more insobriety and drunkenness in England than in any other country I visited upon the entire surface of the globe. It is a most inconsistent and untruthful claim for an English Christian to make, that there is more purity and sobriety among Christian believers than unbelievers. This is about a fair sample of the superiorities claimed by Christian votaries. As remarked, there are many individual cases where Christians lead lives of self-denial, and there is abundance of the same among the Brahmans and Buddhists. We met considerable numbers in Asia who, from a sense of leading pure religious lives, are denying themselves of most of the pleasures of life. They eat not the flesh of animals, milk being about the only article of diet; they live strict lives of celibacy, and do not give way to angry passions. If Christians lived such abstemious lives, they would be regarded as saints. There is probably the fewest number of Englishmen who deny themselves to the same extent. We were forcibly struck while in England with the hollowness and shallowness of the English Church; with its fashion, pomp, hypocrisy; its livings bought and sold; its mechanical clergy, brought up to their business precisely as are blacksmiths and engineers—the second and third sons of gentlemen, who take to the cloth simply to make a livelihood, without any more concern for the life and example of Jesus than that of Simon Magus. We could not help thinking, What a fraud! And to support this corrupt church, the government taxes the laboring classes heavily. How unlike the teachings and example of the obscure and humble Jesus! who, were he to appear here now as is reported he appeared eighteen hundred and fifty years ago, would neither recognize those who now shout in his name, nor would they for a moment accept him.

6. Our friend says he is "sick of the rascality of the masses," and were "it not for the influence of Christianity he would wish to be out of the world." There is little doubt but what he has good opportunities for witnessing much rascality and dishonesty, for probably no country upon the globe has more of it than England and her American descendants. These traits do indeed seem to keep pace with the prevalence of Christianity. The more of the latter a nation has the more they are disposed to take various advantages of their fellow-beings. Christian nations hav gotten up more and bloodier wars than any other nations; they hav made human blood flow in rivers far more extensivly than the believers in other systems of religion. The Christian religion has not been a peaceful religion. It has been spread over many countries wholly by the sword. It has done more persecuting on account of religious opinions than any other system of religion, yes, far more than all others put together. What a contrast between it and the far superior religion, Buddhism, which to-day has 500,000,000 adherents, and has had double the number that hav professed Christianity, and which has never raised the sword to spread itself, and has never taken the life of a human being because it did not accept its system. It has never persecuted nor inflicted torture. Ah! how much cleaner has been its record than that of Christianity! Has it never occurred to our friend that Christianity has been a great failure? That it has not succeeded in making the world either better or happier? Were the record of its wars, like the wars of the Crusades; its persecutions, including the tortures which for five hundred years were kept up in the underground dungeons of the "Holy Inquisition;" the millions of hapless mortals that hav given up their lives under the greatest inflictions of pain human beings are capable of enduring—the pulley, the rack, the pincers, the thumbscrew, the iron boots that were thousands of times resorted to (in the Tower of London our friend can see many of these horrible inventions which were used by the Christians of his own country)—of those who were burned at the stake alone the number has been estimated at five millions of persons, while scarcely one has taken place under the power of other religions—were the whole agony of Christian rule in the world thus written, it would be far more cruel, far more merciless, far more bloody, than the acts of all other religions combined.

Has it never occurred to our friend that Christianity is responsible for much of the "rascality of the masses?" Christianity is the only system which teaches that all the sins and wrongs a person may commit are forgiven, and a home in heaven secured by a simple belief in Christ. The result of such teachings is that no matter how much wickedness, how much rascality a person may commit, the fact that Jesus died eighteen hundred and fifty years ago atones for it all, and his blood will wash the blackest sinner as white as wool. In this way, no matter how many crimes are committed, no matter how many wrongs are done, "Jesus pays the bills." Christianity has well been termed a "bankrupt system of religion," wherein the merits of one person atone for the misdeeds of hundreds of millions. It would be far better to teach people that they must be accountable for every misdeed performed in the course of their lives, and that they cannot escape the legitimate results of any conduct they perform. This kind of instruction would be far more conduciv to good morals than the absurd doctrin that the blood of one individual washes away all the sins of the world. Right here the superiority of Buddhism over Christianity is apparent. Though Buddha taught the purest of morals and enjoined the best of lives, he never held up the idea that his good deeds or his righteousness could be imputed to the impure, and they thereby become as meritorious and as fit candidates for heaven as himself. Christianity is the only religion which promulgates such absurd nonsense.

7. Our friend says it seems to him that we are "trying to pick out all the false people and pit them against those who are true and faithful." Oh, no! not at all; we hav not picked out one in many millions of those Christians who do badly. True, we hav sometimes shown up the shortcomings and crimes of those who profess to be followers of Jesus, to show how little truth there is in their claims that they hav "all the sobriety and all the purity there is in the world." It is quite legitimate to bring them to the light and scrutiny of truth, and see whether their lives are equal to their professions.

8. Our friend says the abundance of hypocrisy which prevails "says nothing against simple and pure Christianity." Here he is again mistaken. A system of religion which cannot do better than rear up an immense crop of hypocrits, so that the simple and pure are merely an exception, it is not what the world needs, and it should giv way for something better. A religion that cannot prevent hypocrisy among its votaries is not a perfect system.

9. Our friend says he has "seen beautiful instances of calm resignation to the reverses of fortune, as well as a beautiful peacefulness at the hour of death." We do not doubt it. We hav seen the same again and again. The great bulk of mankind, regardless of their religious opinions, meet death placidly and peacefully. Death is a form of sleep, and dying is like dropping away to sleep. There is probably not one in a thousand who passes the portal of death that does not do so peacefully and quietly, and there is not probably a hundredth part the suffering in the process of dying that is usually supposed. It is generally painless and happy. We hav known many unbelievers in the dogmas of Christianity who came to the hour of death as peacefully and contentedly as a little babe falls asleep. And why should they not? They are children of nature the same as when they were born into the world. They are still in the hands of nature, and hav no more to fear in leaving this world than they had in entering it. To a man who has done his duty in life there is nothing to be feared in death. It is the Christian religion and Christian priests that hav raised horrors in the human mind about the awfulness of death. Their doctrin of a terrible place called hell, to which an angry God will consign nine-tenths of his offspring, the earth's inhabitants, to eternal torture of the most excruciating kind, for living up to the natures with which they were created, is what has caused more wretchedness and terror in this direction than all other causes combined. They are really the creators of hell, and it is they who thrust people into it. Dying is just as much an act of nature, just as much a necessity, as birth, and it is an unfortunate and culpable system of religion that has filled it with horror, terror, and forebodings. The wrongs which Christian priests hav done in this way can never be atoned for.

It is quite a mistake that Christians die any more happily than others. Believers in all systems of religion die happily, and those who are unbelievers die happily. Samuel Johnson was probably about right when he said

> It is a glorious thing to die—
> A boon that can't be prized too high.

When the turmoils and troubles of life are over it is sweet to lie down and die, to go to sleep, and leave our cares and afflictions behind, and it is a horrible system of religion that makes people believe that they are to be tortured through an endless eternity for the mistakes they hav made here.

Christians often die in greater mental agony than those who are unbelievers. Their system of belief induces this very state of things. They are taught to believe that but one in ten is to be saved, if that many; and as they know their lives hav been full of faults, they are not sure that they are of the small fractional part who hav been washed clean by Jesus's blood. There is inevitably an uncertainty about this which fills them with the keenest torture. The very reverend Mr. Barnes may be quoted as a case in point, after preaching fifty years. With the prospect of death before him, he used such language as this:

> I see not one ray to disclose to me the reason why sin came into the world, why the earth is strewn with the dying and dead, and why man must suffer to all eternity. I hav never seen a particle of light thrown upon these subjects that has given a moment's ease to my tortured mind, nor hav I an explanation to offer, nor a thought to suggest, that would be a relief to you. I trust other men—as they profess to do—understand this better than I do, and that they hav not the anguish of spirit that I hav; but I confess when I look on a world of sinners and sufferers, upon death-beds and graveyards, upon the world of woe, filled with hearts to suffer forever; when I see my friends, my parents, my family, my people, my fellow-citizens; when I look upon a whole race, all involved in this sin and danger; when I see the great mass of them wholly unconcerned, and when I feel that God only can save them, and yet he does not do it, I am struck dumb. It is all dark, dark to my soul, and I cannot disguise it (Practical Sermons, page 124).

As regards meeting with loss of fortune with equanimity of mind, religious creeds hav little to do with it; it mainly depends upon the natural characteristics of the minds of persons meeting with heavy losses. Some place a higher value upon wealth than others, and are more overwhelmed with grief at the loss of it. Some are organized to bear such losses far more philosophically than others, and Christian dogmas hav nothing to do with it. At all events, Christians seem to place as high a value upon gold as any other people in the world, and it seems to hurt them as badly to part with it. Any superiority which they possess over other men in this direction is wholly imaginary.

10. Our friend says, "Voltaire shrieked with terror when his end was approaching." In making this statement our friend simply repeats a priestly lie. There is not a particle of truth in the claim. Voltaire never shrieked at the approach of death, but that priests said he did is very likely. They hav been the authors of villainous lies without number. The facts in the case are these: Voltaire never fully severed himself from the church, and when he became advanced in life, and he thought he was about to die, he did not wish to be buried as an outcast by the roadside, but rather in "consecrated ground," where his grave would be attended to with becoming respect. To secure this he went through the form of confession. But it is wholly false that he shrieked at the approach of death, and our friend should never again repeat such a falsehood.

11. Again our friend says, "Tom Paine would hav given worlds had he not written the 'Age of Reason.'" Here is another unblushing falsehood. It is wholly devoid of truth. Paine never expressed a regret at the approach of death or at any other time that he had written the "Age of Reason." The only annoyance he had at the hour of death was that produced by officious priests who persistently tried to be present in his room. He repeatedly said he did not wish their presence and requested them to leave. He never expressed a regret that he had written the "Age of Reason." If Christians are driven to the employment of such miserable falsehoods their case is hopeless indeed. We hav seen two or three persons who knew Thomas Paine when here, and they were positiv that he never expressed a regret at a word he had written. Christians showed Paine great unfriendliness while living, and they wish to damn his name with calumny now that he is dead. Such is the nature of Christian hate.

By the bye, our friend does not use Paine's correct name; it was Thomas Paine, and not "Tom" Paine. It would not be very respectful to speak of Gladstone as Bill Gladstone, or Macaulay as Tom Macaulay.

12. Our friend thinks a spirit of antagonism precludes us from estimating Christianity at its true value. This is not correct. Few persons hav studied Christianity more closely than ourselvs, and we yield to none in the disposition to estimate it fairly. cause we are not blind to its glaring defects we not necessarily incapable of estimating it.

13. In conclusion our friend says, "It is always easy, if one is so inclined, to take up filth and dirt." One who claims all the "purity and sobriety" in the world should not complain if some filth and dirt be brought to his door. The fact that filth and dirt are so easily found proves that the claim for sobriety and pureness is entirely without foundation. A pure man should not be unwilling to hav his hypocritical associates occasionally shown up. It does not require silence toward hypocrits and frauds for gems and precious stones to be duly appreciated.

14. The most false thing about Christianity is its claims of supernaturalism. All religions which claim to be founded upon supernaturalism, upon a revelation from heaven, are false; as false, even, as is the claim that there is a harmony between the teachings of science and the dogmas of Christianity. The attention of our friend is called to the last published letter of his own countryman, the late Charles Darwin, than whom a greater and truer man has not been produced in his or any other country. The letter was a reply to a young student of Jena who appealed to him to settle some doubts upon religious subjects, and reads as follows:

> SIR: I am very busy. I am an old man in delicate health, and hav not time to answer your questions fully, even assuming that they are capable of being answered at all. Science and Christ hav nothing to do with each other, except in as far as the habit of scientific investigation makes a man cautious about accepting any proofs. As far as I am concerned, I do not believe any revelation has ever been made. With regard to a future life, every man must draw his own conclusions from vague and contradictory probabilities.
> Wishing you well, I remain, Your obedient servant,
> Down, June 5, 1879. CHARLES DARWIN.

This is the whole truth in a nutshell, and if the wise old philosopher was right, there is nothing in Christianity worth a groat. He very tersely says, "Science and Christ hav nothing to do with each other," and it is getting to be pretty well understood that the unfailing teachings of science are infinitly superior to the claims of any supernatural religion. If the wise Mr. Darwin is correct, that no revelation has ever been made, the quicker the absurd claims of Christianity are renounced and men taught to look to the only source of truth for guidance, the better for the world.

Similar in Character and Conduct.

It has been the persistent cry of Anthony Comstock and Joseph Cook that we are "poisoners of youth." The former, over and over again, accused us of poisoning the minds of youth by our Infidel publications which he threatened to suppress and "stamp out." The latter has more frequently denounced us as a poisoner of youth. A favorit term of his which he applied to us in his Boston lectures was "cancer-planter," as though we were busily engaged in planting cancers in the minds of American youth. On his recent tour around the world he many times denounced us as a poisoner of youth. This he did in Bombay and other places in India. He did the same at several points in Ceylon, and when he arrived in Australia he again took it upon himself to denounce us as a poisoner of the young. He has unquestionably told lies enough in this line to doom him to eternal hell fire, if such theological monstrosities are sent to that terrible place. But recently he has gained an assistant. He has a new recruit in his work of defamation. The great William Emmette Coleman, in the Index, has joined the false and conceited Cook in denouncing us as a poisoner of the young. All these men speak words of falsehood. They lie as easily as they breathe. We never poisoned the mind of a single youth in our life. A thousand dollars is offered for any youth we hav ever poisoned.

It is very easy for conceited liars and hypocrits to denounce another as being a poisoner, when the real venom is within their own breasts. In the efforts we hav made we hav endeavored to speak to old and young the words of truth, though in opposition to the claims of theology and ecclesiasticism. It is they who teach falsehoods about angry gods and devils, and who poison the minds of old and young. It has been to furnish the antidote to such poison as this that we hav toiled. We hav endeavored to supplant the poison of priestcraft and supernaturalism with the truths of nature. This has been our crime, and this is what we hav done to be denounced by the three C's—Comstock, Cook, and Coleman. But as they must inevitably appear in their true character of defamers and liars, we are quite content to let the worthy trinity do their utmost. We neither fear them nor respect them, and shall continue on in what we conceive to be our duty the same as though they did not exist.

THE TRANCE IDEA IN HISTORY.

The highest glory, Humanity sings,
Above our ignorance and tears,
Its truest thoughts, as to the whole of things,
All, all, are human ideas.

The first man that the Christian God created he entranced in order to create him a wife, else there could hav been no humanity, nor any serpent with a human tongue and speech. And from that same state of trance Christianity has come, with its visions and revelations from the Lord. The Bible was written by barbarians, who thought a state of entrancement the best for hearing God's voice and for being "caught up to paradise." And, similarly, the modern form of mysticism is founded upon this state of trance, from which messages are made from the dead.

The printers hav a good maxim, to "follow copy if it leads out of the window." And shall not science follow "plenary inspiration" in defining the trance, that state of the human mind whence Christianity has come? Is not the Bible an "inspired," infallible witness as to those states of the human mind whence its "visions and revelations" were derived? And, moreover, what if we find that both the Bible and classic lore are perfectly agreed in their definitions of the "trance" or ecstasy?

The Trance Defined.—In the Greek it is:

Existemi or Existao.—I remove out of my place or state; am out of my wits; am beside myself; am transported beyond myself; am astonished; amazed; astounded.

And this term occurs in Acts x, 10; xi, 15; xxii, 17; 2 Cor. xii, 1–4.

In the Hebrew it is thus defined:

Tar-dai-mah.—Sleep, heaviness, sluggishness, from the root Ra-dam—He sank down; was overwhelmed, as in water; was asleep; overcome with sleep.

It is found in Gen. ii, 21; xv, 12; Num. xxiv, 4–6; and Dan. x, 9.

And is not the present trance mania illustrativ of both these definitions? It is not of the Spiritualists as a Liberal, progressiv class of people that I speak. They are head and shoulders above the old form of mysticism. And but for the fact that I speak of what I know to be true in regard to the trance, and for science and humanity, I might not, perhaps, refer to the fact that this modern form of mysticism, by its "faith" in the "mystic nap," adopted and indorsed Christianity, the old boss "devil," hell-fire, and the "resurrection of the dead." I hav now before me an 8vo pamphlet, published in Auburn, N. Y., in 1849, containing "messages" purporting to come from the dead through Mrs. Benedict, the medium, to a company of Millerites, confirming their views as to the "resurrection of the dead" and the immediate destruction of our planet, thus showing that while modern mediums are "inspired" as really in a state of trance as Abraham and Peter and Paul were, the so-called spirits that control them "communicate" nothing that they cannot previously learn through the trance brains of a medium and those to whom the "message" is made. Hence the trance in this modern form of mysticism is estimated as a "royal road," an open door, as Paul said, to "the thin heavens" and the condition of all the dead. In the "trance" of a modern medium death's seal upon the past in human life is taken off and the secrets of the grave exposed to the light of noonday. A "rap" on the table leg by forms of force of which we can know nothing materializes human ideas.

Gabriel, Jesus, and Isiah
Hav made the "rap" so very loud,
That no mystic thunder could be higher
Or gather such another crowd.

Modern Spiritualism (without hell) is a repetition of Christianity in its "trances," "visions," and "inspiration;" in its motiv power (both in things unknown) it is the same. It is based upon mediums, precisely the same as the Bible and Christianity; and while the latter claims that its trances and visions are superior, because of their having been, even long ago, superinduced by "almighty God," the modern mediums claim that their trances are produced by those now dead. They hav no "creed," each one speaks for himself, and "the devil take the hindermost." Mediums are always the eyes and the ears of all gods and ghosts! Myths, and invisibilities, of all grades, are utter know-nothings and do-nothings, without the trance and a medium's brains. Had they any knowledge of us no mediums would be necessary; and all Spiritualists rely upon what they find themselvs able to believe, as to the grades and authority of invisible spooks that reveal "messages" to them, in a state of trance; hence any medium like Miss Lizzie Doten, through whose entrancement Edgar A. Poe repeats his rhymes (that were not original with him), is considered at the head of the list in the ranks of modern mediumship now, and since her publication of her sensation in her own state of trance (in my estimation) she holds rank with St. Paul in this regard. As the apostle shows in his account of his own case how really he was "out of his wits" in the trance, so Miss Doten, in behalf of Spiritualism, shows in her account how perfectly she was bamboozled in her own entrancement. Hence she affirms of her state that it was "dizzy, frenzied, abnormal, mysty, petrifying, embryonic, weak, vaporish, faint, and horrible!"

Nor is it any marvel that so many, victimized in this manner, should cut their own being short by suicide. I hav now before me accounts of more than a dozen mediums that hav thus ended their own lives; all of them melancholy cases. Miss Hattie A. Eager, of Boston, aged 22, was one case; John W. Lyman, a Spiritualist, in Brooklyn, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1856, murdered Cornelius Cannon; Judson J. Hutchison, 1850, of the Hutchison family, was the first one to become victimized by the idea of being "entranced" by a ghost! From that hour he was insane, and so he remained for a number of years, and hung himself on High Rock, Lynn, Mass., the very spot where the wonder monger-in-chief, A. J. Davis, had invoked his "congress of spirits," when he foretold future events; but his "eye of faith" was not big enough to see that victim of his mysticism hanging by the neck.

Rev. Luke Haskell, a medium, suicided in 1855, and so did Charles H. Whipple, aged 19, in Philadelphia, Feb. 18, 1857. But my space does not allow me in this direction. Within a short distance from my office, where this is written, is the cemetery for the town of Quincy, Mass. And thereby hangs a tale too long to report here of the murder and suicide which caused one tombstone to be thus inscribed:

"Erected to the memory of John R. Grieve; died Nov. 12, 1850, aged 22 years. And Hannah Banks, his wife, died Nov. 12, 1850, aged 15 years. Both of Zanesville, Ohio. Deluded by the writings of A. J. Davis."

That young wife "consulted the spirits about suicide." Soon after they walked out together, when he shot her, and then put his revolver to his own head; they obeyed the advice given them from that dark unknown!

There is a manifest kinship in all those states known as somnambulism, catalepsy, mediumized, hallucinated, and entranced. And such is that state of the human mind, believed to be in a "superior condition" for "messages from the dead" and "revelations from the sky. And does the reader marvel that for more than half a century the writer has persisted in his charge of a gigantic fraud against Christianity? And some hav doubtless thought this was too severe, admitting as he does that Christians are good people, as I did not giv the scientific grounds upon which my indictment was predicated.

Historical.—To the trance my attention was at first compelled by so frequently witnessing this state in the revival spasms I got up when a minister in the Methodist Episcopal church. They were not anticipated, but resulted from the nervous disturbances superinduced by sensational ideas peculiar to the Methodist creed. During my first sermon the entire audience (principally young people about my own age) fell upon the floor, entranced. In the slang of the ism, they were declared to hav "lost their strength" and to hav "been struck down" by the Holy Ghost. Similar phenomena followed in all my "revivals" throughout the New England states for twenty years. In 1836 a Frenchman by the name of Charles Poyen gave lectures on "Animal Magnetism" in Pawtucket, R. I. Only one person became entranced at his suggestion, and that was Miss Cynthia Gleason. I saw her and noticed it was similar to all the trances I had seen. And Poyen explained to me Mesmer's notions as to the subduction of one will by the mere volition of another—notions in which I never invested, as I knew better. I had already seen more cases of catalepsy or trance than Mesmer, who was of an inferior mind, as I judge from his picture now before me. Nor were my converts entranced by my will, and I then had doubts as to any will of the Holy Ghost that could be the cause of the physical and nervous phenomena that were characteristic of Methodist revivals.

At that time my residence was in New York. And soon after my family, at 131 Varick street, were visited by Rev. Charles McReading, a Methodist, and his wife—a lady who had been entranced and "caught up to the third heaven" under one of my sermons some years before. On my referring to the case of Miss Gleason, Mrs. McReading informed me that she herself had been thus entranced frequently, whereupon she instantly passed into that state, merely from my suggestion, and precisely so, by suggestion, the artificial trance always comes on, no matter what processes may be adopted for that purpose. The first thing Mrs. McReading did on becoming entranced she stretched out, and, grasping my hand, she exclaimed:

Oh, Brother Sunderland, don't you remember that sermon I heard you preach in Situate Harbor, Massachusetts, in 1824, when I was entranced and saw Jesus and the angels? Well, this is the same state I was in when caught up to heaven. Oh, this is the most delightful state I was ever in!

Thus it was in 1836 the hint that fell from the lips of that entranced lady set my own mind upon a career of experimental investigation that I hav neither regretted nor abandoned to this day.

My Experiments.—Since I severed my connection with the church in 1840 (after having suffered its bitter persecutions on account of my opposition to slavery for the space of five years), I hav always considered its persecutions as the best thing that Methodism ever did for me. Nor hav I ever had any reason for regretting my experience in "getting up" revivals. Those revivals afforded me ample opportunity for acquainting myself with a class of nervous and mental phenomena that I never could hav witnessed anywhere else, and they prepared me for the discovery of the psychological laws, by which I can now prove beyond all successful contradiction how all those phenomena, and all that is induced in "Christian experience," are brought about. It was certainly a vast advantage to me to hav, in the beginning of my psychological investigations, so large a number of Christian people who had been "converted" and "sanctified" under my preaching. And these "converts" I always found in all the cities where I afterward gave scientific lectures. They were always friendly, and I was greatly assisted by them, and I may as well state the reason here. As a general rule, all persons who are the first to be "converted" are the most easily entranced. It is only the few that are saved—only the few that are miraculously cured. In comparison with the mass, only a few are insane. Only a few hav the right temperament for catalepsy and somnambulism so as to become entranced in that sensational movement known as modern mediumship. And, as a general rule, I believe it will be found that each of these, including insanity, are confined to one and the same class of temperaments.

Hence, my new theory of selfhood, and my success in "miraculous cures," attracted a good deal of attention, both here and in England. I had letters from the Rev. Chauncy Hare Townshend, of the church of England. In 1839, he had published a 12mo volume, entitled "Facts in Mesmerism." I had correspondence, also, with Dr. John Ellistian Contab, F.R.S., and the author of a large 8mo on "Human Physiology." He was also president of St. Thomas's Hospital, London.

The Law of Self-induction.—I hav refered to my experiments, by which I demonstrated this law of self-induction in selfhood, because I know it has supreme control over the instinctiv, the vital, the nutritiv and the mental forces, as I long since proved by experiment, the only method recognized and adopted by the scientific world. The human mind is not to be weighed in the balances of the chemist, nor is it to be measured with a carpenter's rule. The mind is measured by the ideas it evolves. Nor is it, perhaps, unsafe to admit that any mind must be tinged with the trance or insanity whenever it is so hallucinated as to imagine that it has the power of uttering any idea more than human. Such an idea is not very far from a state of trance and insanity. And still so learned a scholar as F. Max-Muller, the German philologist, in his "Essay on Monotheism," speaks of Abraham (who was entranced), and says he did not by his own brains invent the idea of one god! Muller says that idea was injected into Abraham's mind by supernatural power, and he did not himself acquire it in a state of trance, nor by clairvoyance, nor in a dream! I refer to this merely to show to what an extent a truly scientific man may become warped and perverted in his mind by mysticism. Ideas hav no existence until they are evolved by thinking in the human brains. And when expressed they are still human ideas, nothing more.

For twelve years, and throughout the principal cities of the United States, I gave illustrativ lectures on Pathetism, in which this law of self-induction was "substantiated," and by the only method that could put it beyond all doubt.

And Webster, in the quarto edition of his American dictionary, in defining the term Pathetism, has rendered me liable to be understood as indorsing the notions of Mesmer; whereas, I never believed in that theory, nor did I ever use that term for designating the phenomena by which I demonstrated its falsehood. The psychological experiments I performed throughout the country were purely scientific. I never meddled with the nervous system of a human mind solely for the purpose of amusing an audience. And I am sure, if psychology were sufficiently understood, no one would ever consent to be drilled by false ideas into a state of mental hallucination merely to cause a laugh by the fantastic capers they cut up in that state.

My principal experiments were in the cases of persons who had surgical operations performed on them, without pain, in a state of self-induced "trance." Timid women held lighted candles in each hand, while their molars were drawn, when there was no change in their pulse, nor any movement of a muscle. And this was done when the surgeon, also, was entranced, and his eyes blindfolded, while surrounded by numerous other surgeons, editors, clergymen, and men of science. Thus of persons self-entranced, who had tumors cut out, and one had his thigh amputated! Not one of these marvelous states were superinduced by my "will." My method was confined wholly to ideas, and it ignored mesmerism and theology. Of my method, a Boston editor, still living and venerable for his age, his philanthropy and scholarly attainments (Prof. Elizur Wright), when my lectures had been continued in that city for sixty-four nights in succession, said:

La Roy Sunderland is well known as transcending all who hav attempted to explain to us the mysteries of the human mind. No lecturer has ever attracted such crowds or held them by such a spell! No one has ever produced results so magical, doing with no visible means far more than all others hav done with them (Boston Chronotype, November 10, 1847).

In Boston I state what I know when I affirm that after I had lectured there for twelve years, more or less, the mass had become so familiarized with those physiological conditions and laws by which all revival and mental epidemics are got up, that for thirty years after no "revivals" occurred in that city. And when it was assaulted by Moody and Sankey recently, they only victimized a few young people that had been born one age since my lectures were concluded. My theory of selfhood covers all the facts in the "miraculous cures," in "revival scares," and all the nervous phenomena attributed to supernatural causes and the sudden deaths that hav occurred from the sensational excitement of faith, fear, hope, and joy. And moreover, it accounts for mental contagion, mental epidemics, "mothers' marks," and other correlativ phenomena that hav never been explained, either by medicin or theology.

The Trance a Popish Miracle.—When I speak of the artificial, either in connection with the trance or Christianity, I refer only to the methods used. The trance is always a spontaneity, similarly as sleep, fits, and dreaming are so considered. The trance occurred before it had any name; and as it occurred then, so it occurs now; however, it may be suggested to the mind for that purpose. And in those cases where it becomes a habit, and the victim is under the control of superstition, it is considered miraculous! Hence in the popish church, where it occurs in the nuns, everything is made of it by the priests as "a miracle, produced by the power of almighty God." I hav now before me a popish pamphlet by "the Earl of Shrewsbury," entitled "The Virgins of the Tyrol," two Austrian girls who, for eight years, had been in the habit (when receiving the sensational communion) of falling into this state. This tract I hav reviewed at length in my work on "The Trance" (now out of print). It contains pictures of each of these nuns, showing the bleeding scratches they had made on their faces, feet, and hands, as similar to what was believed to hav been done to Jesus when he was crucified and swooned on the cross. If he died at that time, he died in utter despair. Two facts in regard to these popish cases may be mentioned here:

That females only fall into the trance in the popish church. And it so happens that it is only the nuns who hav ever had these scratches which they call "the real stigmata," by which they signify their faith that those marks on their feet, hands, and temples are made "by the miraculous power of God;" whereas, these stigmata are made by each nun when entranced (and it may, in some cases, be that they do not remember it), each one for herself. Entranced persons often act from strange or insane motivs. And the nuns, controled by the popish ideas of Jesus, produce these scratches to gratify their "confessors" and the priests. This I prove, both by the history of these popish cases and by similar cases that hav occurred in papists and Protestant Christians, entranced under my own personal observation.

A nun, entranced in San Francisco in 1872, was detected in scratching her own hands and feet for the stigmata. F. Giard, a popish priest, was tried in France in 1833 for the liberties he had taken in kissing the "stigmata" which a nun had shown upon her person. The account of this case represents that this nun charged the priest with having bewitched her, as (from the laws of association) she invariably fell into the trance whenever he visited her, as he often did. No doubt the bewitchment was reciprocal.

I utter what I know when I affirm that the best Christians that can be found in the popish church, or in Christendom, when entranced, will deceive and falsify for the purpose of gratifying their priests or those they think the most of in their normal state. I could giv the name of one who I believe to hav been as honest and truthful as any Christian woman ever was, a young lady whom I recovered from a state of insanity and epilepsy. She was indeed the best case of "clairvoyance" I ever knew (all the best clairvoyants are in cases of insanity). And yet, to increase my estimation of her clairvoyance, this lady, when entranced, took articles from me that she hid, and then told me that some other persons had stolen them. But when she made these averments to me that these articles had been stolen, I had never missed either of them; and she added, when entranced: "I will watch for the thieves and recover them for you." So one morning I was called to attend her; she was wild, and her clothes were torn. She said she had chased the thieves in the streets and had a tussle with them, and thus her garments had become torn. In view of these facts, I ask if it can be supposed scarcely possible for Christians to be deceived by any ideas of anything, so much as to imagin a state of trance to be oracular, and produced by supernatural power.

As we hav seen, in reality, certain different terms must essentially hav one and the same signification. Hence it must mean a similar state of things when we say "mediumized," "converted," "sanctified," "entranced," or "insane." The writers of the Bible were "mediumized" by "plenary inspiration," it is said, and this was "the highest degree of inspiration," the "royal road" to paradise.

The Bible opens with an account of the "devil" having inspired and "mediumized" a snake, by which it talked and argued with a human tongue! And hence in all the history of ancient and modern mediumship both "the devil" and "the serpent" held rank, and stand at the head of that list, even above God and the rest of mankind. Nor is it apparent why Christians should not freely admit that the serpent was as really "entranced" by the devil, and more than Adam could hav been by his creator! At any rate, as it is manifest that the devil having inspired and mediumized that serpent was the occasion that resulted in sin, Christianity, heaven, and hell, it follows that the Bible and all that credulity has made out of that old barbarian book hav resulted from the devils having mediumized and "inspired" that snake with human speech.

The Case of St. Paul.—He was the chief apostle, and had two spells of entrancement. Rev. Edward Robinson, in his edition of Calrust's Bible Dictionary, says that in the year A.D. 44, "Paul was enraptured into the third heaven and saw ineffable things." This orthodox writer could not say that Paul was "entranced." And Paul speaks of what he "heard" in heaven, not, as Mr. Robinson says, of what he saw there. Paul's account is the most minute, and here it is entire:

I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord. I knew a man in Christ about fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I cannot tell, or whether out of the body. God knoweth). Such an one was caught up to the third heaven. And I knew such a man (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell. God knoweth). Now, that he was caught up into paradise and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for man to utter (2 Cor. xii, 1, 4).

Any full-grown man or woman, not a Christian, to hear such a statement as this, would instantly pronounce it a case of insanity. Nor could a better illustration be given of the definition of the trance than I hav quoted. A man whose mind is in a state that does not allow him to be conscious of his own selfhood and self-control, or to know whether he is dead or alive, is insane. He may tell us what "God knoweth," and of words that he never heard spoken, and also of "visions and revelations from the Lord." But "such a man" is "beside himself and out of his wits." He himself cannot know. That persons entranced are sometimes "enraptured" I very well know. And among the Christians and the ministers I hav seen entranced in my lectures, I hav had numerous cases where they were so "filled with joy" and enraptured with delight that they hav declared it was "far above any prayer-meeting or camp-meeting," which they never would hav said in their normal state.

The Case of St. Peter.—Of this case of trance the popish church makes most. They put him at the head of the list. And here I quote the "inspired" account of Peter's bewilderment:

Peter went up upon the house-top to pray [sensational associations], and he fell into a trance. And saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet knit at the four corners and let down to earth, wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air (Acts x, 10).

But nowadays, when modern mediums fall into this same state of trance and describe what they see, Christians ridicule them in scorn, just as if they themselvs did not believe in such stuff as that! But Peter was highly favored by the Lord. He was on the "royal road" to heaven, and all Christians follow in that track!

The Trance of Abraham.—And when the sun was gone down (tar-dai-mah), deep sleep fell upon Abraham; and lo, a horror of great darkness fell upon him (Gen. xv, 12).

Observe, it was not till Abraham was entranced, that he could hear what his idea of God said unto him! And but for this dreamy, insane state of trance, there never could hav been any humanity but Adam. And since he got his wife from his entrancement, and the race has increased, we are indebted to this same state of trance for all "inspired" writings and our ideas of personality in gods. Hence this trance is pronounced by Dr. Adam Clark the "highest degree of inspiration," and it is the Christian's "royal road" to heaven!

The Trance of Balaam.—Balaam, the son of Beor, lifted up his eyes and the spirit of God came upon him. And he took up his parable and said: Balaam, the son of Beor, hath said, and the man whose eyes are open, hath said. He hath said, which heard the words of God, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open (Num. xxiv, 12).

The reader will notice the tautology is the same here as in Paul's account of his own case. Shakspere has the case of one whose "eyes were open when their sense was shut." I hav seen many cases of this kind.

The Trance of Daniel.—I retained no thought. Yet I heard the voice of God's words; and when I heard the voice of his words then was I in a (tar-dai-mah) deep sleep and my face toward the ground (Dan. x, 8).

Thus, in the "revival" excitement, people "lose their strength" and fall upon the ground, as Daniel said he did, as without the trance no "voice of God" is ever heard! And it is noticeable that a book like this, made out of this crazy state of trance, has in past ages and down to the present time been quoted as the authority for predicting the end of this world, and a general "smash up" in the whole thing. Charles F. Freeman and his wife were Adventists, who, in May, 1879, murdered their infant child, under this infatuation. And about the same time a Christian mother in Erie, Pa., under the same delusion, murdered her own babe to secure its admission into the heaven from which St. Peter saw the beasts and the creeping things coming out!

The Trance of Adam.—And the Lord God caused (tar-dai-mah) a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept; and he took one of his ribs and closed up the flesh instead thereof. And of the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man (Gen. ii, 21).

As this account is inspired, as really so as any other part of the Bible, it may hav come from the trance of some one not named. When this stuff was originally written a few thousand years ago, it was not so generally known as it is at the present day that man had at that time existed on the planet uncounted hundreds and thousands of years.

And no matter by what name you call that state of trance, "converted," "mediumized," "born again," "inspired by the Holy Ghost," or what "God has or done," the supposition that it is true involves many corollaries that follow in despite of "faith" in mysticism. For if our ignorance and superstition giv to this God a personal identity and a priority in the production of a state of trance, and for the purpose here stated, then it follows that as he produced the first case of trance, he also produced the first and the last pain, the first and the last sorrow, the first and the last crime, and the first and the last calamity that has or ever will befall man or the human race. Such are the scientific facts in regard to the trance, upon which all forms of mysticism, ancient or modern, are founded. Let the candid weigh them.

Crush the Rum Traffic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In our beloved TRUTH SEEKER of October 7, 1882, D. S. Irwin attempts to set the matter of difference between "Walter Simonds" and "Liberta" to rights. I am grateful to D. S. Irwin for the splendid generous support he givs me in my efforts to convince Liberals of the duty they owe themselvs, as well as the advantage it will be to the cause of Liberalism to be on the moral side of this question of prohibition.

It is to be regretted that some of our German friends are very desirous of drinking lager beer on Sunday. Sometimes I hav feared that they narrowed this whole question of Liberalism to that of a free Sunday, and that by a free Sunday they meant no more than the right to drink lager to drunkenness on each recurring seventh day.

Now I do not believe the question of Liberalism should be so belittled. We are not striving for the privilege of doing ourselvs and society a wrong on any day of the week. Liberalism, guided by intellectuality, must be against everything which is per se immoral. This opposition to prohibition because some of the churches are beginning reluctantly to support it is unworthy educated, liberal-minded men and women. The churches are undoubtedly against theft and murder, but I should despise the Freethinker who did not take his position by their side and lend them the strength of his hands and of his mind to effect the protection of these crimes.

Here and there we may find a Liberal, as we may find thousands of Christians, so befuddled with alcohol as to be blind, mad, and bigoted an this subject. How preposterous it is to assume that there is a right to do wrong, for that is clearly wrong which crowds our poorhouses with paupers, our jails with criminals, our asylums with the idiotic and the insane!

In the places of all these degraded people Liberalism desires to put earnest, intelligent, happy men, women, and children. That part of the community who make up the churches are not altogether blind to the things we are striving to bring about. When they cease their insane raving about Jesus Christ and him crucified, to cry for the prohibition of the death-dealing, crime-breeding, rum traffic, they are acting like sensible people and merit our applause and our co-operation.

When the Christians say unto us, "You go forth with your irresistible sledges to break down the mighty structures religion has built, to tear asunder the strong bonds with which it has fettered human minds, 'bring all in captivity unto Christ,' in the day of your success, what will you put in the place of them?"

Let us answer as becomes Liberals, "Let us replace them with liberty, with morality, with temperance, with intelligence, with happy families and homes where never the wolf of despair nor the demon of driveling, drunken idiocy can enter."

Would not such an answer be better than the one some misguided people are endeavoring to put into our mouths about to this effect, "We are going to put in the place of your religion drunkenness under the name of moderation (that is a pleasant word for drunkenness, more seductiv, and consequently more destructiv to the young), and in the place of your churches we are going to put beer gardens, rum shops, breweries, and distilleries."

No, no! my, friends, let us stop this folly. The Christians themselvs hav almost drowned the world in alcohol. To-day they are slaying the negroes of the South with rum, as our sweet-tempered Puritan ancestors slew the North American Indians with New England rum. Should the Christians tire of this work, as it is to be hoped they will, are the Liberals to take it up and work at it seven days per week instead of following the Puritanical moderation rule of "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy rum drinking, but on the seventh in sobriety shalt thou make a still greater ass of thyself?"

We cannot be too much in earnest. The first great practical work for us to do—either as citizens of a republic, or as moral, intellectual Liberals—is to crush the rum traffic. LIBERTA.

Letters from Friends.

NETTLETON, Mo., Oct. 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER I cannot help congratulating you on your return to your friends and family. I hav read your notes of travel with interest and profit to myself and family. Inclosed find $8, which please use as directed. W. H. SLOANE.

NEW HOLSTEIN, WIS., Oct. 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The reading of your valuable paper is one of the necessities of my life. Sorry I should be if I should miss a number of the same, though my time is pretty much taken up to attend to my business, the card of which you see above, and of which firm I am a member. So please find inclosed $3 in payment of another year's subscription.

Yours very truly, GUSTAV SLOBERG.

MILLEDGEVILLE, ILL., Oct. 10, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Your financial "poke" of September 20th strikes me square. The argument therein contained is correct, and I hereby admit the force of the same by sending you three inches, or three links, or three yards, or three dollars' worth of the "root of all evil." The above amount of "root" squares us financially for 1882.

Fraternally yours, J. P. HUNTER.

GRATON, DAK. TER., Oct. 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $6—$3 to renew the subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $3 for Frank Douglass. I, for one, hav stopped lending THE TRUTH SEEKER to those who call themselvs Liberals and, in place of supporting papers of this kind, stand on the street corners and try to preach their belief to others, when if that time was spent in work it would pay for four papers. JAMES H. GILES.

ROBERT S. SHOEMAKER.

[FRIEND BENNETT: I just received this letter from our friend Shoemaker, that I think is worthy a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Consumption has not the power to dampen his ardor for the cause of Freethought. H. L. GREEN.]

RUSH, PA., Oct. 20, 1882.

DEAR FRIEND: Yours received last night with the three certificates all right. I saw in last week's TRUTH SEEKER my scolding letter to you. "I did not suppose my scoldings were worthy of publication." I wish I were able to do more for the Liberal cause. I had a very severe hemorrhage of the lungs again last night, which makes me feel rather poorly to-day, but still I am overseeing my business to-day. During my spare time I am reading Bennett's "A Truth Seeker Around the World," as it is a splendid work, but I don't think quite equal to his "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." I think that is the grandest work I ever read. And how Bennett was ever able to write it during his confinement at Albany is a mystery to me. I stood beside Bennett when he and Bell and Miss Tilton were arrested at Watkins, and I cannot get over the disappointment of not being able to meet them there again this year. With best wishes to you and Mrs. Green, and hoping to be able to send you more orders for your book, I am, Truly yours,

ROBERT S. SHOEMAKER.

PRINCETON, MINN., Oct. 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3 to renew for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I can't do without it. It is the only really Liberal paper that I hav ever taken. I hav the Religio-Bundy, Roberts-Matter, and hav read the Banner of Light and Seymour Times. I am a Spiritualist in religion, an Independent in politics. I hav read so much of cultured Liberalism and Spiritualism that I almost detest the words. The great cry for culture and purity reminds me of the French and German soldiers. "How does it come," says the Frenchman, "that you Germans always fight for money, while we French fight for honor?" "Vell," replies Hans, "I 'spose each von fights for dot he most lacks." When Freethinkers hav nothing to harp on but cultured Liberalism and the higher phases of mediumship, they hav no business any longer in this naughty world of ours; they can be spared with profit, since their mission will hav been filled. To my mind, we want more Liberals and not so many pretenders. I see that the temperance and Sunday law wave has struck Ohio and has been somewhat broken. It is well. Let all Sunday laws share the same fate! W. J. CRAVENS.

ITHACA, MICH., Oct. 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am very poor, and a cripple at that, but I don't see how I can do without your paper. I get more knowledge by reading it than I could by eating apples, butter, or honey. I am called the wickedest man in this town by the Christians because I take THE TRUTH SEEKER and try to get others to take it, and speak what I think without fear or favor. I hav been challenged to several debates by some Christian big heads. I hav always accepted, and had no trouble in putting them to flight. One big-headed minister and Sunday-school superintendent asked me to discuss the question of the infallibility of the Bible. He argued that it was the infallible word of God. We met in a school-house, and it was the first discussion of the kind ever held in our town. There was a large audience. It was my first effort, but I made it hot for him. He was so put to it for argument that he resorted to slang and rage; he tore around like a madman; told the people that I was an old Infidel, full of hell, and ought not to be allowed to speak in public. I laughed at his rage. He quit the school-house and never came near it again. Surely the righteous are as bold as a lion. I hope and expect to send you several new subscribers by the first of January. I followed you all around the globe with intense anxiety for your welfare, and was rejoiced at your safe return. You hav done a great work in a short time. That you may liv many years and do much good is the desire of your friend, ISAAC GABBION.

PERRINSVILLE, MICH., Oct. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please forgiv me. Unavoidable circumstances hav kept me from the good rule of remitting in advance for your highly esteemed TRUTH SEEKER another year. For this you will find inclosed $3. I fully indorse the highly merited congratulations sent to you from all classes of our best people in the world. I do not like to weary your patience, yet I would like to say a few words about Mr. Whitehead's God of the Bible, and show that no true religion can be built upon the Christian's God-foundation, for it seems to me that in the making of his children God has made a great mistake. In the first place he forgot to put knowledge into the heads of Adam and Eve, instead of a tree, and for that reason became grandfather to a murderer. That he did not want Cain to be hurt or killed must hav been for the reason that Cain was of such close connection to him—his only grandchild. How, I should like to know, could a perfect God get himself into such a condition? Does it look reasonable to command some of his own posterity to stone all those who spoke of greater gods than himself? It must hav looked so to him since he wanted to be the biggest one. Was it a big thing to wrestle with Jacob, yet never save the lone mother and child from the knife of a high way robber, or the crew of a sinking ship of any number of persons praying to be saved?

What if he counts the hairs of the head, and notices the sparrow's fall from the roof too late to save him? If God was so great as to drown nearly all of his family so as to save the rest that came by another god, he must indeed not only be a great but an inexplicable something, which alone makes a foundation to support any religion.

Thanking you for your patience, I remain,

Yours truly, WM. C. HERR.

ESCANABA, MICH., Oct. 17, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me, even at this late hour, to congratulate you on your safe return home from your trip around the world. I had many doubts when you started that you would complete the journey; but it seems God, in his wise providence, allowed you to do so, and I am glad that he, she, or it did so, as I hav been very much interested in reading your letters, and even my little son, Roy, who is only nine years old, got so interested in your travels that I had to read them aloud to him, and he would sit with his geography and point out the places and follow you in your journeyings on the map; and I hav myself learned more about the geography of the Eastern continent than I ever knew, and I thought I was pretty well posted. Had not my business prevented I would hav met you on your return at Chicago or Milwaukee, but I could not do so at that time. But I trust I shall hav the pleasure of meeting you at some future time, although it does not look very favorable just now, as I intend to start with my family on the 15th of next month for Santa Barbara, Cal., to spend the winter, and perhaps may conclude to locate there. I thought it would be best to pay up my debts before I left this part of the country, and I knew you would be glad to hear from me in the shape of a remittance, so here it is, an express money-order for $6.00, for which please send me "The Occult World" and "The Christian Religion," by Ingersoll and Black, and the balance apply on subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. You may send the books here to Escanaba, and I will write when I wish my address changed on the paper. Mrs. Hiller joins me in sending regards to you, and we wish you to remember us to Mrs. Bennett and to Eugene and wife, whom we had the pleasure of meeting a year ago. Yours truly, J. N. HILLER.

WOODHULL, Oct. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It has been some time since I hav troubled you with the scratches of my pen, and I trust you will overlook this, my intrusion upon your attention. Think not I hav forgotten you, though I regret you failed in your extensiv travels to find the remains of Mother Lot or Nebuchadnezzar's pasture field. But there is one consolation, it proves that which does not exist cannot be found; so you are exonerated from censure or neglect.

I welcome you home to the bosom of your family and your office, and congratulate you on your good fortune in returning in good health. But, oh, if the river Jordan had swallowed you, are you able to conjecture the result?

I hav read the "Pictorial History of the World," written by James S. McCabe, who says the land of Palestine or Canaan is about the size of New Jersey one hundred and eighty miles long and forty-five miles wide, covering about eight thousand square miles, and a great portion is covered with mountains and rock. The river Jordan, he says, is not navigable, but fordable most of the time; no bridges until after the Roman conquest. There could hav been but little energy or enterprise in the Jews as a people. He speaks of some nine different nations (Bible account), and names them, when Joshua entered Palestine with an army of 601,730 fighting men and numerous cattle. It would be fair to say that there were the same number of gentiles, making in all 1,203,460 soldiers. Estimating one soldier out of five in a family, there were 6,017,300 inhabitants in all, making 7,521 to each square mile and their cattle. If any one should think this unreasonable, let them also think all things are possible with God, and if he is not satisfied with this explanation we will appeal to the Bible record, which warrants us there were at least one hundred times as many gentiles as there were Jews. It makes one Jew equal to one hundred of these enemies in battle. This is plain to be seen by the number killed on each side, so we think if the Bible account is true of the many battles and the number killed on the part of their enemies, our estimate of the number of inhabitants is correct. And failing, as they did, to kill off all the Canaanites at the rate of at least one hundred to one of the Jews, we are warranted to say there were 300,865,000 gentiles besides the Israelites. Now, Bro. Bennett, as you hav seen the country, do you think the description given of the land of Canaan by Mr. McCabe is correct as to size and otherwise? And, providing every acre tillable was well cultivated, how many inhabitants would it support? Also, the probability of a nation of people living in the mountains defending themselvs in irbn chariots in defiance of an army of 600,000 under such a commander as Gen. Grant.

Inclosed find $3 for another year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. May it liv and do good is the wish of an old subscriber, though his time in this life is almost out. Whether he will be able to renew his life is a question with some.

I am corresponding with a father in the Catholic church who has promised to answer any question I see proper to ask, but I cannot persuade him to hav our correspondence published. He has answered questions. Respectfully yours, ISAAC PADEN.

XENIA, O., Aug. 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I feel inspired to place before your readers a true version of the Bible god and the Bible devil, as given in the first three chapters of Genesis, and see which has been the best friend to the human race. In bringing the two before the thoughts of the people I shall admit that they both existed at that time, and both said and did just as the Bible says, and if they do not pan out to suit our Christian friends they cannot blame us.

On the first day God created the heavens and the earth, but the Bible fails to tell us what he created it out of, as create means to make something out of nothing. The Bible fails to tell us where that nothing came from. On the same day he produced light out of water. "And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, and said, Let there be light, and there was light." On the same day, after he saw that the light was a good thing to hav, he divided the light from the darkness, and called the light day and the darkness night. In this age and day there is no such division made; light and darkness are produced by the earth turning upon its axis once in twenty-four hours. I suppose at that time God had not set it to whirling at the rate of seventeen miles a second and way out about a thousand miles an hour in the other way, and had not given it an oscillating motion once in six months.

On the second day God made the firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters, and he called the firmament heaven. So we see that heaven is part of the waters that were at one time on this earth. On the same day he gathered the waters of the earth to one place and called the waters seas, and the dry land he called earth.

On the third day he made the earth bring forth grass and the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after its kind, and he saw it was good. But how he made all these things grow without the sun is a mystery to me; since my earlest recollections I hav been certain that grass and fruit-trees could not grow and bear seed without the sun. But they tell us that God can do anything; it may be he can, but I doubt his ever doing what the Bible says he did on the third day.

On the fourth day he made the sun, moon, and stars. That was the greatest day's work he ever did, as there are but three stars in the universe that we know of smaller than this earth; the rest of them are from thirteen to five thousand times larger. On the same day he made the sun on purpose to giv light by day and the moon to giv light by night; now, what became of the light that made day and night the first three days, or what became of the light he made out of the waters on the first day of his work?

On the fifth day he made the animals, birds, fish, snakes, insects, and creeping things, and after he saw them he pronounced it a good job. Now, he worked very hard the first five days, and still he had not made a man. So he took a partner on the sixth day and says to his partner, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness, and let them hav dominion over all. So they made (what?) both man and woman, male and female created he them, both the same day, and had a long lalk with them, and told them to be fruitful and multiply, and subdue the earth and control the animal creation, and told them they might eat anything that grew out of the earth. He, in this chapter, made no reserve of anything, but in the second chapter we find that he changed his mind. Before entering the second chapter I will say that the man who wrote the first chapter told a falsehood in regard to God, or the man who wrote the second chapter told a falsehood.

The great trouble with our ministers consists in their striving to make the Bible mean different than what it reads, and at the same time they will tell us that any one that adds to or takes therefrom is in danger of hell-fire.

The first verse of the second chapter tells us that "thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them." Now mark, there was more than one heaven, as the text says heavens. Then God took a rest of one day from all his works. The fifth verse tells us that every plant of the field before it grew on this earth was as made by this God. Now any schoolboy or girl knows that was not true. The same verse tells us the reason that nothing had grown upon the earth was because there had never been any rain as yet, and it was the eighth day. The sixth verse tells us, "But there went up a mist from the earth and watered the whole face of the earth." This does not correspond with the first chapter, where it tells us that the whole earth was covered with water the first day of the creation. The second chapter tells us that the Lord God formed man out of the dust of the earsh and planted out a garden and put him in it. The first chapter does not warrant any such conclusion, as he made him on the sixth day, and that was after that. God or the Lord God put all kinds of fruit-trees in this garden, and in the center he placed the tree of knowledge, and told him he might eat of the fruit of every tree in the garden except the tree of knowledge. In the first chapter he made no reserve, but everything that grew out of the ground was to be food for him. This God did not intend the man to know any more than a mule, or he would never hav forbad him eating of the tree of knowledge. At this time the man did not know that he was naked. Up to this time God had not made a woman. The first chapter says he made them both the same day and at the same time. The Lord God caused all the animals to pass before the man, and then he made the discovery that none of them would be a mate to the man. So he put him into a deep sleep and cut out one of his ribs, sewed up the wound, and out of that bone he made the first woman. The first chapter says this was a lie, and so does every intelligent man and woman on earth. We see by the second chapter that it was the intention of God to keep these people in ignorance to such an extent that they were not to know that they were naked. Now, wouldn't the human race hav been in a pretty fix if this God had had his own way, and had it not been for the devil we should be as ignorant as the brutes, as we will prove by the third chapter.

The third chapter tells us that the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field that God had made. If this serpent was the devil, this God made him, and, knowing all things, as the clergy claim, knew just what influence he would hav over the woman. And he said unto the woman, "Ye shall not surely die, for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." This talk of the devil was the truth, and what God said to her was false. As soon as they partook of the fruit of the tree of knowledge their eyes were opened, and they made a discovery, and that was that they were naked; and they lived over six hundred years afterwards, and if the Christian religion is true they are still alive, either in hell or heaven.

Now, I think, according to these three chapters, the devil was the best spirit of the two, for had it not been for him we would all hav been as ignorant as mules, and there is nothing that we could put our eyes upon (that does not grow out of the ground) that would hav been in existence had it not been for the devil.

I will close this article by quoting the twenty-first verse of the third chapter and asking a few questions. "Unto Adam and his wife did God make coats of skin and clothed them." Where did he get the shears to cut out the clothes with? Where the needle and thread to sew them together? and what kind of skins were the suits made out of? Remember that I contend that the text means just what it says, or it has no meaning, as God never inspired a man to write one thing and at the same time mean something else.

J. D. SEELEY.

IMMORTALITY—WHAT IS IT?

ITHACA, N. Y., July 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Thankful for former favors, but would crave space in THE TRUTH SEEKER to answer the above question, which has been asked, but no special answer given. The principle is so far away from the views of many that to do the subject justice by the manner of evidence I introduce that it may require more space than could reasonably be allotted me. The principle being an important one, and the time come to understand and apply it. And in order to establish evidence of this important principle, I will begin by saying every principle has a positiv and a negativ position. The positiv is, of necessity, the material foundation, and the negativ is in contradistinction the mental or moral. Nature, the eternal male and female progressiv cause, is a producing power, whose laws cannot be defined only from what it produces. I judge from what my natural and mental eyes behold, that if nature has any design it is the perfection of man and his surroundings. I will go to nature's history as she embraces all that actually takes place in her sphere of action, and of course the Old and New Testaments are included, whether the record is good or evil, or mistakes and myths; yet I view it as the animal Adam, our representativ humanity, as at first it had no moral capacity, yet progressiv, while the elements of his animal nature were being developed, signified in the history of him by the production of fishes, fowls, cattle, beasts, and all manner of creeping things, could it be expected a more perfect history from poor, weak, animal man, having little or no mental capacity, while his animal organs must first be developed, such as marvelousness, secretivness, acquisitivness, combativness, destructivness, and philoprogenitivness, while none of the intellectual organs were being developed, while on the sixth day (so called) these animal elements were compacted; and then came forth nature's man, and he was pronounced good. Here, then, stands forth the positiv, the corruptible, yet not fully developed, but represented by John the Baptist, of whom Jesus said that no greater prophet had arisen. And here was the positiv evidence of progressiv nature, for John had conceived the idea of a change in the progressiv; yet he went forth baptizing with water unto repentance, and the people had somehow got an impression that an inspired leader was soon to come, and supposed it might be John the Baptist, but he confessed that he only baptized with water unto repentance, as the kingdom of heaven was at hand. And that there was one among you of whose shoe-latch he was unworthy to unloose, and that he should baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire. The kingdom of heaven seemed to giv them a new idea, that it was a condition of peace and pleasure. But in the progress of time Jesus stood forth and proclaimed himself to be the son of man, and also the son of God, and, as it is said of him, he was made of a woman, which has several significations, but in this place it has a mental signification, a virgin of the law, a progressiv condition above animal, he was made under the law, that he might hav knowledge to redeem them that are under the law. Thus he came in possession of advance progression, in mental capacity. And Jesus said, I came not to send peace on the earth, but a sword, and he began to preach the kingdom of heaven, and as they were expecting a righteous king to reign over them, they thought to crown him, but he told them his kingdom was not of this world (not a temporal kingdom), and then he stood forth to explain it by saying the kingdom of heaven is likened unto a husbandman who sowed good seed in his field, and an enemy came while men slept and sowed tares, and while they thought to extract the tares from the wheat he said to let them grow together until the harvest, and then divide and gather the tares and burn them, showing that the kingdom was not a condition of peace, but of agitation, and enemies; and his disciples being in doubt asked him when his kingdom would come, and the end of the world. His reply was that the kingdom of God cometh not with observation. Behold, the kingdom of God is within you, showing it to be a sentiment, and not a territory.

He said, "I come not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it;" he came to perfect the animal, and to introduce the mental. As is recorded, God finished his work, and rested the seventh day; and on the eighth day God saw there was no man to till the ground, as he had not caused it to rain on the earth, therefore there was no mental moisture; and the Lord God (male and female) formed man out of the dust of the ground. The animal he had already formed was the dust from which he formed him (or John the Baptist), and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life (the mental capacity or preparation); and Jesus, the tiller of the ground, did his best to develop the mental organ, but only succeeded in gaining a few fishermen as his followers, who, after all, did not understand the mental principle he came to teach, which was hard for the animal man to understand, though he might be a teacher in Israel.

He spoke of going to his father, when Philip said, "Shew us the father and it sufficeth us." And he said, "Philip, hast thou been so long with me and hast thou not known me; if thou hast seen me thou hast seen the father; I and my father are one." Showing that he (Jesus) was the outgrowth of the first Adam, or animal humanity, who was the father and he the representativ son; and thus the progressiv work of nature is carried forward by establishing the moral or mental organs, which is a step toward putting on immortality. Thus Jesus sacrificed his life to establish his kingdom, but only laid the foundation of it; but while agitating and combating his enimies his disciples found fault, and asked why he did not speak plain to the people and not in parables. And Jesus said, "Because it is given to you to know the mysteries of the kingdom, but it is not given to them." I think he did not fully establish it with his disciples, from what followed, for they soon after forsook him in the fatal hour of his trial. He suffered alone upon the cross, and was heard to say, "My God, why has thou forsaken me?" showing that he had given up the hope of establishing his pet sentiment.

Now, the resurrection of the personal Jesus on the third day is not true, in the sense of the letter (which killeth); but in the mental idea, the people of this age are rising from the corruptible death to the literal resurrection of the dead Jesus. Thus came the end of the personal Jesus. He said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life, which principle was placed in a new sepulcher wherein men never look;" signifying that the way, truth, and life has been confined in the new sepucher of orthodoxy, and the stone of sectarianism is rolled upon it. But just now the Freethought of Liberal truth and life has arisen, and is appearing to many like a spirit. Yet, as we handle him through THE TRUTH SEEKER, we see he hath flesh and bones and the prints of the nails that fastened his hands and feet to the cross of the animal kingdom; but he is about to ascend, as he sticks no stakes, and will not bind himself to Materialistic or special ideas. And this is the corruptible that must put on incorruption while siting at the right hand of the father (animal) and pleading for forgivness. But he (THE TRUTH SEEKER) cometh the second time, not in personal individuality, but without a sin-offering, as a sufferer on the cross, unto salvation, but now delivering up his pet sectarian kingdom to the father (invincible nature), and thus the last enemy, which is sectarianism, is destroyed.

As you will observe, sectarianism is death, because it divides. Liberalism is life, because it unites. Sectarianism engenders strife; Liberalism engenders charity. Strife is mortal; charity is immortal. Charity hides a multitude of mistakes and myths. It is the one eternal; it is the organ of comparison; it is the intellectual capacity, from which emanates reason; it is the beautiful bridge, the lamb, wife, the negativ; united with the position, it is the New Jerusalem, the city of the living God; it is the Melchisedec of the age; it is a continual priesthood, without beginning of life or end of days; it never faileth; it proceeds from the only one living and true god—progressiv nature, immortality.

First, then (as in the above), the objectiv, the animal man, Adam of the earth, earthy. Secondly, the moral man, the Lord from heaven, the subjectiy; and thirdly, the union of the two, the objectiv and the subjectiv, by unerring charity—love. Thus this corruptible (the first Adam) must put on incorruption, and this mortal (the second Adam) must put on immortality, which is the union of the two—the positiv (male), and the negativ (the female); the whole experimental.

Marcion's Soliloquy.

BY ALHAZA.

He indorsed no gospel but Luke, and altered it as he pleased.—Dean Milman.

We must hav something new; the world is old,
And ripened fruit should drop upon our path.
Stale thoughts, incongruous, suit not thinking men.
How sickening is the mass of legendary lore
Poured on our ears by tricksters everywhere!
The ears of generations hav been stunned,
And no sane person should record the same.
But lies will sell—the masses love the cheat;
They love wild dreams and sentimental hopes;
They bound to bliss from agonies below,
Or fly to heaven on faith's voluptuous wings.
I will be bold and honest; I will throw
A torrent of reproach on Jah's great name,
Who flung his thunderbolts on harmless men—
Who gloried in the light of burning towns
And cries of murdered dames and helpless babes,
And maids dishonored by a beastly crew.
I will be a god myself. No gory spot
Shall stain the page that my disciples read;
An idol men will hav—an eon pure—
A lowly Christ; a suffering spirit form
I will portray to meet their longing gaze.
For centuries these tales hav been in vogue—
A Christ or Jesus the familiar name;
He miracles and wonders must perform,
Or priests would starve within each holy shrine.
From Persia's fountain ages yet shall draw—
Great Zoroaster's name will never die;
He stains not God with evil. Satan's breath
Awoke the world of form, but rain and dew
Can rouse no life until the light appear
And soul develops in each bud and leaf.
A heretic I am, who has the right.
Yes, I will sweep a host of lies away
Till foolish gospels and epistles fly;
I'll choose out Luke, some decent thoughts
I there hav found, and very soon can change
The erring text and make it new and pure,
With a few words from Paul—a teacher rough.
First, I will teach that soul from soul has sprung,
Then bind a chain on all that can corrupt,
And men will soon be perfect. Earthliness
Is not akin to heaven; press it down
And fasten wings to every impulse pure.

Thus thought great Marcion, but Abaddon came,
And Mammon and a host of deadly fiends,
And lo! the church was soon a serpent's den.
But men disdain our oriental thoughts
And feed on husks and unsubstantial food.
The great negation of all forms, we know
The infinit God could not a body take
And lead a gross, impure, and fleshly life.
How could a human brain sustain God's mind?
All infinit conceptions spring from him,
And in that sea he is forever lost.
Of gods who never act we only dream,
Then let us think of a great Demiurge
Who scorned perfection to create a world,
Whose pinnacle of power cast so deep a shade
That in the darkness mankind deeply sinned.
This shade was Satan's dark Titanic form,
And earthliness grew rank without a light.
Slowly it organized till great reflection came,
And it evolved a soul. But tear its props away,
Can the poor shade liv on unless it deigns
To dwell a hermit in some humble shape
Of beast or bird and haply rise again?
I feel, I know, that great Heraclitus
Hath sown the air with wild, delusiv dreams
Of three great natures blended into one.
These woven rays of light, most radiant, beamed
On the Nicene Council's clamors dire,
But I decide that bishops should retire
And change each noisy actor once a day.

Not Fit to be Kissed.

BY ANNA LINDEN.

Published by Request of Elmina.

"What ails papa's mouf?" said a sweet little girl,
Her bright laugh revealing her teeth white as pearl;
"I love him, and kiss him, and sit on his knee,
But the kisses don't smell good when he kisses me."

"But, mamma"—her eyes opened wide as she spoke—
"Do you like kisses of 'bacco and smoke?
They might do for boys, but for ladies and girls
I don't think them nice," as she tossed her bright curls.

"Don't nobody's papas hav moufs nice and clean?
With kisses like yours, mamma, that's what mean!
I want to kiss papa, I love him so well,
But kisses don't taste good that hav such a smell!

"It's nasty to smoke, and eat 'bacco and spit,
And the kisses ain't good, and ain't sweet, not a bit!"
And her blossom-like face wore a look of disgust,
As she gave out her verdict, so earnest and just.

Yes, yes, little darling! your wisdom has seen
That kisses for daughters and wives should be clean;
Caresses lose something of nectar and bliss,
From mouths that are stained and unfit for a kiss.

The Dawn.

Air—"The Bridge." A Paraphrase.

WORDS BY T. W. WILLIAMS.

I stood by the church at nightfall,
As the stars began to appear,
And the moonbeams fell like silver,
Inspiring me with fear;
For 'midst the spires and steeples,
The demons seemed to play,
As if waiting for souls in the churchyard
To arise, then bear them away.

As lingering, sighing among them,
Rose the fresh evening breeze,
It swept out into the moonlight
The leaves of maple trees—
Each leaf a spirit seeming,
Forever whirled through space;
While memory marked the changes
Since first I saw that place.

How often, Oh, how often,
In the dreamy days of youth,
I had paused by that church at nightfall,
And wondered if this was truth!
How often, Oh, how often,
I had wished that some storm-cloud low
Would waft me away on its pinions,
Far beyond the reach of woe!

For my heart was sad and doubting,
And my soul was ill at ease,
And the faith the church asked of me,
My reason could never seize;
But now the bright dawn of Freethought
Sheds abroad the light of day,
And only the sorrow of others
Casts a shadow on my way.

And I think how many thousands
Of priest-encumbered men,
Deluded with fables supernal,
Hav passed that church since then!
Forever and forever,
Humanity shall be free,
As long as the mind has reason,
And Nature shall decree!

No longer the old superstitions
With their shadows shall appear,
As the symbol of life eternal
And its broken image here!

Men of the Hour.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUTLER,

DEMOCRAT NOMINEE FOR GOVERNOR OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Having twice unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for governor, twice nominated to the same office by the Democrats, and as many times defeated, the irrepressible Butler is now candidate for the position of the Bay State executiv, on the Democrat ticket. There seems to be a good chance for his election, as he will get the entire Democratic vote and a large part of the Republican. Benjamin Franklin Butler is a strong man, a scholarly and well-equipped lawer and fine speaker; a man possessing an unconquerable will and extraordinary strength of character, but still gentle and good-natured; a jolly fellow whose possible variableness is easily forgiven.

He is a nativ of New Hampshire, born Nov. 5, 1818. When twenty he was graduated from Waterville College. Having read law and been admitted to the bar, he began practice at Lowell, Mass. His first political office was that of member of the Massachusetts House of Representativs, to which he was elected in 1853. He was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of Massachusetts in the same year. In 1859 he took his seat as state senator. He served as delegate in the Democratic Conventions of 1860, held at Charleston and Baltimore. At the outbreak of the civil war he entered the Union army as a brigadier-general, having already attained rank and experience in the militia. He was made a major-general in May, 1861, one month afterward, and served throughout the war. He was first located at Baltimore, then at Fortress Monroe. In 1862, in connection with the naval forces under Farragut, he assisted in the capture of New Orleans, of which he was afterwards governor. His command in 1863 was in Virginia and North Carolina. The next year he made an unsuccessful attack on Petersburg. After failure to take Fort Fisher in the same year, he was relieved of his command. He was returned to Congress as a Republican in 1866, and re-elected to the Forty-first, Forty-second, and Forty-third Congresses. Beaten as a candidate for the Forty-fourth, he was elected to the Forty-fifth. Since the expiration of his term, he has cultivated a remunerativ practice with occasional deviations into politics.

On religious matters it is pretty well known that Butler is Liberal or an unbeliever in the dogmas of theology and supernaturalism. There are few abler men in the country. In executiv talent he has no superior. It is to hoped he will be elected.

Special Notice.

The manuscript for the "Freethinkers' Directory" is in the hands of the printers, but will be held open for names to Nov. 10th. Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

Humanity and the Progress of International Law.

An address delivered

BY EDWARD SEARING

Of the New York Bar before the Society of Humanity

An illustration from history that intellectual and moral growth is measured by the decay of theology.

The president of the League says: "It shows how International Law became one of the corner-stones of the 'Era of Man.' I wish every Liberal and every patriot would read it. T. B. WAKEMAN."

Elmina says: "It is truly an excellent work, and I hav been much interested in it. Hav gained many new ideas from I., and thank thee for writing it. It embodies a wide field of gleanings, and presents its theory in such a strong and vivid light that to read is to believe and appreciate. We need just such books as this to keep us from being selfish and self-absorbed. I feel that I am better for having read it. and I trust that through its teachings many many more may be led and guided into truths leading to the happiness of the whole human race. We are indeed only one of the great mass of mankind. and our hearts should pulse in unison with all other hearts, and one good law bind all to nature in true morality and a noble life.
"Thine gratefully, ELMINA D. SLENKER."

"WILSONIA,"

INVENTED BY

WILLIAM WILSON,

MEDICAL ELECTRICIAN, LECTURER ON ELECTRICAL THERAPEUTICS, AUTHOR OF THE "TRIAL OF MEDICIN," THE "LANGUAGE OF DISEASE," "MEDICAL FALLACIES," ETC.

WILSONIA,

The acme of perfection in Magnetic Clothing, superseding every kind of electric or magnetic garments. The "WILSONIA" will cure every form of disease, including Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Consumption, Kidney Complaint, Gout, Catarrh, Heart Disease, Deafness, Nervous Prostration, Mental Aberration, Impotence, Sterility, Sciatica, and all forms of disease resulting from impaired nerve force and loss of manhood.

"ONE DISEASE ONE CURE," IS OUR WATCHWORD.

Names of diseases hav no meaning in our system. The same garments that hav cured Catarrh will afterward cure a cough, Paralysis, Rheumatism, or Bleeding of the Lungs.

DISEASE CANNOT EXIST WHERE "WILSONIA" IS WORN AS DIRECTED.

Read the following testimonials:

93 CONSELYEA ST., BROOKLYN, E. D., N. Y., Sept. 2, 1882.
MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: Seven months ago I bought your garments for the cure of spitting blood, from which I suffered for several years. I spent considerable money for doctors, but the bleeding would still come on at intervals, which both weakened and alarmed me. Since wearing the garments the bleeding has stopped, and I am now as strong as ever. Through their great benefit to me, I can and feel it my duty to cheerfully recommend the Wilsonia to all persons suffering as I was.
Respectfully yours, MRS. A. BRYANT.

Catarrh and Muscular Rheumatism.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1882.
MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: Being compelled to walk lame from the effects of a broken eg, I was recommended to try your Magnetic Garments, and I am happy to say that they hav given me great benefit, being able to walk as good as ever; and also my son, who was troubled with catarrh for years, has tried these garments, and now he is perfectly cured. Very truly, BERNARD MARKEY,
260 Degraw street, cor. Smith.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Aug. 9, 1882
MR. WM. WILSON, DEAR SIR: It is now nearly a year that I hav worn your appliances, and I am very sure that when the year expires all disease will be driven from my body. I suffered from a complication of disease, viz., general debility, severe heart trouble, but worse than all, the worst known form of blood-poising. At the end of every two months I experienced a curious and powerful breaking up of the diseas- and expulsion of impurities. The last attack was the appearance of numberless boils. Foolishly alarmed, I consulted an eminent physician of New York. To my astonishment he prescribed mercury. but my head was level enough not to take a particle of his poison because I concluded to trust entirely to the Wilsonia. And now I hav the benefit of it, for everything is healing up rapidly, and I am almost certain that it is the last symptom. Respectfully yours, H. LANGE.
cor. Jay and Nassau sts.

P. S.—Oct. 15. Since writing my former testimonial, I hav fully recovered and will be glad to answer any inquiries. H. LANGE.

FOR GIRLS.

A

SPECIAL PHYSIOLOGY,

OR,

Supplement to the Study of General Physiology.

ILLUSTRATED.

BY MRS. E. R. SHEPHERD.

12mo, EXTRA CLOTH, PRICE $1.00.

We hav here a work, the need of which has long been felt by all intelligent women, and especially by mothers and teachers, conveying to girls that special knowledge so important to them, but which, for proper reasons, must be omitted altogether from the general and school physiologies. Written in a careful and entirely unobjectionable manner, it is so plain and practical as to be easily understood, and its perusal is sure to leave an impression of the importance of the subject on the minds of the readers. It discusses the physiology of woman; the proper relation of dress to comfort and health; the age of puberty; menstruation; some of the diseases of women, their causes and prevention; something about marriage and motherhood, and many other topics of importance.

The special attention of mothers and teachers is called to this book, with the hope that they will read it, and convey to their daughters or girls in their charge the information given; or, better still, after reading, place it in the hands of the girls for whom it was written. KNOWLEDGE IS POWER.

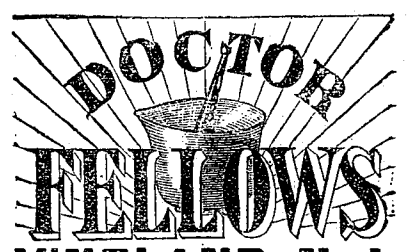
READ.



KNOW THYSELF.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase and read the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, entitled the Science of Life: or, Self Preservation. It is not only a complete and perfect treatise on Manhood, Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in man, Errors of Youth, etc, but it contains one hundred and twenty-five prescriptions for acute and chronic diseases, each one of which is invaluable, so proved by the author, whose experience for 21 years is such as probably never before fell to the lot of any physician. It contains 300 pages, bound in beautiful embossed covers, full gilt, embellished with the very finest steel engravings, guaranteed to be a finer work in every sense—mechanical, literary, or professional—than any other work retailed in this country for $2.50, or the money will be refunded in every instance. Price only $1.25. Gold Medal awarded the author by the National Medical Association. Illustrated sample sent on receipt of six cents. Send now.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. ☞ sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notices from the Press.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Times.]

We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician, who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of those who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

[From the Star Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.]

TO INVALIDS AND OTHERS: The Banner seldom indorses any doctor or medicin, but it is free to say to all interested that Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., is not only a skilful and reputable practitioner, but one of the most successful physicians in the United States.

Gems of Thought.

ECONOMY, thrift, and industry are worthy virtues, but beware of avarice and miserliness Lay by, if possible enough for all the needs of life, but do not hoard for the mere love of gain It is better to invest thy money in good works while thou livest to see that thy designs are carried out than to die and trust to others to do thy will, and know not but they will fail in the end.—Elmina D. Slenker.

EVEN the wisest do not reflect on the most important and the most certain of things, which is, that every act of inhumanity and injustice goes far beyond what is apparent at the time of its commission, that these and all other things hav their consequences, and that the consequences are infinit and eternal. If this one truth alone could be deeply impressed upon the hearts of men it would regenerate the whole human race.—Lander's Imaginary Conversations.

PERHAPS we are anxious to maintain a reputation for consistency. If I believed and said a thing yesterday I will stick to it, whether it is true or not. That is the attitude, I think, of the great majority of people. Or a person has a prejudice against a new truth, he does not like it, and therefore he will not look at any evidence in its favor. Whether for one reason or another, it makes no matter what it is, people are not truth-seekers so much as they are anxious defenders of certain opinions that they happen to hold.—M. J. Savage.

THOUGH all the winds of doctrin were let loose to play upon the earth, so truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to doubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple. Who ever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter? Her confuting is the best and surest suppressing. . . . . Who knows not that truth is strong next to the Almighty? She needs no policies, no stratagems, no licensing, to make her victorious. These are the shifts and the defenses that error uses against her power.—Milton's Areopagitica.

DOWN with the useless and the rotting props
That cumber only and deface each wall!
Off with the antiquated cloth that drops—
Moth-eaten draperies around the columns tall!
Nor needs the heavenly architect our small,
Superfluous tricks of ornament and gilt
To deck the royal courts his wisdom planned and built. —The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

THERE is no cause of insincerity, prevarication, and falsehood more powerful than the practice of administering oaths in a court of justice. All attempts to strengthen the obligations of morality by fictitious and spurious motivs will, in the sequel, be found to hav no tendency but to relax them.—Goodwin's Political Justice.

OUR Quaker friends do not, I imagin, perjure themselvs oftener than other people, but they never take an oath. The discontinuance of this custom is not something to be deprecated, but a consummation devoutly to be wished. The custom is a premium upon every-day lying. Indeed, we hav Jesus himself with us on this matter; "Swear not at all," he said. And, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, the way in which oaths are administered is not very solemn or impressiv. Religion and piety are degraded every time an assessor or attorney rattles off or mumbles over that little formula; and every earnest person, when subjected to it, must wish the land well rid of such an idle superstition.—J. W. Chadwick.

IT is urged against Atheism that it is negativ, and that out of a negation no fruit can spring. But it is an error to regard any truth as negativ and barren, for all truth is positiv and fruitful. The contradiction of error, when error is supreme, is necessary to make possible the affirmation of truth. The destruction of falsehood is not negativ work, but is the necessary preliminary to the assertion of the truth which the falsehood has negated. . . . The denial of an error is the affirmation of the antagonistic truth. The denial of the supernatural is the affirmation of the sufficiency of the natural. The denial of the usurped supremacy of God is the affirmation of the rightful sovereignty of man.—Annie Besant's Gospel of Atheism.

SURELY human souls are not made any more than ships, to lie at anchor, with flukes buried in any blue clay of infallibility, however good the holding ground. Man has a momentous voyage to make, in which, if he be wise, he will use the very best charts from the most recent surveys, the best compass, with all the variations of careful observers marked, but relying, not on chart or compass alone, but upon his own cautious judgment, his good common sense, and upon the knowledge freely gained each day from celestial observations.—W. A. Tilden.

THE first property was a portion set apart for the gods; this is for the conjurers or priests. Shortly, those who decided on subjects of litigation took presents for their good offices and by degrees claimed rewards. Hence originated two classes or professions, which hav absorbed, in the course of ages, more by many times than the fee-simple of the whole cultivated earth.—Lander.

MANY men firmly embrace falsehood for truth, not only because they never thought otherwise, but also because—thus blinded as they hav been from the beginning—they never could think otherwise, at least without a vigor of mind able to contest the empire of habit and look into its own principles, a freedom which few men hav the notion of in themselvs and fewer are allowed the practice of by others, it being the great art and business of the teachers and guides in most sects to suppress, as much as they can, this fundamental duty, which every man owes himself and is the first steady step toward right and truth in the whole train of his actions and opinions.—Locke.

NOR love thy life, nor hate; but what thou livest,
Liv well—how long or short, permit to heaven.
—Milton.

Odds and Ends

TAFFY turneth away anger.

SOLOMON'S Song: "So hellup me gracious! that coat fits you like the paper on the vall."

A MICHIGAN cow got mixed in a clothes-line, and paraded the streets clad in underwear.

ONE of the easiest things to believe in and one of the hardest things to practice is common honesty.

NEXT we shall hav a coat-tail flirtation code. Having the coat-tails covered with mud will mean "I don't like her father."

"REMEMBER, young man," said Uncle Mose. "dat de best frien' yer's got on dis earth is a better frien' ter himself den he is ter you."

IF we could get together all the tombstones we hav set up over broken resolutions we should hav material enough to erect a marble palace.

IT is a very fortunate thing if you hav "a great mind" to do something, because then you needn't do it, and you will still hav the "great mind."

IF you ever hav the good fortune to get to heaven you will find there a great many people whom you didn't expect to see, and you'll miss a great many others whom you expected to find.

"YOU dog of a printer," cried the enraged poet, "you hav not punctuated my poem at all." "Yes, but you see, sir, I am not a pointer—I'm a setter," replied the printer.

A SERVANT applying for a situation was asked the reason of her having left the last place. "Please, ma'am, it was because I were too good-lookin', an' visitors was always mistakin' me for the missus."

A GENTLEMAN who was playing billiards in Toronto happened to touch one of the billiard balls with the lighted end of his cigar. The billiard ball immediately took fire and burned rapidly. It was made of celluloid.

TEACHER: "John, what are your boots made of?" Boy: "Of leather." "Where does the leather come from?" "From the hide of the ox." "What animal, therefore, supplies you with boots and gives you meat to eat?" "My father."

"I DECLARE, Julia," exclaimed Mrs. Marrowfat as her eldest daughter seated herself at the breakfast table, "your lips are all broke out in a rash." "Yes," returned Julia with bashful candor, and a heightened color that looked as if the rash was spreading all over her face, "Charley has begun to let his mustache grow again."

A CHICAGO clergyman has crammed a whole sermon against selfishness in a single illustration: "Said a bystander to an old man busily engaged in setting out young trees: 'My old friend, why are you planting trees? You will not liv to gather the fruit.' As the veteran of eighty mopped the sweat from his brow, he replied, 'Somebody planted trees for me before I was born!'"

A BOY who wanted a drum very much was told by his parents to pray for it when he went to bed, and this was the way he did the praying: "Our father, I want a drum, which art in heaven I want a drum, hallowed be, I want a drum, thy name, I want a drum; thy kingdom, I want a drum, come, I want a drum, thy will, I want a drum, be done, I want a drum, Amen!" During the prayer his father had put the coveted drum on the foot of his bed, and when the boy opened his eyes he exclaimed, "Where the devil did that drum come from?"

A COACHMAN calls upon the doctor to ask what can be the matter with him. "My good man," said the prince of science, "you've got dropsy—that's what ails you." "Dropsy! What's that?" It's a morbid collection of fluid in the serous cavities within the body—in your case, I take it hydroperitoneum caused by cirrhosis of the liver, but curable by paracentesis." "I know, but what is it in English?" "You are full of water inside." "Water? Oh, that's nonsense." (Reflects a moment) "That scoundrel of a saloon-keeper must hav watered his liquor, and yet he swore to me he didn't."

JUST back of Missionary Ridge, Chattanooga, while following the highway to reach Tunnel Hill, I came across a little church half hidden in the woods. The building was primitiv, and the old darkey who sat on a log by the door was more so. After I had made inquiries about the route and was ready to go on, he said:

"Better git down, boss, an' come in to meetin'."

"Do you hold services this afternoon?"

"Yes, sah. We am gwine to open in 'bout five minits, an' I 'spects de sermon will be a powerful one."

I got down and took a seat beside the old man. After a few minutes spent in general talk he said it was time to go in. I followed after him, and found myself the sole audience. I next found that he was the preacher who was to deliver the powerful sermon. He opened services in regular form and with all due solemnity, and then announced his text and began preaching. I stood it for fifty-five minutes, and then as he had only reached the "second G," I waited until he closed his eyes and then made a slide for the door. It was no go. I hadn't gone six feet before he stopped his sermon and asked:

"S'ranger, must you be gwine?"

"Yes, I feel that I must."

"An' you can't heah the rest?"

"No"

"Den I'll chop off right whar' I is."

"Oh, don't do that You can go on with your sermon just the same."

"But you see dar mus' be a collecksbun tooken up arter de sermon," he protested in anxious tones "If you'll obleege me by takin' a seat I'll sing a hymn an' pass de hat."

I sat down, and when he had read and sung a hymn he passed the hat, transferred the quarter to his vest pocket, and observed as we went out:

"I didn't git down to de moas' powerful part ob de sermon, but if you happen 'long dis way nex' Sunday I'll giv you de odder half. Dat quarter comes jist in time to encourage me to keep de good work bilin'."—Detroit Free Press.

THE people of Rutland, Vt., are triumphant over the sentence of a liquor seller to imprisonment for thirty-five years. There were two hundred counts, for as many different offenses. The liquor seller was a woman.

SPOOPENDYKE says of his wife that if she had red cushions and a rack nailed up in front of her, she would only need an over-due mortgage and a fight in the choir to be a dodgasted fashionable church.—Rochester Post-Express.

THE deacon's son was telling the minister about the bees stinging his pa, and the minister inquired: "Stung your pa, did they? Well, what did your pa say?" "Step this way a moment," said the boy; "I'd rather whisper it to you."

THE Boston Globe reports that lightning struck a contribution plate in a Western church, just as the deacon was passing it around. "This is the first time anything has struck this plate for three months," said the deacon, thoughtfully.

OVER the grave of a Springfield, Mass., man in the old Methodist grounds, who died from the kick of a horse, is the following quaint epitaph cut in cold marble:

> Blame not the beast who sent me to the dust.
> For the God of nature said he must.

"LITTLE girl, do you know whose house this is?" asked a solemn-looking old man of a bright child seated on the church steps. "Yes, sir; it's God's, but he ain't in," she added, as the old gentleman was about to walk up the steps, "and his agent's gone to Europe."

SAID the Denver man to his friend, the clergyman: "My dear fellow, you must really let up on driving fast horses and frequenting variety shows. There's a heap of scandal floating round about you." And the clergyman replied: "Is there? Oh, joy! That's what I've been working for! I shall hav some audiences now!"

THE Central Baptist says that a Scoth Presbyterian preacher recently said in a sermon: "The children of unbaptized or unconverted persons, dying in infancy, are now in hell." This is hard on the children. Brighter light is shed on the subject by the Presbyterian Journal, which says: "We Presbyterians believe in the salvation of the infant dead, though often charged with the contrary view."

"FRIENDS," said a Salvation Army orator, "a year ago I was as big a blackguard as any one here; but now I am a-travelin' on to heaven above. I wants some of you fellers to come and git along with me. Sa-a-ay; will ye go? will ye go?" There may be some people who are much moved by this style of persuasiv eloquence, when something less personal and more refined might fail to attract their attention.

A PATENT has just been taken out in Germany for an engin, the piston of which is driven backward and forward by small charges of gunpowder supplied at each end by an automatic arrangement. The ignition is effected by the motion of the piston, which draws in a flame of gas or spirit, the access being regulated by side-valves, which open outlets for the escape of the gases of combustion.

HANNAH MICHAEL, a Jewess, is an inmate of the girls' prison at Middletown, Conn. She refused to take part in the Christian services held in the chapel, further than to attend them with the rest of the convicts, and the matron, after insisting in vain that she should join in certain responses, whipped her so severely that her arms and back were scarred when shown to a visitor two weeks afterward.

GEN. BOOTH, of the Salvation army, says that what is required for efficiency in gospel work is not learning or mental power, but "a hallelujah hurdy-gurdy in the insides, constantly played upon by the Holy Ghost." It might safely be said that with several evangelists and their aids, in bringing souls to Jesus reason and common sense are discarded, and that in place of these they hav "a hallelujah hurdy-gurdy in their insides, played upon by the Holy Ghost."

GEOLOGICAL examination of the delta of the Mississippi now shows that for a distance of about 300 miles there are buried forests of large trees, one over the other, with interspaces of sand. Ten distinct forest growths of this description hav been observed, which, it is believed, must hav succeeded each other. Of these trees, known as the bald cypress, some hav been found over twenty-five feet in diameter, and one contained 5,700 rings; in some instances, too, huge trees hav grown over the stumps of others equally large. From these facts, geologists hav assumed the antiquity of each forest growth at 10,000 years, or 100,000 for all.

THE Rev. M. J. Savage, of Boston, preached a sermon on newspapers. "People often hold," he said, "that the world is more wicked now than ever it was before An explanation of this, I believe, will be found in the fact that no man, who is not so utterly alone and so far away that what he does and says cannot be reported as news, is safe to-day in the commission of crime, for the chances are that very soon he will see his name in a newspaper telling all about him; and this, if you think of it, is the one thing that the average man fears more than he fears God, more than he hopes for heaven, and more than he dreads hell." On the other hand, Mr. Savage blames the newspapers because he thinks they are generally cynical in tone.

THE following telegram, respecting a worthy evangelist, zealous in bringing souls to the fountain of blood which washes away all stains, comes over the Eastern wires: "St. John, N. B., Oct. 28.—About four weeks ago Edwin H. Ellis, who had been traveling through Maine as an evangelist, and Mrs. John E. Rose, of Thomaston, Me., arrived here and registered at a hotel, under assumed names, as man and wife. Mrs. Rose's husband tracked the eloping couple to this city, and procured Ellis's arrest here, under an old law, on the charge of adultery. In the county court today Ellis was found guilty and fined $400 or two years' imprisonment, the full penalty of the law. Ellis deserted his wife, who lives at Neponset, Mass., and has three children. As Mrs. Rose stands by Ellis, the fine may be paid."

THE correspondent of the Cologne Gazette in Egypt writes from Cairo: "Herr Janson, the correspondent of the Stockholm Dagblad, saw with his own eyes how the Egyptians wounded in the trenches of Tel-el-Kebir, half an hour after the attack, were killed by English soldiers. He counted eight wounded, incapable of offering any resistance, who were shot in his presence, and one who was stabbed. Lieut.-Col. Thurneisen, a nativ of Austria, and one of those officers in the Egyptian service who, by way of taking part in the operations, were attached to the English headquarters, also witnessed the slaughter of the wounded in a helpless condition. He saved the lives of several. Two other persons hav told me the same story. By none of the numerous English officers with whom I hav spoken has the killing of the wounded been contradicted."

THE Presbyterian ministers of Pennsylvania take strong ground against the "desecration of the Lord's day." One of the closing acts of the synod which adjourned on Monday, in Harrisburg, was the adoption of a resolution appealing to the legislativ, judicial, and executiv authorities of the commonwealth "to maintain that system of governmental sanction and support which has hitherto been employed to secure the day of holy rest to the Christian people," asking the railroad and other corporations for travel and transportation to "suspend their violations of the Sabbath," and protesting against the running of excursion trains or boats, "whether openly for purposes of pleasure or in the name of religion." The Presbyterians are a large and influential denomination. It will be of interest to watch what effect this resolution has upon the authorities and corporations to whom they appeal.

KING MTESA is more troublesome to the missionaries than any other of the petty monarchs of Africa. He has an unpleasant habit of falling from grace and turning his back on the convictions of which he has been proud. He disdains to hold theological arguments with any of the missionaries. It is enough for them that he orders them to clear out of his territory. Having tired of all the religions he knew, he sent three commissioners to England to obtain further information as to the ecclesiastical and political outlook. These commissioners returned with a long report, which he refused to let his people see. But, after hearing what they had to tell about England, Mtesa announced that he would let the missionaries of any persuasion from that country come into his dominions on one condition. That condition was that Queen Victoria should giv him one of her daughters in marriage. For the present the missionaries are laboring elsewhere, and it is their impression that King Mtesa is an unprofitable sinner.

THE Rev. Dr. Hepworth defines the faith cure as "that religious idiosyncrasy," and says it is "the product of the emotional nature when it is swayed by an inexplicable mysticism and becomes indifferent to such a low order of materials as facts and law." He devotes an Independent article to a consideration of recent cures claimed as miracles, and concludes: "Suppose my father to be attacked with typhoid fever, shall I resort at once to those means of recovery which hav been providentially afforded, and which the educated physician is acquainted with, or shall I send for the officers of the church to make a prayer? I think I ought to do both, but especially to send for the doctor. The messenger who does my errand should go to the physician first, and to the minister afterward. If either of them is out of town, I earnestly hope it may not be the doctor. If I ignore the agency of God in the cure of disease, I am an Infidel; and if I ignore the fact that the Lord has provided for just such an emergency in the skilled physician, I am without that ordinary common sense which the Lord expects me to use."

A SCANDALOUS scene was enacted at St. Jude's Church, Liverpool, one Sunday recently, when the incumbent, the Rev. Ernest Fitzroy, was assaulted. On the previous night an orange-colored placard was posted in the neighborhood, as follows: "God save Protestantism. The parishioners oppose the profanation of the services because of, first, monkish cassocks; second, a surpliced choir; third, processions; fourth, preaching in the surplice; fifth, intoning the prayers; sixth, early morning (fasting) celebration of the Lord's Supper; seventh, naming the Lord's table the 'altar,' and bowing to it; eighth, a cross and flower vases on the Lord's table; ninth, teaching the 'real presence' and baptismal regeneration; tenth, turning to the east and bowing is antiscriptural and papistic, and therefore likely to promote tumult. Protestants, help in opposing these pranks until they are withdrawn." On Sunday morning the Protestant party gave vent in the church to disagreeable sounds, and when the incumbent and the choristers proceeded down the aisle an attempt was made to stop them. A disgraceful struggle was the consequence, and Mr. Fitzroy and the choristers took off their surplices on the spot. Several blows were made at the incumbent, who warded them off as well as he could. The police appearing on the scene, a young man was given into custody.

FROM the 23d to the 27th were great days for Philadelphia. They were celebrated by exercises commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the landing of Penn. Speeches were made, guns were fired, and the streets were crowded with spectators from the ajacent rural districts. A minister who had never before been heard of caused considerable remark by calling to mind the fact that Friend Penn sold firewater to the aboriginal Pensylvanians, but he was not encouraged in his historical researches. Altogether the citizens of Philadelphia made quite a holiday for Quakers.

AN OLD VETERAN.

I should not fail to mention a visit I made, in company with Mr. Cowen, to see a worthy laborer in the Freethought and reformatory ranks, by the name, if I remember correctly, of Samuel Diller, now eighty years of age, and who, though infirm in body, is still strong and brilliant in his mental capacity. Fifty years ago he edited and published a paper devoted to Freethought, the Land Reform, and other reforms in the interest of the working classes. He is worthy of the highest honors as one who loves his fellow-men, and who has devoted the better part of his life to their best interests. He is an Irishman by birth, and is really one of nature's noblemen.

THE WINE INTEREST OF CALIFORNIA.

I had a pleasant interview with Mr. Henry Kohler, a very intelligent German, who was the first man, by several years, to commence in California the culture of the vine with the view of the manufacture of wine. At first he only met with discouragement and evil prophecies. Everybody was ready to decide that wine-making never could be a success on the Pacific coast. But Mr. Kohler saw promise and success ahead, and he pressed on, midst poverty and discouragements, raising a limited amount of grapes at first, and finding difficulty in selling his wine when manufactured; but year by year the demand increased, and year by year the popularity of California wines improved in the judgment of the American people, and thus he gradually enlarged the business until his firm have now two hundred and twenty acres in vineyard, and are planting from two to three millions of vines per year.

The usual yield in the Napa and Russian River valleys is about fifteen pounds of grapes per vine, and that yield constitutes a profitable crop; but in the Fresno Valley, some one hundred and fifty miles further south, the vines, when seven years old, yield sixty pounds of grapes per vine, which must make an exceedingly profitable crop. It would seem that a man could do well to own from twenty to forty acres, in the Fresno country and plant the same in vines, particularly the raisin grapes, as these are fully as profitable as for wine-making; and when sixty pounds per vine are produced, and the vines last for a hundred years, the income is large and steady.

Mr. Kohler informed me that fifteen pounds of grapes make a gallon of wine, and that in the wines of this country no adulterations are used; and as the grape juice itself is cheaper than any substitute that can be used, there is no likelihood that adulterations will be made in the future. The wine is kept from three to eight years before it is offered for sale, and in that time it becomes of excellent quality. The demand for California wine from the Eastern states and from other localities is largely increasing, and the trade has already reached such proportions that Mr. Kohler's firm are very wealthy, counting their assets by millions. They distil largely of brandy, as do all the wine manufacturers of the country, and the brandy is of fine quality. The wine business of California is destined to reach very large proportions, and the amount of grapes that will here be converted into raisins will yet astonish the world. There is not under the sun another country—another such magnificent country—for the grape culture. All the grapes raised in other countries do well here, and the flavor is usually improved, and the yield is fifty per cent greater than in Switzerland, Italy, Spain, or Germany. Many experiments are still being made with new varieties, and usually with good success.

In 1881 ten millions of gallons of wine were here produced. At six months of age it is worth twenty-five to thirty cents a gallon. The usual price of grapes in the fall is from $25 to $35 per ton. Flat lands have chiefly been used for the culture of grapes, but hill lands are coming more and more into use for the purpose, being found fully as good for the purpose, the juice being richer and of finer flavor.

Mr. Kohler is a gentleman of unusual good sense, and is a settled Freethinker. I had the pleasure of adding his name to the number of those to whom I send THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is a man of strict sobriety, and appears like one who, if he uses wine, does so to a very limited extent.

FEMALE LAWYERS OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Before completing my accounts of this interesting city, I must speak of three distinguished female lawyers in practice here, all of whom are stanch Liberals. Their names are Laura DeForce Gordon, Marion Todd, and Clara S. Foltz. The first I had not the good fortune to meet, but the last two I became acquainted with. Mrs. Todd honored me by a call upon me at my hotel, and I found her a brilliant and interesting woman. The three are actively engaged in the practice of law, occupying offices, and meeting with very fair success. Mrs. Foltz has done an important work in starting the ball rolling, and in enabling women to practice law in the state. Through her influence, colleges have been opened to women, and they now practically stand on a level with the male persuasion. Mrs. Foltz is the mother of five beautiful children, and what, under the circumstances, she has achieved is truly wonderful. She is a genial, smart woman, and is successful in the cases she prosecutes.

Mrs. Gordon is a prominent woman, and stands well with the public. She possesses brain and fervor of no mean degree, but is less impulsive than Mrs. Foltz, and perhaps possesses less of the sympathies which melt a jury. I do not know whether she is a mother of children.

Mrs. Todd has a daughter about fifteen years of age, to whom she seems greatly devoted. She possesses decided individuality of character, with brain force and enthusiasm, which do not fail to carry her audiences with her. She, as well as the two others, has been a regular lecturer for some years, at which she was successful. Mrs. Todd passed the examination for the Supreme Court of the state in July, 1881. She went before them with a class of twenty men, and she was one of the seven only who were admitted. She passed upon the merits of being duly prepared for the ordeal. The second case she brought was against the Geary Street Railroad corporation, and she obtained a judgment in the court below, and procured a dismissal of their appeal in the court above, on technical points. The case produced not a little excitement, and was deemed a decided triumph.

The three women do not agree in politics. Mrs. Foltz is a Republican, Mrs. Gordon a Democrat, while Mrs. Todd is a Greenbacker. The last takes far the most interest in political questions, and has made several speeches on political economy and finance. She has made the money question, land, banks, and kindred subjects, a familiar line of topics. The Greenback party, at the last municipal election, nominated her for district attorney, and her campaign speeches were reported in all the state and city papers, and they were said to evince great thought and research upon all the political questions of the day. Hundreds flocked to hear her. The next state election comes off in the fall, and it is already proposed that Mrs. Todd be made the candidate for attorney general on the Greenback party ticket. She seems to be very popular with that party.

Perhaps I have told you all you will care to read about the Golden Gate City, so I will next tell you something of my visit to other places in the state.

OAKLAND.

One of the prettiest places in California is Oakland, and one of the most interesting visits I have enjoyed was here. My friend, Mr. H. W. Schow, who lives in Oakland, had called upon me in San Francisco and invited me to his home. On Saturday, June the 10th, I proposed to go to Sacramento, as my friends there had been kind enough to tender me a reception, to take place on Sunday evening, so I resolved to start in the morning and make my call at Oakland en route. The day was pleasant, and the ride of some eight miles across the bay, passing near Goat Island, is an agreeable one indeed. It is hardly necessary for me to tell you that the city of Oakland is located on the east side of San Francisco, and in many respects it has a much finer site for a city than the latter. Had the facilities for large steamers and ships been as good here as on the opposite side of the bay, Oakland would undoubtedly have been the city; but in the way of a harbor, San Francisco has a great advantage. A good deal of money, however, has been and is being expended to extend out long piers and to dredge the harbor so the large shipping can approach near the town. Whether this will be sufficient to overcome the natural impediments remains to be seen.

The ferry between San Francisco and Oakland is extensively patronized, five or six millions of people crossing here each year. The boats are fine, and the ride is really a pleasant little excursion. Oakland is practically the terminus of the Central Pacific Railroad, for here the principal portion of the travel and freight leave the cars and cross the bay by steamer. There is a branch of the road, which leads around the southern end of the bay, at Stockton, but it is so much more indirect that only a portion of the travel goes that way.

Oakland is frequently called the "bedroom" of San Francisco, for within its limits reside with their families many of the more wealthy and successful citizens who do business in the larger city. Thus Oakland bears the same relation to San Francisco that Brooklyn does to New York, the former city being the home for great numbers who toil and struggle for the almighty dollar in the maddening mazes of the latter. The site of the town of Oakland is all that could be desired, it being principally a level plain, surrounded at a distance on the east, north, and south by higher ground, which has a pleasant appearance at a distance of a few miles. The town received its name from the somewhat plentiful growth of oak-trees which once dotted the plain, and many of which still remain. Throughout the city, however, a large number of shade-trees, many of which are soft maple, have been grown, so that every street in the city is finely shaded.

I soon made my way to the home of my friend in the northern portion of the city, and a lovely, peaceful home it is. Having been for many years a builder, he was enabled to construct for himself such a house as he desired, and around him he has several other buildings which he rents. For many years Mr. Schow was industrious and hard-working, but now he does little more than keep his property in good order and collect his rents. The husband and wife are Scandinavians, but having been successful in this country, they are now in a condition to enjoy life with comfort. A more neat and tidy home is seldom seen.

It was interesting to hear the pair relate their evolution from the church to the plane of Freethought, where they now peacefully reside. The church for many years had had the benefit of their help, and gave them up with great reluctance, but finally were compelled to do so. By the character of the books which now lie upon their center-table and are in the library—the works of Paine, Ingersoll, Darwin, and others—it cannot be doubted that the escape is permanent and complete. They will never again acknowledge allegiance to the doctrines of ecclesiasticism and supernaturalism. Of course the four volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and some others of my publishing, will be added to the Liberal works they now have, as I received the orders for the same while with them.

After an excellent dinner had been dispatched, Mr. Schow took me in a carriage all over the town and out into the suburbs, among the residences of the rich, and by the georgeous meeting-houses of the godly. The city is laid out in wide streets, at right angles, so that the squares are regular in shape, and uniform in size. The city, which claims a population of 40,000, is finely built, the dwellings being largely of the best description, with large lots, and an abundance of shade-trees being the rule. It is easy to perceive that dwellings abound more than business houses, the town being more noted for a place of residence than for its trade. Arrangements, however, are being made for some extensive manufacturing establishments here, which will bring in the working people and give them employment. A large percentage of the dwellings are of wood, though of good size. Wood seems to be the favorite buiding material in this locality, being less inclined to dampness from the sea air, and, what is more important, probably, it is less disposed to tumble down when shaken up a little by an earthquake. In the outer parts of the city are many large and elegant mansions, erected by those who have an excess of money, and they have all the comforts around them that wealth can produce. The drives out into the country are very pleasant.

Oakland boasts of some thirty churches, and they are of a rich character, vying with each other in grandeur and ostentation. The Congregational and Presbyterian seem to be ahead in cost and magnificence. These are not such places as the humble Nazarine would be likely to step into if he should chance to stroll around this way as he is said to have strolled around the sea of Galilee. And should just such a person as he was venture to place a foot in these fashionable churches the well-dressed sexton would immediately show him the door and enjoin him to "move on," as that was no place for such as he. How Christianity has changed in eighteen hundred and fifty years! The most humble and obscure individual of that time has become one of the most noted gods of the world, and he has no less than one hundred and fifty thousand temples erected to his honor and worship in Europe and America, and many of them of most extraordinary magnificence; but were he to come back now and be just as he was when here, he would, as remarked, hardly be allowed to step a foot into one of the gorgeous temples, nor would he be permitted to rest his weary limbs therein for the short period of half an hour, so variable are human whims.

It is almost singular how much superior the climate of Oakland is to that of San Francisco, though only eight miles away; but being farther from the ocean, it is far less subject to the harsh, cool winds which prevail on the coast, and the weather is decidedly more mild and pleasant. It gets warmer, too, in the summer, than San Francisco, which is a remarkably cool place, the mercury seldom rising over seventy two degrees. There are few mornings in a year that an overcoat does not add to one's comfort. Oakland is decidedly the pleasanter place for a home.

Among the conspicuous public buildings are the Court House, Hall of Records, the Post-Office, and the Masonic Temple, all of which are fine edifices.

Alameda is a flourishing town, within sight of Oakland, on the east side of the bay, and three or four miles south of Oakland. A ferry also runs to it from San Francisco, and it has railroad connection from Oakland. Like the latter, it is a beautiful place of residence for those who do business in San Francisco.

After a thorough ride all over the pleasant town of Oakland, my friend Schow saw me to the station, where I took the train for Sacramento about 5 P.M.

STATE UNIVERSITY.

The first little town we passed through in coming up on the shore of the bay is Berkeley, called also the university town, for here is a splendid State University, dating from March, 1868, when an appropriation was made of $200,000, the proceeds of sales of public lands, as a portion of the Endowment fund. A Seminary and Public Building fund, amounting to $100,000, previously existed, and was included in the endowment, with the accumulated funds of the old college of California, that had been in existence since 1855, and transferred in its entirety of one hundred and twenty thousand acres of land; this was appropriated to the establishment of an agricultural department. This department was made a section of the University, and thus it became a handsomely endowed institution. The University grounds are two hundred acres in extent, watered by numerous mountain streams, which, with artificial aid, enhance the productiveness of the land, which is beautifully laid out and adorned with flowers and foliage. The institution embraces eight distinct colleges, as follows: Scientific, Agricultural, Mechanics, Engineering, Chemistry, Mining, Medicine, and Law, while the degrees conferred are A. B., M. D., and Bachelor of Philosophy.

THE STATE DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM

Is located near the State University, and its farm consists of one hundred and thirty acres. The costly stone edifice, for the use of the scholars, was destroyed by fire on January 17, 1875, but a more expensive building has taken its place, having every arrangement to promote the comfort of the inmates and to secure safety from other devastations by fire. The course of studies pursued here is the same as in the public schools, with the addition of music, which is taught the blind as a means of procuring a livelihood.

SAN BENITO.

After passing San Pablo we made our way to San Benito, where the Sacramento River empties into the San Francisco Bay, and which has to be crossed to pursue our course by rail on to Sacramento. I think this is probably the largest railway ferry in the world. The boat is four or five hundred feet in length, and has two tracks nearly the whole length, capable of taking on the engine and fifty loaded cars, with either passengers or freight. The entire load must amount to thousands of tons. But the boat makes the transit, a distance of a mile, smoothly and easily, the train moving on and off with as little disturbance as if passing over twenty rods of ordinary rails.

THE SACRAMENTO VALLEY

is a broad and fertile tract of beautiful plain, I think, some ninety miles in length, and from twenty to forty in width. The crops produced here are of magnificent quality, whether in cereals or in fruit, which thrive here finely. About twelve miles south of Sacramento we passed at Davisville through the extensive fruit lands of who has on several occasions shown great generosity to your humble servant. When I was sentenced to prison he sent me a draft for one hundred dollars, had given presents of twenty dollars on two or three occasions, and soon after my arrival at San Francisco he sent me his check for fifty dollars. Men of such generosity, and who possess the same ability, are somewhat rare. His very extensive fruit farm looks extremely flourishing and well taken care of, and mostly consists of hundreds of acres in apricots, pears, peaches, and grapes. I intended to have called to see him, but could not do so, as he is now on his other extensive property in Fresno county, some one hundred and fifty miles south, where he is opening new vineyards, erecting a dwelling-house and other buildings. He is probably the greatest fruit grower in California, or perhaps in the world, and is as good a Liberal as fruit grower.

G. G. BRIGGS,

HYDRAULIC MINING.

As Sacramento is approached, indications are apparent that the river overflows, and lays much of the valley under water, preventing it from being cultivated. Thousands of acres thus are in grass which would produce good wheat, barley, and oats, were it not for the superabundance of water. The hydraulic system of mining has unquestionably been of great injury to Sacramento and the surrounding country. By this system of mining hills of considerable size are washed away by powerful streams of water, directed against them by tubes and nozzles, under heavy pressure, wearing down the hills of gravel and dirt, and washing the debris down into the fertile valleys below, and absolutely covering hundreds of acres with a covering of five or ten feet of hard and worthless gravel and clay. In this way the interests of the mining class have triumphed over the agriculturists, and much excellent land has been perpetually thrown out of cultivation that the grains of gold in the hills may be washed out. It is a serious question here, and one which must again and again come up in the legislature of the state, whether the farmer's right to his land is superior to the miner's, and whether the latter shall have the right to wash down the sterile hills, and hopelessly cover the most fertile land in the world. Sacramento city has itself been very much damaged by this hydraulic mining, the debris of the hills being so washed down as to fill the bed of the river several feet, and subjecting the city to serious inundations. The banks of the river have had to be raised several feet to keep the wide and beautiful stream within bounds. The Snow mountains, or extensive ranges of hills, lie from 30 to 250 miles north of Sacramento, and these are the source of the river, and immense supplies of water from them seek to join the ocean.

SACRAMENTO WAS REACHED

early in the evening, and, stepping from the train, I found that Dr. J. L. York and several friends were awaiting my arrival. Among the friends were N. D. Goodell, E. F. Woodward, Mr. Byers, Dr. Hewes, R. Butterfield, and others. A carriage was also awaiting me, and, stepping into it, I was conveyed to the Golden Eagle Hotel, the first in the city, where I had a pleasant visit with the numerous friends of both sexes who called in to make me welcome. Among those who called was Judge Solon Hall, a man of decided intelligence, and who is a recent acquisition to the Liberal ranks, he having become satisfied that the claims of ecclesiasticism are untrue, and that it does not afford the solid ground on which an honest investigator can stand. The visiting was kept up till a late hour.

Sunday, June 11th.—This day was spent in riding about the city and suburbs, accompanied by the Liberal friends of the place. Two carriages were chartered, and in them we rolled from place to place, viewing the many beauties of which Sacramento can proudly boast. It is well known that this city is the capital of California, and here the laws of the state are enacted. We visited the park, the cemeteries, rode through the principal streets, saw the fine residences, and much else that is interesting. The city is about two miles across, each way, the streets in one direction being named numerically from 1 to 26, and the other way they are called after the letters of the alphabet, from A to Z. This is a regular way of naming streets, and gives even a stranger a ready idea of the portion of the city a given street is in.

Sacramento is indeed a beautiful town, and contains a great number of fine houses. The site is perfectly level, the streets are wide and laid out at right angles, and shade-trees of a beautiful character are in abundance. The fine dwellings indicate wealth on the part of the occupants. Mr. Goodell is an architect, and as we rode along he pointed out many fine mansions which he had built, or rather which were built according to the plans proposed by him. They certainly do him great credit as an architect.

We rode out in the edge of the country to the county hospital, or almshouse—or, as we call it in our country, the poorhouse—where the poor and helpless, the sick and indigent, are furnished a home. This edifice was also built after the plans of Mr. Goodell, and is a novelty in its way. The central portion—the residence of the physicians, etc.—occupies the main position, and from this diverge five parts, or additions, for the patients, these being from eighty to a hundred feet in length, by thirty in width, and two or three stories in hight. They diverge like the fingers of the hand when spread, giving a better chance for light and air than could be secured in almost any other form of building.

Dr. White is the presiding physician, and seems well adapted to the needs of the place, having good executive as well as medical talent. The supply of medicines is ample; the drugs are in a well-arranged dispensary, and under the charge of a competent druggist. We walked through the different wards, and saw the sick and ailing, whose fortunes in life have been much inferior to the more favored sons of opulence who have fine homes of their own, with an abundance all around them of what the heart most desires. But it seemed a mercy indeed that so comfortable a home was here provided them, where they are so much better off than hundreds of thousands, and millions over the earth's surface, who are compelled to suffer and starve without any comforts around them, and with little shelter to protect them from the sun, wind, and rain. The number of patients in this hospital is about one hundred and eighty-five.

It being about the dinner hour when we were there, Dr. White kindly pressed us to stay to dinner. We were not hard to persuade in this direction, and in half an hour found ourselves partaking of an excellent dinner, which our ride had given us a good appetite for. We found Dr. White very interesting, and he imparted to us not a little information touching the county hospital affairs. The dinner over, we looked over the grounds, and inspected the mammoth tank, holding one hundred tons of water, and erected on a trestle-work a hundred feet in hight, capable of throwing water over any part of the neighboring buildings. The remainder of the day was occupied in riding along the river bank out in the country, and in visiting a beautiful cemetery, filled with monuments in memory of departed friends.

RECEPTION IN THE EVENING.

At 8 o'clock Turner Hall was well filled with the citizens of the place, who came in to do me honor. Judge S. Solon Hall presided, and made a neat speech, in which he spoke of the advances Liberalism is making in the minds of thousands. He made complimentary allusions to the object of this meeting. The platform was profusely decorated with festoons, bouquets, and baskets of flowers, giving the house the appearance of being highly ornamented in a floral way.

I responded to the welcome which Judge Hall had expressed, and spoke some forty-five minutes, giving my hearers some description of that which I had seen in Asiatic countries. Dr. J. L. York followed in an eloquent speech of three-fourths of an hour, upon the nature and duties of Liberalism. He also directed a portion of his remarks to myself, and spoke in flattering terms of the manner in which I had acquitted myself in the contest I had made with the powers of darkness.

The exercises were made cheerful by duets and solos by Mrs. Godley and Mrs. Fitch, who were accompanied by a gentleman on the piano, all acquitting themselves finely. Miss Brier gave a fine recitation of "The Deed of a Man." Messrs. N. D. Goodell, Byers, Woodward, Butterfield, Martin, and Dr. Hewes acted as vice-presidents. The meeting passed off very pleasantly, and was a most enjoyable affair. The exercises continued for two and a half hours, and were followed with the usual handskakings and cordial congratulations.

Monday, June 12th, was spent in visiting various points in the city, going from place to place in a carriage. Friends N. D. Goodell and Dr. J. L. York accompanied me. We visited, among the first places, the extensive railroad shops belonging to the Central Pacific and located here. The works cover over twenty-five acres of land largely reclaimed from a slough near the Sacramento River. Superintendent Watson was kind enough to show us around, and when he could no longer take the time to be with us, he kindly delegated a subordinate to go with us. The works are very extensive, and comprise twelve different departments.

The main engine is of one hundred and fifty horse-power, and seems a most perfect one, for it has not stopped an hour for repairs in the ten years it has been running. The engine in the rolling mill is still of larger caliber, being a three hundred horse-power. Several others of the shops have separate engines, and besides these a hydraulic engine is largely used, over the entire premises, for straightening and bending heavy iron, operating cranes, etc. For many purposes hydraulic power seems to be better adapted than anything else. This engine has a pressure of 220 pounds to the square inch, and has a weight, in lead, of ten tons on the upper end of the piston. The power is conveyed in pipes to all the shops, and is readily applied to the different purposes for which it is used.

Some of the shops, and they are usually two or three hundred feet in length, are repair-shops, while others are engaged in manufacturing new work, making everything pertaining to freight and passenger cars, from the wheels and springs to the locks used upon the doors. Some of the shops are exclusively blacksmith shops, where forging of all kinds is done. Several steam-hammers are in use, the hammer of the largest weighing five tons. They claim to have made here the largest locomotive in the world, weighing, without the tender, sixty-five tons, and with the tender, ninety-one tons. The engines for the road are not only made here but the passenger and freight cars. The finest finishing is done, as well as upholstering. The timber used for manufacturing the cars, etc., comes from Puget Sound. I saw several sticks of timber twenty-six by twenty-eight inches square, and ninety feet in length. I saw also timber and plank one hundred and twenty feet long. The sills for cars are thirty-five feet in length, and five hundred of these are mortised and tenoned per day by the machinery here.

The rolling-mills and forging-shops usually run day and night, two sets of hands being employed. I think some two thousand hands are employed in the entire establishment. In looking over this immense establishment one cannot help being deeply impressed with the wealth, magnitude, and enterprise of the Central Pacific Railroad. Some of the projectors of this road reside in Sacramento, and though they entered the company with scarcely a dollar in the world, they were in a very few years worth from $5,000,000 to $20,000,000. One of this class was Judge E. B. Crocker, now deceased. He was brother of Charles Crocker, one of the moving spirits of the road, and was taken into the company as legal adviser; and though he put in no money at all, he was worth at the time of his death some $20,000,000. We made it convenient to call at his mansion, where his widow now resides, though she is at present on a journey to the Eastern states. The house is furnished in the richest manner, the furniture in the parlor being of the very grandest description, an elegant mosaic round table top being so expensive that the duty alone on it was one thousand dollars. Many of the vases and other articles of ornament are of the finest and richest manufacture, costing tens of thousands of dollars.

The house throughout is perfect in all its appoint ments, including the billiard-room, the museum of shells, corals, and other curiosities of nature. But the richest and most noticeable feature of the establishment is the picture-gallery of rare and expensive paintings. These fill several large rooms on the second floor of the mansion, and to walk through them and admire the rich works of art is almost equal to visiting some of the first-class galleries of Europe. Mr. Crocker must have expended hundreds of thousands of dollars on this collection, the greater portion of the works being by the best European artists. It takes a catalogue of nearly two hundred pages to describe the thousands of fine paintings here displayed, the great majority of which would be an honor to any collection in the world.

The Liberals of Sacramento speak in very high terms of Mrs. Crocker, who is herself a Spiritualist and Liberal. She has been generous on several occasions. As samples of her sympathy for the poor it should be said that one day in the week she allows them to visit her mansion and look through the picture-gallery without charge. She has built a fine and expensive conservatory (which I visited) almost on purpose that the poor may have a place where they can obtain flowers without charge. The Liberals and Spiritualists, through the efforts of Dr. J. L. York, who has been laboring here as a lecturer for six months, have formed an organization, and it is their purpose to build a hall where not only meetings can be held and a considerable portion of the building be rented out, to bring in a revenue. Mrs. Crocker is looked to to furnish the principal part of the money for the purpose, as she has given favorable assurances in that direction.

In the afternoon we went to the State House, visiting both the fine Senate chamber and the House of Assemblymen or Representatives. Dr. York served here as a member during one term, so he was partially at home here. The State House stands in the center part of some thirty acres of ground, beautifully laid off and decorated, and is itself a magnificent pile—with, perhaps, the single fault of standing too low. We visited the State Treasury, and were shown by the obliging treasurer some $2,000,000 in gold coin, about $20,000 in a bag. I was able to lift one of them, but if I had to carry it five miles, it would assuredly grow very heavy. The funds on hand in favor of schools and educational purposes are large, for the state has been most generous in this direction; perhaps no state has been more so. We also visited the Governor's room, the library, and others of the public rooms of the institution. It seems almost marvelous that a state so young in her history should have made such rapid advances in acquiring wealth, establishing institutions of learning, and in erecting commodious and splendid public buildings.

We spent the afternoon in calling upon friends and making new acquaintances. In the evening many of the friends called upon me to take their farewell leave. I have had a very pleasant visit to Sacramento, and shall long remember the kindness and partiality of the Liberals of the city.

Tuesday, June 13th.—At six o'clock this morning Dr. York and myself took the train for San Francisco, returning the same way in which I came out. We reached the city about 10:30 A.M., and Dr. York soon took the train for his home in San Jose, leaving me to finish up some matters I had commenced—to make some shipments east of luggage and freight, and to visit several places I had not before attended to.

Thursday, June 15th.—In the afternoon Dr. George Hardcastle and Mr. H. W. Walker kindly saw me to the San Jose station, when I bid good-by to San Francisco and was soon on my way southward, on the west side of the bay, toward the beautiful Santa Clara valley, which is really one of the prettiest in the state.

The towns passed through were San Miguel, Colma, Baden, San Bruno, Milbrae, San Mateo, Belmont, Redwood City, Menlo Park, Mayfield, Mountain View, Murphy's, Lawrence's, and Santa Clara, the whole distance being fifty miles. Some of the points named are mere stations; others are rather pretty villages, as some of the wealthy money lords of San Francisco, such as W. C. Ralston, J. C. Flood, D. O. Mills, etc., hav erected splendid palaces for summer residences.

THE SANTA CLARA VALLEY

Lies beautifully, and looks like a continuous garden. The land is nearly all farmed, and orchards and garden-beds are very numerous. As we approached San Jose we passed an onion field containing a thousand acres. In the foreground are substantial and elegant farm-houses, surrounded by orchards and gardens, and the Santa Clara Mountains in the distance, making all a most beautiful picture. Santa Clara valley is acknowledged on all sides to be the finest in California. Snow never falls here, nor is it ever uncomfortably hot. It is twenty miles from the sea, but a range of mountains separates it from the coast, and keeps off the harsh winds and sudden changes of temperature, while a still higher ridge on the east excludes the hot breezes from that direction and beyond. Mineral springs abound in the locality, and the waters of Almaden are bottled under the name of "California Vichy," so closely do they resemble the French original. Warm Springs are on the east and Saratoga on the west, and both are places of fashionable resort.

We arrived at San Jose at about 4 o'clock, and I found awaiting me at the station a goodly number of friends, with carriages to bear us away. Among the friends who thus did me honor, were Mr. L. Mangenheimer, the venerable Samos Parsons, Dr. J. L. York and wife, Mr. R. H. Schwartz and wife, Thomas Jacob, and others. Mr. Mangenheimer is a worthy man, and a patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He has a pleasant home and a pleasant family. I found myself very enjoyably located with them, and could not ask a more agreeable family to visit with. I was taken over the town, and saw that it is extensively lighted by an electric light from a tower two hundred feet in hight and constructed of iron. The town is one of the pleasantest in the state. It is called the "Garden City," because so many gardens and fruit groves surround it in every direction. It has many advantages which other California towns do not have. It is free from fogs and mists, the chilling winds, and the melting heats under which other towns suffer. It has many fine buildings, including the Court House, and numerous dwellings. The Court House is one of the finest in the state, and cost $200,000. The Catholic school and the Academy of Notre Dame are fine buildings, as is also the Opera House. The Catholics were among the early settlers of the country, and gained a strong foothold which they have persistently held. The view from the dome of the Court House is one of the finest in the country, taking in the most beautiful valley in the state, twenty miles across, bordered by a mountain range on each side.

The city is noted for its educational institutions, being, besides the public schools, the large Catholic school named, a day and boarding school for girls, the St. José Institute, a day and boarding school for both sexes; the University of the Pacific (Methodist), connected with which is a seminary for young ladies; and the State Normal School, completed in 1881, at a cost of $275,000. The San Jose Public Library contains four thousand volumes. The city has two fine markets, and, of course, several costly churches. Here as well as elsewhere the god that is worshiped in this country either requires finer temples than he did formerly, or his worshipers have become more wealthy, and have imbibed grander and more extravagant notions than they used to indulge in. The Catholics, being ahead here, have the finest church—St. Joseph's. Whether that particular saint takes any more pleasure in fine churches now than he used to, when he eked out a slender living at the carpenter business, is not clearly stated. This church to the holy carpenter stands on the same ground that the first church occupied, which was built here one hundred years ago, when the place bore the sweet and saintly name of the Pueblo de San Jose de Guadalupe. This town was named after the holy carpenter who did not have the pleasure of being father to the son which his little wife bore him. There are many fine drives about San Jose. Seven miles east of the town is the Penetencia Canyon, a public reservation of the city as a park, in which is situated Alum Rock, several mineral springs, and some fine cascades. The scenery here is grand, interesting, and very accessible; the roads are fine, and the country beautiful in every direction. It is some seven miles northwest of the city that the famous mill property is located—the mill built by James Lick, and donated by him to the Paine Hall enterprise of Boston, and to the lecturing fund. It cost a large amount of money, but the money was not well invested, and the property has never been worth in the market twenty-five per cent of what it cost. I think it is now used for a paper mill. I intended to visit the property, but I have had so many to see, and so many places to visit, that I have not been able to do so.

Ten miles from San Jose are the Pacific Congress Springs, the waters of which contain carbonate and sulphate of soda, chloride of sodium, lime, iron, silicate of alumina, and magnesia, and are resorted for rheumatism and many kindred diseases. The accommodations for visitors are of a good character.

Friday, June 16th.—On the principle, perhaps, that a school teacher in a country district used to "board around," staying a limited time with each family, I was this morning conveyed to the house of my friend, R. H. Schwartz, where I also find excellent accommodations, and as much kindness on the part of both the host and hostess as any one could ask for. It is enough to say they are patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and are strong believers that it is an excellent paper. No pains are spared to make me comfortable, and I shall long hav reasons to be gratified to the friends who so kindly entertain me.

NEW ALMADEN QUICKSILVER MINES.

Friend Schwartz took in his carriage Dr. J. L. York and myself through a pleasant stretch of country to the New Almaden Quicksilver Mines, some twelve miles in a southwestern direction. With the exception of the Almaden Mines in Spain, from which these were named, they are said to produce the largest amount of quicksilver of any mines in the world. The history of these mines is an interesting one. In 1835 a Mexican officer met a tribe of Indians with their faces painted with vermilion, which they had obtained from the cinnabar or quicksilver ore. For a consideration he induced the Indians to point out to him the locality where the coloring material was obtained. The mines are in a spur of the coast range of mountains. The Indians had dug fifty or sixty feet into the mountains, when first discovered by Captain Castellero, with their hard-wood sticks. They had probably been acquainted with the mines for many generations. A number of skeletons were found in the passage which the Indians had dug, where probably the earth had fallen and crushed them to death.

Since that time 55,563,327 lbs. of quicksilver have been taken from the mines. Several hundred miners are employed here, being both Mexican and Cornish men. Shafts are sunken several hundred feet in depth, and are being worked two hundred feet below the ocean level. The ore in immense quantities is brought up both vertically as well as on inclined planes. The cars containing a ton or two of the ore are to be seen running along on narrow tracks for the purpose, drawn by mules for a mile or more to the works, where it decends an inclined plane, and is dumped in the vast bins for deposit at the furnaces.

The metal is extracted by roasting the ores by continued heat in large vertical retorts, and the metal arising in the form of vapor is passed through condensing chambers, when it is returned to the fluid state, runs out by a channel or trough, and is conveyed to the place of deposit, where it is put in iron bottles containing over seventy-five pounds.

The retorts, or furnaces, are made in different ways, but most of them are vertical, and thirty feet in hight. They are rapidly filled by the ore being dumped in from cars containing about a ton. I think a full charge is a hundred tons. Several hours are required to distil off the quicksilver from such a mass of ore. The refuse, or debris, thus obtained is enormous in quantity, and is dumped in the bed of the creek hard by. The iron tubes, or pipes, through which the vapor of the metal is conducted and condensed are fully two feet in diameter. Many improvements have been made in the furnaces and the mode of coustruction, and they are now believed to have reached a high degree of perfection. The works are very extensive, there being about a dozen of those large furnaces, constructed of brick or iron, and the buildings to cover them must necessarily be of large proportions. It is easy so see that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended here.

We saw several six-horse teams engaged in hauling the iron bottles containing the metal to the railroad at San Jose. The iron bottles are filled, the stopper which closes them being screwed in, and they are transported by laying them in a horizontal manner. It being one of the heaviest of substances, but a small bulk is necessary to make five tons. Quicksilver has varied greatly in price in the markets of the world—from sixty-five cents to a dollar and a half per pound. The present price is not far from the first figures. Scores of tons of the metal have been used for the manufacture of calomel, that formerly popular medicine being a sub-muriate of mercury or quicksilver. Corrosive sublimate, one of the most virulent and corrosive poisons known, is also a muriate or chloride of mercury. Calomel is comparatively mild, while the corrosive sublimate, containing precisely the same ingredients, but in different proportions, is the harshest and most positive poison known. I remember once witnessing the last hours of a beautiful but unfortunate woman who, in a state of frenzy at being deserted, had rashly taken several grains of corrosive sublimate. I am sure I never saw a human being suffer such excruciating agony for some ten hours as that poor woman did. The poison causes the most active degree of inflammation of the stomach and bowels which nothing can allay or check. The retching, vomiting, and writhing are constant and of the most painful character, continuing for hours, until at last death kindly steps in and closes the scene. I thought then, that however much I might feel inclined to end my existence I assuredly would never employ corrosive sublimate to do it. It is sure, but terribly painful.

The world is to be congratulated that it is now enabled to get along with a much smaller use of the salts of mercury as medicine or curative remedies than formerly. Fifty years ago the major part of the physicians of the country administered calomel for nearly every ailment they were called upon to treat. Calomel was the sheet anchor—the great club of Hercules with which the hydra-headed monster of disease was to be beaten to death. It was thought sub-murias, or calomel, was the most useful curative in the entire materia medica. If ever a poor wretch complained of headache, stomachache, torpid liver, constipation, diarrhœa, loss of appetite, rheumatism, billiousness, intermittent fever, malarial fever, and the thousand and one ills which flesh is heir to, he immediately had to swallow from two to twenty grains of calomel, and the smaller doses to be repeated every three hours and kept up for days and weeks until the system was fully saturated with mercury and a state of salivation produced.

When I was a boy it was not a very uncommon thing to see a person, from the full effects of calomel, with his tongue so swollen as to hang out of his mouth, his breath of the most offensive and metallic odor, his joints swollen or greatly affected with the medicine, the glands of the throat swollen from the same cause, and a state produced infinitely worse than the original disease. Practice was then conducted upon the principle that in order to remove a common or given disease from the system the mercurial disease had to be set up. Thus, it was then almost impossible to find a person who had not been salivated and whose teeth had not been loosened, till perhaps they fell out, from the effects of mercury. In this way the lives of millions were permanently made wretched, and millions carried with them to their graves the effects of mercury poisons which they need never have been troubled with had not the medical practice of the country been fearfully misdirected. Yes, by the undue use of mercury the lives of millions were shortened and a great proportion of what should be life's pleasures totally destroyed. This kind of medical treatment, thanks to the measure of good sense which has been dispensed among the people of the world, and the constant use of this form of mercury, have been greatly lessened, though by far too much is still used. When men and women become as wise as they should be they will find that sunlight, pure air in abundance, pure water, with the benefits that may be gained by many articles of food, are the best curative remedies, and that drugs of any kind, especially poisons, are very little needed by the human system. Instead of making a chemical laboratory of the stomach, it is far better to remove disease by the use of nature's remedies and by controling the diet. The "coming man" will have little use for calomel, arsenic, strychnine, and the endless list of poisons and noxious articles which, for scores of years, men and women have been swallowing under the mistaken idea that they are curatives and health-imparting remedies.

A large amount of quicksilver is used in the manufacture of vermilion, which is widely used for painting and other purposes; but by far the largest share of quicksilver is used in gold and silver mining. In crushing the ores and rocks bearing the precious minerals the particles of gold and silver are liberated, and upon the application of quicksilver the minute particles of gold and silver are thus taken up, for quicksilver has the property of readily uniting with the precious metals, taking up every particle with which it comes in contact. When the quicksilver is thus duly charged with other metal, it is transferred to a retort, and distilled off by heat, it going over in the form of vapor, and again condensed, while the gold or silver, as the case may be, remains in the retort. The extensive gold and silver mines of California, Nevada, Utah, and Colorado afford a ready market for the quicksilver obtained at the New Almaden mines. The fumes of quicksilver are necessarily very poisonous and deleterious, and it has long been regarded as extremely unhealthy to work in quicksilver mines or in the furnaces where the ores are reduced, but the furnaces are now constructed with such care and accuracy that but few of the injurious fumes are allowed to escape, and the men working about the furnaces look as healthy as ordinary men.

THE SAN JOSE RECEPTION.

We were back to the city in good time for the reception what my friends had prepared to extend to me in the evening. The affair came off in the California Theater, a very neat and pretty establishment, and where a goodly number of the citizens of San Jose gathered in to do me honor.

The stage was tastefully and profusely decorated with flowers. Mr. Thomas Jacob, the president of the San Jose Liberal League, presided and made the opening speech. The city band, employed for the occasion, discoursed most excellent music. Miss Maud Loud recited "No Sects in Heaven" in an animated and very creditable style. Mr. R. H. Schwartz performed a cornet solo in a fine manner. His wife assisted him, not on the cornet, but in making selections and accompanying her husband by voice.

Dr. J. L. York made the principal speech of welcome, and dilated for half an hour on the purposes and benefits of Liberalism. I followed in remarks of about half an hour, in which I expressed my gratitude for the kindnesss that had been shown me here, and I told them somewhat of what I had seen in the Asiatic world. Thirteen young men of the Turn Verein sang a favorite song in splendid style. The closing and the best speech of the evening was made by Marion Todd, lawyer of San Francisco, who kindly came down expressly to speak upon this occasion. Her speech was an able and finished effort, and I only regret I am unable to giv it entire.

After the meeting came the usual hand-shakings and congratulations, abundant evidence being extended to me that friends here are numerous and appreciative. The meeting was indeed a grand effort, and cannot be soon forgotten.

An Exquisit "Cultured Liberal."

The late lucubrations of one of this tribe, with the remarks we felt induced to make upon the same, hav brought out some comments upon the cultured individual which seem to be legitimate property of our readers. We will giv in this issue two letters that hav been received in reference to this delectable personage, who seems to regard himself as of much bluer blood than ordinary mortals. Here is one from a friend, who certainly writes moderately:

WILLIAM EMMETTE COLEMAN.

MR. EDITOR: Being an unconditional optimist, I look upon everything, however insignificant, as necessary to the working out of the greatest amount of ultimate good, although to the finite mind it may appear like evil only, and that continually. Ever since I began to see Mr. Coleman's effusions in the papers I hav wondered what good could ever come out of such a conceited, pedantic egotist. He seemed like an unmitigated, infinitesimal sphinx.

I heard on good authority that when he lived in Leavenworth he used to borrow books by the armful of a gentleman possessing a fine library, and by dint of selecting passages from different authors and dovetailing them together, produced articles which he palmed off on publishers as original.

But some passages in his tirade, given in a late number of Bundy's Ridiculo-Pragmatic Journal, must be his own. He charges Sir Godfrey Higgins, Kersey Graves, Judge Waite, and, I think, others (the latchets of whose shoes he is not worthy to look at), with "infamous falsehoods"—that is his term.

"Nature works in mysterious ways her wonders to perform." I should never hav doubted the necessity of Mr. Coleman's existence had my obtuse mind never caught a ray of light on the subject; but I feel that a clue to his utility is "getting through my hair." His mission in the economy of the universe is to carry pedantry, egotism, and arrogance to such disgusting extremes as to head off his readers who are inclined that way and make amiable, modest, and useful members of society of them. Amen. STEPHEN YOUNG.

Memphis, Mo., Oct. 25, 1882.

Thus this conceited jackanapes, who calls for more culture and more purity, is held up in his true light; and if he is good at perceiving reflections he can now see himself in the light in which others see him.

Here is another brief note from a gentleman with whom we are well acquainted, and who we are sure would send us no report which he cannot substantiate in the fullest particulars. Here is what he says:

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Your castigation of William Emmette Coleman is the finest thing I ever read. He is (I speak from personal knowledge) one of the most vile and immoral men in this country. He was driven out of Philadelphia in front of a shotgun in the hands of an indignant brother of a girl that he had ruined. I know whereof I speak. Yours, J. B.

This, indeed, is a repulsiv photograph of a man who thinks himself better than ordinary Liberals, who prates about superior "culture" and "a higher standard," who holds it to be wrong to oppose ecclesiasticism and theological dogmas, and who is capable of denouncing as unclean men far better than himself. This is the man who pretends to advocate "purity" and "culture," slanders those who do not agree with him as "Freelovers," and applies the epithet of his friend, "tag-rag and bobtails," to those who were consistent Liberals before either he or or his confederate were even known in the ranks. This alleged seducer has been very free in his censures of the editor of this paper, and has held us up as an ignoramus, as coarse and low, and as a person unworthy of confidence and support; but we wish to emphatically assure the cultured gentleman that, as bad as he and others hav represented us, we hav not been a seducer of any man's daughter, wife, or sister, and hav never attempted to be. If he or his friend is able to show the contrary of this to be true, he is hereby challenged to do. He may regard himself as vastly purer and more cultured than ourselvs, but we are sure we are better content with the record we hav made than we should be with such a one as his. Particulars will be furnished if desired.

When a man boasts of his purity and his culture, he may well be marked as a hypocrit and a bad man. He is playing the game of "brag," in which his pretense of purity is made to take the place of the genuin article. Whenever a man pretends to be better than his fellows, and boasts of his superior morality, he should be regarded with the greatest suspicion, for as truly as the sun shines he is simply a pretender and a bad man at heart. It is much the same with the man who needlessly seeks to defame and injure another. Beware of him, for it is morally sure he will not do to depend upon. No truly good man, no gentleman, will boast of his own purity and morality; nor will he be ready to tear down the reputation of another, that he may himself rise upon the ruins thus produced.

The cultured gentleman under discussion appeared very much disturbed because uncomplimentary allusions were made to his friend, B. F. Underwood. It was of course very kind of him to thus stand up for his friend, and cultured gentleman No. 2 ought to be duly grateful. Now, said cultured gentleman No. 2, who is associate editor of the Index, should reciprocate the sympathetic feelings of the cultured gentleman No. 1, and come forward to his relief and shield him from the damaging charges made against him. If these apostles of culture, purity, and morality will not stand by each other in adversity, and when the truth is told about them, of what particular good are they any way?

Our readers will be able to decide for themselvs whether the cultured Liberalism advocated by William Emmette Coleman and B. F. Underwood is really superior to old-fashioned Liberalism, with far less pretension, and whether it is desirable that all who embrace cultured Liberalism should become like these pretentious and conceited apostles.

Thieves in the Post-Office.

We request those remitting money to us to send either by registered letter, money order, express order, or by draft on a bank. We hav had recently abundance of reason to believe that letters for us are dishonestly abstracted while in transit, for in a short time more than twenty letters containing remittances hav failed to reach us. Registered letters can be traced up and found what becomes of them. Money orders and bank checks and drafts if lost can be duplicated and the money collected; but if currency is sent in a letter without registering, if it comes to hand, all right, but if a thief takes it, it is hopelessly lost, and there is no chance for redress.

We hav sometimes thought that the clerk thieves who steal our letters are Christian thieves, who think all that is taken from so bad a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER is a real good. This may explain why more TRUTH SEEKER letters than others are stolen and why our friends should be specially cautious. The additional expense of sending by the modes indicated more than make amends in the security given.

New Books, and Cheap.

We will endeavor next week to lay before our readers a part of the miscellaneous works we hav recently added to our stock, and the exceedingly low prices at which we are selling them. We hope our friends will decide to patronize us in purchasing what new books they wish.

The Tuttle Fund.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav received the following for Daniel Tuttle since September 3d: Allen Johnson, Dallas, Texas, .25; Annie Everest, Cheney, Washington Ter., .25; G. P., Cheney, Washington Ter., .25; John Cosgrove, Soldier's Home, Washington, D. C., $1; J. S. Weeks, Onekama, Mich., $1; Dr. Fairchild, New Brunswick, N. J., $1; C. Garwood, Baltimore, Md., .50; V. J. Borette, Nevada, .30. Total, $4 55.

Less than $5 for two months' solicitations, and many of these "crumbs of comfort" hav come through personal appeals to my private correspondents! Here it is almost winter, and this old man, who has spent a lifetime doing pioneer work for freedom, must be left to his bare crust, old clothes, and cheerless hearth, simply because Liberals, who are really able to send a mite now and then, are too careless and thoughtless of his needs and that of his sick wife to take the trouble to do so.

This is my last call, friends, till Christmas; please don't let it be in vain. If each one who writes to me for a book or a paper would send a few stamps toward the Tuttle Fund Elmina will esteem it a personal favor. Just here let me say I feel a little pride in having my friends do a little more to aid me in assisting Tuttle than Garwood's do to aid him in assisting Hacker. He is a man and has money, and can print circulars and postals and all that; I'm only a nobody, owning nothing—not even a vote. I hav only my record as a worker for humanity. On that I base my plea for help for the needy. Shall it be in vain? Address ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Who Were the Abolitionists?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Some time ago I received a letter from a friend of your paper and the principles it advocates, who resides in Shawano, Wisconsin, with the request that I would compile a list of the names of the leading men and women in the Abolition movement in order to show their relations to Christianity and Infidelity, for the writer believed that most of the agents of the Underground Railroad, as well as the early advocates of temperance, were parties of the Infidel stripe, and that the claims and assertions of the church that the Bible and their efforts and sympathies were in opposition to the institution of slavery and the liquor traffic were false.

With the permission of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will state who were the Abolitionists and what class constituted the bone and sinew of the antislavery cause. By way of illustration, I will state, as briefly as possible, what came under my own observation, which facts will demonstrate just how the church stood regarding the cause at the head of which stood William Lloyd Garrison. The facts to which I refer occurred in 1841–'42. At that time I was a member (on probation) in the Methodist Episcopal church. Rev. William Barnes was the pastor. The main church was at Pottsville, Pa. Such men as Benjamin Haywood, John Madison, and others of like standing, were its leading men. At Port Carbon, two miles distant, we held meetings in a large stone house. It was revival time, and when prayers were started after preaching Mr. Barnes would often ask B. Lewis Jones (colored) to lead in prayer. Mr. Jones had a son Lewis, about my age (nineteen years). The father appealed to me to induce his son to go forward for prayers, saying, "You know, Brother Lynn, he will go at once if you ask him." This was true, for a Scotch boy and myself were the only two young men in all that region that would go to the colored church and teach them how to read, and who devoted our energes for their upholding and the liberation of their race. Yes, it was true, they would do aught we said, so young Lewis followed me to the "mourner's bench." When about half way there this priest mounted the bench, spread out his arms, and said, "Stand back! stand back! We don't want any niggers here!" This, too, after repeatedly asking his father to lead in prayer. Could a satellite from the lowest hell hav done worse? When I remonstrated with him regarding the wickedness of his conduct he said, "Why, Brother Lynn, if we allow this it is as much as to say to a respectable public, 'Stand back! stand back!'"

The next occurred at the Lutheran church at Port Carbon. This church edifice was made out of the old school building, and when the society organized they circulated a petition to the effect that all subscribers, as well as all who gave labor to fence and fix the grounds, should be entitled to free burial. Charles Sinus (originally a slave) was the largest money subscriber of the poor men, besides helping to make the fence, etc. His wife Rachel died and was buried there. One year after Charles came to his death by pleurisy. He requested his body to rest by the side of his wife. I was made administrator, and was at that time acting-superintendent of the Lutheran Sunday-school. When all was ready for the funeral the church refused burial, assigning as a reason that they did not want niggers in their graveyard. I called their attention to the agreement on their petition, stated the request of Charles to rest beside Rachel, and the wickedness of a refusal. My appeals were vain. I used every Christian means that I knew. I tried praying and found it useless. Seeing that interment must take place ere long I hit upon this device. The church was mainly German, so I went to the Dutch doctor and stated the case. He was an honest soul, though saturated with liquor and lager, and brimful of good, honest swearing. I said: "You see how the matter stands; the funeral must take place. I hav tried reason, justice, and praying. Now you try reason and swearing." He said, "Come along, Mr. Lynn." I went, and as soon as he met the first one he let off a tornado of full, fat swears that hit like rocks. He then went to another and let off still worse. When he came to the third trustee he uncapped his heavy artillery and executed the grandest display of Greek-fire cursing I ever heard. The saints caved. The request of my old dear friend was complied with, and I was happy.

This experience weakened my orthodoxy, and shortly after I became a Universalist. Being made member of the Pennsylvania Convention, held in Pottsville, the question of slavery and intemperance came up. Of course, I was the only black (Abolition) sheep in the flock. Rev. "Asher Moore" was the priestly defender of moderate drinking and slavery, all of which taught me that S. S. Foster's pamphlet, "A Brotherhood of Thieves; or, a True Picture of the American Church and Clergy," was true to the letter and in nowise overdrawn. After the death of Charles somewhat less than a year, a colored man and his wife, who occupied the late Sinus's residence (the very house used to secrete the fugitivs), were taken back to slavery; the party claiming the husband was a Methodist class-leader, and the person claiming the woman a leading member of the Baptist church. They carried them back to hell.

It does not seem necessary to compile a list of names to show who were the friends and who the enemies of human liberty. The church did not hesitate to call us all Infidels because we refused to shut our eyes to the sin of slavery, and exposed its complicity therewith. Instead of the church aiding the antislavery reform, it threw every possible obstacle in the way of our work for the slaves in the South, and our efforts in assisting the fleeing fugitivs to Canada. We could trust any one better than an activ church-member, as a rule, though I say it with pleasure that there were a few honorable exceptions. Though, while the church branded us all as Infidels, the majority of workers known to me were women and men of the largest faith in the goodness and justice of God, with a belief in immortality, and the literal interpretation of those grand words in the Declaration of Independence and the "Golden Rule." The Hicksite Friends, among whom were Lucretia Mott, Isaac and Amy Post, and many others, made the cause their life-work. Gerritt Smith, Wendell Phillips, Theodore Parker, the Channings, Burleighs, Whittier, and a long, long list who claimed to be Christians, were ever vigilant in defense of liberty, and yet scarcely any were considered quite orthodox. It is true that there was a large body in good and regular standing that clung to the popular faith that were always true to the cause of the slave. In this list stood George B. Cheever, Albert Barnes, Theodore D. Weld, the Grimkies, and still more, that were always right, that held the same religious ideas. It must never be forgotten, and cannot be too often reiterated, that while the churches of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston refused to open their doors to Mr. Garrison, it was the Infidels of Boston that gave him the opportunity to plead the cause of the slave in Julian Hall. Many of these friends were the earnest friends of the downtrodden, and none more so than the noble Charles F. Hovey, the Boston merchant; while dissenting from the multitude, religiously and politically, and while believing that ecclesiasticism and Christianity hav done, and are still doing, an untold amount of evil, we must not violate the principles of truth and justice.

Actuated by this spirit, we are compelled to admit that the great majority of antislavery workers were imbued with a religious faith that God was on the side of justice, and worked with them to establish liberty throughout the land to all the inhabitants thereof; and, though it is too true that religion, as understood by the masses, did not make them remember the poor slaves as bound with them, but on the contrary made them excuse the slaveholders and hate or dread the Abolitionists, it is equally true that a certain Infidel element were so busy in lampooning religion, and berating the priests and priestcraft, that they had neither time, nor taste, nor patience to battle with chattel slavery, or join the antislavery ranks.

These are simply my opinions, which twenty-five years of antislavery work crystallized.

Among my personal acquaintances, during my residence in the states of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and Illinois, I never knew scarcely a single case on the part of a man or woman that were activ workers in an orthodox church that were reliable Garrisonians—by which I mean the kind "that would not equivocate, that would not retreat a single inch, and that would be heard"—for the reason that the church was first, and freedom for the oppressed second. They were a species of ultramontaines—God first, the poor slave afterward.

The brazen effrontery of the church is a part of its stock in trade. Who does not know that it bred just such offspring as "South Side" Adams, Orville Dewey, and Henry Ward Beecher; the first, the Bible champion in defense of the "sum of all villanies;" the second, to show his subserviency to slavery and the "Fugitiv Slave law," said, if it was necessary, he would send his own mother back to slavery; and the third, while prating, "in season and out of season," in opposition to the "peculiar institution," could invite slave-holding divines to his pulpit, and not hav sufficient courage to speak from the platform of the antislavery yearly meetings, combining the hypocrit and coward in equal proportions? As earnest workers, we found it absolutely necessary to cut loose from church influences, and we accepted what seemed the most proper and appropriate name, viz., "Come-outers." We ceased for many years to put any trust in the church. We knew it to be our most insidious and persistent foe—what it could not accomplish openly, it sought to secure by the basest insinuations, or the most shameless assumptions. Our constant agitation was the leaven of truth that kept up a perpetual ferment in every pretended or real moral and mental organization. Its power clove asunder sects, and systems, and institutions which imagined they were so firmly rooted and permanent in principle that naught could destroy their equilibrium or integrity. We were a thorn in the side of political parties, a rebuke to dishonest patriotism, and a constant and vigilant detectiv to hunt out and bring to justice all shams in opposition to human liberty, whether done in the name of God, religion, or even science. My letter is too long to giv my opinion of the status of the church on the temperance question forty years ago. Hoping my Wisconsin friend and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will enjoy this article, I am his and theirs, for truth and justice GEO. LYNN.

Knowledge Necessary to Belief.

In an argument, no matter upon what subject, it is ungenerous and unwise for the disputants to descend to personalities. The arguments should be left to speak for themselvs. They are worth their face, no discount being made for the author's character, be he young or old, good, bad, or indifferent, a member of some church, or of no church; whether he believe in one or more gods, or in one or more devils. We care not where the truth comes from, "it is worth only its convincing qualities to the mind which receives it."

The vast majority of the world is governed by custom, but there are a few who will think, speak, and act in accordance with their reason, who will speak their honest convictions, whether they are conventional or unconventional, regardless of what the world shall say of them or of their opinions. They know that truth will finally prevail, even if there is but one man who advocates it against a million, and they are willing to wait a hundred years or more to hav their theories proved—as many a one has done before them—that "facts are of far more importance than reputations;" therefore the present belief of others in regard to their theories does not discourage them.

With uneducated and unreflecting men the personal abuse of a disputant, who entertains what they consider the unconventional side of an argument, undoubtedly has weight; but the thoughtful reader or listener does not look at names; if the arguments reach his soul, and if he is honest and unprejudiced, he judges the arguments by their own merits, not by what is said of the merit or demerit of their author. If we try a pen and find it good, are we to condemn it because its maker was a Chinaman, or because some one pronounces it to be a worthless pen? No. We have proved to our own satisfaction that the pen is a good one, as we prove that the argument is sound—by the dictum of our judgment.

But some will say, "How shall we decide, when doctors disagree?" As long as there is disagreement it is quite evident that there is no supreme authority on the subject; for where there is authority there is no disagreement or investigation. Disagreement leads to investigation, and if it is not permitted, how can perfection be arrived at? If Franklin and Morse had been debarred from making experiments, if they had been compelled to admit that the pen was the best an only means of communication, should we ever hav had the telegraph? Orthodoxy says, "We hav the best, and know it." But some one says: "I don't believe them. To my mind it seems at least possible that it would be better to devote more time to educating children, and men too, in regard to matters pertaining to this world." We should not receive anything as absolutely true, so long as there is any possibility that it may be false. The doctrins that we must not doubt and must not interrogate are the greatest obstacles to progress that can be created or imagined, no matter to what subject they may be applied, or in what book they may be found. There is no proof that the creator of the world had anything to do with books, and until this proof shall be found to exist beyond question, it is a sin to ask a reasonable being to receive the doctrins found in any one of them that are in direct contradiction to his honest convictions. It is bad enough to hav unchangeable belief in regard to what we can know about what we can see; but to hav a settled belief in that which is not absolutely certain, what pertains to the hereafter, to the next world, is very unreasonable and nonprogressiv; to be compelled to believe what we cannot understand, or what we construe differently, is not only unreasonable but monstrous. This has been done for thousands of years, and yet there are those who claim that this course has civilized the world. But a far more reasonable, and, to my mind, the only reasonable, view is, that mankind hav progressed in spite of these enforced dogmas. To fetter a man's mind is as deleterious to his spiritual nature, and interferes as painfully with his mental progress, as placing irons upon his feet and hands.

It is but a few years since mankind were given their freedom of thought and speech, and now that they are comparativly released from their mental serfdom, they are making rapid strides in civilization. Stuart Mill says, "The sole end for which mankind are warranted, individually or collectivly, in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number, is self-protection." What cause more sacred than to protect a human being in his right to think for himself—the right to use what reason he has? But thanks to such men as the "great champion of human rights," the world is beginning to breathe the inspiring air of liberty of thought. No pontiff now can inflict inquisitorial torments upon a man for believing and worshiping as he thinks right. In this country, where each man is "king of himself," and where each has "a clear title to his brain, free of encumbrance," any society that compels its members to liv on faith instead of on facts will either hav to append to its constitution a "fifteenth amendment" or stand upon a very infirm foundation. That such a society has been able to exist for centuries we will admit; but since the world has been fit to liv in only a very few years (for a short time ago men and women were bought and sold like sheep in even the most civilized countries), men hav commenced to think for themselvs; and for the next million years the society that says to its members you must believe in any book and let us do your thinking for you, if those members remain it will be for some other purpose than believing and thinking. In one sense, all men of the past and present think for us; that is, we hav the benefit of their thoughts; but we claim the privilege of selecting those that we consider best for us and of adding to and improving upon those thoughts if we can. But to compel one man to accept, unquestioned, the thoughts of another, whether he claim to be inspired or not (inspiration does not add to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of what our judgment says is unwise or false), is worse than a military despotism—'tis reason despotism, and that, beyond all others, is the worst, as it destroys freedom of thought as well as of action.

How many new thoughts should we hav to-day if the theory of the church had been carried out? autos-da-fé would still be lighted with our quivering flesh; heretics be gasping their last in living graves; heads would be falling by the guillotin, and we believing that heaven was too far above to hear or pity, and that hell was just beneath, waiting to receive and torture our roughly disembodied spirits. Even our Galileos would not dare insist "the earth is round;" the Copernican system would not be believed; and we should still hav literal hell-fire and eternal damnation preached into us. Who is it that has Liberalized the church, those who believe or those who doubt? And the Liberalizing process has but just commenced. The time is coming, yes, has already come, when a man will be allowed to hold his own opinions, as to whether the Lord inspired Moses to write the laws, or whether Moses only thought he was inspired; whether he really saw a burning bush, or whether it was but the reflection of the sun over the hill; whether Lazarus was really dead, or whether there might not hav been some life left in him; whether the sun and moon actually stood still, or whether it was the picture of the sun and moon on the standard bearer's flag that stopped while Joshua fought the battles; whether the story of the flood was a great or small story, was true or false; whether the book called "the Bible" was inspired, or whether the writers thought they were inspired; whether the world is ruled by a personal god, or by natural laws.

Since the church has been constantly changing, as far back as history goes, it is not absolutely certain that it will not keep on changing, and as its tendency has always been toward Liberal views, it is not certain that all of its present dogmas will stand. We may well hope, when we hav such men as Thomas, who cannot swallow the Methodist idea of atonement; as Swing, who talks principally of salvation in this world; as Beecher, who says that pain carried beyond purification is cruel, and that to construe the Bible literally is monstrous; as Ingersoll, who says that "faith is only necessary when the story is unreasonable;" that he thinks more of facts than of faiths, more of reasons than of revelations, more of principles than of persons, more of nature than of names. Compare these sentiments with "He that believeth not shall be damned;" with the doctrin of eternal punishment; with the idea that an infinitly wise and all-powerful god murdered all the finite beings upon the face of the earth by a flood, because they were wicked, when he might hav made them as pure as angels by one word, in the twinkle of an eye. How much less trouble, and how much more humane this would hav been than all that flood business!

If we would hav no belief in regard to what we know nothing about, but try to investigate what has not been already explained satisfactorily, and govern our actions by what we think to be right, life would then be a success, and constantly progressiv. Emerson says, "Think and act yourself, to-day, and if to-morrow you find yourself mistaken, hav the strength of mind to change your opinions." A man who does not change his opinions does not progress. Perfection seems desirable, but in nature, when that point is reached, it is the end. Nothing that is known to be perfect is doubted, and whatever is doubted cannot certainly be considered as true and perfect beyond question. The world of thought is infinit and there is no danger of getting out of material. He who has too much time has too little sense, and deserves to hav fewer years if he cannot make better use of what he has. A man certainly ought not to be punished with time. He can make as much less for himself as he chooses. Those who do not believe in investigation, and who will not investigate, are generally those who hav too much time.

For a thinking being to hav a belief or theory in regard to that of which he knows nothing is an absurdity, but to insist that others shall believe what neither he nor they can understand, or be eternally damned for disbelieving, it is monstrous.

Revivals.

Now is the season when the voice of the revivalist is heard in the land. He is a man of voice, must necessarily hav a voice of power, and if a sweet singer, so much the better for the cause. He generally knows something of the power of that strange influence, known to the scientist as "magnetism," and to the church as the "power of the Holy Ghost." He watches with eagle-eye the first indication of the manifestation of this wonderful power, using every method at his command to widen and deepen its influence. He calls the brethren and sisters close together, urges them to lay aside every thought but the love of Jesus, insists upon their shaking hands and singing the old familiar hymns, well knowing that any form of intense mental action will retard the work of the "Holy Ghost."

So the magnetist well knows that any form of mental abstraction makes it impossible for him to control his subject. But the revivalist does not stop. Night after night, after giving deep and terrible warning to sinners, followed by tender and loving appeals to "flee from the wrath to come," he calls up the old wheel-horses of the church, both ladies and gentlemen, keeps them praying and singing, thus diffusing "magnetism" until the whole church is filled with the "Holy Ghost." It is then easy for them to believe, for in that condition they do not think. It is then the "precious" promises and pious phrases of church parlance are greeted with an artillery of "amens" and storms of "glory hellelujahs," when proclaimed by this loud-voiced man of God.

When a special effort is made by a strong mind and body, backed up by the accumulation of ages of sacred beliefs that hav grown up around and, so to speak, become a part of the people, it becomes almost omnipotent in its power. It moves a congregation as a storm-swayed forest. They then hav no disposition to resist this influence even if they had the power to do so, for the sensation is pleasant and because they are fully persuaded that it is the very power of God.

Our city was visited by such special effort last winter. The Rev. Prettyman, of Baltimore, Md., did some of this kind of work at the Fourth-street M. E. church, and tried to palm it off as "Holy Ghost" work. Strange to say, the "ghost" did not come at his call. There seemed to be some drag, and sinners did not fall on their faces and call for mercy. Fact is, people are getting an inkling of how this thing is done. They are all on the "qui vive" to see who will be the first struck with "conviction" (another name for the same thing), consequently there is but little influence felt. I am informed that he was driven to the dire necessity of calling the Sunday-school children up to the bench in a body, prayed over them over an hour or more, then told them to get up, that they were converted, and were now the children of God. The next day one of the city papers stated that the revival on Fourth street was flourishing, that over fifty had experienced a change of heart in a few days. Such things are getting too thin even for the devout. The reverend gentleman was criticised pretty severely for his off-hand method of doing things. The Rev. Shepherd soon left in search of greener "fields," or, I should hav said, sheep.

The Rev. Mr. Chubb, of the Eighth-street Evangelical church, seems to be better acquainted with the ghost. Night after night, for seven or eight weeks, he kept pouring down hot shot upon the heads of the sinners and calling in, in large numbers, the lost sheep and lambs. Quite a number of old sheep were thus brought into the fold and washed preparatory for the spring shearing, which is the most important part of a good shepherd's work. They were having what they call a glorious revival. This is called by a certain class of Christians "getting religion," "saving souls," "getting a change of heart," "making a bad person good," "enlisting under the blood-stained banner." Many questions come rushing into the mind on witnessing one of these storms of human passion.

Is there any good coming to humanity from its exercise? I think there is. The power exists, it is a patent, potent fact. People become exalted; all the faculties of the mind are aroused; they become, for the moment, generous, affectionate, and some even forgiv their enemies for the time being. The whole being seems lifted up into a purer life. I am not surprised that the sudden possessor of this mysterious power should believe himself baptized by the "Holy Ghost," especially when he has been taught to look upon it as such from childhood. But I hear some one say, "You are a queer Liberal to admit such exercise to be in any way beneficial." I answer, It is not confined to God nor to his self-appointed representativs, the preachers, but is as common as the power to breathe, therefore may be used intelligently. You cannot mingle with your fellows in any department of life without more or less exercising it. It can be and is used, whether consciously or not, in all kinds of intercourse among mankind. It is but little understood, yet enough is known to place it front among interesting subjects before us. It is used in trade, in politics, in social life, in the school, but, most of all, in religion; and it is only because of the long-continued, persistent effort that it is so much more noticeable there than elsewhere.

The religious world has for ages used this power blindly. Although they are just learning that certain conditions produce these manifestations of power, they still try to make their ignorant dupes believe it depends upon prayer and faith.

Admitting that this force may be used injuriously among the ignorant multitude, does not argue that it may not be used with great good when used intelligently. There is no reason why this mysterious power may not be used to further the Liberal cause, as well as to allow the Christians to monopolize it, since there is no patent upon it. It can be used with varying degrees of intensity. It can be exercised over one person, or over the multitude. It is only limited by the mental and physical capacity of the operator.

There is no space here to go into details as to method, but I cannot close without saying that passivity, an unresisting negativ condition of the audience or individual, is necessary. In church parlance, a state of faith.

To produce such a condition, a teacher or speaker should endeavor in the start to produce a gentle ripple of laughter, or in some other pleasing way secure a harmonious feeling in his audience; then, never for one moment, let their minds wander from the subject—never a break in the current of thought. But the speaker must learn the varying conditions of his audience, and to work upon them; the feelings should be frequently varied by the rapidly flowing thoughts of the speaker. The man or woman with plenty to say, and a good voice, will soon learn to appreciate my meaning when I say he can learn to play upon them, as the musician, by touching, brings harmony from his strings. Paine's Theism.

If Paine was an Atheist it could be no reflection upon his character in the estimation of any intelligent person in this enlightened age, and I do not write this to vindicate his memory; but it is the right of every soul to be correctly characterized; especially is it our duty to those who cannot speak for themselvs to use our best efforts to hold them in their true light. So when a man abuses a great opportunity chance has given him to tell to a listening world a downright falsehood respecting a great character—one to whom every citizen of this land is greatly beholden for such uncommon privileges as we boast we enjoy—it is the duty of all of us to cry "shame!"

A lawyer of no great repute, in the Guiteau case, lately abused his opportunity by sneeringly alluding to Thomas Paine as "Paine, the Atheist." Evidently he did not know of what he was talking. It is notorious that Paine was what we to-day call a Unitarian. Moreover, many to-day would deem him superstitious, for he declared more than once, in his published works, that he believed in God—a God who will reward and punish in another world. His statement about a future life is the strongest, perhaps, ever made. "It is not near so wonderful that I shall liv hereafter as that I liv now, never having lived before." He also said that it does not follow because the Deity has conferred life on all men here that all of them shall liv hereafter. Some may not be fit to liv in the future.

Such an exhibition of ignorance as that made by this evident pettifoger is too contemptible to notice but for the great publicity he gave to the slander of the dead—I say slander, for to thus publicly misrepresent so great and good a character is slander, whether legally or not. C. I.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing seven hundred square inches more reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVENBER 4, 1882.

A New Departure.

With a view of increasing the number of the patrons and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we hav resolved to lessen the price at the commencement of the tenth volume on January 1, 1883. This is not because we hav been making too much money, nor because by the publication of this fearless weekly we hav been enabled to lay up treasures where moth and rust do not corrupt and where thieves do not break through and steal; for, the fact is, we are publishing the largest Liberal journal in the world; and in view of the quantity of reading matter we weekly lay before our readers, we are publishing it at a lower price than any similar publication. We are giving seven hundred inches more of reading matter every week than is contained in any other Liberal journal with which we are acquainted.

No, we hav not made too much profit. We hav many and many a time been at a loss to see how we could weather the tide and be able to pay the heavy bills we hav to meet. Many a time it has been almost an inexplicable problem how we should be able to pay off the hands at the close of the week. More than once hav we had occasion to think that were it not for the little profits we are able to make on books, the income from the paper alone would not be sufficient to keep it up and pay off the bills.

Under such a state of facts it may seem ill-advised and like poor policy to lower the price of the paper below a paying basis. But we hav resolved to test the matter and see if the circulation will not thereby be considerably increased. We desire that the paper shall hav a wide reading at a price that will barely keep it alive, rather than to obtain a generous price for it with a limited number of readers. We shall hardly feel satisfied till we hav tested the matter, and test it we shall.

The price of THE TRUTH SEEKER after January 1st will be $2 50 per year, payable in advance, and we hope friends will not ask us to wait twelve months and more for our money. We hav not made fifty cents clear on each yearly subscriber we hav supplied, and it must be seen at a glance that unless our circulation is largely increased we must be out of pocket in our new departure.

We shall look confidently to our friends that this does not prove a fact. Our friends hav constantly sustained us in all our efforts since we begun our little sheet in Paris, Illinois, over nine years ago. The enemies of mental liberty and the advocates of intolerant ecclesiasticism hav many times attacked us with the fixed determination to ruin us and break up our publishing business, but our friends, scattered all over this broad land, hav as firmly stood by us through discouragements of all kinds; and when malicious men in our own ranks hav conspired with our ecclesiastical foes with the determination to accomplish our ruin, these good friends hav cheered and preserved us. We hav often realized and spoken the truth that if man ever had cause to feel grateful to friends, we are that man. Our friends hav been our comfort, our support, and our life. Without them we could hav done nothing.

We still intend to draw upon the public spirit and generosity of our friends. We look to them to aid us in obtaining new subscribers to our paper. With the lessening of price, with due effort on the part of friends in every state, county, and community, the circulation must be largely increased. Unless it is, we shall feel that we hav made a mistake in decreasing the price, and will unquestionably sustain loss.

It must be seen in a moment that if $3 a year has barely met expenses, the number of patrons must be largely increased for it to be self-sustaining at $2.50 per year. The greatest item of expense in the printing of a paper is the setting of the type, and it costs just the same to set the type for a single thousand as though twenty-five or fifty thousand are printed; so while $5 per copy per year for the one thousand would scarcely meet running expenses, $2 per year for the fifty thousand would leave a handsome profit. This easily illustrates our object in decreasing the price.

Whenever we hav patrons enough to justify the reduction of the price to $2 the reduction shall be made, and we look forward to the time when THE TRUTH SEEKER can be published at $2 per year. Our desire is to hav a large number of readers rather than to make money. So long as the paper is self-sustaining, and is able to meet its own bills, we will be content.

We call, then, upon every friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER to constitute himself an activ agent to obtain as many new subscribers as possible. Those who can send six new names, with the accompanying cash, will be hailed as warm friends of the paper, while those who can send but one new name will be cordially accepted as doing the best they could under the circumstances Some can do much more in this line than others. There are far more liberally disposed people in some communities than in others, but in nearly all communities there are people who ought to take a Liberal paper who spend not a dime a year in keeping up Liberal publications.

In view of the total apathy and indifference which Liberals evince in this direction, we sometimes almost hav to hang our heads in shame at the contemplation of such Liberalism. We mentally inquire, Will these dead souls never show any more life? Will false-hearted hypocrits always contribute their money freely to help sustain the power of priestcraft and the institution of the church, and not be willing to expend two or three dollars per year to help sustain some worthy Free-thought journal? Will men who ought to be independent as well as just, be always willing to stifle their convictions, withhold their aid from the struggling paper which speaks the truths they believe, and willingly see it struggle and starve for the very aid they are withholding, while they readily expend ten times as much money in some foolish enterprise, and even giv their money to keep up the institutions which they do not believe in at all.

We hav had occasion to think that there is not one person in ten who has lost faith in the dogmas of the church and the claims of the priesthood, who takes a Liberal paper that ought to. It is not to be supposed that all these indifferent persons can be enthused with a willingness to pay for a Liberal paper, but is to be hoped many of them may be. If only half of them can be brought to a realizing sense of their duty, a great good will be accomplished.

It is generally conceded that in no more effectual way can a given amount of money be employed in spreading the truths of Liberalism, and in combating the errors of supernaturalism, than in the publishing of a live, outspoken Liberal paper. In no way can a limited amount of money be made capable of doing the same amount of good. Liberal papers should be far more numerously circulated. At least a hundred thousand people should take a Liberal paper who now do not.

As to the quality of THE TRUTH SEEKER during the next volume, it will, perhaps, be enough to say that it will be, as in the past, the fearless, outspoken foe of ecclesiasticism, priestcraft, and supernaturalism. It will oppose the enslavement of the mind to the dogmas of superstition, the same as heretofore. We shall advocate and endeavor to illustrate the truths of nature. We shall continue to show the blighting effects that ecclesiasticism has had upon the world, and the errors that hav grown up under it. We shall still endeavor to show the superiority of nature over supernature, one being always true, the other always false. The pages of the paper will still be open and free to people of diverse opinions. Contributors are not required to think as we do to gain admission to our columns. Those who write sensibly, and hav something to say worthy of being read, will always be welcome.

Volume X. will be printed from new type, purchased for the purpose, and in the first number will be commenced an excellent story by William McDonnell, the author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," and "Family Creeds," entitled "Reminiscences of a Preacher." This story is remarkably well written, and will run for several months. It alone will be worth the price of a year's subscription.

We ask our friends to interest themselvs in obtaining new subscriptions. We would that every true Liberal should feel a lively interest in having THE TRUTH SEEKER in the family of every Liberal in the country, so far as possible. We shall use what ability we possess to make the paper worthy of general patronage, and we will be glad to hav it generally appreciated and patronized.

Besides lessening the price as above, we will make this additional concession: To such new parties as subscribe now, or before the expiration of the year, the sum of $2.50, we will send the paper for fourteen months, or until January 1, 1884. This offer should bring in many new subscribers. We hope those who hav hitherto been borrowing the paper, and paying nothing to the publisher, will conclude to act the more honorable part, and pay for what they read, and thus pursue a manly course.

We hope the names of new subscribers will flow in freely. To the three persons who send in the greatest number of new subscribers between this time and the first of March next, we will present, according to the number of subscribers sent in, a copy of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, a set of Dickens's complete works, in fifteen volumes, and a fine edition of Shakespeare's complete works, or other works of the same value as may be preferred. Here are most valuable works offered as premiums, and we trust they may be earnestly contested for. Publication from time to time will be made as to the number of subscribers sent in by different canvassers. Those who can use sample copies of the paper to good advantage will be supplied upon application.

LET THE TRUTH SEEKER LIST ROLL UP.

Right here it seems a fitting time and place to invite those in arrears to square up with us between now and the close of the year. We trust that all will feel disposed to enter upon a new year with clean books and with the old scores of arrearages wiped away. It is not pleasant to hav to dun our friends for trifling amounts, but it is very pleasant to receive the amounts due us, and not realize that thousands of dollars are due us while we are owing thousands of dollars to others.

Let THE TRUTH SEEKER and its patrons make a struggle to not longer be in debt.

Materialism versus Spiritualism.

Standing, as we do, on middle ground, and acting as a connecting link between the believers in the two extremes of thought, it often grieves us to notice the harsh things said by one side concerning those occupying an opposit position, and the want of charity and courtesy each side evinces toward the other. We hav reason to believe both sides contain many honest people, but we are sorry to see that so many persons lack tolerance toward opposing views, and are so ready to denounce others as dishonest frauds and tricksters.

We are differently organized, and it is almost impossible for all to arrive at the same conclusions, even though the same evidence is placed before us. Some are more hard-headed and unconvinceable than others, and it requires four times the amount of proof to make converts of them that it does of those more spiritual—more disposed to the mysterious and marvelous.

All Liberals, however, whether total unbelievers in everything of a spiritual nature, or whether they accept the possibility of invisible intelligences, should train themselvs to exercise a measure of charity toward those who arrive at totally different conclusions. It should be one of the labors of Liberalism to cause its adherents to be liberal and tolerant toward those whose views are diametrically opposed to their own.

We take pleasure in introducing here a reasonable and fair sort of letter from a Spiritualistic friend in Missouri. If all were as considerate as he is there would be slight grounds for bitter contention and rancorous feelings:

KIRKSVILLE, Mo., Oct. 24, 107.

MR. EDITOR: I notice of late a tirade of T. Winter in your paper, as also in The Age and Investigator, against Spiritualism, classing Spirituals as fools, impostors, etc., and throwing out slurs against and heaping epithets upon them. This may be considered a Liberal procedure by him, but I apprehend that these articles, for the reasons alluded to, will be distasteful to Liberal-minded people who may read them.

I wish no controversy or argument with Mr. Winter, for I consider one so rabid or bigoted and set in his ways as he beyond the reach of argument. He reminds me of one of Bible lore who wished "to know nothing save Jesus and him crucified," as his hobby or interest seems to run in but one direction," yet he claims to be well acquainted with nature's laws, when, in fact, the most learned even know comparativly but little of the laws or forces of nature, even when confined to this little globe. This will be readily admitted by those who are the most learned.

Mr. Winter says of those who hav expressed diverse opinions and who are as honest in them as he is in his own, "Fire off your wads, ye dealers in tricks," etc., thereby accusing these people of trickery and dishonesty, while they beyond a doubt consider him honest in his convictions, though rabid or singular in expressing them, and abusiv in assailing the views of others. I believe it best to let these or like articles from him pass unnoticed, or, in other words, let him uninterruptedly throw off his steam and free his boiler from accumulated dirt and scales, and fit it, if possible, for generating something better or more refined. This, of course, is nothing but a "wad" and a suggestion to those who may hear the roar of steam from the Winter generator to pay no attention, for no harm can result, as the pressure grows less and less as the heated mixture from within is belched forth.

Mr. Winter, in all candor, do you not know that diversity of opinion is a law of nature and a stepping-stone to investigation and progression? In view of this, there should be more moderation in the exchange of opinions on all sides.

Fraternally, WM. HART.

This letter is not calculated to exasperate any one's tender feelings, while it evinces a due degree of respect for the opinions of Mr. Winter.

Here is another short letter from the party complained of in the foregoing, and with whom the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are by no means unacquainted. His rough, fervid style has more than once given offense to those who cannot share in his convictions. Here is his last:

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

BROTHER BENNETT: A thousand thanks to you for publishing my manuscript. You are a brave man, and I admire you for your pluck. You know that Materialism is right and every phase of supernaturalism is spurious, not excepting Spiritualism; that is the last spasm of the decaying faith in the theological dogma of immortality. Mortality we know, but outside of that we know nothing, one man no more than another. All is speculation beyond the present existence. All the priests or mediums of the whole world can never show one honest proof that man survives the wreck of death or dwells eternally in some unknown world. It is simply a utopian dream of the imagination, and on this dream all the world's superstitions are founded. I do not desire to offend or insult any one, but no man dares to smother the honest truth as nature and sound sense displays it, therefore I must be bold in the exposure of anti-natural assumptions.

I utterly despise any system whose object is to make money out of the ignorance and credulity of the multitude. No advantage should be taken of man's stupidity. Teach the people he right and proper way to liv for this world; that is sense. All the other drivel about worlds on high is the most peuril nonsense. T. WINTER.

We will exercise the liberty of saying that, according to our views, Brother Winter is right in some respects and wrong in others. He will not take offense at our giving our views upon his opinions, for he would not be as good a Liberal as he is could he not allow us that freedom.

"Materialism is right, and every phase of supernaturalism is spurious." That is strictly true according to our belief. But from that it by no means follows that matter only exists in beds of granit, hills of gravel and clay, in the visible elements, and in the various palpable compounds into which they enter.

The question is, Has Mr. Winter full knowledge of the universe and the intricate powers that permeate it? We fear he has not. We fear no living man has. It is probable that but a small proportion of the intricacies of the vast universe is yet understood by a living man. Every year new discoveries are made, new forces brought to light, which, though they hav eternally existed, hav but just been learned. Thus the powers and uses of electricity hav been recently brought to light. It is but recently that men hav been able to harness it, causing it to haul heavy railway trains, to convert it into light, and with it illuminate hundreds of cities with an intensity of light almost rivaling the rays of the noonday sun. It is but recently that the aid of this mysterious force has been used in sending intelligence almost instantaneously from one side of a continent to the other, and for thousands of miles under the ocean. It is but recently the rapid undulations of the sun's surface and the magnetic forces connected with them hav been closely studied, and the immediate connection the same hav with earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and cyclones on our own planet. It is but recently that the extremely rapid vibrations of light, color, and sound are clearly understood and reduced to an accurate enumeration. It is but recently that it has been learned that sound, in the forms of the voice and instrumental music, can be transmitted instantaneously for a hundred miles, so as to be distinctly heard and recognized.

So within a few years a great number of new discoveries of previously unknown existing forces of nature hav been brought to light; and there is every reason to believe that but a fraction of the wonders of this universe hav as yet come to the knowledge of man. Whoever is alive fifty years from this time will undoubtedly be well informed of several deep and intricate truths now wholly unknown to the wisest of men living. And probably in a thousand years from this time, though men keep on making discoveries in geometrical ratio, not even a tenth part of the subtle forces of the universe will be thoroughly understood. The fact is, this universe is an immense institution and possesses powers and potencies far beyond the shrewdest capabilities of any man who draws the breath of life.

It would not hav done even a single fifty years ago for any Thomas Winter to take the position that all about nature was fully understood, and that they were only frauds and fools who held that such a thing was possible as sending intelligence all around the globe, over mountains and under oceans, in a few seconds of time. So ten years ago it would not hav done to uphold the possibility of the human voice or an intricate piece of music being conveyed a hundred miles over a wire, and in a few seconds of time. Neither does it do now for Mr. Winter, or any other man, to say the powers of nature are fully defined and understood, and that all the possibilities of the universe are reached, and all beyond what is now known belongs only to the domain of fraud and trickery.

Of course this argument is not designed to account for the frauds that hav been played upon the people of this country, and it must be admitted that frauds hav been perpetrated. Some claim that ninety per cent of the materializing and other phenomena are fraudulent, and, even if that is so, it does not by a long way prove the other ten per cent also to be fraudulent. It is not intended by the remarks here made that Spiritualism is a sure and settled proof. This is not our purpose, but what we do claim is that a certain class of phenomena do take place under certain circumstances which cannot truthfully be relegated to the domain of fraud; nor can it be true, though ten thousand persons cry out "fraud, fraud," so loudly as to even split their very lungs. It does not make an animal of the canine species really rabid for a thousand intolerant and prejudiced people to cry out "mad dog, mad dog." The popular cry is just as liable to be wrong as anything in the world. And it is always the easiest thing in the world even for people of the best intentions to be mistaken.

We are far from asserting that we know the claims of Spiritualism to be true. We do not pretend to say that we hav proofs that we liv again after death, but we hav honestly investigated this subject, and we think we are disposed to be fair and candid. We do not wish to be a dupe in any direction. We are not afraid to acknowledge the convictions to which we giv our assent. We believe we hav received proofs of invisible sources of intelligence, and having come to the conclusion that intelligence cannot exist without organization, when we find intelligence we conclude there must be organization to produce it.

Much, indeed, that pertains to this globe on which we dwell is, or is capable of being, invisible. Oxygen, so far as is known, forms three-fourths of the ores, the soils, the earths, the waters which surround the globe, and the atmosphere which reaches, so said, forty-five miles from the earth's surface. Oxygen, besides being vital air, the most essential element which imparts life, combines with nearly all metals, rocks, and earths, forming oxides; it is the base of nearly all the acids; it enters largely into the formation of the crust of the earth—still, in its nativ state, it is as invisible as a ghost is said to be. It cannot be seen by the sharpest eyes ever formed. But no one can deny that it nevertheless has as real an existence as a hill of gravel, a bank of clay, or a mass of granit. Thus it will not answer to deny the existence of the most important element in the universe, because in its nativ state, when uncombined with other substances, it is wholly invisible. Visibility is far from being the strongest proof of existence.

It is a mistake to rank Spiritualism with supernaturalism. They are not at all alike. If such a state as spirit life exists, it is a form of nature and helps to make up the grand system as much as any part of it. On the other hand, supernaturalism is in every way opposed to nature, and forms no part of it. Supernaturalism presupposes a creator of immense size and power, who always existed, and once upon a time took up a notion to make a few million worlds, suns, and systems from nothing and sat them whirling in space, which we believe is allowed to always hav existed. This being and all that pertains to him form no part of the system of nature, but are antagonistic to it. Here the difference can easily be seen between the claims of spirit life and miracles and supernaturalism. If the spirit phenomena do take place as claimed, they are just as much in keeping with nature's laws as for water to run down hill.

The most materialistic scientists, after having long been conversant with the three conditions of matter—the solid, the fluid, and the aeriform—are now asserting the fourth condition of matter, or the unconditioned, but which really has an existence as much as either of the other three, and is as much more attenuated and refined than the usual aeriform as the aeriform is more subtle and attenuated than the solid rock. If, then, spirit life is a reality, it may hav some relation to this fourth condition of matter, and thus really exist, though no more visible to the eye than the finest ether in the stellar spaces.

We repeat, this universe is so great and so grand that it is presumptuous to limit it, and say only this, that, and the other is it capable of performing. Whatever is more than these three is superatural, a miracle, a humbug—all trickery and fraud. Matter and force are the cosmos, are other terms for nature or the universe, and they are all one inseparable system. Every law and condition connected with the system is as simple and true, if well understood, as the most simple operation; but it will not do to circumscribe nature, and say, "Only thus far shalt thou go." It is wiser to yield that nature and the universe hav limitless possibilities, and we ought to hold ourselvs willing to embrace its truths, so far as they are brought to our comprehension.

We see that nature is capable of imparting many forms of life. There is the life of the rocks and ores; the life of unorganized matter; the life of air and water; the life of crystallization; all forms of vegetable life; all forms of animal life up to the most finely-developed human being. All these forms of life are from nature, for there is no other source whence they can emanate. There is an important phase of life called fœtal life, which was preparatory to the form of life we now hav, and without this form of life, existence would be for us now impossible. Who, then, shall be able to say that this is positivly the last and highest form of life nature is capable of, and that with this all her efforts terminate? Who is able to say that this is the last, and after this comes nihility? Who shall say with truth that this form of life is not as preparatory and essential to a higher form of existence, as the fœtal condition was preparatory to this? Who has any right to say that with this form of life all the powers of nature end and then it turns upon itself?

We prefer to regard nature as perfectly immense and capable of according to her children continued life in other and higher forms. There are those, of course, who will regard us as a fool for entertaining such chimerical notions, and such will bellow themselvs hoarse by shouting "there is no existence after this; this is all that nature is capable of doing." We are willing to ally ourselvs with those who repose all confidence in nature and believe her capable of performing very much that is yet unknown and not understood.

Belief or choice has nothing to do with settling this matter, and cannot make the slightest difference with the ultimate facts. If a continued life belongs to the great economy of nature it is just as much a fact as our present existence, and denying or affirming cannot make the slightest difference in the general truth. If, however, the matter could be referred to the choice of the human race, whether to continue to exist or cease to exist, a large majority would doubtless be in favor of continued existence. With all its evils and drawbacks, existence is found to be pleasant; and there are but a small percentage of the earth's inhabitants who would, by their own vote, utterly snuff themselvs out of existence.

The nature and existence of mind are closely connected with this subject, but we hav already been so prolix that very little more must be said. The question has been debated in these columns, Is mind material? We answer, Yes; the same as everything else, including all the processes of nature, is material. Whatever is not matter, or material, is nothing. Whatever exists at all is matter in some form.

We do not believe that mind, or intelligence, is an element in a simple form of existence, and that it has a vast sea or fountain where it is stored up, and from which great store every individual obtains what mind or intellect he is able to boast. On the other hand, we hold that mind, or intellect, is produced by a material organization, the same as sight, hearing, taste, and smell are produced by their especial organs. Without a circulatory and digestiv system, and without a brain, no such thing as mind, or thoughts, can be produced. Without a healthy, vigorous body, there cannot be a healthy, vigorous mind. It is the body, with all its parts, which gets up the mind, and this depends wholly upon that for its character and quality. Thus, in a word, the stomach and the digestiv apparatus, with the aid of the brain and nervous system, grind up the bread, meat, and potatoes we eat into mind, into thoughts; in fact, into essays, lectures, and poems, as the case may be, and hence is material.

We will venture once more to say that the universe is a great and glorious system, and those are not the most wise and most truthful who circumscribe its powers and drive down stakes for bounds, to show how far it may go.

In conclusion let us again plead that Materialists and Spiritualists who cannot arrive at the same conclusions treat each other courteously, and not call each other fools and frauds. All should be equally good Liberals and adorers of nature. All should oppose the errors of supernaturalism and theology.

It cannot be denied that Spiritualism has done its share in Liberalizing the world. Spiritualism has doubtless done as much in this direction as Materialism, and does not exhibit any more bigotry, dogmatism, and uncharitableness than the latter.

E. H. Heywood Again in Prison.

We hav received a letter from Mrs. Angela T. Heywood, dated Oct. 27th, in which she states that Anthony Comstock, accompanied by United States Deputy Marshal Enos, visited Princeton, and summarily took Mr. Heywood to Boston, where he was arraigned before United States Judge Hallett, who held him under $1,000 bail, in default of which he as taken to prison, his brother subsequently going his bail.

She did not state the particular charge upon which he was arrested, but probably it was for mailing quotations from Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," together with improper matter published in the Word.

As much as we are opposed to Comstock's modes and measures, and as much as we regret that Mr. Heywood is again in trouble, we hav fears that Mr. H. has been indiscreet. We are in favor of free mails, the same as free thought, a free press, and free speech, but we are not in favor of sending indecent matter by mail, or in any other way.

And a word here as to Walt Whitman's poems: As a rule they are grand, and doubtless contain the genius of true poetry. Whitman is an honest and earnest man, but it does not follow as a consequence that everything he has written is desirable to be spread over the land, whether by mail, express, or otherwise. There are one or two of Whitman's poems that, according to our views, would hav better been omitted from his book, and cannot be of special benefit to anybody.

These particular poems or parts of poems seem to be the very ones which Mr. Heywood took special pleasure in mailing. We feel in no humor to indulge in censure at this juncture, but we must confess that we hav wondered why Mr. Heywood should decide, under the circumstances, to mail such matter. He has seemed to us not a man with a coarse, animal nature, but naturally as free from such a tendency as one man in a thousand. We must say, however, that he chose to make himself conspicuous by mailing Walt Whitman's most objectionable poem, and by publishing some things which we most certainly would not publish. We could not see what good was to be gained by it, what principle of Liberalism is involved, or how the best interests of any class of the community can thereby be served. There is no reason why any one should unnecessarily thrust his hand into the lion's mouth.

Oriental Stupor, Occidental Vanity, and International Light.

Mr. Bennett's observations corroborate all tourists' accounts of the unprogressiv influence of oriental customs. Homage to mythic monarchs of their souls so largely absorbs life that personal comfort and purity hav small claims, and mental culture less. Greek, Turk, or Arab, 'tis all the same; Moslem or Christian, 'tis all the same; despots of their souls mold their natures to the purposes of despots over their bodies, each limiting the comprehension of liberty. Missionaries from America are of superstitious cast and selfish aim, carrying more slavish element, counterparting, not mending, the Moslem. The difference is but hair-breadth, pagan features equally strong in most church compacts.

A few Freethinkers firm as Bennett, staying there, would light beacons among ruins of ancient and modern ignorance that would desolate cross and minaret in a generation, if the powers permitted their teaching; but to inculcate truth there would be death. It comes very near that here. We blindly boast of enlightenment while dazed and groping. After reasoning on life a century, but few dare act from convictions; a vicious opinion is potent to command; only men hav learned to be physically comfortable.

What could be hoped where priests add ignorance to our superstition and hypocrisy, and men waddle in petticoats? They seem not to crave knowledge, and show as little gumption in caring for the surface as in culturing the inner being. And the foolish women imitate as foolish occidentals, putting dangling obstructions over the trousers which they are bright enough to retain. The men may think, like some I hav heard here, that the sexes should convert their similar outlines into opposits by clothes, so take the tub form, because women keep the natural. Hobbling in leg-cages would giv salutary lessons to our sticklers for women's trammels. They forget how fetters vexed their fathers three centuries ago.

Doubtless Allah directs his women to cover their faces. Paul, when he was speaker for Yahweh, wanted his to cover their whole heads, and learn only of husbands at home. But who in all these latter ages, or the mythic heavens, is it teaching orientals to uncover their bosoms? It can't be men of the present, they are so prudent; can't be Jupiter, Pan, or Pluto—the gods were exemplary, history knows. I partially see the meaning, but who means it? is the query. I think dress reformers might go there and teach both sexes to dress consistently under the burning skies, if sultan, shah, and Allah concurred. But heathens, under sunrise or under sunset, are similar; it might be as easy to giv women consistent appearance among relics of the favorit and worshiped Venus, as here among galleries embellished with Harper's Bazars. Yet here some minds grasp the importance of the subject which is being considered. The relation of proper clothing to all progress is known, and hopeful action is seen. Women will not much longer endure distortions that, in proportion to their discomfort, demoralize men, causing discord in the dual sphere of mutual helpers.

This branch of bondage, underlying and interlaying others, must fall with the rest. Through our weekly letters we hav reviewed the orient and deplored its state. Let us look over the occident, choosing its best, the United States of America, and see what difference is apparent in the religious department. Christian sects cover this land as Moslem masses do that. Many people, particularly the women, seem to liv and labor to keep the spread churches in stylish order,, and the poor contribute to the support, though lacking common comforts, the object being to worship one whose death, they are taught, will save them from the effects of their sins if they believe it will, and conform to fixed ceremonies—a more sin-licensing dogma than the Koran contains. The intent, if not the style, of the Testament is, as used, the same as the Koran—produces the same bigotry and superstition and more arrogance, while similarly checking mental growth. With much vanity, these decorate temples above the shining mosques and raise ornate steeples higher than minarets, while poverty pines in their shadows. Yet these do not profess to know this is idolatry just as that is, but, pretending otherwise, go there to enlighten about the saving merit of their faith, though they never get their Bible to suit them, and hav kept changing it ever since compiled. How much above ancient Jerusalem or modern Baalbec has Christianity risen? Is not its elevation all in its conceit? Its better appearance is from the better prosperity it follows. It now holds its adherents by popular culture and affiliation with ton and aristocracy. It takes its ease, worships one day in seven, and takes pilgrimages only to the bread-and-wine table, while Moslemism bows daily in the dust or the mosque, and travels annually to Mecca, proving faith by works. Evidently our enterprise and discovery are in the departure from Christian control. When the letters come from the land of Buddhism they may bring flashes of "the light of Asia" displaying less stupidity and deepening the shade Arnold's matchless poem throws the Koran and Bible into.

Light dawned on the occident a century ago, when the partial outgrowing of authority revolutionized despotism in these states, and sent rays across seas evolving growth. But leniency of civil law allowed church rule to encroach till secular light is dimmed, and guile, avarice, and ambition threaten darkness, if permitted sway. Modern unfolding sends forth two larger lights, the one temporal, the other temporal and spiritual. The former givs all thought and strength to improving worldly conditions and elevating humanity to earthly happiness, knowing the decarnating change givs all of the other life, if there be one; the latter aims at accomplishing the same, and believes the knowledge of a deathless spirit in each human being that is cultured by the same, retaining its knowledge and identity in a more refined sphere succeeding this carnal state, still more promotes earthly joys. It sees this laying off the flesh is not death, but natural passing to the next sphere, where there is no monarch, compulsion, or homage; where responsibility is basis of motiv, as it should be here. It sees signs of that life, and thinks such signs led olden ignorance to suppose heroes here became gods there, and that servil natures, seeking authority, peopled imaginations with other despots, till their Jupiters grew to creators, demanding worship. Now, research finds responsible liberty the higher law, and living, loving, and reciprocal goodness above the ever-changing forms of crude matter.

Both these lights, ignoring control and cruelty, can work in harmony for universal beneficence and emancipation, for international intercourse and assistance. If sectarian craft can dwindle out of the way, as implied in spreading science, they may worthily unite in humane administrations and kindly missions, wherever need solicits or want is receptiv, and beam forth fraternally, till the light of liberty illumies the antipodes and poles.

Vice-Suppressing Societies.

O wad some power the giftie gie ye,
To see yoursels as others see ye!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Boston Commonwealth, Sept. 2d, says of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" that "it is absurd to rank the work as an obscene or reprehensible one," and that its fleshly pieces "are but beatific adorations of the great gift of maternity." But those fleshly pieces aroused such impure thoughts in the minds of certain Boston officials that they proposed to suppress the poems from circulation. Why do Whitman's poems produce such diverse fruits to different readers? The bee and the wasp suck flowers, and from them the bee elaborates honey, and the wasp poison. A rose-bush and a skunk-cabbage draw out nutriment from the same soil. In the former it becomes a sweet perfume; in the latter a noisome stench. Anthony Comstock and other vice suppressors read Walt Whitman and complain of obscenity. But poets, artists, and Liberal editors praise him. Why these perverse conclusions? Is the impurity complained of in the book or in its reader? Is that picture indecent?" asked Boswell, pointing to a classic engraving of a naked woman. "No, sir," replied Dr. Johnson; "but your question is." A Presbyterian lady censured as nasty one of Miss Lewis's statues because it was naked. "Madam, your mind is nastier than my statue," was Miss Lewis's answer. J. G. Whittier says: "It is the mind that really sees, shapes, and colors all things." Prof. A. Wilder says: "The impure ear pollutes the purest speech." The Apostle Paul, accepted as authority by Comstock and his coadjutors, thus explains, "Unto the pure all things are pure, but unto them that are defiled and perfidious* is nothing pure, but even their minds and conscience are defiled" (Titus i, 15). The logical deduction from these premises is that the obscenity complained of by vice-suppressing societies and Boston's prosecuting attorneys, is in their own minds and not in Walt Whitman's poems, and in threatening prosecution they thereby published their own shame. Comstock and many of his associate vice suppressors profess to hav been regenerated, and are members of evangelical churches. Swedenborg says (Arcana Celestia 989) that one cannot be regenerated unless he be affected with love toward his neighbor and merciful to him. As in the blood-stained records of the Inquisition, molder the names, superstitions, and atrocities of its founders and supporters, so will the published reports of existing vice-suppressing societies transmit to future execration the bigotry, barbarity, and obscene-mindedness of their projectors and managers. As for perfidious, lying, deceitful, unmerciful, ferocious, and filthy-minded Anthony Comstock, the accuser of his brethren, he who under the aspect of a sheep nourishes the fangs of a wolf, yet remains in good standing in an orthodox Christian church, which, from its cordial support of him, his lies, and his cruelties, is a conspicuous illustration of a modern evangelical church method of personating purity and piety—his name will become a by-word and a scorn. Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place.

And in the time that's coming,
The not distant by and by,
The children sure shall curse him
As soon as they can cry. G.

* The word rendered "unbelieving" in the common version of the New Testament, more exactly translated, is perfidious.

Human Monstrosities.

What enormous monstrosities there hav been on this earth in human form, and living among decent men an women! Monsters born of the human race! Monsters pretending to be the embassadors of the "Prince of Peace," and who spent their lives pretending to preach a doctrin of "peace and good will to men!" and received and adored by honest but ignorant people! Think of John Calvin, the father of that abhorrent and abominable creed that could, and does even to this day, declare that a wise, merciful, and just God created a certain portion of the human race with immortal souls, for the express purpose of torturing those souls through an endless eternity, to show forth to the gaping multitudes of heaven his power and glory!

At a time when priestcraft awed kings and emperors into silence, and had all laws enacted to further their vile purposes, the monster Calvin had a dispute with Dr. Michael Servetus, in which he was worsted. This so enraged him that he had Servetus arrested, tried, and condemned to be burnt at the stake as a heretic, to appease his anger! And after the good man was burnt, the monster wrote a pamphlet in which he justified the act, and called on all good Christians to use their utmost endeavors to exterminate all the accursed heretics as he had Dr. Servetus. Is it any wonder that such a man taught that the human race were born totally depraved? A man finding such depravity in himself might very naturally conclude that all others were as bad as himself.

And then there was that old Calvinistic parson, Oliver Edwards, who said, "One of the chief joys of the redeemed, in glory, would consist in looking down from heaven and witnessing the miseries of the damned, for there they would behold the justice of God!" Justice of God!—a God of love and mercy as well as justice! This would be justice with a vengeance. Justice, if it can ever make punishment a legitimate thing, can never punish the greatest criminal one moment after he says, "I will obey;" for punishment, if it is ever right and proper, can hav no other aim than to reform and save—never tortures to revenge. But old Calvin's victims are not punished for sinning, but because God created them for the very purpose of damning them, to show forth his justice, power, and glory! Away with such a doctrin, and kick the priest into kingdom-come, if you can't convert him, when you find him preaching such stuff to your children!

If I should go to heaven, with angel hosts to dwell,
And see my dear good mother or father writhe in hell;
If I could not relieve them, however I might strive,
I'd curse the god or devil that kept our souls alive.

JER'H HACKER.

Berlin, N. J., Oct. 21, 1882.

Paine Hall.

The following sensible article on Paine Hall is from the Investigator of Oct. 25th, and, as it meets our approval, we readily giv it place in our columns. We feel sure that those who take the stock of the hall will make a good investment, and that it will pay a good profit, and at any time in the future be worth what it cost. We will be truly glad to hav all the stock taken, so that the grand old pile may be entirely clear of debt. There are certainly Liberals enough in the country able to take the stock without inconvenience to themselvs:

We wish to say a few words to the readers of the Investigator and the friends of Freethought concerning this glorious structure, dedicated to Paine and "Common Sense;" and for the benefit of those who hav lately joined our ranks it may be well at the commencement of this article to briefly summarize its history, by stating that it was erected under almost insuperable difficulties at a cost of $100,000 in 1874. At that period material and labor were at their highest, and, as a consequence, there remained on the building at its completion a debt of $62,000, which, on account of the natural shrinkage in values at that time, rendered its final possession exceedingly doubtful, and caused the stoutest hearts to despair of ever saving it for the purposes for which it was dedicated. As most of you are aware, its vicissitudes are many, and to those of ordinary mold its future looked discouraging indeed, nought but humiliation and final defeat appearing as the ultimatum of the Paine Hall enterprise.

But, fortunately for our cause, there remained a few men made of sterner stuff, who, having successfully breasted the waves of orthodox intolerance for nearly half a century, refused to bow to these obstacles, and, consulting together, as they had under more trying circumstances done, said firmly, "Paine Hall shall be saved!" and hence it stands to-day the only monument in the civilized world dedicated to Thomas Paine and the glorious principles he so ably advocated. How great and how incalculable the advantage that has accrued to Liberalism from the erection and maintenance of this building! Think of it, friends! Here it stands in old Puritantical Boston—a splendid, handsome structure, proclaiming from its lips of marble the glorious sentiments of Paine, instilling into the minds of the rising generation the fundamental principles of Freethought, and remaining forever a menace to the bigotry and superstition of the times. Is it nothing to hav done this? Is it of no consequence to mankind that in these United States, bristling with spires and steeples in honor of an unknown God, there is maintained one building from whose free rostrum sentiments are voiced that can obtain a hearing nowhere else, and which stands a beacon to the intellectually oppressed of the land? Is it nothing to us, to our cause, that this is done?

If it be conceded that these are steps in the march of progress, let us claim your attention just for a few moments longer. This work, such as it is, has been done in the face of great obstacles, which are now happily almost obliterated, but there still remains much for the Paine Memorial Corporation to do, which it will take in hand in due course of time as it finds itself in position so to do. The only impediment in the path of the grander development of this institution lies in the debt that still remains to weaken its power by consuming its earnings. For it is felt to be a duty to those who hav stood in the breach during the darkest hour of the battle, that every dollar received beyond the running expenses of the building be applied toward the extinguishment of this debt before embarking in still greater enterprises. This is the only obstacle, and this is one which the natural income of the building will of itself remove, as surely as the day will dawn to-morrow, for it is now accomplishing this result at the rate of about $2,500 per year. So you see the final extinguishment of this debt is only a question of time at worst; but time is precious, and at this rate fourteen years of comparativ inaction must pass ere we can hope to appear in the arena full girded for the fight, and it is from a sense of what every Liberal owes his cause that you who read this statement are asked to come, not to the rescue (for that is already done by the little army of pioneers gone before), but to the aid of Paine Hall, and help to place it in a position where it can do more activ service in the work that is dear to us all.

How, then, to accomplish this end? is the great question you will ask. It is easily answered. Let fourteen hundred Liberals step forward and take one share of stock each at $25, and the deed is done, Paine Hall out of debt, and our cause receives such an impetus as never yet has graced it, and a field of action is opened that can only be successfully worked by organized capital. Now, who will be the first to enroll himself in the gallant 1,400? "Let him step forth." And let it remain a burning shame to Liberals if, from the numerous army of Freethinkers in the country, there are not 1,400 who shall insist that on the 29th of January, 1883, the 146th anniversary of Paine's birthday, they shall own at least one temple in the United States dedicated to the development of common-sense ideas.

BY E. N. KINGSLEY.

PART FIRST.

Our answer to the learned Cyrus Smith,
It proves that his religion is a myth.

PART SECOND.

By evolution let us, if we can,
Learn the true origin of worlds and man.

PART THIRD.

If orthodox religion you despise,
What will you giv us in the place of lies?

PART II.—CANTO IV.

Is it the gods' eternal, loving plan
To damn their offspring just because they can?
Could not the gods as easy and as well
Save all mankind from misery and hell?
Is there one man on earth who can explain
Why gods should let men suffer endless pain?
Men cannot look gods squarely in the face
And charge them with such infinit disgrace.

Are all gods' plans in all the worlds the same?
Is Yahweh there as much as here to blame?
Does Jesus die for every world in space
And bring his Father's infinit disgrace?
If all the worlds like this are truly damned,
Will not God's hell be infinitly crammed?
Is not damnation infinit disgrace
To gods in all the worlds in boundless space?

Who will subscribe to that infernal lie,
Gods will not do as they would he done by?
Who will that other human lie sustain
That finite souls must suffer endless pain?
Is there one fool who absolutely can
Believe the gods will always torture man?
It must be ape, ourang, or Bible fool
Who can believe this devilish Bible rule.

Mankind begins to see the Bible frauds
That snakes and devils are outwitting gods.
We rather die by torture, fire, and stake,
And go to hell in God's sweet brimstone lake,
Than send dear souls to hell for unbelief,
And bring the best of souls to endless grief?
Must parents and their children go to hell,
Where raging, raving demons always dwell?
If this is truth, and God's eternal word,
Mankind must see 'tis damnably absurd.

Christ went to hell, but soon he came away—
So hot the climate that Christ could not stay.
Christ's journey to the regions of despair
Would hav been perfect had he settled there
And modified the climate of that place,
Filled hell with glory, happiness, and grace,
Stopped hellish torture and eternal pain,
Made mercy, truth, and justice always reign.

BIBLE PICTURE OF GOD.

God's picture, nostrils, eyes, mouth, hands and feet,
Does represent the monster most complete.
If large as life, and put in golden frame,
Will giv the artist everlasting fame;
But in the foreground, with a barbed tail,
Put cloven Nick, who always did prevail,
The picture will be worth its weight in gold,
And fifty thousand will be quickly sold.
Some pious Yankee will his fortune make
By this grand picture, there is no mistake.

CANTO V.

All unbelievers should expose the frauds
Of persecutors cruel as their gods.
Think of kind friends who burn but never die,
And brand the Christian with the Bible lie.
Tyrannic gods are an infernal shame—
Their persecuting Christians are the same;
Like gods, like worshipers, is perfect truth—
Both fond of blood—both thirst for gold forsooth;

Both hav a bloody record from the first;
By both mankind hav always been accursed.
Christians hav murdered millions in their spite;
Jesus commands it and it must be right.
"Slay those mine enemies," Christ did proclaim.
Christ's teaching brought him to the cross and shame,
Begins, continues, and it ends in blood.
Be damned or cleansed by Jesus's precious flood.

Christ's teaching was all terture—endless pain
For moral men, but thieves with Jesus reign.
Repentance saves all murderers from sins,
The greatest criminals thus always win.
Truth, justice, honor, nobleness, renown,
To bottomless abyss are tumbled down.
Rogues, ruffians, fools, and tramps with Jesus reign,
But moral men must suffer endless pain;
This gospel, preached for eighteen hundred years,
Its paths bestrewed with murders, blood, and tears;
By this infernal, infamous device,
A premium was always given vice.
Believe in Christ, in heaven you shall dwell,
Dare disbelieve, and be consigned to hell;
Here, in a nutshell, is God's perfect plan
To damn forever this frail creature man.

'Tis wonderful learned Christians cannot see
Gods made things as gods wanted them to be.
We often think if we were gods we would
Make all mankind pure, virtuous, and good,
And, like the Christian's fancy place above,
Fill earth with plenty, happiness, and love.
Gods hav not done so. Are not gods to blame—
Gods, bibles, Christians, put to endless shame?

Christ's miracles, the fig-tree and the wine,
Appear to be not even half divine.
Christ gave the money-changers fits and gripes;
Christ flogged them well—gave them holy stripes.
Christ conquered devils. Did Christ raise the dead?
If this is truth, Christ had a level head;
If this is truth, Christ could hav raised a stone
To life and reason, spirit, flesh, and bone.
When gods and creeds and superstitions fail,
Truth, science, reason, progress, will prevail.

CANTO VI.

If we believe God's inspiration true,
Gods can't save all as they desire to do.
To save all souls if gods will try again,
All intellects will shout: Amen! Amen!
Of all the wrongs mankind has ever heard,
God's murder plan, and hell, are most absurd!
O cruel gods! and Bible most obscene
Of all the pagan bibles that hav been!

Excluded from the mails God's book will be,
When "Cupid Yokes" of science will go free!
We hav no faith, false doctrins will prevail,
With the assistance of the press and mail—
With the assistance of church taxes paid,
And Christians' wealth, by confiscations made;
With all the help of bigotry and frauds,
And the assistance of their man-made gods.

If gods hav millions of good gifts to spare,
Friend Smith, how is it gods don't answer prayer?
Gods certainly will answer if they can,
Or be denounced by future, coming man.
Dear Smith, your prayers do absolutely seem
Like Mary's vision and her husband's dream.
Ten thousand faithful prayers were duly tried
Before our dear, lamented Garfield died.

Saint Guiteau's god—his confidential friend—
Refused his holy agent to defend!
God's promises, he trusted in from youth,
Sad Guiteau proved had not one grain of truth.
Our late rebellion, in our deepest grief,
The gods of battles gave us no relief!
One soldier, with his musket, gave more aid
Than all the prayers for which this nation paid.

The Monitor did more to save our land
Than all the prayers our nation could command.
Fated Chicago, when destroyed by fire,
Gods left their faithful Christians to expire.
Gods never lift a finger, as we know,
In famins, floods, nor hell's eternal woe!
Now, we must all depend upon ourselvs—
Put Bible-gods and prayer-books on the shelvs.

'Tis absolutely useless, foolish, vain,
To pray for aid man never did obtain.
Science and reason hasten on the day
When Truth will hav a universal sway;
Wars, cruel gods, and Christians be no more,
And man progress as never known before;
When Smith's religion and God's plans all fail,
Truth, common sense, and reason will prevail.

CANTO VII.

The gods and Bibles—whether false or true—
Grand evolution we will calmly view.
We make an effort—do the best we can—
To find the origin of worlds and man.
Without beginning, and it never ends,
Eternal matter to perfection tends.
All that has been, or ever is to be,
Existed in some form eternally.

By changing forms forever, nature will
The laws of the grand universe fulfil.
The perfect laws of matter let us choose—
Above the myths of pagans, Christians, Jews.
Suppose the universe was once all fire!
A universal, raging funeral pyre!
A self formed sun revolving planets hurls,
Producing trillions of dependent worlds.

All hav their growth, their acme, and they may,
Perhaps, in time (like man), all pass away.
If worlds and systems all dissolve by heat,
The mighty suns their motions will repeat;
By Nature's forces rolling fragments hurled,
Again produce their systematic world,
Till crudest matter is like gold refined—
Adapted to the highest spirit mind.

Worlds may be forming now, without design,
Beyond the ken of gods and men divine.
Nature produces every distant sun;
In perfect harmony they always run,
Without the gods or any outside force
To keep them in their orbits and their course.
In viewing the great panorama round,
A grand, almighty, center world is found!

Infinit, oldest, largest globe in space—
Perfect, effulgent, beatific place!
The spirit of the universe astound,
With the grand universe revolving round.
Infinit force! If this should lose its power,
The wreck of worlds would follow in an hour;
And all the gods men ever did create
Would perish in a universal fate.

Soul of the universe is this, no doubt,
But who can find the mighty secret out?
Spirits survive destruction—we suppose—
And smile at Nature's dreadful, wildest throes;
Matter and mind refine without one pause,
By universal and eternal laws.
This grand and everlasting truth we scan:
Laws of the universe perfect the man;
Laws of the universe forever sure,
And man's progression always will endure.

CANTO VIII.

Eternal matter to protection tends,
Eternal progress never, never ends.
Infinit force and change that never pause
Form all phenomena and life from cause.
Thus evolution brings forth worlds and man—
Without the gods' infernal cruel plan.
Laws of the universe did form our sun
Before this world was thought of or begun.

A germ from Sol—a law of nature hurled!
In the beginning formed this mundane world.
Suspended worlds in perfect order fly
By gravitation in empyrean sky.
Worlds gravitate into their proper place,
And order reigns in never-ending space.

Nature without intention or design
Formed all that is, both evil and divine.
Grand, thoughtless nature, without mind or plan,
Produces all things—seraphim and man.
We do believe the laws of nature will
Man's highest aspirations all fulfil.
All evil in the universe destroyed,
Then vast eternity will be enjoyed.
Smith, also, will the universe explore
With the vast billions who hav gone before.

Welland, Canada.

The largest list of names I hav received from any one post-office for the directory came from Welland, Canada, sent by John Ray, fifteen in all. A number of other places hav sent twelve, thirteen, and fourteen names. And now Mr. Ray informs me that the fifteen who hold certificates as members of the Freethinkers' Association propose to meet and compare notes, and the prospects are that it will result in a local Freethinkers' association. I hope this movement will produce equally as good results in other places. H. L. GREEN.

W. S. Bell.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a few weeks I shall start on a lecture tour extending as far west, probably, as Colorado. I would like to giv lectures at different points as I go out and return convenient to the lines of railroad I shall travel. And before I choose which roads I shall go over, I would like to hear from Liberals of different places, that I may be the better able to select a route that will accommodate the most. W. S. BELL, 18 E. Springfield st., Boston, Mass.

BROTHER BELL is a good lecturer, a sound Liberal, and a very worthy man. The Liberals of the country will only be performing their duty to keep him constantly employed. Let our readers see to it that he receives many applications to deliver a series of his able lectures.

AN old oriental story relates that one day Moolla Mooseerodeen, in a mosque, ascended the desk, and thus addressed his audience: "O children of the faithful, do you know what I am going to say?" They answered, "No." "Well, then," replied he, "it's no use wasting my time on such a stupid set;" and, saying this, he came down and dismissed them. Next day he again mounted the desk, and asked, "O true Mussulmans, do ye know what I am going to say?" "We do," say they. "Then," replied he, "there is no need for me to tell you;" and again he let them go. The third time his audience thought they should catch him; and on his putting the usual question, they answered, "Some of us do, and some of us do not." "Well, then," replied he, "let those who know tell those who do not."

A COLORED congregation in Austin recently discharged their pastor because he made too frequent and uncomplimentary allusion to "de powers ob darkness." This kind of talk did not match the color of the congregation.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Oct. 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me a dozen or so copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 21st inst., and oblige. Many thanks to you for showing the world what a fraud it has been subjected to these long years.

Yours truly, B. M. SMITH.

DANSVILLE, MICH., Oct. 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find draft on New York for $2.25 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER until the 1st of July next. If at that time I am still a resident in the flesh, will try and subscribe again, for of all the papers I ever read, giv me the stanch, liberty-loving TRUTH SEEKER. It deals with facts instead of faith, and so mote it be! Yours for this life, and as much longer as we can retain a conscious existence,

E. J. SMITH.

PRESCOTT, ARK., Oct. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am rather late coming in with my share of congratulations. The orthodox in my community all say it is an Infidel lie, the idea of your going around the world. Why, that's preposterous in the extreme degree. When I told them that you had like to hav drowned in that sacred stream they said it was a great pity that you did not. Now they say I am not fit to liv in society. I tell them I think my reputation will compare very favorably with their best orthodox minister's; and now to show them that it will I inclose twenty-five cents for Mr. Billings's "Crimes of Preachers," latest edition.

With my best wishes for your continued prosperity, I remain, Yours, D. G. MELEAR.

MASON, MICH., Oct. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Bible tells me that John the Baptist is the greatest born of woman; there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist, notwithstanding he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he—Matt. xi., 11. Let us see now who is the least in the kingdom of heaven. Matt. v., 19, tells me that whosoever therefore shall break one of the least commandments shall teach men so he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven.

If these passages are divinely inspired, the creator must hav had a poor opinion of John the Baptist; but my opinion is that he thought as much of him as he did of Moses, when he said "If your wife differs from you in religious views, though you love her as you do your own soul, take her out and stone her to death, or hav it done."

I feel thankful that superstition is done with to a great extent, and that a man to-day can say the earth revolves without being imprisoned. The more we are enlightened the more we will love our wives and our children. I love a man who does his own thinking.

TORONTO, Oct. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I owe it to you to say that it is not because I am dissatisfied with the paper or its editor that I discontinue my subscription. I think as much of THE TRUTH SEEKER to-day and its noble editor as ever, and I hav been your subscriber since the wicked and damnable attack made upon you which resulted in your incarnation, at which time I circulated and sent to your office a petition in your behalf.

I hav followed you with interest through your most trying ordeals since the above date, especially Bundy's, Underwood's, and the devil's attack upon you. No words are fit to describe that villainous scheme. That thing was certainly begotten in hearts of corruption and treachery. Nothing seems to me more certain than that persons capable of such infernal purposes will expose their baseness in many transactions, and thereby become known to the world in their true characters. I hope, for the sake of truth, that it will not be long before this posing before the world as saints, when corruption possesses them from center to circumference, will go for what it is worth, not for what it seems.

With many good wishes I must part company with y ofor the present.

Very truly yours, E. B. WILLIAMS.

UTAH LAKE, UTAH, Oct. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read your paper for about two years and became a subscriber soon after you started on your trip round the world. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, and I feel interested in its welfare. I see by the tab on my paper that my time is up, so I inclose $1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months and 50 cents for your life-size lithograph, as I wish to hav you where I can look at you when I want to; and another reason why I want your likeness (and also Thomas Paine's, Ingersoll's, and others, as soon as I can spare the means) is, a great many of my neighbors are good saints, and of course are very religious; and nearly all of them, I find, hav one class of likenesses hanging on their walls in their houses; that is, Brigham Young and the twelve apostles of their church. As these people visit me frequently, I think it well to hav a change in my house, so that when they call on me they can see my apostles also. I should hav sent this money before, but I hav two parties here that promised to take THE TRUTH SEEKER on trial for three months, and I hav been delayed in seeing them. I hope to see them soon, and will forward their subscriptions.

Yours for the truth, HENRY S. BROOKS.

CANYON CITY, COL., Oct., E. S., 82.

MISS ELLA E. GIBSON, all hail! In THE TRUTH SEEKER I read your observations on appropriating a masculin pronoun to God. I do not charge the fault, if fault it is, to persons so using it, but to a deficiency in the language. We hav for first person plural, without gender, we, our, us; singular, I, my, me; second person, singular, thou, thy, thee; plural, ye, your, ye. None of the above indicates gender. Then we hav third person, singular, he, his, him; feminin, she, her, her; plural, they, their, them; these last hav no gender. Now we want a third person, singular, without gender. so I propose e. Nominativ ee, possessiv eez, objectiv eem. It frequently happens that we speak of a person but do not wish to indicate whom it is, even by expressing gender. These will apply to gods, angels, women, and men. We then shall be able to say of God,

"E plants ez (eez) footsteps in the sea,"
And leaves the land behind em (eem).

Now what do you say to joining me to introduce these into our grammars? There is nothing like starting a good thing and then going ahead. Let it stand for inanimate things. What do you say?

A. B. PIKARD.

ST. CATHERINES, ONT., Oct. 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken your valuable and interesting paper now going on two years, and must say with all your other subscribers that it is one of the great pleasures of the week to read its contents. I regret having let my subscription run behind, and hereby inclose one dollar to pay up to the end of this year, when I hope to be in a position to subscribe again.

I think it is a good move on your part lowering the price of suscription, and hope sufficient new names will be enrolled on the list to fully make up the difference in price caused by the reduction.

Even in Canada the cause of Liberalism is spreading, and every day recruits are being enlisted in the service, while the same amount of prejudice expressed against the Freethinkers, or Infidels as they are termed by the religious body, is not so severe as in former days. Still a great many reforms are needed, such as the admission of an Agnostic's evidence in court, the taxation of church property, etc. The former reform, I believe, is at present not only being discussed but being pushed by the secular societies of the Dominion, and it is to be hoped that the efforts will prove successful.

Yours fraternally, R. C. FITZGERALD.

ESCANABA, MICH., Oct. 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received the last number of your paper, and noticed in it "Elmina's" notice about "Leaves of Grass." I do wish Liberals would hav sense enough to let up on this book, or anything that even borders on obscenity, and not keep continually harping about them. I hav not seen the latest edition of this work, but I hav seen, and hav in my possession, an edition of "Leaves of Grass," by Walt Whitman, of 1860-61, which I do know is obscene, and I understand that this edition was suppressed, and I am glad of it. Any man that will publish such a book as this is not a pure-minded person, and I do not wish to read any revised edition of such a book. Any person that keeps constantly talking about prostitutes must certainly be thinking about them, and must know more or less about them; and his writings are not what Liberals should go crazy over. There are enough good books published so that people can find plenty of good reading matter without taking up Walt Whitman; and if they must hav something obscene, let them read the Bible, and especially the Songs of Solomon, which are a good deal like some of Whitman's writings. I am a Liberal in every sense of the word, but I cannot indorse Walt Whitman.

ALTURAS, CAL., Oct. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is with much pleasure that I now for the first time address you a few lines, and since you occupy the highly-honored position as one of the prime movers in the great field of Freethought, allow an humble co-worker to express the opinion that future generations will do you the honor of celebrating you birthday, as do we that of Thomas Paine, who fearlessly gave expression to his honest sentiments. Though ignorant superstition still has power in the land, her sun must soon set to rise no more. The shackles of theological oppresssion are fast falling off, hence we must soon be free. Truth is conquering, and must conquer until all enemies shall be put under her feet. Her strongest enemy is ignorant superstition. We need a host of able lecturers in the field, more Ingersolls, more Chaineys, and others. Through the press much has been and can be done. Cheap Liberal tracts are wanted by the million. They can be made to reach the masses at a small expense, and in isolated regions where lectures are seldom heard they will hav a good influence. I find in my travels as book agent about three-fourths of the people are Liberal-minded. Many take THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Man, Liberty, etc., which are often handed me in numbers for circulation. Should you hav back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER send over some; I think I can get you a few subscribers to it. I hav secured a few orders for Liberal books, which find inclosed. Hav been buying in San Francisco, but conclude I can get more for the money from you. Being poor, wish them low. Please find inclosed a two-dollar post-office order to cover book order named.

Fraternally, W. C. GRAHAM.

OREGON, MO., Oct. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Respecting the proposition of certain gentlemen in Canada to meet Slade, the medium, at some point in the United States, allow me a word.

If it be with a view to settle Slade's claims, or generally to settle the question as to the genuinness of spiritual phenomena, of what use can it be? It might satisfy the few who might be present; that would be all. For just go back into the history of this thing, and recall the numbers of times similar propositions to test the matter hav been tried. For instance, was there ever anything done with more pains and care than that inquisition by the London Dialectical Society? Thirty-six committee men were selected—men of the highest capacity—men of great repute—men generally incredulous as to the matter. How long, patiently and carefully, did they investigate? Again, consider the careful, watchful inquiry of Zollner and his three friends, great scientists all, into the claims of this very man Slade.

Beginning with the inquiries instituted by him who was called the American Faraday, Prof. Hare, an Atheist, an unbeliever of most pronounced type, utterly scornful and incredulous, and considering the thousands and thousands of cases from that day to this, investigations running through more than thirty years by all manner of men and women, and summing up the testimony recorded in hundreds or works, the testimony is so much that nothing can be added to it effectivly.

If these gentlemen should meet and become convinced, and proclaim their conviction to the world, it could not add a feather's weight. Next year similar propositions would be made by those who disregard everything except what they themselvs see or hear.

Yours truly, C. IRVINE.

SPRAGUE, W. T., Oct. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I would crave leave to say a few words to my would-be Christians of days of yore—childhood days when our venerable parson, with wrinkled brow and bowed under the weight of years, stood in the pulpit on those memorable Sabbath-days, and proclaimed, his cheeks wet with tears, that there were infants in hell not a span long. I never can forget while I liv the anguish, care, and sorrow that seemed to fill my heart after hearing the awe-inspiring statement. I, poor soul, brought into the world without my consent, elected to be damned through a never-ending eternity—or to be saved! My mind for a time was so imbued with superstition, generated by the blood-curdling statements from that saintly parson, and solidly imbedded in my youthful brain by hearthstone teachings, that I felt a pervading sense of terror in almost every undertaking. But, thanks to the power of thought, clothed in robes of light, my pathway was illuminated by reason, and I finally overcame those terrifying influences, and now breathe the air of enlightenment. It is joy indeed to feel, to know, that the chains of paganism no longer bind you!

I would ask your readers to cast their eyes and thoughts upon Matthew and his writings. No priest can prove he wrote the book called after him. Christ says repeatedly the kingdom is not his to giv, and yet he givs it to Peter, with the keys of heaven. He also says, "And on this rock will I will build my church," and here hangs the salvation of the whole world. Peter should hav been brave, of great stability, good judgment, calm, and one to be trusted; instead, however, behold him a poor, weak, pussillanimous, cowardly, lying sneak, who would not be worthy of a corporal's guard in these days. "And of such is the kingdom of heaven." Just read, and set Reason on her throne, and priestcraft appears in its true light—a perfect fraud and humbug!

B. F. WARDWELL.

OSWEGO CENTER, N. Y., Oct. 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Methodist, and as you pretend to be fair and publish "both sides," will you please insert this (when you hav time and space—if you dare), and perhaps our "cultured" feelings may go out in sympathy for you a little; though you hav done us no little harm with your vile, coarse, uncultured, Infidel sheet, and you will hav it cast into your teeth, when you arrive in the long, low vaults of a seething hell, that you and your infernal coadjutors hav well-nigh annihilated our glorious church organization in this place; and nine-tenths of our members, who were once cultured and happy, nav landed on the "barren rocks of skepticism," and hav "evoluted" (as you call it) to what we call "coarse, uncultured Freethinkers;" and, though we acknowledge your hellish influence with your coarse publications, we deplore the lost condition of our members, whom we cheerfully consign, with you as their leader, to a seething flame of sulphur, in a gaping, yawning HELL.

We hav prayed and prayed for you, times without number, but we find that you hav "chariots of iron," and consequently it seems as though the heavens were brass, and our God cannot answer through them. Now, for Christ's sake, let up, and giv us a little fair show, and don't go thundering and crashing along so, with the devil for your engineer; for, be assured, you will soon be "telescoped" in hell, and we (the chosen few) will look over the battlements of heaven and laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh.

Your old Infidel TRUTH SEEKER and "Round the World" books, and all the rest of your thousands of publications, will make splendid fuel for the flames of the damned truth seekers, and you'll need none of our onions or horse-radish to make you appear to weep, when we flaunt the Index, the Journal, and Brother Coleman's cultured theology in your face. I repeat my warning: "Stand from under!" We acknowledge that you carry all the Liberals with you, but you don't carry Jesus and us— METHODISTS.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Oct. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, which please credit to Joslin L. Park. Excuse for delay is, when I thought of it couldn't attend to it; when I had time, didn't think about it. I am sorry, Brother Bennett, that there is any occasion for fighting lies. It seems that when we reach the period of mature judgment we ought to be able to discriminate between the true and false without much difficulty, particularly in theological matters, as the extremes are so great. We now and then read or hear a lie that we admire and forgiv on account of the ingenuity displayed in its construction; but the old lies of theology are so devoid of merit in every respect, without a shadow of reason, common sense, or principles of justice, to be gleaned from them (unlike many modern fictions, which nearly always contain some good moral or beneficial lesson), it is enough to puzzle any one who really thinks how the old mythological stuff could be peddled successfully by even the most skilful priest.

I think the cause of irritating and humiliating thoughts we more or less suffer while giving attention to the prevailing superstitious dogmas, is not so much the self-evident lies, but rather the fact that certain ones of our acquaintance, whom we wish to regard as mentally sound, claim to believe the monstrous absurdities which are so numerous in our Bible. The laws of the human understanding are made to appear worthless; the boasted intellect a delusion. We dislike to be forced to lose confidence in brains supposed to be healthy. Many otherwise intelligent people evidently deceive themselvs; they in some insane way imagin that they believe in certain "sacred" lies, and hav some way to prevent themselvs from using any common sense. If they hav what they may suppose to be a reason they seem too much ashamed to mention it to a close inquirer.

It must be very gratifying to all who wish the truth, let it cut where it may, that the true inwardness of the old degrading religious system is being critically analyzed and the results fearlessly placed before the people. I think the time is near at hand when the one who claims to believe the old standard Bible falsehoods will be looked upon by all who hav any intelligence as a knave for policy's sake, or as being mentally weak, deserving only pity.

Truly yours, M. GRAHAM.

WINCHESTER, ILL., Oct. 16, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Here I come with a good greenback dollar to pay up my subscription for the grand old herald of light, THE TRUTH SEEKER, till January 1, 283, and twenty-five cents left, for which please send me that new edition of Billings's "Crimes of Preachers." I like to keep posted in regard to the record of these soul-agents, for I used to be one of them, and, like many other ex-reverends, I know their tricks.

It is very gratifying to every true Liberal to see the steady, sure, and exalting steps our cause is taking for the establishment of human independence and the rights of man. Oh, what joy it givs to see the acknowledgment of our cause as it appears in the journals of to-day over the slander and abuse of that of former times! How we love to see the acknowledged worth of our illustrious dead spoken so truthfully in the article I inclose, clipped from the American Sentry, as a part of Warwick Martin's brief history of American independence.

THOMAS PAINE.

I could not do justice to this great subject were I to omit the above man as one of the important aids to American independence. It is true he did not fight battles in the field, nor did he belong to the Continental Congress. He, however, performed as great a work as any of them. For a long time he accompanied the army, carrying with him a printing-press and publishing a valuable paper, in which he set forth, as no other man could, the rights of man and the duties of American citizens in the great contest. This was to the people of the United States a most important work, and faithfully did he perform it without compensation. So highly did the Continental Congress appreciate his services to the cause that after independence was achieved they passed a unanimous vote of thanks to him for the services he had rendered.

After the close of the war, when Washington was President, Mr. Paine addressed to Washington a note stating that he wished to travel through the United States, and requesting Washington to send him a letter of introduction and commendation to the people of the United States. Washington sent him the following: "The bearer, Thomas Paine, is too well known to the people of the United States to need any letter of introduction or commendation to the American people." This was the highest commendation he could hav received.

After Mr. Paine went to Europe, and was for so long a time imprisoned by the French during the Revolution in that country, he wrote Mr. Jefferson, then president, that he wished to come to America, and so high was the estimate of Mr. Jefferson of the services he had rendered our cause, that Jefferson caused him to be brought to the United States in a United States government vessel free of charge.

Mr. Paine came to this country and here died, and his mortal remains now repose in peace not far from the city of New York, in the land of his adoption, which he had done so much to make free and independent.

Go on, Brother Bennett, we see the light of liberty's son dawning upon our horizon. We know the day draweth nigh when liberty's sun shall set the world aglow; and oh, better far than the wealth of a Vanderbilt will be the honor bestowed upon those who lead the noble cause! J. B. TRAVERS.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Oct. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: That feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER which makes it an organ of Freethought, all having an equal chance, is what pleases me best. And this conflict between mind and mind is the way to get at truth and bring it out. One truth always finds or begets others, and whether new or old, it is that that lasts always; it is one of the immortals, and some will say divine. And when such minds as Mrs. Hedden, and Wettstein, and many others come in conflict, the sparks fly, a new light is seen, and we lookers-on now and then catch hold of a ray.

And by the way, I do not wish to be taken as a critic or desire to be cynical, but suggest some thoughts that may call out more light on certain subjects that to me are hazy, dark. Mr. Wettstein says, "Confine ourselvs to the means within our reach, to the knowable, the actual; remain within the realms of nature, and in it, and from them find all requisit solutions for existing mysteries." Again he says, "It does not justify us or explain the mystery to assume the existence of a greater mystery.

Apparently he would admit there may be degrees in mysteries—that they may be classified, greater, lesser, and so on. Not logical. A mystery admitted is equivalent to a miracle, and the only word or definition is the one so common now—unknowable. Mr. Wettstein says, "And all other and higher classes of beings are but a higher degree of development in the grand chain of evolution which pervades all nature." Has it ever been proved, or can it be, that the germs or sources of all or any of the suns, systems, or worlds can be found in what astronomers call nebula, or the dim light that requires the aid of the most powerful telescope to locate in the vast abyss of space? I assume it has not yet been done, and their guess, or others, to that effect is no better than the one in the old Jewish story-book, that God made all things in six days from nothing, became weary and rested, and is still resting or idle if that account is true.

Evolution (change) cannot produce or make a particle of matter that did not before exist; and it is contrary to science, logic, and common observation that matter can create itself. Admitting that what is called nebula may be substance or matter, did it create itself on or beyond the bounds of space, remain inert for countless ages, then particles chip off, assume shape, start out on a wild-goose chase, remain in limitless darkness till, reaching the attraction of some convenient and friendly sun that in its infancy traces back to the same source (for if worlds can be accounted for in that way suns and systems can), begin circling round and evolute till they become a fit place for man and animals, and just then men and animals evolute from some lower forms of matter? Will they tell what period of time inorganic matter began to assume shape and life and produce a toad? And when did the toad evolute and become an elephant? and so on, as Mr. Wettstein says, ad infinitum. When, in the evoluting process of making a man, did the eye, the ear, and other organs so essential in keeping the machine going, present themselvs? Whoever undertakes an answer may begin and end with this one word, mystery. I am looking for the man or woman that will number and classify them.

J. VAN DENBURGH.

ITHACA, N. Y., Oct. 25, 1882.

M. D. BENNETT: My well beloved friend, I well remember my first hand-shaking with you at my boarding-house at Watkins Glen, how it kept a source of friendship that time cannot erase. You accidentally stepped in to avoid a shower of rain then pouring. I had never seen you personally before, but had often looked at your lithograph hanging at the back of my desk. I remember the sympathy I felt for you when you were confined in the penitentiary. I saw at once that you were constitutionally fitted for the burden you then bore. I received a letter at home from you while I was absent in the West. While there I could scarcely talk with any one on the subject of liberty and Freethought but they gave evidence that the whole world was in bondage and groaning to be delivered from animal excess and the slavery of sectarianism.

Your letter reminded me of a few thoughts expressed on paper and handed to Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, who wrote me and said he handed it to you; and you expressed in your letter that you should publish it, but could not at present on account of the press of other matters. My article is entirely at your service. Nature, as you know, takes plenty of time, and is never in a hurry and never out of order, so that when your business will admit of it, it will be just the right time. But it is so long since I wrote it, and having no copy of it, and wishing to add to it, I may make some repetitions, which, if so, I would like to hav corrected. My thoughts running so different from anything I hav ever seen published, and they being purely my own and wholly experimental, I can only say nature will provide. And, as I said, I wish to add a few lines which in justice must hav place somewhere in nature's building, to wit: That everlasting priest, Melchisedec, has been often in communication with me since the Watkins Convention. Although the name is found in the New Testament, yet I am of the opinion that, like many other scriptures, it has a mental signification that is not now understood by Mr. Chainey's This World, nor Mr. Wakeman's Man in his kingdom, nor Mr. Heywood's Word or letter by whom the man and his helpmeet were made; but it (his name) signifies king of justice, or peace, and no fable or myth, but a real mental priesthood, without beginning of days or end of life—a perpetual priesthood, which is nature's special assistant to build the animal man (the Freethought people), consisting of Materialism and Spiritualism united as the man and his helmeet. Nature is possessed of two general principles, namely, the positiv and the negativ, the animal and the mental, the good and the evil, the male and the female; the one cannot be appreciated without the other. And, as you will observe, Nature, in her everlasting progression, has created and has need of all the pagan histories and her great variety of gods, and all the Jewish histories with its gods and bibles, as help, either positiv or negativ, and has taken the gleanings from many fields to possess herself of (this world) the man (the Freethought Liberal people). Though she is blind and dumb and without design, yet through her production (man) design is perceptible. Yet man, having as yet only the breath of life in his nostrils, has not yet become a living soul. And it is plainly seen through all the Freethought and Liberal publications that man is incapacitated, and does not seem to understand that nature embraces all differences, both negativ and positiv, good and evil, as absolute help in progression; but he (man) makes war and battles as with an enemy to gain a victory, not knowing, with all his boasted knowledge, that nature takes the initiatory of both sides and agrees to disagree. And thus the woman, the female of nature, the negativ, the mental of humanity, the sympathy, the beautiful, the magnificent, the all-together lovely, the worshipful, the great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven (agitation) from God (the knowledge of this world), and her light is as clear as crystal, also it has a variety of entrances, or gates, distributed on either side; and the city (intellectual knowledge) lyeth four-square; the length, breadth, and hight are equal, embracing all of unerring Nature's progressiv works, positiv and negativ, pagans, Catholics, Christians, and Protestant Christians and Liberals of all shades from which the animal man (this world) was produced. And there is no temple in it, for the Lord God Almighty and the lamb (male and female nature) are the temple of it. And the city has no need of the sun nor the moon (Materialism or Spiritualism) to shine in it, for the glory of God (the satisfaction that there is nothing included as common or unclean) did lighten it, and the lamb (the fruit of the tree of life which produces all manner of fruit, both good and evil) is the light thereof, and the gates are not shut at all by day, and there is no night there.

The above are a few additional thoughts which possessed me for some time, and it would be satisfactory to your friend to publish them.

Yours truly, ZENAS KENT.

Thoughts About the Damned and the Redeemed.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Amid the torments of hell-fire
Prayed Dives for his friends,
And none above his prayer of love,
In sympathy attends.

By this it doth appear that saints
To all love bid adieu,
They never grieve when their loved ones
In torments meet their view.

They can behold their wives and babes
Wailing in torture there;
Yea, see their parents, brethren, friends,
And never breathe a prayer

To God to put an end to hell,
Their darling loved ones throw
Back to their first unconsciousness,
And terminate their woe.

Once, at the great Almighty's bid,
To life men entered in;
He made them so depraved and weak,
They could not help but sin.

He made their lives a span in length,
Their brains he made unsound;
With darkness, sorrow, and disease
He circled them around.

All their environments by him
Eternally were planned,
By his fiat, alone, he came
To this sin cursed-land.

And nine-tenths of mankind he dooms
To endless flames, 'tis said,
And neither angel, god, nor saint
Will do aught for their aid.

None of the blessed set will meet
To form a grand crusade,
To pray Jehovah to unmake
Those luckless souls he made,

And sink them everlastingly
Into unconscious sleep,
And let them not for evermore
In bitter anguish weep.

Thus, worse than Dives is each saint—
To hell the good man goes,
And heaven is filled alone with souls
Like Comstock's and Guiteau's.

Our London Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:

I dare say you wonder I hav not sent a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER lately, but the fact is I hav been away holiday-making, and as I saw no English papers till my return, I was quite ignorant of the doings of the religious or Infidel world, and hav had quite a lot of reading to do since my return, and I hav not got through with my back work yet.

I hav had a long-standing engagement to visit a cousin in the southeast of France, near La Lochelle in the wine district, and as I was prevented through various causes from going last year, I made up my mind to do so this summer if at all possible; otherwise I should probably never hav gone, as he will be leaving for Germany ere long. I was anxious to see the nativs of France right away from Paris, where they had but little opportunity of intercourse with foreigners, and I find they are different in many respects to the Parisians.

I left London by the night train en route for the French capital, via Newhaven and Dieppe, thereby gaining a longer sea trip, which I think far more enjoyable than railway traveling. I was very pleased with Dieppe, which was reached about eight next morning, but as the train only waited an hour, I had only time to get breakfast and walk as far as the market, but I hope to go there and spend a few days on some future occasion. On the pier-head at the entrance to the harbor is erected a large crucifix, gaudily painted, and underneath the figure of Christ was one of a woman, which I presume represented Mary, Star of the a . Since the present republic has been established, and the edicts against religious orders published, superstition has not so many votaries, and these images receive very little attention. I could not see that any of the French sailors on our boat recognized it, as was formerly the custom.

For some distance from Dieppe the natural scenery was very fine, it being a hilly and well wooded and watered district—indeed, I saw nothing equal to it in any other portion of the country I passed through.

As we neared Paris, the sky assumed a gloomy aspect, and in the city the rain was coming down in torrents, so I could not get about much. I concluded, therefore, to push on, so took the midnight train, and reached my destination about mid-day. My cousin was waiting at the station, but we managed to miss one another somehow, and after waiting some time, I engaged a vehicle to take me to his pension. I told the man the name of the street, and he mounted the box to drive off when a thought struck him. He dismounted, and came to the door, and delivered in a most rapid manner what I took to be an oration, or recitation, or something of the kind. I was quite bewildered, as he looked as if he expected an answer, and I had not the remotest idea what it was all about. I asked him to go over the ground again, and take more time about it, as I was not in a hurry. He started somewhat slower, but soon went off at a racing pace. I was still in profound ignorance, and got him to try once more, and this time was fortunate enough to catch a word or two which enabled me to elucidate the mystery. He only wanted the number of the street, and instead of asking the question in two words, he must needs waste about two hundred. I can now understand how it is the French do not overwork themselvs—they use up all their strength in talking. They rattle on at a most fearful rate, and one requires to liv with them for a time to be able to understand them. I found I could make myself understood all right, but was alwaysat a loss to get at their meaning.

Sunday appears to be the busiest day in the week, and the market is always better attended then than on Thursday. The women come in from the outlying villages adorned in their best clothes, and all wearing white caps of all shapes and sizes, some of them being beautifully worked and ornamented with lace. Their values ranged from five to one hundred francs; the more expensiv are often handed down from mother to daughter as heirlooms. Each village has its distinguishing shape, and it can at once be seen by the initiated from what place the wearer comes.

The town in which I was staying rejoices in the possession of four or five churches, Notre Dame being the oldest. In it there are several chapels, that dedicated to the "ever blessed" being the principal; and this contains some fine carving, which is, however, greatly marred by a tawdry fresco painting for background. It is rather a curious picture, and would giv one a first impression of having been originally intended as an advertisment for a life insurance company. It is divided into compartments, each one containing a representation of narrow escapes of life. One showed two trains meeting on a single track, and another appeared to be a sporting scene; I forget what the others were. I found out on inquiry that these various views were records of miraculous preservations from imminent danger, suddenly averted by the "Queen of Heaven." I could not, of course, help believing, as I saw the picture which was considered by the faithful as a most conclusiv proof that it was all true. About half a dozen women were kneeling on prie Dieu chairs in front of this work of art, though whether engaged in admiration thereof, or in praying to the image, I cannot say. Another chapel was devoted to John the Baptist, if I remember rightly, or else the infant Jesus: I can't say for certain, as I omitted to take a note at the time. All I remember is that the carving of a child occupied the most prominent position. This chapel was adorned with a dirty black table, placed close to the altar, just outside the rails, and ornamented with sundry spikes, on some of which were stuck lighted candles of various lengths, and the grease was dropping down from them to the table, and then to the pavement. It scarcely appeared to be in accordance with the fitness of things, but as the habitues of the place did not seem to see anything incongruous in it, I could not complain.

The parson business does not appear to be very flourishing in the town, the supporters being chiefly women who hav given up frivolity and are settling down into middle age and religion, trusting, by devoting their old age to patronage of the priests and prayers to the saints, to hav a short time in purgatory. The women who hav gone ahead in their early life are most devout in their declining years. At one of the churches I observed a woman, apparently aged about fifty, going the round of the wretched daubs known as the "stations of the cross," kneeling before each, and mumbling some prayers. I suppose she felt better after it was over.

The priests hav greatly lost their hold upon the people, and even the peasants, who are generally the last to be disinthralled, will now pass a black-coat without taking any notice of him. It is not so long since this class held them in great reverence, and bowed low on meeting one of them.

Marriages are now treated purely as civil contracts, though binding till death, and the aid of the church is rarely evoked.

I happened to see a wedding procession; it consisted of twelve couples, assorted sexes, each female carrying a large bouquet; the bride, attired in an elaborate white dress with a long train, and covered from head to foot by a thin veil, conducted by her nearest male relativ, was in the front, the bridegroom and bride's mother bringing up the rear. The couple were married to the mairie, after which the bridegroom's father took charge of the bride, and they all marched to a cafe for the wedding breakfast. The bride is not handed over to the husband till later in the day. As the streets had just been watered, and some oxen and horses had passed along just before the procession, you may imagin the condition of the bride's train, which dragged along the ground. They took the middle of the road, and never stepped aside to avoid the filth.

All the houses and public edifices are built of white stone, which I found very trying to the eyes when the sun is shining, and in summer most of the inhabitants wear tinted eye-glasses in consequence.

There is a very good museum in the town, where I saw a fair collection of fossils, chiefly found in the neighboring quarries. This building is only opened twice a week, for about three or four hours, but the townspeople take no interest in it, and it is only visited by curious strangers. Literature is at a low ebb, the demand being very small. Reading is not at all in favor, with the exception of the short paragraphs in the daily papers. Agriculture seems carried on in much the same manner as it was centuries back; the fields look rough, and as if left entirely to nature. The work of plowing is lazily performed, and the ground is scarcely turned over. When the plowman gets to the end of the furrow, he and his horses or oxen take a long rest before starting on the next one. A Frenchman requires a deal of rest during the course of his work. However, as the population is by no means excessiv, and the wants of the peasants easily satisfied, there is not much need of overwork to get a living. Under the system of peasant proprietorship, a man has a small piece of land, and grows all he wants on it. He has a patch for his vines, growing a sufficiency of grapes to make wine enough to last his family till next vintage time; another for maize, and one for vegetables, and is therewith content. What more can he want? He is his own master, and can work or not, as it pleases him. There is no fear of one farmer removing the landmarks of his neighbor, because such things rarely exist. Now and again you may see the commencement of a stone wall to mark the boundaries of a field, but it is never completed. The fields right in the country are level with and quite open to the roads, and although there is no fence, the owner is very particular to hav a gate made of two upright stones, and a pole or two placed across, and strongly chained and padlocked. Doubtless it is extremely important and necessary that there should be a gate, but it strikes the uninitiated as somewhat superfluous.

I was greatly interested in watching the street pavers and excavators in the town. They would work for a minute or two, and then stop and hav a long gossip before resuming. I believe labor of that description must be paid by time and not by the piece. If a shower of rain came on they at once stopped operations, sat down on anything that happened handy, put up their umbrellas, and talked or smoked until the rain was over. They did not believe in getting wet.

The French are very fond of music, and always crowd round a gratuitous performance; a barrel-organ or a drum, or anything that will make a noise, will do. Quantity, and not quality, is the requisit thing, and it provides an opportunity to loaf, which is a great consideration.

One day I walked to a neighboring village (some ten miles off) with my cousin to visit a very ancient chateau, a relic of the feudal times, so old that its history was completely lost. It was a splendid ruin. The walls were of great thickness, passages, rooms, and staircases being contained in them, and the environs were honeycombed with subterranean passages, most of them now being blocked up. The six towers are still standing, and portions of the connecting walls. The present owner is a utilitarian and takes no interest in antiquities, so the old place is fast crumbling away.

The customs and manners of the inhabitants of the hamlet are very primitiv. The cafe, or inn, is distinguished by the old-world sign of a bush hung out of one of the windows. We found the door was fastened, and were wondering how we were going to get refreshment, when the hostess came up and unfastened the door. She had been up the road having a gossip with the neighbors and did not expect visitors, they being few and far between. There was not much choice of liquor, beer in stone bottles being about the only thing in stock. It had a peculiar taste, and its manufacture was probably a secret only known to the manufacturer. It was guiltless of malt or hops, and was probably made from herbs; it, however, had the recommendation of being cool and wet. Food was not to be procured, so we had to content ourselvs with blackberries and walnuts, of which there was abundance.

The main roads are planned on the Roman system—perfectly straight from town to town, but terribly monotonous, and you may tramp for miles without meeting a human being. The people are not great travelers, and will not walk if they can ride. The idea of planting trees along the roads is a good one; but, as they are generally planes, the effect is about as picturesque as a row of telegraph poles. Elms, oaks, or beeches would be far preferable in every respect, but it is not the custom, and they do not care to make innovations on time-honored traditions.

There are immense stone quarries in every direction, and I saw some very fine fossils in stones built into walls. Some of them hav been preserved in the museums, but no one takes much interest in them.

Business hours appear long. The shops open at 6 A.M. and close from 10 to 11 P.M. At one-half past eleven the lamp-man goes round the town and turns off the gas in the street lamps. All respectable people are supposed to be indoors by that time. The water is also turned off, so that in the event of a fire it takes an hour or two before any water can be procured for the engin; but this apparatus is not of much use. The popular way to deal with a fire is to make the spectators form a chain to the river, if near enough, and pass buckets of water from one to the other. The only apparent objection to this plan is that by the time the bucket has reached the fireman its contents have disappeared. The principle is good enough, the only defect being that it fails in practice.

Altogether, I may say I was considerably edified and often amused by the incidents I met with during my stay.

I hav just mentioned a few things I noticed, but hav already written quite enough to weary you; but as one or two observations may be new and perhaps interesting, you must overlook the rest.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such swork would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Humanity and the Progress of International Law.

An address delivered

BY EDWARD SEARING

Of the New York Bar before the Society of Humanity

An illustration from history that intellectual and moral growth is measured by the decay of theology.

The president of the League says: "It shows how International Law became one of the corner-stones or the 'Era of Man.' I wish every Liberal and every patriot would read it. T. B. WAKEMAN."

Elmina says: "It is truly an excellent work, and I hav been much interested in it. Hav gained many new ideas from it, and thank thee for writing it. It embodies a wide field of gleanings, and presents its theory in such a strong and vivid light that to read is to believe and appreciate. We need just such books as this to keep us from being selfish and self-absorbed. I feel that I am better for having read it, and I trust that through its teachings many many more may be led and guided into truths leading to the happiness of the whole human race. We are indeed only one of the great mass of mankind, and our hearts should pulse in unison with all other hearts, and one good law bind all to nature in true morality and a noble life.
"Thine gratefully, ELMINA D. SLENKER."

SPECIAL PHYSIOLOGY,

Supplement to the Study of General Physiology.

ILLUSTRATED.

BY MRS. E. R. SHEPHERD.

12mo, EXTRA CLOTH, PRICE $1.00.

We hav here a work, the need of which has long been felt by all intelligent women, and especially by mothers and teachers, conveying to girls that special knowledge so important to them, but which, for proper reasons, must be omitted altogether from the general and school physiologies. Written in a careful and entirely unobjectionable manner, it is so plain and practical as to be easily understood, and its perusal is sure to leave an impression of the importance of the subject on the minds of the readers. It discusses the physiology of woman; the proper relation of dress to comfort and health; the age of puberty; menstruation; some of the diseases of women, their causes and prevention; something about marriage and motherhood, and many other topics of importance.

The special attention of mothers and teachers is called to this book, with the hope that they will read it, and convey to their daughters or girls in their charge the information given; or, better still, after reading, place it in the hands of the girls for whom it was written. The untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase and read the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, entitled the Science of Life: or, Self Preservation. It is not only a complete and perfect treatise on Manhood, Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in man, Errors of Youth, etc, but it contains one hundred and twenty-five prescriptions for acute and chronic diseases, each one of which is invaluable, so proved by the author, whose experience for 21 years is such as probably never before fell to the lot of any physician. It contains 300 pages, bound in beautiful embossed covers, full gilt, embellished with the very finest steel engravings, guaranteed to be a finer work in every sense—mechanical, literary, or professional—than any other work retailed in this country for $2.50, or the money will be refunded in every instance. VINELAND, N. J.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. ☞ Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notices from the Press.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Times.]

We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician, who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of those who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

[From the Star Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H]

TO INVALIDS AND OTHERS: The Banner seldom indorses any doctor or medicin, but it is free to say to all interested that Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., is not only a skilful and reputable practitioner, but one of the most successfu physicians in the United States.

Gems of Thought.

WE should never nurse our sorrows. Life is too short to waste it in useless grievings over the inevitable. "Thy will be done" is only another form of saying "The ills we cannot cure we should patiently endure." Or better still, let us seek for the light. Joy always comes to those who earnestly desire her presence, and seek with a determination to find her.—Elmina D. Slenker.

CHRISTIANS speak of their private experience as one of the irrefragable evidences of Christianity, but as no two individuals think and feel alike, a logician would find it difficult to construct arguments out of such materials to satisfy the demands of close reasoners St. Jerome declared that there was no end to the credulity of Christians. They suspend their dearest hopes upon props which would cause practical and scientific minds to start with horror, if offered for their use in those precious investigations which are now filling the world with glorious light of truth.—Alhaza.

IT was one of the fine sayings of the first Napoleon, one of the veins which redeemed the blackness of his character, when he saw a lady standing in the way of a soldier carrying a load, "Madam, respect the burden."—London Society.

BELIEF I define to be the healthy act of a man's mind. It is a mysterious, indescribable process, that of getting to believe; indescribable, as all vital acts are. We hav our mind given us, not that it may cavil and argue (?) but that it may see into something, giv us clear belief and understanding about something, whereon we are then to proceed to act. Doubt, truly, is not itself a crime. Certainly we do not rush out, clutch up the first thing we find, and straightway believe that! All manner of doubt, inquiry, skepticism, as it is named, about all manner of objects, dwells in every reasonable mind. It is the mystic working of the mind on the object it is getting to know and believe. Belief comes out of all this, above ground, like the tree from its hidden roots.—Carlyle.

STRANGE how religion, in any form, should hav generated cruelty. The Inquisition, established after Christianity had supplanted paganism, was a system of deliberate cruelty. It was continued for centuries as a pious institution, and will ever be branded as infamous and execrable. Yet its pretensions were based on the name of a gentle loving religion.—F. W. Newman.

THEY shall put you out of the synagogs; yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think thathe doeth God service.—John xvi, 2.

THE great mass of young men who enter the ministry, as soon as they announce their intention to do so, are shut off from the ordinary training given to other men. Instead of being taught science, from which the enemies of Christianity now draw many of their weapons, they are drilled in the dead literatures in order that they may argue with sectarian opponents on the meaning of a word. In the seminaries to which they pass from college, the main object is to fence them in from all contact with the world of temptation and vice which they are to combat. Polemics and ecclesiastical history are the fields in which they are taught to work. The young pastor, when at last he has a charge, is as a rule set apart from the ordinary experiences of life, the rending passions, the mastering temptations which every day wrench the souls of other men. His mild theology, his carefully written sermons, drawn mostly from his knowledge of human nature given him by books, fall gently on the ear of the middle-aged men in the pews very much as do the voices of the boy-choristers overhead piping sweetly of the day of judgment.—N. Y. Tribune.

What recks it them? what need they? they are sped;
And when they list their lean and flashy songs
Grate on their scrannel pipes of wretched straw;
The hungry sheep look up and are not fed,
But swollen with wind, and the rank mist they draw,
Rot inwardly and foul contagion spread.
Milton's Lycidas.

THE lama of Thibet, at this day, is held forth, not as the offspring or successor of a divine race of princes, but as the immortal God himself, the object at once of civil obedience and religious adoration. This instance is singular, and may be accounted the farthest point to which the abuse of human credulity has ever been carried.—Paley's Mor. and Pol. Philosophy.

ALL the great changes that hav taken place in the world hav had to pass through a "Utopian" phase.—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

WHAT is called "culture" amounts to little. It may be associated with the meanest moral character, abject servility to those in high places, and arrogance to the poor and lowly. The fast, idle youth believes nothing, hopes nothing; no, not even the final triumph of good in human hearts. There are many Mr. Tootses in the world, saying "It's all the same, it's of no consequence." It is not all the same, nor will it be all the same a hundred years hence. The life of each man tells upon the whole life of society. Each man has his special duty to perform, his special work to do. If he does it not, he himself suffers, and others suffer through him. His idleness infects others and propagates a bad example. A useless life is an early death.—Dr. Smiles's Duty.

JUDGE every word and deed which are according to nature to be fit for thee, and be not diverted by the blame which follows from any people, nor by their words; but if a thing is good to be done or said, do not consider it unworthy of thee. For those persons hav their peculiar leaning principles to follow their peculiar movement; which things do not thou regard, but go straight on, following thy own nature, and the way of both is one.—M. A. Antoninus.

IF the taste of a Quaker could hav been consulted at the creation, what a silent and drab-colored creation it would hav been! Not a flower would hav blossomed its gaieties, nor a bird been permitted to sing.—Paine's Age of Reason.

Odds and Ends.

MAN wants but little here below;
He is not hard to please;
But every woman that we know
Wants everything that she sees.

THE meanest kind of a man is the one who, seeing another lying in a hammock, howls "dog-fight!" so that he may see the victim try to get out of the hammock quick and get slung about six somersaults with mud in his mouth.

A SAVAGE Illinois woman says that for every young wife that cannot cook there is a young husband who will not make fires, carry ashes, split kindling, or shovel snow, and cannot market, because he does not know a hawk from a hen.

THE mistress has gently reprimanded her maid for oversleeping herself in the morning. "You see, ma'am," explained the servant, "I sleep very slowly, and so you see, ma'am, it takes me much longer to get my full sleep than it does others, you see, ma'am."

A MILD-EYED youth, wearing a dessert-spoon hat and polka-dot socks, went into the Middle Park the other day and claimed to be a mining expert. The boys inveigled him into driving a stick of giant powder into a drill-hole at the bottom of a shaft with an old axe, and now they are trying to get him out of the ground with ammonia and a tooth-brush.—Bill Nye's Boomerang.

A SUDDENLY rich and very muscular young man from the oil regions stopped at a seaside hotel the other day for the first time, and had great difficulty in getting anything to eat. A sympathizing stranger at his elbow whispered, "You will starve here if you don't tip the waiter." Two minutes afterward the waiter found himself tipped over on the floor. The young man did not starve.

IT is said in the Patent Office Reports that patents were granted last week to women. This is as it should be. We hav thought for years that women ought to hav been patented, and are glad that it has been done finally. They are the greatest invention of this or any other age, and it is ridiculous to think of fortunes being made on the invention of mouse-traps, tobacco-boxes, sewing machines, and breech-loading firearms, when there is no patent on women, the great labor-saving sewing machine and generally useful article. The party who has got a patent on women has got a fortune, as no person who enjoys the society of the patent will kick on paying a royalty. Now let the newly-patented article vote and it is all right.

"WHO is Maria?" was the question that startled Mr. Brown (who talks in his sleep) as he waked the other morning and found Mrs Brown sitting up in bed with an interrogation point in one eye and an exclamation point in the other.

"Maria? Maria who?"

"That's just what I want to know; you repeated the name over and over again last night."

"Let me see. Oh, yes; that's Parker's dog—a splendid animal. I've been trying to buy her."

"You ought to own her, certainly, you are so excessivly fond of her. You asked Parker's dog to put her arms around your neck and kiss you. You even went so far as to tell Parker's dog that you loved her with all your heart, and that when you came to die if you could only lay your head on Parker's dog's bosom you could breathe your life out sweetly there. Then you asked Parker's dog to hav another plate of ice cream, and if the watch you had given her kept good time. During the night you kissed Parker's dog a dozen times, called her all the pet names known, and proved to me conclusivly that you ought to liv with Parker's dog and not with me."

Mrs. Brown has gone to her mother.

A STRANGER with long hair, a white coat, and a white hat with a crape band, entered a Griswold street restaurant yesterday and said to the proprietor:

"Let me explain in advance that I am a singular man,"

"All right, sir. A singular man's order is as good as any one else's."

"I want six oysters on the half shell—on the left hand half, if you please."

The oysters were opened and placed before him, and when he had devoured them, he said:

"Now take six oysters, run them through a clotheswringer to remove the dampness, and fry them for me in olive oil."

This order was also filled, when he called for a cup of salt and water, added milk and sugar, and drank it down and asked for his bill.

"I also desire to explain in advance that I am a singular man," replied the proprietor. "Your bill is $2."

"Impossible!"

"Just $2, sir."

"But that is monstrous."

"Perhaps it seems high, but that's my singular way of charging for singular lunches."

"I'll never pay it."

"Then I'll sadden your heart."

The sad proceedings were about to begin when the long-haired man forked over and walked out. The lesson seemed to sink deep into his heart, for he halted at a fruit store, and, without any explanations in advance, paid the usual price for a banana, and carried it off without asking the seller to dip the ends in rose-water.—Detroit Free Press.

Notes and Clippings.

It is stated that those who attend Sunday services the most are the ones who can afford to show new bonnets in church every few months.

The sad suicide of an Arkansas preacher who had devoted himself principally to politics would seem to be a valuable lesson to ministers of the gospel who want to run the primaries and boss the machine.

A Georgia preacher went to a circus to see how many of his flock were wicked enough to go to such places, and half the papers in the country are referring to it as though they thought that dodge a new one.

"What do you think I had better preach about?" asked tha new minister, and the old deacon scratched his head and replied, "Waal, if you preach abaout twenty minutes I think you'll tech our people jest right."

In the new volume of her letters, George Sand, speaking incidentally of the English character, sums it up thus: "Every true Englishman believes himself to be the finest man of the finest country in the world."

Two hundred thousand people are asked to contribute a nickel apiece to build a church in Texas. It should be called the church of St. Nickel-us, and when it is in operation it is to be hoped the old Nick-el hav less to do in Texas.

A certain reverend drone preaching a very dull sermon to a congregation not used to him, many of them left the church before the sermon was near ended. "Truly," said a gentleman present, "this learned divine has made a very moving discourse."

The girls of Manayunk are collecting buttons. It is said, and with a fair show of truth, that the father of the girl who has the largest and most varied assortment is a church deacon who takes up the Sabbath collections for the missionary cause and the minister's back salary.

Rev. Rider thinks the world would be better if newspapers would make fewer references to the doings of the wicked. If preachers would make more frequent references to the doings of the wicked instead of delivering pretty essays on hair-splitting differences in creeds, the world would be better yet.

The Salvation Army in England, though supposed to perform merely military functions of a spiritual character, hav been showing a disposition to use the weapons of the flesh. At a place called Yeovil on a Sunday recently, Gen. Booth's troops fought the police, and succeeded in giving the guardians of the peace the worst of it The newspaper report states that one salvationist "cut open a youth's head."

Miller was tried by a Wisconsin Baptist church, of which he is a pillar, on a charge of irreligious conduct in going to a negro minstrel show. His defense was that he started for a temperance lecture, got into the wrong hall, and did not discover his mistake until the show began. He admitted that he was to blame for not instantly withdrawing, and that he remained because the entertainment amused him. He was reprimanded.

The Rev. J. G. Sydenham, a clergyman of the Church of England, has just been prosecuted by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, for neglecting to supply seven dogs with sufficient food. The dogs were in a state of starvation, and ate ravenously when supplied with food, one dog trying to swallow a biscuit without masticating it. The defense was that their condition was due to mange; but a veterinary surgeon said there was no flesh about their bones, and they were suffering solely from starvation. The magistrates said the charge was a very serious one, and they fined the defendant £5, with the option of one month's imprisonment. The fine was paid.

The Kentucky mountain evangelist, the eccentric Brother Barnes, does not find his experiment in Norwich, Conn., an overwhelming success. While many come to his meetings out of curiosity, they do not seem to be much impressed with any gospel message that he has for them. He keeps up his practice of "anointing with oil for the healing of the body," but has not thus far had many patients. The clergy stand aloof from Brother Barnes about as in other places.

Popular belief in the wisdom of vaccination has received a severe blow in a part of Germany where a large number of children, both those vaccinated for the first time and others revaccinated after an interval of twelve years, hav fallen dangerously ill, the flesh about the punctured part decaying and sloughing off, and the bodies being covered with sores and boils. It is thought unlikely that a single one of the affected children will recover. Impure virus appears to hav been the cause of this unfortunate result.

The Rev. Dr. Arthur T. Pierson told the Presbyterian Synod of Indiana that pastors too often made idols of their church edifices. "I had a magnificent church in 1875," he said, "and $35,000 was spent on the interior decoration. Then and there I said to God that I would renounce all the idols of which I had been made conscious. He would only let me do his work. While I was praying for this blessing the church took fire, and in half an hour it was in ashes."

An alleged witch doctor has been indicted on account of his proceedings in Pittsburgh. The story of the treatment he prescribed to remove a "spell" from a patient reads like a chapter from early New England experience. It seems that there are yet people who can be made to believe that witches ride on broomsticks, and that evil spirits can be driven out by silly incantations. It is as easy for the same class of people to believe in the absurdities of supernaturalism, of Jesus having no natural father, and of his casting out an immense number of devils.

The Rev. G. Duncan, an English clergyman, in a recent sermon on "Solomon in all his glory," at Crossland Moore, said that the Song of Songs givs us "the glow, the ardor, the beauty, and fragrance of Solomon's youth." He conjectured "it may show Solomon's great love for Abishag—a love interfered with by the intrigues of the harem." After having 700 wives and 300 concubines, Solomon in all his glory had no more time to write canticles. As a matter of historical criticism there is no evidence of the existence of the Song of Songs until five hundred years after the time of Solomon.

The English clergymen are about as much disposed to evil ways as their holy brethren in this part of the world. The Rev. J. Thomson has recently resigned his charge at St. Marnock's parish under the confession that he has committed grave indiscretions. At a recent funeral in England the presiding clergyman was so drunk he came near tumbling into the open grave, and would hav done so had he not been steadied by the clerk. He also two or three times got his service into such a muddle that he would neither understand it himself or make anybody else understand him.

Much concern is manifested by the ministers and church officials in Massachusetts on account of the decline in church attendance. This is especially true of the western part of the state. In the smaller towns and villages, where in former times almost everybody went to church, there is the greatest falling off. As an instance of this, there is a place not far from Northfield where formerly sixty families attended church; now only nine families attend, and several of them are very irregular. In Deerfield, Wapping, and Whately not one-third as many persons go to church as used to. In some large and comfortable old-fashioned churches which formerly were well filled the numbers of the congregations now are reduced to about fifty each, except when the summer visitors increase them.

A novel theory concerning what is finally to become of the devil is promulgated by Dr Waddell, a Scotch clergyman. In a recent sermon at Glasgow he expounded the statement in the twentieth chapter of Revelation concerning the angel from heaven who came down with a great chain in his hand and the key of the bottomless pit. This angel laid hold of the dragon, bound him for a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit. Dr. Waddell says that this means the overcoming of evil, the term for which is dragon, or devil, or Satan. The angel, he says, is the angel of electrical science, who comes direct from heaven. If such an angel brought a chain in his hand it was a coil of telegraph wire and submarine cable. The angel's key was the telegraph key. Dr. Waddell holds that in exactly the proportion that electricity circles the world, the devil will be defeated and the regeneration of mankind will progress. To him the idea of a "bottomless" pit is that of one from which the devil can never be recovered, as he will evidently fall through without possibility of restoration.

A Philadelphia clergyman named Beale has been preaching on feminin fashions, particularly as regards tight lacing. He says that men hold themselvs erect without the use of bones, except such as God gave them; and he cannot see why women should not do the same. He asks, "How can the depths of divine truth reach a heart compressed and squeezed within the narrowest possible limits?" This view of anatomy is that which was entertained by the ancients before modern medical science had shown them that the physical heart was not more than any other natural organ the seat of the immaterial and immortal soul. Mr. Beale's theory is that gospel truth must enter into the part of the system which is girded about by the feminin corset, or else be excluded, to the woman's great disadvantage. He regards the corset as so mischievous that he says, "No ordinary evil is doing more damage to the female sex." At this statement it is more than likely that some of the sisters who were in the reverend gentleman's audience quietly laughed in their sleeves and remarked within themselvs, "Men don't know anything about women's clothes," or something to that effect.

Some of the newspapers yesterday, says a writer in Sunday's Truth, gave us one more striking instance of the depraving influence of the Christian religion. It consisted of the account of a young woman in Canada who stood over a fire until she was horribly and fatally burnt. Her last words were: "I am going to Jesus," and the telegraphic account givs us the pathetic intelligence that "she was religiously inclined" and "weary of life." The fact that she was religiously inclined must be a consolation to her friends, and it is to be presumed and hoped that her terrible death was pleasing to Jesus, otherwise he would hav prevented it. Of course, it has been said that horrible suicide was not caused by the religion of the unfortunate victim, and that it should be charged not to Christianity. This assertion need be met by nothing more than a simple denial. Unprejudiced and fair-minded men and women, those who are not degraded and blinded by Christianity, will see that the fact is otherwise; the very ignorant will not be convinced by argument. The same claim was made in the case of Guiteau, and yet that vile man was nothing more or less than what Christianity made him and would make of any man of similar brain and experience. It cannot be too often repeated that Guiteau was the natural, legitimate, and, in his own case, inevitable product of Christianity. Probably many Christians will thank God and Jesus because this unfortunate woman did not sacrifice a few children to them in addition to killing herself. How any person having either intelligence or humanity can get consolation from the Christian religion is a mystery, if it be a fact.

Mrs. Seguin, the wife of a physician of this city, shot her three children one day last week and then committed suicide. The cause assigned is mental aberration.

A fresh discovery is reported to hav been made of documents which implicate the sultan of Turkey in connivance with Arabi Pasha in the late Egyptian rebellion.

Black troops are being enrolled in Egypt for service against the so-called False Prophet of Soudan, who has collected a large following and has thus far been victorious in his encounters with the troops sent out to suppress him.

Barnes, the Kentucky revivalist, is doing the Lord's work in Connecticut. He is half preacher and half blackguard (a mixture often met with), but is said to be making little impression on the unsusceptible people of the wooden nutmeg state.

There has been incorporated in Boston a Palestine Colonization and Christian Missionary Association, the purpose of which is to transplant in the "holy land" some of the surplus population of the Hub, together with their virtues, and make a new Boston near the old Jerusalem.

The pope has sent a letter to Queen Victoria thanking her for the interest she has shown in, the welfare of Catholics in her dominions, and for the religious freedom enjoyed under the British government. When it is remembered that the oppression of the Irish people is due to the fact that they are Catholics, and that a man is denied his seat in Parliament because of his religious views, this letter of the pope's must seem to the queen something like irony.

The elections of Tuesday resulted in important Democratic victories. New York elects Grover Cleveland for governor by a majority of between 130,000 and 150,000. Franklin Edsonis elected mayor of the city. Thomas M. Waller (Dem.) has a plurality of 3,000 in Connectiout. New Hampshire is claimed by the Republicans. Massachusetts has especially done herself honor by electing as governor her citizen first in war and first in peace, Gen. B. F. Butler. Both he state and the man are to be congratulated.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Twenty Days in California.—Concluded.

A RIDE TO SANTA CLARA.

Saturday, June 17th.—In the fore part of the day Mr. Magenheimer, with his very fine horse and carriage, took me down the Almeda, an avenue of willows, three miles, to Santa Clara. It is a beautiful drive, the street being wide, bordered on each side with fine and beautiful residences. The willows were planted by the Jesuit fathers in the year 1799. The town is perhaps older than San Jose, but is not nearly so large, and is more remarkable for its schools than for anything else.

Santa Clara College was founded in 1851, while California was yet in its infancy, by a small number of gentlemen warmly interested in the education of youth, in connection with theological instruction. So rapid was the growth of the undertaking that in 1855 the legislature of the state gave a charter to the institution. Since that period the success of the school has been pronounced, and has sent out many representatives, who are now filling responsible positions in many quarters of the state, in law, medicine, music, and in various business avocations. The position of the school to-day is that of the first on the Pacific coast. The staff of professors and tutors numbers twenty-five. Its two professors of chemistry daily use a completely furnished laboratory; a professor of physics, who has at his command the the largest cabinet of apparatus possessed by any college in the United States; telegraphy is taught with four instruments, at different stations in the different buildings, occuping ten acres of ground. Photography is taught in a building erected exclusively for the purpose, and fully supplied with apparatus. Five professors of music give opportunity for making acquaintance with every musical instrument of the day. Mathematics are taught, from arithmetic to the calculus. A professor of English literature lectures four times a week, Greek and Latin classics employ five teachers, and the modern languages are taught each by a native linguist of the tongue in which he instructs.

The most objectionable feature in this school is that its management is exclusively Christian, being under the control of the Jesuits. The religious ceremonies are strictly Catholic, though pupils are received from other denominations. Students are not allowed outside the college precincts. The scholastic year consists of ten months, for which period the scholarship, including board and all expense save clothing, is $350. A school is also here which accommodates five hundred female pupils.

We returned to San Jose by another road, and were within a short distance of a district including hundreds of acres, called the Willows, more exclusively devoted to fruit-growing than any other portion of the vicinity. Seventy-five acres of strawberries are in one body. I must again say that the entire country around San Jose is of a most lovely character.

A TRIP TO MOUNT HAMILTON.

At 1 P. M. eight of us, in a chartered omnibus, with long seats on the sides, and facing each other, started on a most pleasant ride to Mount Hamilton, twenty-seven miles from the city, where the largest observatory in the world is being erected with the money donated by the generous Infidel, James Lick. The party consisted of Dr. and Mrs. J. L. York, Mr. Magenheimer, Mrs. Barker, Mr. R. H. Schwartz, Mrs. Anna Folmer, the driver, and your humble servant. It is almost needless to say the drive was a lovely one. For some six miles we rode across the Santa Clara valley, when our course led up the mountain side, but ascending so gradually as to be not exceedingly exhaustive upon the horses, and much of the way so they could trot along gaily. We had four horses in our team, so we traveled in style, stopping at intervals of some miles along the pleasant journey at houses of refreshment, where edibles, lemonade, beer, etc., are sold to the passers by.

When half the mountain has been climbed, it is exceedingly interesting to stop and look back over the charming valley left behind. There are few scenes in the world more exquisitely beautiful. The town of San Jose is fifteen miles away, the lower part of San Francisco Bay is seen shining like a burnished plate of silver, away in the north, and tens of thousands of acres of the most beautiful and level farming country on the surface of the globe, dotted and variegated with fruit orchards, lovely groves, and delightful homes, stretch out like a panorama in bird's-eye view before the enraptured beholder. The scene cannot be adequately described. The ground must be gone over, and the view taken in, in order to be fully appreciated.

Many and many a time did we halt during that afternoon's ride, and gaze back over the beautiful panorama so charmingly spread out for our great pleasure, and till we were almost satiated with delight did we turn and take in the beautiful loveliness of nature and art combined, though nature must always rank a long way first. And thus did the afternoon pass away, as we gradually ascended that beautifully graded road winding in a serpentine manner almost continuously up the towering hight. For fully two hours could we see the observatory on the highest knob—the object of our destination—and it looked so near and the distance seemed so short, that it seemed as though we ought to reach it in half an hour, but the ground to be gone over was very deceiving. We had to wind over serpentine roads—round this hill, on to that—going a long way to gain a little distance in altitude, so that it was about sunset before we reached the mountain-top, where we were to pass the night.

Some of us walked a considerable portion of the distance, climbing up steep acclivities in order to gain long distances, thus giving us abundant time to halt and view the loveliness of the scene thus magnificently spread out before us. But finally the summit was gained. We could, of course, have left San Jose early in the morning, made the trip to the mount, stayed a short time, and have returned the same day; but that would not have filled our programme. We wished to pass a night on Mount Hamilton, to look through the telescopes at the stars which rule the night, and to have the exquisite view early in the morning of the slumbering valley below, while the fogs and partially condensed moisture are spread over it like an immense corrugated covering which hides it from view.

Captain Thomas Fraser and wife are permanent residents in the comfortable and commodious house which has been built, and the captain it is who takes immediate charge in carrying out the specifications regarding the works for the great instrument, which is not yet upon the ground, but is now being constructed in Germany.

Captain Fraser is, I believe, a native of Maine, and it is simple pleasure to state that we found him and his young, genial, and intelligent wife, most agreeable hosts. Armed with the following explanatory little document from the editor of the principal paper of San Jose, we found the doors of the establishment were kindly opened for us, and such a welcome awaited us as is peculiarly agreeable to weary and hungry travelers, and climbers of a mount over four thousand feet above the plain we had left, and soon a sumptuous repast was before us, which, I think I can say, was highly enjoyed. This is the letter we bore:

OFFICE OF THE DAILY MERCURY,
SAN JOSE, CAL., June 17, 1882.

DEAR CAPTAIN FRASER: Let me ask you to kindly entertain the company of friends who will bear this to you. Among them is D. M. Bennett, a somewhat noted man, editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, who is now on his way home from a tour around the world.

The kindness you show to them will be as highly regarded by me as though shown to myself. Yours truly,

J. J. OWEN.

After the supper we ascended the elevation, a hundred feet or two higher than the residence, where the observatory is being constructed—where the earth and rocks have been leveled off and the plateau enlarged so as to afford ample room for the different buildings needed for the main instrument and the auxiliaries, and which are now in course of construction, built firmly of brick, which are burned a few hundred feet lower down the mountain side and corded up.

The evening was very clear, and we had the pleasure of taking a view of several stars through two moderate-sized telescopes duly mounted here. The one is called a comet-searcher, and is so constructed that it can be directed to any part of the heavens, and one can sit in the easy-chair attached to the instrument and look all around the heavens for comets; but unless there is one of these wandering travelers rushing somewhere through the more adjacent parts of the heavens the instrument is not all likely to disclose the erratic strangers. I have to record here that we discovered no new comet that night. We however took a view of many of the stars, and though it seemed to add somewhat to their size and brilliancy, we made no special discoveries worthy of note.

In the smaller observatory already completed is what is called an equatorial instrument, pointing vertically to the heavens, and taking in such stars as cross its disk, which is, I think, a four-inch glass. Capt. Fraser is a thorough astronomer, and with the aid of his electric clock, in connection with his other apparatus and tables, he was enabled to tell within a second when any particular star would cross the disk of the instrument; when, by getting under it, placing the eye to the glass at the lower extremity, a view af the star could be seen with increased brilliancy and clearness. The fixed stars are so far away that only with the largest and most powerful instruments in the world is their size apparently increased. They are so far, far away, that it is wholly unlikely that any instrument will ever be constructed powerful enough to make them seem really much nearer. We never can know much about those blazing suns which for millions of ages have been casting off infinite floods of light, probably upon other worlds wholly invisible to us, which are dependent upon them for life, as we are upon our central orb for all that we enjoy.

While sitting there, in that observatory on Mount Hamilton, built with the money earned and donated by that rigid Infidel, James Lick, and witnessing the difference pointed out between equatorial and mean time, and seeing how the captain could tell within a few seconds of time when a given sun or distant star would pass across the disk of that instrument, I could not help realizing how much more superior nature is, how much more accurate, how much more reliable, how much more satisfactory in all her movements, than is the entire system of theology, with all the absurd twaddle about angry gods and devils that priests have been able to devise. Oh, yes; nature is millions of times superior to all the gods men have created; in fact, there is no comparison to be made between the two, for nature is all that is grand, and great, and true, while theology is the quintessence of ignorance, imagination, and falsehood. Nature, as taught by astronomy, is the great reality, the great truth; while what is pretended to be propounded by theology is wholly fiction, invention, and absurdity. One is reality, the other is simply guess-work and arrogant assumption. One is as free as the air of the heavens to all who will study it, while the other has an excessive price. The immense difference between nature and theology can be easily appreciated within the walls of an observatory.

Upon returning to the house an hour or so was passed away in talking to people in San Jose by telephone, which is in working order between the two points. We called upon several individuals in the city, and had little pleasant conversations with them. Our presence on Mount Hamilton was thus announced, and the same duly appeared in the city papers in the morning. This all over, we were prepared for a good night's rest, and we could not help enjoying the nice beds which were furnished us.

On the following morning some of us were up before the sun, to take the extraordinary view of the slumbering valley below while the clouds of fog or partially condensed vapor were close down to the valley or hugging the city and the country farm-houses. I had never seen such a sight before. Around us all was clear, while we looked down three thousand feet or more below us upon the cloud of fog, which seemed much like looking down upon the ocean thrown into billows moving with ceaseless unrest or upon windrows of snow. It was a grand sight indeed. As the sun rose, the fog in the valley lifted, taking away the desolate ocean, and placing in its stead the same lovely country we had so fondly gazed upon the day before.

We spent three or four hours in wandering over adjacent points of the mountain, where the view of the country, both east and west, is of the grandest character. The country east of the mountain, off toward the Joaquin valley, is for many miles very broken, and does not present the garden-like appearance which the country west of the range of mountains does, though it looks rugged and grand. It presents a much bolder aspect than upon the western side, with very little evidence of homes for human beings.

We also visited the water works belonging to the observatory, or rather the spring house on the mountain side, a mile from the observatory, and several hundred feet lower, where the scanty supply of water from several small springs runs into half a dozen tanks, holding, perhaps, a thousand gallons each, and from which point it is pumped by steam into a large resovoir, located on ground a hundred feet or two higher than the house, and from which the establishment obtains its supply. Many hundred feet of iron tubing of various sizes are used for conducting the water.

There is a small growth of stunted shrubs growing upon the mountains here, but very few trees of large size. The manzanita grows here in considerable quantities, and large numbers of walking-canes are cut from this particular growth. It is a very hard wood, and is prized for walking-sticks. A fine cane was given to me in memory of my visit to Mount Hamilton. The manzanita bears in considerable abundance a kind of fruit called "small apple," from which it is said a fair article of bandy has been made by distilling the fermented juice.

My visit to Mount Hamilton has given me a realizing sense of the magnificent donation of James Lick to the cause of science. If I remember correctly, his gift for this purpose alone amounted to nearly a million of dollars, and I trust it is being judiciously expended. This, as before remarked, is to be the largest observatory in the world, and is to have the largest telescope, the main glasses, I believe, to be six feet in diameter.

It made me feel proud that an Infidel had conferred such a great favor upon science, and I trust our Christian opponents will not continue to charge Infidels and unbelievers with doing nothing to promote science and education, for in proportion to their numbers it is probable they do as much as any other portion of the community. Like the Infidel Stephen Girard, who founded one of the first colleges in our country, Mr. Lick did himself great honor in the very generous bequest which he made for the permanent good of coming generations of his fellow-beings. Long will they have occasion to bless his memory and to give the truthful credit that Infidels occasionally do perform noble deeds worthy of im-mortalization. May the provisions which James Lick made as to the conduct of his property be more closely followed, with respect to the munificent gift which he left behind, than were those of the good and politic Stephen Girard, who well understood the craft and wiliness of our Christian opponents, and expressly prescribed that the tenets of Christianity should not be taught in the college built and endowed with the money which he gave, and that a Christian priest should never be allowed to enter the grand structure. So far have his prudent conditions been disregarded by the Christian rulers of the city of Philadelphia that the Girard College has practically been forcibly and wrongfully transformed almost into an ecclesiastical institution, where the dogmas of Christianity are not only industriously promulgated, but where priestly influence bears rule, and where psalm-singing and Christian prayers are daily enjoined upon the pupils. Even if it may be claimed that these practices are not only harmless but virtuous, they are certainly in direct opposition to the stipulations made by the great Girard, and show how little integrity our Christian opponents exhibit in carrying out the stipulations of an Infidel bequest. It is a clear exemplication that it will not do to entrust Infidel money to the wily incentives of our Christian foes in carrying out the solemn provisions of a will. How wrong it is for our foes to taunt us with the charge that Infidels never do anything for science and institutions of learning, when where they do give munificently their express and reasonable stipulations are wholly set aside!

About 10 o'clock, after seeing all there was to be seen about Mount Hamilton, and taking in all the beauties that exist in superabundance in that locality, we started on our homeward way; and as the journey is all the way to the valley gently descending, and our team was fully refreshed, we swiftly rolled pleasantly down the skilfully graded road. The day was clear and charming, so we had nothing to do but to take in and appreciate the continued charms of scenery of distant views which were continuously spread out before us. But it should be understood that though much space is not here taken to describe the loveliness of that ride, we were not so obtuse as not to fully appreciate its perfect loveliness.

Our team made excellent time, for they were on their way home, and they needed no urging to cause them to measure off the distance rapidly. We reached the city at about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, feeling that we had had a most pleasant excursion, and myself feeling particularly grateful to all the friends who had accompanied me, because the affair was gotten up for my especial benefit. Long shall I remember the kindness of my San Jose friends.

To keep up the "boarding-round" system, I went to the house of my friends, Dr. and Mrs. York, which is allotted me for the remainder of the time I remain in this pleasant city. When I am with Dr. and Mrs. York it is impossible to doubt that I am in the society of two stanch and steadfast friends, and it is impossible to feel otherwise than happy in such society. During a portion of the afternoon I called upon my venerable friend, Samos Parsons, now over eighty years of age, and who for a long time has been struggling against the encroachments and evil influence of priestcraft, and who is in favor of the highest liberties which are man's birthright as an incumbent and heir. He owns a few pleasant city lots, on which he has small dwellings, which readily rent to tenants of humble means, and some of his surplus ground he occupies as gardens, and cultivates numerous vegetables and legumes. His wife was with a daughter a few miles out in the country, so I was unable to see her; but the time of their golden wedding is not far away, when they will have been fifty years in each other's society in performing the journey of life. They are now rapidly nearing the evening of their days, and will ere long relinquish the struggle and lay down to the sweet sleep of nature, which has neither nightmare nor unpleasant dreams. Mrs. Parsons is the sister of my esteemed friend, Daniel R. Burt, of East Dubuque, Illinois.

Monday, June 19th.—Having had a most agreeable visit with my esteemed friends of San Jose, it now becomes my duty to set my face in an easterly direction toward the home which I have not now seen for nearly a twelvemonth; so at nearly 9 o'clock my friends accompanied me to the station, when I took cars for Stockton, from which place I have received invitations to call and make a visit. It was the intention that Dr. J. L. York should accompany me, not only to Stockton, but on so far as Reno and Virginia City in Nevada, and Salt Lake City in Utah; but an illness has been steadily coming over him for the past two weeks, which has increased to such extent as to preclude his making the journey. This was a disappointment to both of us, but we were obliged to say our adieus at the station, with the hope that before very many months have passed away I will be able to return to the Pacific coast, when we may, in company, make the tour of southern California and Oregon and Washington Territory. At first the programme was laid out that we should make the tour of Oregon and Washington Territory, where I have many friends whom I would be very glad to see, and who, I am vain enough to believe, would be glad to see me. But I found that this would require more time than I can now spare, and would keep me too long from my home and Eastern friends. It is laid down in my programme that I must be back within twelve months from the time I left home. I gladly would visit the friends in Oregon and Washington, but I must defer it until I have seen my home and friends still far away in the East.

So Dr. York and I parted, with the hope that it was not for aye, but that we would still be able to travel thousands of miles in company. The doctor has been an excellent friend to my paper and its editor. He has sent in many new subscribers, and has worked almost unceasingly to extend its patronage and reading; and since I have been in California he has shown me unflagging kindness and attention. May he find an abundance of as good friends as he has been to me.

As the train upon which I was a passenger moved out of the station, in a northerly direction, I left all my San Jose friends behind, but my heart was filled with gratitude at the kindness I had received from their hands, and the warm sympathy they had shown me during my brief visit.

We stopped to change trains at Niles, from which point our course was in a more easterly direction. In passing around in the valley of the San Joaquin we go between and near some pretty high and rugged spurs of mountainous land, which, for summer, have a too arid and parched look to compare with the experience of one reared in the Eastern states; but we also passed a large area of beautiful, productive valley-land, which, when the rain is not too deficient, produces abundant crops of cereals. These are now ripe for the reaper, and as I pass thousands of acres of golden grain, the promise seems strongly held out that the toil of the husbandman is liberally rewarded.

At Lathrop, where the road to the south up the Fresno valley diverges, and which is the usual route to the Yosemite valley, we halted for half an hour to leave passengers going south, and taking on others who are journeying from that direction. It had been my purpose to visit the Yosemite country, to look upon the grand scenery of that locality, which is said to throw almost all other scenery in the world into the shade; and also to visit Modesto, Merced, Fresno, Oleander, and two other points from which I had received urgent invitations to give them a call. Yes, I wished to gaze upon the mighty crags, the towering domes, the wild chasms, the beautiful cascades, the ever-varying glades and hollows, which make up the scene of Yosemite grandeur; I also wished to see the big trees of Mariposa; but the lack of time, as well as of money, admonishes me that I must not attempt this excursion now, but defer it till I return to the Pacific coast.

We were soon rolling on through the San Joaquin valley toward Stockton. Often thousands of acres of wheat, oats, and barley were spread out on either side, and the conviction forcibly strikes the traveler that California is a great grain-growing state. When its capabilities are fully developed it will be so productive that it is almost beyond the range of present possibilities to set bounds to what it will be able to produce in the way of grain, fruits, and stock. In another century the Golden State must be immensely rich in all that makes a country great.

We reached Stockton between twelve and one. It lies in the center of an extensive fertile country. It is the county seat of San Joaquin county, and is some three miles east of the beautiful and wide San Joaquin River. It is ninety-one miles from San Francisco by rail, and one hundred and twenty by steamer; for though by the map Stockton seems wholly an inland town, it is favored with water communication with the metropolis of the state. The town is located by a large slough, which has been excavated, and this connects with the San Joaquin River, which empties into the bay, so that boats of considerable size make their way up the river and slough, and after depositing their cargoes, return well laden with grain and the manufactures of the town.

Stockton was laid out about the time gold was discovered in California, and was named in compliment to Commodore Stockton, whose name is prominently connected with the conquest of California. The growth of the city has been gradual, perfectly healthy, and free from excitement. Its limits have been enlarged, and its area of taxable property greatly increased. The streets are wide, and at right angles with each other. The town is well built, giving at once the impression that it is a flourishing business point. The city is supplied with gas and water, the latter being obtained from an artesian well over a thousand feet in depth, which ejects its water eleven feet above the surface of the ground, and furnishes 360,000 gallons daily.

After dinner at the Commercial Hotel I called upon one of my patrons, Mr. G. C. Hyatt, with whom I had corresponded, who is engaged in iron machinery, foundry, and met with a cordial welcome from him. I also called upon Drs. A. S. and A. T. Hudson, with whom I had a pleasant visit. Dr. A. T. Hudson, with his buggy, took me over the city, or over parts of it. He also took me to the home of W. F. Freeman, with whom I have had much correspondence, to whom I have sold many books, and who has been a firm friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Freeman is at present on a visit to his native New England home, so I had not the pleasure of visiting with him. To make some amends, I had a pleasant interview of an hour with Mrs. Freeman, who is an intelligent and genial lady. After an hour Dr. Hudson returned, and spent two or three hours with me, taking me over the city in his buggy to the slough where the boats deliver and take on freight, where considerable wharves and warehouses are constructed. We visited several manufacturing establishments and flouring mills, and also a large and flourishing paper mill, where hundreds of tons of straw are annually ground up into pulp, some of which is made into the ordinary yellow straw wrapping-paper, and much other paper, wherein the straw is bleached and combined with rags, and made into fair printing paper.

Several thousand pounds of paper are turned out here daily. Several mills are in constant operation, grinding the straw and the rags into pulp, when by the most improved paper mills it is drawn out into continuous rolls of paper six feet wide and perhaps five miles long. The pulp is drawn out, of course, in the wet state, but is taken over heated cylinders, which press it smoothly and dry it thoroughly, so that in a very few minutes from the time the material leaves the vat in the form of homogeneous pulp it is drawn out in an even and smooth roll of paper, dried and calendered, and either wound on cylinders for shipping, or cut into sheets of the usual sizes and bound in reams and bundles as the laws of the trade demand. I have visited paper mills before, but am always interested in witnessing the process of taking dirty rags and coarse straw, and by virtue of rapid-running mills, grinding, and bleaching processes, to see this unsightly material converted in so short a time into good commercial paper. Requiring not a little of paper in my own publishing business, I very naturally looked with interest over this extensive establishment. I saw a large body of bales of straw, perhaps containing two hundred pounds each, laid up somewhat in the form of a huge barn, but solid, with a roof over it, the mass being two or three hundred feet in length, seventy-five feet in width, and nearly the same in hight, the whole containing fifteen thousand bales. There can be no doubt, in riding over this San Joaquin valley, that the material for manufacturing straw paper will always be abundant here, and to be had at as reasonable prices as any place in the world.

THE RECEPTION.

At 8 o'clock in the evening a meeting took place at Turner Hall, which was held in my honor, and to give me a welcome to this beautiful city. Dr. A. S. Hudson presided at the meeting, making the speech of welcome and giving very sensible remarks upon the good that scientific thought and instruction have done in advancing the views of mankind. He spoke highly of the labors of Darwin, Huxley, and others, and credited them with doing perhaps more to emancipate mankind from the thraldom of theological errors than all other influences. The music by Dreyfoose's band was very good, and added not a little to the enjoyability of the occasion. I followed in remarks of about an hour, dilating principally upon the religious superstitions I had seen on my journey around the world, and the ignorance in which the great mass of mankind are sunk, growing out of the absurd belief in gods and devils. I corroborated what had been remarked by Dr. Hudson that the teachings of science are infinitely more true and enlightening to the mind of man than all the myths of theology and mythology which priests have been so industriously teaching for thousands of years.

After the meeting, which was numerously attended, filling nicely the capacious hall, I had personal interviews with many friends who stopped to speak and shake hands with me; and what was very satisfactory, within a few minutes after the meeting was over I took in fifty dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER and my Round-the-World volumes. This made an agreeable finale to a pleasantly passed day. Stockton is a pleasant town, and its people must be called equally so.

On the following morning, as I had a few hours on my hands before train-time, I made a visit to the State Lunatic Asylum, located two or three miles outside of the city, in a northerly direction. The grounds are beautiful and the buildings commodious. I judge there are fully one hundred acres of ground belonging to the institution, and the buildings for males and females being some distance apart, there is plenty of room for all. The grounds are well laid off in vegetable gardens, flower gardens, and fruit orchards, interspersed with wide gravel walks, with an abundance of shade trees in the vicinity of the buildings; so that the entire surroundings of the homes of these poor unfortunates are made as charming as possible.

The superintendent, Dr. G. A Shurtleff, received me politely and escorted me over two or three of the buildings for male patients, and one or two for female patients, which are in about equal numbers. There are somewhat over a thousand now confined here, some one or two hundred being from Nevada, as that state has not an asylum of its own, though it has one now in course of construction.

I was struck with the cleanliness, light, and cheerfulness of the various apartments, corridors, places for exercise, etc. The system of ventilation is of a perfect character, an abundance of fresh air being conveyed to every ward and to every separate apartment. I noticed there was no dirt to be seen, and that everything was in the most perfect order throughout. A first-class hotel, with its hundreds of rooms, could hardly be better conducted.

The patients are classified according to the various degrees of their insanity. Those of a mild type are not allowed to associate with those who are wild and raving; and from fifteen to thirty of those but moderately affected are allowed to associate together in the large halls, where they have nothing to do but talk over their misfortunes and the hopes they entertain of soon being set at liberty.

As Dr. Shurtleff appeared among them in the different parts of the asylum it was almost amusing to observe how eagerly the different men would approach him and plead with him to be sent home to their friends. The great desire entertained by nearly all is to gain their liberty, and to mix in with the outside world. Several, while the doctor was listening to their complaints, supposing I possibly possessed powers to help them, came to me with their complaints and told the pitiful stories of their hardships and deprivations, of how their business was suffering from their being thus confined, of the needs their families felt for their help, and of the most urgent reasons why they should no longer be kept in confinement. Of course I sympathized with them, and gave them to understand that while I feared it was not in my power to do very much for them, if I only could wield omnipotent power for a short time I would materially improve their condition.

Dr. Shurtleff is a man of unusual presence and self-command, and I noticed he met their various complaints with great coolness, kindness, and evenness of temper. He listened patiently to their many petitions, and gave them answers which seemed to satisfy them for the time being. It is well he is a reasonable and kind-hearted man, for his position is one of great power over these poor wretches, and they are the merest and most helpless subjects of his will. He has it in his power to be their true friend, and he also has the power to be harsh, oppressive, and unfeeling toward them. Doubtless many of them are tedious, wearisome, and well calculated to tire him of their senseless importunities and vagaries.

We passed down into the yard attached to the asylum, surrounded by a wall fifteen feet high, where there were some thirty or more patients taking the sun and air. The inclosure was thoroughly paved, the wall was impenetrable, and there was about as much chance for the poor, demented creatures to escape as there would be of their flying like birds. They were differently engaged; some, imagining themselves orators, were making powerful appeals to their hearers; some were singing religious songs; some were engaged in some kinds of boyish games, while others were cursing and swearing in a most vociferous manner, and showing an excessive amount of indignation.

One fellow I especially remember; he made an impression upon my mind. He rushed from the opposite side of the area, and came up immediately before Dr. Shurtleff, and, without a moment's warning, began to reel off in this wise: "Doctor Shurtleff, I want you to understand that I am God Almighty, and if I am not let out of this place in one hour, I will level this whole institution to the ground. Yes, by God, I am God Almighty. I don't intend to be shut up here in this damned place any longer. Do you understand, Doctor Shurtleff, that I must be let out of this within sixty minutes, or the worst of fates will befall this institution? Understand, I am God Almighty, and I will teach you a lesson you have never learned!"

Dr. Shurtleff did not cower at all before this self-proclaimed god, and did not look as though he half believed what the fellow said. About all the reply he made was:

"Oh, you had better keep quiet, Jim. You do not want to be locked up in the cell again, do you? Remember, the more quiet you keep, the more liberty you will have."

"Yes, by God, though, I am God Almighty now, and all this business has got to be changed—you understand! and that damned soon. I am not to be shut up here any longer. I give you one more hour, and then you will catch it!"

"Go away, Jim, and keep quiet; that is the best thing you can do. Let me hear no more of this loud talk. Go right away."

Jim seemed to take the hint, and was soon engaged in conversation with some fellow-prisoner, several feet away.

I could not for a moment believe that he was God Almighty, though he so positively asserted that he was. I should hardly believe any one, were he to make the same assertion. True, I thought Jim acted about as Yahweh is represented, when he used to tell Moses he was God Almighty, and work himself up into a fury and threatened to burn up his people in a moment, and cut them off from the earth. Jim looked very much as I imagine Yahweh did when he got into one of his excited moods, for his eyes were wild and glaring, his manner was ferocious and well calculated to frighten children and old women. He raved, and threatened, and swore; but he calmed down like a little kitten, and did not hurt anybody. The institution stood solidly, the earth rolled steadily on its axis, the sun rose and set all the same as if no threats had been made. I don't believe Jim was God Almighty, nor do I believe Yahweh was a particle more. They were both playing a game of brag.

The inmates of the asylum sometimes get so wild and furious that they not only have to be closely confined in small cells, but they have also to be kept in strait-jackets, by which their arms are closely bound to the body, rendering them wholly unable to do harm. I occasionally, in passing through the corridors, heard the wild shriekings of those with too little reason to control themselves in the least degree. What a dreadful thing it is, indeed, for a human being to lose his reason and become worse than an idiot! Where a cure is hopeless the state is far worse than death.

It is said that in the days when Jesus was on the earth and spent a year or so in what is called his mission, he regarded all such cases of insanity as being produced by devils. He is said to have cured many cases of insanity by casting out the devil, or devils, which had caused the mischief. In the case of the poor wild man who was found among the tombs near the Sea of Galilee, there must have been a very unusual degree of insanity to contend with, or, what was about the same thing, an unusual number of devils, for Jesus is said to have driven two thousand devils out of this wretched creature, or enough, at all events, to fill two thousand swine. But that mode of treating insanity is not at all pursued in the asylum at Stockton. I perceived that Dr. Shurtleff and Dr. Brown, and their assistants, do not accept the devil theory of insanity. When an insane patient is brought to them they do not set themselves hunting for devils, nor do they in the slightest degree make themselves busy at trying to drive the devils out. They seek rather to restore the general health of the patient, under the belief that, as a rule, a healthy body produces a healthy mind; and to restore a natural state of the mind then make use of all the aids within their reach to keep the mind quiet, and to remove sources of irritation. They believe in no devils as being the cause of insanity, and they do not the first thing toward trying to cast them out. They disagree entirely with Jesus. He or they must have been in the wrong. Which is it?

I also visited the portion of the asylum for the accommodation of females, and here I found everything exquisitely neat and clean. Many of the patients occupy rooms by themselves, and in some I saw their tables set for a late breakfast, and everything looked as cosy as though they were boarders in an extensive hotel. I occasionally heard shrieks from some parts of the establishment, indicating that some of the inmates were far gone in insanity. Some looked wild indeed, and their eyes rolled in frenzy, while others looked as mild as the most sound-minded woman, and conversed with apparent good sense about their families and their anxiety to return to them.

The superintendent and directors have great power in their hands over the unfortunate beings placed under their control. It is in their power to be merciful and to show themselves good Samaritans, or they can be heartless, unfeeling, cruel, and tyrannical. That they too often show the latter qualities must with pain be confessed. The proofs accumulate in nearly all parts of the country that many persons are sent to insane asylums who are not insane at all. Sometimes a husband wishes to be rid of a wife who is no longer regarded with affection, and if he has money he can easily induce physicians to pronounce her insane, and send her to an asylum. So with a designing wife; if the husband is wealthy, and she wishes to have control of the money, it is not difficult to have him declared insane and immured within the prison cells. It is the same way with brothers and children; they have often exhibited a most unfeeling disposition, and have taken means to confine a brother or father within the dreadful walls of an asylum. It is a disgrace to physicians that they are often found to be pliant tools in this vile business, and it is equally to be regretted that superintendents and keepers are to be found who will aid in carrying out this unrighteous business. Few things are more to be abhorred than for sane persons to be deprived of their liberty and be shut up with the really insane, where they are afraid to show a particle of resistance to the injustice thus done them, lest this very resistance be urged against them as proof positive of their insanity. Many an unfortunate man and woman have in this way been for years deprived of the precious boon of liberty.

"Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn."

In the last published report of the directors of the asylum, in giving the avocations of 114 patients in the asylum is the following table: Laborers, 28; housewives, 17; farmers, 12; miners, 12; house servants, 2; bookkeepers, 2; sheep-herders, 2; teachers, 2; housekeepers, 2; washerwomen, 2; blacksmiths, 1; policemen, with one each of saloon-keepers, musicians, stewards, book accountants, mechanics, lawyers, salesmen, tanners, stock raisers, confectioners, carriage painters, carriage trimmers, gardeners, wood-choppers, cooks in camp, carpenters, machinists, glove-makers, barbers, cabinet-makers, teamsters, etc.

In another table giving the causes of insanity appears the following: Masturbation, 12; intemperance, 8; business troubles, 6; hereditary predisposition, 6; epilepsy, 5; the same brought on by fighting fire, 1; injury to the head, 4; domestic troubles, 4; dissipation, 2; syphilis, 2; overstudy, 2; Spiritualism, 2; religious excitement, 4; inflammation of the brain, 1; sunstroke, 1; protracted illness, 1; exposure to weather 1, with one each of several other causes.

Of these 114 patients the following classification is made:

Mania, 51.
Monomania, 22.
Melancholia, 12.
Dementia, 29.

Returning to the city, I looked around the town somewhat, and among other places called upon the public library recently organized.

Total number of books, 3,640.
Donated, 450.
Circulated the first year, 1,700.
Orders for books now out, 1,000.
Borrowers having cards, 1,212.

Citizens have the books free; those outside make a deposit of ten dollars. Novels form the great bulk of the books borrowed.

At one o'clock, dinner having been partaken of and finding my bill at the hotel had been paid, I betook myself to the station, and was ready for the train. Three hours through a pleasant, fertile country brought us to Sacramento, where we stopped till nearly sundown, when the regular eastern train came along from San Francisco. Soon it began to grow dark, and ere long we had reached the elevated lands and began to ascend the mountains, and to approach the eastern boundary of the state. And now as the recital of my twenty days in California is over, it is the proper place to come in with

The Rev. John Smith Responds.

This divine livs a long way off, as it has taken from the 23d of September till now for his response to our replies to his questions to reach us. And while he does not bring a formidable array of argument to back up his positions, we must giv place to what he has to say, and reply to such mistakes he so easily runs into. Here is his last:

MR. EDITOR: A copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, containing your answers to my six questions, was placed in my hand by a friend from whom I occasionally borrow Liberal papers. I would subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but there are two serious objections to my doing so. First, there is quite a sprinkling of articles occasionally printed in its columns that border on the obscene; hence, I do not think it would be for the best to allow children to read it. You will perhaps say that these articles are taken from a biblical standpoint and are Bible language; but there is no excuse for you to parade even Bible quotations, if they are unfit for children to read. Obscene language is no purer in THE TRUTH SEEKER than in the Bible. If you claim the Bible is obscene, why print obscene quotations from it in your paper? Do you think it will be any more beneficial for children to read it in THE TRUTH SEEKER than the Bible? I admit that there are passages in the Bible that are unfit for children to read until they hav become of maturity; but pray tell me if Christians teach their children to read such passages? I do not believe one child in one hundred knows such passages exist—and, even then, it probably has been the work of some Infidel who wishes to cast ridicule on the Bible.

Another objection to THE TRUTH SEEKER is, it demonstrates too much of the immoral doctrins of Spiritualism. Of all the beliefs in the world, that is the most silly, the most ridiculous, and the most corrupting. I hav known a great many Spiritualists, and I hav seen but few who were moral people, and I judge from that that Spiritualism has a tendency to corrupt society. It causes more insanity and disturbance in family affairs—more divorce cases—than any belief that has ever been known to man. They teach no teachings that are ennobling or beneficial to the human family; their meetings and seances are nothing but frauds, cheered on by a lazy crowd of mediums and spiritual healers, who bleed the poor dupes of their coin, and laugh in their sleeves at the unsophisticated greenness of people who cannot see through their own superstition. Spiritualism is based on undemonstrable claims. I hav challenged different mediums to answer to some tests, doing so for the purpose of demonstrating the truth or falsity of their claims, but I cannot find one who is willing to stand the test.

Now in regard to your answers to my questions. To my first you make some queer remarks. You say: "That Jesus once lived is not a self-evident fact any more than the assertion hat such characters once lived as Aladdin, Sindbad, Crusoe, nd others." Why, my dear sir, I hav never heard it claimed at they were historical characters; but millions claim that Jesus was. Is not your comparison rather flimsy, when pagan and Jewish writers of early date admit that Jesus once lived—yes, even learned Infidels admit that he was once a dweller on this earth? Then, again, you admit there might hav been an humble individual who might hav assumed to be the rightful ruler of that country, and was crucified, etc. But it would be queer if an humble, obscure man was served that way. He must hav had power and influence to hav incurred the wrath and jealousy of a king. I would like for you to giv some authority for asserting that the Christian chronology was first instituted in the eighth century. As you are a spreader of light, you should, when making claims, giv the source of your light, as people do not like ipse dixit assertions and claims.

To my second, you claim that because Brahma, Siva, and Christna were myths, Christ must hav been. How do you know that even they were myths? They might hav been prominent men, who were deified after death by their superstitious followers.

To my third and fourth questions you address the myth idea to help you out. Infidels use the myth argument to help them out of a hard corner. I suppose you would also claim that Noah, Abraham, Solomon, Philo, Tacitus, and other notable historical characters are myths.

Your reply to my sixth question I admit, after investigation, is correct. Tell was probably a brave man who lived and died in Switzerland, and after death his history has had a great deal of the mythical attached to it.

In regard to the six questions you hav submitted to me, I will gladly avail myself of the opportunity to throw light on some things that look dark to you.

To your first, I would say yes; all the early fathers of the church—Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Polycarp, Irenæus, Eusebius, and pagan writers, such as Celsus, Porphyry, Emperor Julian, Hierocles, Eunomius—all testify to Christ. St. Paul, I think you will admit, is testimony that cannot be disputed. Is that sufficient for you?

To your second, I shall also emphatically say yes. Does not St. Paul speak of Jesus as a living man and god? Was not St. Paul contemporaneous with Christ? The four gospels must be accepted as genuin until you can prove different. They will stand as testimony to Christ.

To your third: It is immaterial whether the gospels were written by the persons whose names they bear or not. Does it make them any the less reliable?

To your fourth: Yes. Do not the early fathers who lived before the year 181 make extensiv quotations from the gospels? It will not do to say they copied from older existing writings, for even then it would not prove the gospels false. A copy can be as true as the original. Gerostratus, in his apology to the emperor, Adrian, in the year 125, refers to the gospels. Eusebius speaks of Clement's account of the origin of the gospel of Mark; also of the statement of Papias that Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew. There is other proof which can be adduced to prove the gospels, or the originals, were in existence before the year 181.

My reply to your fifth question is this: I admit that nearly all of the dogmas and rites of our religion were practiced by pagans. I find some twenty of the early fathers of Christianity testifying to that fact, directly or indirectly; but, even then, does that make those dogmas and rites any the less divine? The pagans borrowed them from the Jews, and the Jews received them from God.

To your sixth I will reply by asking you if Christna was a demi-god or savior? Was he crucified? Did he perform miracles? Was he divinely begotten? If so, please giv your authority for the history and claims of Christna; and we will compare the historical evidences of the two, and leave it to the judgment of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to decide whether you can adduce as good evidence in favor of Christna as can be brought forward in favor of the historical Jesus of Nazareth. If you can do so, please do so. As I am searching for the truth, and as yourself claims to be a truth seeker, perhaps I can help you to find it; or, if you hav some truths which I am not versed in, I am not going to ignore truth, no matter where it comes from. The truth is the truth, even if given or spoken by Satan. I do not wish you to take this as comparing you to Satan. I do not see why you condemn Christianity as it is to-day. I admit some over-zealous Christians of the past hav been a disgrace to the true religion, but what nation, religion, or sect of people hav not persecuted? And right here I would like to ask you this: Is it not a self-evident fact that if the Infidels had the power they would persecute all who differed from them? All religions hav persecuted more or less; but to-day Christianity is a necessity, even if it was not divine, as it teaches men and women to do right. Do Christians persecute now? No. Do they teach immorality? No. Do not Christians build colleges? Yes. Do not Christians favor equal rights to all? Yes. Are not Christian nations the most civilized? Yes. Then why do you fight it?

On the other hand, do Infidels build colleges? No. What do they do? Tear down and do not build. I will admit that the more Atheistical some men are, the less they stray from doing right, and it is a mystery to me why it is so, and to me it is unaccountable why it should be so. I know from my experience with Infidels, I hav always found them honorable and just men and women, while again I hav seen ministers who were villains. I know some ministers make unwarrantable attacks on Infidels, and often misrepresent them in regard to their morals; but they are over-zealous, and Infidels should not judge Christianity by what some of its believers do, but should search for Christ and be saved, for good works alone will not save them.

Search the Bible for truth, pray to God with faith in him, try to seek for comfort in Jesus, and he will answer you. You cannot find out God's love and mercy by ridiculing his works.

Hoping you will publish this and answer it, I remain yours, believing in Christ, (REV.) JOHN SMITH.

Hillsboro, Oregon, Oct. 10, 1882.

REPLY.

It will be seen that the reverend gentleman, before attempting to disprove the answers we had made to his inquiries, undertakes to arraign THE TRUTH SEEKER, calling it an obscene paper. We are sorry to see the gentleman descend to such slander, and to make the charge without bringing a particle of proof to sustain it. Every honorable man, when making such an offensiv charge, should justify it by proof. This the Rev. John Smith does not do. He is content to denounce the paper as obscene without adducing a single instance where if has been so. We undertake to say he charges the paper falsely, and that it is not obscene. It has never published an obscene article or word, unless, possibly, in quoting parts of the Bible, which is held up to us as God's word, and perfect in every particular. It is placed in every family, in every Sunday-school, before every child in the land, and we certainly are entitled to quote correctly from it to show what it contains. If the Rev. John Smith rejects THE TRUTH SEEKER because it is obscene, how much more should he reject the Bible for the same reason! If THE TRUTH SEEKER, because it contains some quotations from the Bible, is unfit for the children to read, how much more unfit is the Bible itself to be placed in the hands of children! When the reverend gentleman admits the Bible contains portions unfit for children to read, why does he not condemn it, cast it aside, or seek to expurgate it of the foul and objectionable features?

Another objection is that THE TRUTH SEEKER "demonstrates too much the immoral doctrins of Spiritualism." We hardly know what the gentleman means. We are not aware that THE TRUTH SEEKER has made such demonstration as he points out. Neither are we aware that the doctrins of Spiritualism are immoral. In many respects they agree closely with the doctrins of Christianity. Spiritualists believe that human beings continue to liv in spirit form after this life is over. So do Christians. Spiritualists believe that the dead hav the power to communicate with the living. So do Christians, and all their claims about the spirits of the dead holding communications with the living are directly upon this claim. Christians are clearly and distinctly Spiritualists, and it cannot be successfully denied.

As to the morals of Spiritualists, we are unable to say what the Rev. Mr. Smith knows about them, but as far as our own experience extends we must say we hav found them as moral and to lead as good lives as any other class of people. They teach that man's condition in the future depends upon his good or bad conduct here, and there is certainly nothing very immoral about that, nor is it the belief calculated to make one immoral. The statement that Spiritualism causes more insanity and family disturbances than any other belief is wholly unproved. The statistics of the various insane asylums show there are far more cases of insanity caused by a belief in Christianity than by a belief in Spiritualism. While the morality of believers in Spiritualism formed no part of the questions propounded in our friend's interrogatories, we trust he will not be unjust, and slander them as being more immoral than Christians.

1. To recur to the questions under consideration, our friend objects to our saying that the assertion that Jesus ever lived is not a self-evident fact. The assertion that any person lived does not make it a self-evident fact. Thousands of characters hav been said to hav lived which never did liv; and the simple assertion that they lived by no means makes it a self-evident fact or a fact of any kind. Nor does the belief of millions that any given character lived make it in the slightest degree true; and unless there is other proof to rest the claim upon it must fall to the ground. Unfortunately, there is a great weakness touching the life and mission of Jesus. There might hav been a person by the name of Jesus, but there is no historical confirmation of it. Our friend is very far from the truth when he says that pagan and Jewish writers of early date admit that Jesus once lived. No such writers do anything of the kind. No pagan writer confirms his existence, and no Jewish writer mentions him save Josephus, and the mention made by him of Jesus is forcibly lugged in without any connection with the text. He is made to speak of Jesus as no orthodox Jew, as he was, could possibly speak of one who was claimed to be the son of God. The allusion to Jesus in Josephus is clearly spurious—an interpolation, and the best judges for hundreds of years hav pronounced it false. And this is the only contemporaneous writer in the first century who does so much as mention the name of Jesus. This is indeed a most weak confirmation by which to establish the validity of the story.

We are at a loss to know what our friend means when he says learned Infidels admit that he was once a dweller on the earth. What learned Infidels does he refer to? None of them hav any means of knowing that Jesus had a real existence, and their admission that such a person might hav lived proves nothing.

Our friend talks as though it is absurd for a humble and obscure man to be executed for making pretensions to the throne. That is by no means true. A great majority of the people who hav been publicly executed were humble and obscure.

2. Our friend calls for authority to sustain us that Christian chronology was first instituted in the eighth century. If he will note closely what we said he will see we did not say it was first introduced in the eighth century. We said the application was first made in the sixth century, was not introduced into Gaul till the eighth century, and into England nearly a century later. For authority for this we refer him to the greatest cyclopedia of the world, the Encyclopedia Britannica, under the article on "Chronology." The People's Cyclopedia says the Christian era was not generally adopted till the middle of the fifteenth century.

3. Our reverend friend suggests that Brahma, Siva, and Christna were real characters, men in the body, not myths; but inasmuch as no claim has ever been set up that they were corporeal persons—yes, and as by the common consent of the literary world they were myths, we are quite justified in so regarding them. We regard all as myths who are held to hav performed wonderful miracles, or, at least, that part of the claims set up about them is mythical. Our friend's slur about Infidels using the myth argument is rather far-fetched, and does not amount to much. Nothing is more certain in the world than that the literature and religious claims of the past millenniums are replete with myths, and the Rev. Smith cannot successfully deny it. We do not claim that Christ was a myth because Brahma, Siva, and Christna were, but because there is much that is mythical in his claims, and because his story is very imperfectly corroborated. Our friend does not go far astray when he supposes that such characters as Noah, Abraham, Solomon, etc., are regarded by us as myths. We do not believe that such persons ever had a real existence. There is no corroborativ proof that such persons ever lived. Abraham was about as close a copy of the Hindoo Brahma as the names are alike. Max Muller, in articles now appearing in the Nineteenth Century, is showing how much of the Hebrew theological story was borrowed from the Hindoos. He makes a strong case of it. The Rev. Smith will do well to read it. And again, Moses was simply a copy of the Menu of India, the Menes of Egypt, and the Minos of Greece. who were all noted law-givers. If there was such a wonderful man as Solomon, with his thousand wives and concubines, with his brilliant court, with his magnificent temple, all surpassing in splendor and richness all the other kings of the earth, it is very singular that nobody else ever knew anything about it save the writer of Jewish fable. There were other historians in those days, and who followed on closely afterward, including Berosus, of Chaldea; Herodotus, of Greece; and Diodorus and Xenophon, of the same country. They seem never to hav heard of Solomon and his wonderful glory. Herodotus made two extensiv journeys through Syria, of which Palestine is a part, not long after the time alluded to as Solomon's. He wrote full histories of what he saw and what existed, but he had not a word to say of the riches and glory of such a person as Solomon, and the only rational conclusion is that no such person existed. I repeat, if there was such a man, no other nation or people ever heard of him. The Bible claim that he should be more known and honored of all nations than any other king in the earth is clearly untrue. As to Philo and Tacitus, there is the clearest proofs that they existed. The slur that they were myths amounts to nothing.

4. It is gratifying that Brother Smith has received satisfaction on the William Tell subject, and he is honorable in acknowledging that additions were made to the story of Tell after his death, the same as has been done by many others.

5. As our clerical friend has no objections to bring with reference to what we had to say relativ to the Christian era being founded upon the story of Jesus, though eight hundred years or more afterward; about the number of Christians in existence being no special truth of the story of Jesus; about the probability of Jesus and other religious characters being myths, of the remarks we made about Buddha and Mohammed, it is gratifying to see that he gracefully acknowledges the truth of what we said. If he could hav refuted our remarks he assuredly would hav attempted it.

6. Upon the subject of the questions which we put to him he needs a little more light, which we will cheerfully impart. His replies exhibit a degree of ignorance hardly pardonable in a clergyman who assumes to discuss the subjects and to set Infidels right. To our first question, "Is there any reliable history about Jesus save what is contained in the four gospels attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; if so, please name it?" he replies, "Yes, all the early fathers of the church, Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Polycarp, Irenæus, Eusebius, and pagan writers, such as Celsus, Porphyry, Emperor Julian, Hierocles, Eunomius, all testify of Christ." Here is dishonesty or ignorance—and which to place in advance we scarcely know. Not one of the persons among the Christian fathers named claimed to ever hav known Jesus, or to hav seen him, and not one of them attempted to write his history. To show how weak and dishonest Brother Smith's positions are it is only necessary to inform him that Irenæus did not flourish till the latter part of the second century, a hundred and fifty years after the time of Jesus's death, and Eusebius was in the fourth century, and knew just as much about the real existence of Jesus as the Rev. John Smith does himself. They neither of them attempted to write a history of Jesus, and had they done so they were so erratic and untruthful that their statements would not hav been entitled to credit. The dishonesty, also, of attempting to prove the existence of Jesus by pagan writers whose main effort was to show that no such Methodism and Spiritualism Indentical.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am delighted with the true spirit manifested by our noble and outspoken brothers, S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich., and Thomas Winter, of Cincinnati, O., in their letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 21st ult. It is wondrous strange that so many of our professed and supposed unqualified Liberals should include among the noble, outspoken, daring band of Liberal and courageous speaking anti-supernatural fanatics, the class so well known as Spiritualists—a sect that hav existed for more than a century, although at times under other synonymous names, Theosophists, etc., especially since the latter-day developments commencing in the village of Arcadia, N. Y., in 1847, in the family of Michael Weekman, and ultimately "developing" in the family of John D. Fox, who were Methodists, and moved into the house in December, 1847, formerly occupied by the Weekman family, and where the great Fox Spiritual nonsense emanated from, and whence hav grown the numerous Spiritual necromancers that are traveling over the land with their banjoes, bells, horns, and rope-tying nonsense practiced before the thousands of credulous, who sit like so many idiots looking for something mysterious to come from the well-known old "cabinet!" Did ever worse folly exist in a thoroughly organized Methodist camp-meeting? I claim that all of this nonsense is cut from the same piece, and, to giv the doubter positiv evidence, I will quote a portion of a letter from Baron De Liebestoef Kirchberger to Louis Claude De St. Martin, in a work giving a large correspondence between the two last-named individuals, published in London in 1863. This letter was written at Morat, July 25, 1795, viz.: "Accept my thanks, sir, for your kind and interesting letter of the 12th inst. . . . . There are some people for whom the reading of Theosophic works would be too strong diet, to whom, as opportunity offered, we might present the works of Madam Guyon to awaken a love for the spirit of Christianity; but her works are getting scarce in France. . . . . You were good enough to say, sir, in your last letter, amongst other things of much interest on the subject of these powers, that it is necessary to classify them; but, to do this, it is necessary to enumerate them.'

"This is quite a new thing for me, and beyond my competence, beyond my knowledge; I shall therefore most thankfully receive all the information you may think it right to communicate to me on these matters. Your remarks on visions particularly struck me. No doubt in the school you mention the master imparted sufficient ideas for discerning and distinguishing between good powers and those which are not so. I picture to myself that there are both external and internal manifestations, in both of which visions may hav place, so that it is a matter of importance to be able to discern them. I believe the best perscription to insure safety from every unfavorable influence is to hav an entire confidence in the love and power of the great principle, a trust, before which visions will vanish like shades before the rising sun. The school you passed through in your youth reminds me of a conversation I had two years ago with a person who came from England, and who knew a Frenchman living there, Mons. de Hantrive. He told me that this De Hantrive enjoyed, physically, the acquaintance of the activ and intelligent cause, which he arrived at after sundry preparatory operations during the equinoxes, by means of a species of disorganization, in which he saw his own body motionless, as it were, separated from his soul; but that this disorganization was dangerous, on account of the visions, which then hav more power over the soul thus separated from the covering which served it as a shield against their action.

"You can tell me whether, according to your former master's teachings, these proceedings of M. de Hantrive were error or truth. Another cause is that of the Marchioness de Lacroix, who must hav had manifestations. I am told she had them even when in company, and that she suspended the conversation to hear what her friends in another circle said to her. You doubtless hav heard of Madam de Lacroix; was she under illusion or the truth?

"I agree with you entirely 'that since our being is central, it must find all the help needful for its existence in the center where it had its birth.'

"To come to this center, even in this life, is the aim of our desires; between this center and ourselvs there are intermediates; there are obstacles to overcome, and success to receive. The grand thing, no doubt, is the inward secret way. What will help us is, I think, to consider the secondary virtues as agents, not as distributors of favors, and to receive what they giv us with thankfulness to the great giver, but to address our souls and our worship to the fountain-head, the principle himself. One of the grand means of approach which he teaches is, I believe, to do his will. Now, to do his will is to assimilate ourselvs to his agents, and thereby facilitate their work upon us.

"As for the manifestations, whether interior or exterior, I look upon them as means for increasing our faith, our hope, our charity, which is an inestimable advantage; but even in this let us submit all to the supreme will. If he thinks fit to open our eyes, he will do it; if not, the way to faith without light cannot be displeasing to the great principle. Blessed are those who, without seeing, hav believed. How truly you say 'when by grace on high our spirit has attained its full stature, then the elements become its subjects, and even slaves, instead of simply servants, which they were before!' Our spirit attains its proper stature, it seems to me, when we no longer liv our own life, when the verb livs in us in all his fulness, and absorbs all our faculties, and our spirit loses itself, so to speak, in his. This, the highest degree attainable by man, is what may be called the perfecting insurity. Then it is no more we who act, but the creator acting for us, and who commands the elements. That this apostolic state is still possible in our time I do not doubt for an instant; not reason only but experience proves it. I will mention one instance. When Father Lacombe was crossing the Lake of Geneva such a storm arose that the boatmen had lost all hope; then Father Lacombe commanded the waves to be still, and there was an immediate calm. This fact is related by an eye-witness, whose probity is above all suspicion. (See Life of Madam Guyon.)

"You communicate to me a very interesting idea, viz., that the good agents, when they make themselvs visible, make use of a light of their own, which is hidden in the elements.

"The little physical knowledge I possess makes this interpretation more than probable. Please to point out to me the particular treatis of Jacob Boehme where this is affirmed. . . . . I hav before told you that I found a volume of his works in quarto, 1675. I hav now, while waiting, received three volumes more in octavo, 1682. I giv you, at foot, the titles of all the treatises I now possess, that you may refer to them in any explanations you may please to giv me, or that I may help you to their rendering in French, if you should find yourself at fault. The little I hav seen of these works strikes me much. On some points I see a remarkable solidity and clearness; on others, an obscurity which would hav stopped me short if you had not encouraged me.

"Jacob Boehme is truly the foremost man of his age. Hiel and Jane Lead are acquaintances for which I hav to thank you. . . . . You approve of the rule which I consider most essential for progress in the light. It is the very strait gate through which everybody must pass. Madam Guyon calls what is opposed to the suppression of self, selfhood. My present letter is so long that I reserve my quotations from the 'Tableau Natural,' and my second observation on elementary nature for another post. I flatter myself with the sweet hope that the same center will bring us continually nearer together, feeling persuaded that the only true and enduring liaisons, here below, are those which are based upon the love of the great principle whom we both adore."

Thus all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER can see that all that was characterized in ye olden time as the truly good and at all bordering on the really honest hav, in our modern stamp of Spiritualism, entirely disappeared; and such creatures as now make Spiritualism a profession to travel and use as a swindling machine, would bring the blush of shame over the countenance of the severe old theosophists, or, as now so called, Spiritualists. Let our ranks be kept free from anything of the kind, and let us build our Liberal, intellectual edifice free from anything bordering upon the supernatural; and when a Protestant of any grade, or a Catholic, or Spiritualist, Mormon, or Henry Ward Beecher sloughs off the miracles and their imaginary Jesuses, we will gladly giv them our hand; but such disturbing elements as the past history of the whole lot has shown them to be, are better outside. The same rule that governs spiritual seances and orthodox sacramental tables will, in my opinion, be well for us to adopt. We want none but such as can unqualifiedly say we are not believers in anything but what can be logically shown to be true and really in existence, of which we hav some evidence that at some time in the past it existed.

M. O. WAGGONER.

Professor Haeckel in Ceylon.

"My frugal dinner at an end, I usually took a solitary walk on the shore, or delighted my eyes with the sight of the illumination of the palm woods by myriads of fire-flies and glow-worms. Then I made a few entries in my note book, or tried to read by the light of a cocoanut oil lamp. But I was generally quite tired enough to go to bed soon after nine o'clock, after another careful shaking of the clothes for the expulsion of scorpions and millipeds.

"The great black scorpion (nearly a foot long) is so common in Ceylon that I once collected half a dozen in the course of an hour. Snakes exist also in great numbers. Slender green snakes hang from almost every bough, and at night the great rat snake (Coryphodon blumenbachii) hunts rats and mice over the roofs of the huts. Although they are harmless and their bite not poisonous, it is by no means a pleasant surprise when one of these rat snakes, five feet long, suddenly drops through a hole in the roof into one's room, occasionally alighting on the bed.

"On the whole, however, my nights in Belligam were but little disturbed by animal intruders, although I was often kept awake by the howling of jackals and the uncanny cry of the devil bird (a kind of owl, Syrnium indrani) and other night birds. The bell-like cry of the pretty little tree-frogs which make their dwelling in the cups of large flowers, acted rather as a slumber song. But I was far oftener kept awake by the whirl of my own thoughts, by the recollection of the many events of the past day, and the anticipation of that which was to come. A brilliant succession of lovely scenes, of interesting observations, and varied experiences mingled in my brain with plans of fresh enterprise and new discoveries for the morrow."

The Bright Side, as Elmina Sees It.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MRS. HEDDON.

FRIEND HEDDON: I take thy letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 14th as an invitation to say a few words more for the Materialistic, or godless and finite, side of the question. I do not call the processes of the universe a ceaseless rush of blind forces, propelling senseless matter "through Time's rough billows into Night's abyss;" but believe there is a never-ceasing, never-ending chain of cause and effect running through all matter, and causing all we see, hear, and comprehend, and all that we do not see, hear, or understand. Saline water crystallizes into its own peculiar crystals, just as saccharine does into its own. Pearls, opals, and diamonds form according to natural and inherent laws or forces inseparable from matter, under those peculiar circumstances that produce them. The "senseless matter" is governed and controled by its own laws and properties, precisely as that which embodies our own human sense and perception. We are but a bundle of "blind forces," as much as is the storm or the whirlwind. The countless causes that combined to form us precisely as we are were just as much the inevitable as anything you may call chance or "blind force." What we are is the result of all past; what we shall be depends upon every incident of the future that influences us or our surroundings. We shall, of course, as individuals, sink at last into "Night's abyss;" but it will be only a dreamless sleep that never ends. If for thee there were no waking from Night's sleep, would it make one jot of difference to thee? Thee could not know it, for thee would be nothing and nowhere. Like the light of a lamp that is blown out, the soul, mind, and self of a person ends when life's flickering blaze is extinguished. I do not say I do not "desire to liv on," but desires do not create certainties, else would we all be forever good, rich, happy, and wise.

As it is inevitable that we die, all that we can do is to try and leave a clean and useful record behind us.

Is it no stimulus to heroism, inspiration, and courage to feel that each good deed done, each good word spoken, and each good thought generated by us will add to the world's happiness all along the coming future of its inhabitants?

The poetic sentiment that "reaches out for the unseen" can revel as gloriously in dreams of beauty, love, and progress, to be realized here on earth, as it can in fancying impossible realms in an impossible future. When a child, I was inordinately fond of reading fairy tales, and all the poetry of my nature was spent in weaving dreams of fairy lands; but they were like thy dreams of the wished-for "summer-land"—empty visions, where reason finds no foothold on reality.

As to admiring a glorious sunset, or a beautiful landscape, through Materialistic eyes, only a true poetic Materialist can judge of this. It is impossible for thee to fancy what a mind differently constituted from thy own can see, comprehend, or feel.

When mythology filled every stream and fountain with its sea-nymphs and water-gods, every tree with its hamadryad, every cool cave, every mountain, and every cloud with its invisible deities, the believers therein would hav termed nature dry and bald indeed with these living spirits gone from it. As we read the lines of the immortal Homer, when he says:

> The saffron morn, with early blushes spread,
> Now rose refulgent from Tithonus' bed,
> With new-born day to gladden mortal sight,
> And gild the courts of heaven with sacred light;
> When baleful Eris, sent by Jove's command—
> The torch of discord blazing in her hand—
> Through the red skies her bloody sign extends,
> And, wrapped in tempests, all the fleet descends.
> High on Ulysses' bark, her horrid stand
> She took, and thundered through the seas and land,

We at once take in the whole grand scene. We see the "saffron morn" represented as the fair goddess Aurora, dressed in her yellow robes, leaving her husband in bed while she stepped out in the yard and threw back her veil, thus dispersing the shades of night, and then with "rosy fingers" opening the "gates of day" and flooding all the heavens and the earth with "sacred light." We see Eris, or, as the Greeks called her, Discord, with her pale face, torn garments, and eyes sparkling with hate and malignancy, descending in tempest with her blazing torch in hand, and at last standing in the vessel of Ulysses. We feel that old Jove, on his Olympian throne, is as much a real personage as Yahweh on his golden throne, and that life, as Homer saw it, would be dull, tasteless, and unpoetic robbed of all these impalpable deities; but we know them to be only myths, just as are all other gods of which the world has records. All existences save those of earth—those who come up out of unorganized into organized matter, hav their brief existence here, and forever pass away—are as mythical as the lovely Aurora or the baleful Eris. If there are other worlds, where other existences come and go, they, too, are mortal and finite, and are no more to us than is the tiniest insect that flits in the still evening air of the antipodes.

I see nothing more divine in nature than her beauty, her grandeur, and her suitableness to that which is. Good men and good women are the only divinities the future will recognize. We look on the dark side of nature and exclaim with Walt Whitman:

I see all the menials of the earth laboring;
I see all the prisoners in the prisons;
I see the defectiv human bodies of the earth—
The blind, the deaf and dumb, idiots, hunchbacks, lunatics;
The pirates, thieves, betrayers, murderers, slave-makers of the earth;
The helpless infants, and helpless old men and women.

And no god lifts a finger to make one of them good, useful, beautiful, or happy. Then I turn to the "bright side:"

Afoot and light-hearted, I take to the open wood,
Healthy, free, and the world before me,
The long, brown path before me leading wherever I choose;
I hear the workman singing, and the farmer's wife singing;
I hear in the distance the sounds of children and of animals early in the day.
The earth—that is sufficient;
I do not want the constellations any nearer;
I know they are very well where they are;
I know they suffice for those who belong to them.

Snowville, Va., Oct. 27, 282.

Windy Winter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The communications of Thomas Winter are decidedly windy, and his unsupported assertions and assumptions are equaled by none, excepting those of the pulpit pounder and Bible expounder. His antipathy toward Spiritualists seems on the increase, and all the spite and venom embodied in his nature, which I judge is no small amount, appears to flow forth in unlimited quantities on the heads of those who think man is something more than a structure of organized matter. The thoughts of a future life, where the loved and lost will be united, where a brighter and happier existence awaits us, seem to rouse feelings of anger and resistance, and he is determined that he won't liv hereafter, any way.

Perhaps if he could hav been consulted, he would never hav honored this world with his presence, but he came without will or desire, and in all probability will thus enter the next. He talks about "venom and abuse which fall harmlessly on him;" and thinks the "ghostists," whom he refers to as hornets, would like to sting the life out of him; and here we see where imagination is working, for he cannot refer to a correspondent that has "abused" him, and as for any "hornet ghostist" wanting to end his earthly career, and the only life he expects to liv, it is the hight of absurdity. Like the man with the tremors, he is pursued with invisible and imaginary enemies, and he clings to the idea that his rabid utterances hav given the death-blow to Spiritualism.

Not so, Mr. Winter, and I hav yet to learn of one Spiritualist whose knowledge has been shaken in the least by any article from your pen. Don't place too much value on the importance of your effusions, and you will avoid serious disappointment.

Spiritualists are not all fools because so regarded by T. Winter; if they were, his communications might hav a different effect. He would do well to heed his own advice about not tearing shirts, keeping cool, etc., for he appears the most excited on this, to him, distasteful subject, of any person who tries to discuss it. I would recommend that he sit on ice when he feels one of these spells coming on, for it might hav a beneficial effect. He sets up a man of straw, and knocks him down with one "right from the shoulder," by asserting that no land anywhere exists which is occupied by disembodied humanity. What Spiritualist ever claimed there was? Set up another, Thomas.

He stands, so he asserts, firmly and squarely upon the great plain of nature, and when he asserts that such and such things are impossible we are to take it for granted that he has penetrated all of nature's secrets. Wonderful, marvelous man! Having done this, when he "emphatically" declares man does not hav two lives and cannot realize a second state of existence, the whole thing is settled—in his mind—and when we die we are as dead as he some time hopes to be.

In closing, his lofty remarks terminate thus: "Now, sir, I shall take no further notice of superstitious cavilers, and make no reply to their scurrilous scribbling." Query: Who are these "scurrilous scribblers" of whom he'll take no further notice? Mr. Winter, you go a step too far, and hav yet to learn what "scurrilous" means, or your hatred of Spiritualism transcends your common sense.

Unsupported assertions are not arguments, and when a man attempts to enlighten others his "I emphatically deny," or "I emphatically assert," soon gets stale; and unless he can support these assertions and denials, his efforts, if intended to accomplish anything, had better be devoted to something else, say muscular labor, where his brain can hav a rest.

Hoping T. Winter will giv this a thought, as well as the ice suggestion, I am, yours truly,

The Employment of Tobacco.

From the London Lancet.

As long ago as 1854, Marshal St. Arnaud, when at Varna, wrote to the Intendant of the War Department: "Have you sent tobacco for the troops? It is very important, for tobacco is undoubtedly the best means we possess to prevent attacks of nostalgia and to alleviate the miseries of the bivouac." General Brac, again, in his "Traite des avant Postes," strongly insists that a taste for smoking should be cultivated in the light cavalry, on the ground that it keeps him awake, employs spare moments that would otherwise be employed in thinking, and keeps him near his horse, which he sees has its forage and is not abused. "How comforting it is!" he adds; "in the early morning; it drives away sleep, and renders the rain less cold, thirst less severe." The pipe, again, demands a steel and some tinder, and the implements for the production of the bivouac fire are therefore always at hand. But there is another side to all this. Dr. Blanchet, an army surgeon, writes that "constant association with the soldier, and inquiring into the effects of smoking, hav taught him that the illness of many men is to be traced to the abuse of tobacco alone. Ulcers on the lips, in the mouth, on the tongue, in the nose, necrosis of the maxilary bones, are not uncommon results of its use. Others suffer frightfully from gastralgia, gastritis, and enteritis; others from vertigo, mental debility, and even transient attacks of mania." Who is in error here, the general or the surgeon? What hav our English surgeons to say to it? In moderation, as Sir B. Brodie said long ago, it probably acts as a calamativ to the nervous system, especially when in a condition of excitement and worry, and its abuse only should be deprecated.

Mistaken Mr. Perry.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Brother Perry uses much obscure language to explain away the clearest facts. Every skilful anatomist knows that the brain is not only the organ of thought, sense, and consciousness, but the grand and only battery for all nerve sensitivness. Not one particle of feeling could be experienced, or one moment's consciousness, if no brain existed; and as to life germs, everything might hav life germs. But it doth not imply that such germs are imperishable—no, sir. If this theological soul is nothing but a germ, then it is the weakest of arguments in favor of an eternal existence. Nothing is more easily destroyed than germs. Beating around the bush, in order to make black white, is unworthy of any man who lays claim to sound sense and honest purposes. Now, I think Brother Perry hath more than a glimmer of intelligence, and if he would only employ it in a better cause, his mind would be less obtuse and far more solid, and doubtless much more content. I hav long discovered that the speculativ portion of mankind on the supernatural axiom are pretty much torn up, all the time, on this antimundane theory. Now, nearly all men of science hav discarded the delusiv idea that mind makes matter. But be it known unto you, Brother Perry, that if your organic matter was non est, your present great mind would be so small that the most powerful microscope would not develop it worth the millionth part of a cent? Think again, Brother Perry, you will liv and learn that man is but one organic creature, which livs, and dies, and is forever oblivious, including germ-life? Friend Perry must understand that materialistic philosophy is solid and safe, and all speculativ quibblings must ever be shattered against this rock of common sense. I think I see in the near future that friend Perry will become so well formed and constituted that he will hold the first rank in T. Winter's school fo philosophic Materialism. For be it known to our friend Perry that, had there been no material, there could not hav been any mental. Organic matter hath ever existed, and ever will; but not in fabled worlds in mid-air. Castles in the air are poor structures to build faith on; but such faiths are popular. But, never right or true, and being on a false foundation, it must fail and vanish before the steady light of Materialism.

Truth—A Poem in Three Parts.

BY E. N. KINGSLEY.

PART III.—CANTO IX.

If orthodox religion you despise,
What will you giv us in the place of lies?
We giv you reason, common sense, and truth,
Morality and purity in youth;
We giv you science—Nature's perfect laws,
Teach you to reason from effects to cause.
If you do this, you surely will succeed
To find the truth, and happiness indeed.

Learn Nature's laws, and triumph evermore;
The lovely sunshine worship and adore.
If gods are Christ, gods will on Christmas day
Make grand and perfect infinit display;
And once or twice in each succeeding year,
Like the great sun, to all mankind appear;
By this grand pageant make all nations know
Gods rule above and on the earth below.

All doubting in the world will then be o'er;
Truth and the gods will reign from shore to shore.
Small effort for almighty gods to do!—
To prove their bibles and existence true.
If Christ is gods, gods will save all mankind,
If that is what the gods at first designed.
But, till gods prove Christianity divine,
Truth, and truth only—precious truth!—be thine.

If gods do ride upon the raging storm,
Amazing wonders will they sure perform!
Control the winds, and save all human life,
Stop wars and shipwrecks, famins, floods, and strife;
And holy gods, instead of making evils,
Without delay kill their opposing devils.
By godlike power and an almighty skill
Make all intelligence perform God's will.

By gods' omnipotent, almighty sway,
Make all their creatures perfectly obey.
This is indeed a philosophic view
Of what the future coming gods will do.
Here all mankind throughout the world may see
Exactly what the future gods must be.
Gods soon must change their program and their plan
Or be denounced by future coming man?

If orthodox religion you disdain,
What will you giv in place of endless pain?
We giv you truth instead of Bible gods,
Which true philosophy proves myths and frauds
We giv to you a future life indeed,
Without a damnable, infernal creed.
A perfect future life we will explain,
And try to make the subject true and plain.

CANTO X.

By Nature's law the spirit hopes to rise
To pure, serene, celestial, cloudless skies.
Does Nature giv to man this great desire?
To future life man's spirit does aspire,
And we believe the law of nature will
Man's highest aspirations all fulfil.
And spirit minds forever will expand
In an existence infinitly grand.

From smallest germs of matter, minus mind,
Originate all nations of mankind;
And from a very little germ we see
Grows the great, towering, majestic tree.
Nature by turns produces life and death—
It givs and also takes away the breath;
Produces bodies, spirits, minds, and thought,
And all we see unto perfection brought.

From perished seed, earth, air, sun, dew, and rain,
The precious golden harvests, we obtain.
Delightful music birds from eggs do bring,
Sweet, withered flowers bloom again in spring—
When dreadful storms of winter all are past;
Worms change to butterflies at last.
Bees, flowers, worms—all things that we see—
Proclaim to man a future life may be.

In spring (from larvæ) insects speed away,
And soar triumphant in the blaze of day.
But language fails to giv, in truthful terms,
Man's elevation above creeping worms—
Man's elevation above myths and frauds,
Man's elevation above man-made gods,
Man's elevation while the ages roll,
The never-ending progress of the soul.

If, unassisted, Nature brings man here,
Why not adapt him to a higher sphere?
If evolution forms the shining gold,
Why not refine a soul a thousandfold?
Change men to angels in celestial bowers,
Equal to cherubim's and seraphs' powers?
And unfleshed spirits meet again on high,
Where friendship livs, and flowers never die?

May it be ours to join the spirit bands,
In lovely, shining, perfect summer-lands—
In endless bliss the universe explore,
With kindred spirits who hav gone before;
And labor there for all the human race,
To bring all spirits to their destined place.
Oh, how delightful it indeed will be
To join the spirits who hav guarded thee!

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

DURING the service in the cathedral at the Illyrian city of Ragusa, some weeks ago, the officiating priest, a member of the Society of Jesuits, was stabbed to death by a girl whom he had betrayed. She inflicted five wounds. The congregation poured into the street amid wild excitement, and the girl was taken into custody. The cathedral was built by Richard I., and contains Titian's celebrated picture of "The Assumption."

person lived, is particularly weak, and shows to what straits the defenders of the Jesus story are driven to make out their case. The very fact that the writings of Celsus and Porphyry are brought up to prove Christianity, when the early Christians considered them so damaging that they utterly destroyed them, is in keeping with Christian tactics and fairness. The fact is there is no history corroborating the four gospels, and it it positivly certain that they had no existence till the latter part of the second century.

7. As to Paul, he does not pretend that he ever saw Jesus in the body, or that he knew personally anything of Jesus. He was a warm partisan; he had seized the story of Jesus, whether mythical or otherwise, upon which to build up a new system of religion, which was a very common thing at that time, the Jewish people abounding in many religious sects. The probabilities are that Paul was a restless, enthusiastic sort of person; that he saw in the story attributed to Jesus a sufficient basis on which to start a new religion, and he appears to hav been more the founder of Christianity than Jesus, who never established a church, or perfected any kind of organization. Paul was an ardent, shrewd man, but he never pretended to hav seen Jesus while he lived. He got up a vision story, but it is so differently told in different places that unfortunately it is worthy of but little credit. To lug Paul in as a writer to show that Jesus existed, strongly shows the very little real proof that exists.

8. To our third question—"Is there the slightest proof that the four gospels attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were written by them?"—our friend makes this singular reply: "It is immaterial whether the gospels were written by the persons whose names they bear or not;" and then he coolly asks: "Does it make them any the less reliable?" Well, if this is not yielding the whole subject, we know not how else to understand it. To say that it matters not whether such persons as Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John had a real existence; to say that four spurious and unknown persons, a hundred and fifty years later, who could not know the first thing about Jesus, undertook to write in the names of persons they never saw, and to pass themselvs off for persons whom they were not, is just as good as though the writers were the persons they pretended to be; that it is just as good to be spurious as genuin, is just as good, just as reliable as though the entire story were true, is a most astonishing position for a reverend gentleman to take. He might just as well admit that the whole Christian story is false and is not worth a straw. When a clergyman is prepared to admit that spuriousness is just as good as genuinness, and that falsehood is just as good as truth he is very far gone; his system has become extremely weak, and the sooner he throws up the Christian sponge and seeks the ranks of truth and rationalism the better. He should no longer defend fable. Can it be possible that our friend believes a spurious person who pretends to be somebody he is not—a person who is a pretender, a fraud, a cheat, and a falsifier, is just as reliable and worthy of credit as one who represents the truth?

9. Our friend evades our fourth question—"Is there any proof that those four gospels (as such) were known by the early fathers, by any of the bishops, by any of the earlier churches, or by anybody else before the year 181?" He attempts to answer "Yes," and then by another question attempts to show that the four gospels were earlier known and quoted from. Here the gentleman is dishonest. He well knows those four gospels were not known and were not quoted from previous to that year. That other gospels which were discarded by the church as spurious were known and quoted from proves nothing. It is of course admitted that such gospels existed. That a gospel by Matthew written in Hebrew had been mentioned proves nothing. The first gospel in our New Testament was not written in Hebrew, but in Greek. Matthew could not write in Greek, and was not the author of the gospel bearing his name. What does it amount to what Eusebius, who lived in the fourth century, said about the gospel of Mark? Our friend simply states a falsehood when he says, "There is other proof which can be adduced to prove the gospels, or the originals, were in existence before the year 181." Then why does he not adduce it? The Christian world has been loudly called upon to produce the proof that the originals of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were known previous to the year 181, and it has not been able to do so. The fact is, no "orig-ignal gospel" has ever been seen by anybody. They are all copies of spurious copies, and no originals of the now called inspired gospels were ever known. It four shows the weakness of Christian claims to show up this fact, but fact nevertheless it is. No matter how damaging truth may be to any pet theories, it should be brought out.

10. It is gratifying to see that our friend admits that "nearly all the dogmas and rites of our religion were practiced by pagans. I find some twenty of the early fathers of Christianity testifying to that fact directly or indirectly." Here our friend has more candor and fairness than might be looked for. If the dogmas and rites existed in the pagan world before the advent of Christianity it clearly follows that Christianity is not an original system. If these wonderful doctrins which are the only hope for the salvation of the world were known in the world long before Christianity was gotten up, it certainly did not require an enormous amount of divine revelation to introduce them into the world. It would seem unnecessary for a god to leave his happy home in heaven to enter a woman's womb, remaining there nine months, then to pass through the stages of infancy, childhood, youth, and manhood, and then to ignominiously die upon the cross to tell the world what they knew all about before. The whole thing cost more than it came to—far more than it is worth. The fact is, the whole story is extremely silly, and it is a wonder how sensible people can giv credence to it. The dishonesty of our friend, however, again crops out when he tries to make it appear that the dogmas of Christianity are divine because the Christians got them from the pagans, "the pagans borrowed them from the Jews, and the Jews received them from God." This is one of the weakest arguments Brother Smith has made. The Jews never had the dogmas of the Christian religion, and the pagans never borrowed anything from the Jews. This is but a fair specimen of the frivolousness and falsity of the entire Christian claims, and clearly shows how little of truth the system has to rest upon. Max Muller clearly shows that the pagans borrowed nothing from the Jews, but that the Jews borrowed much from paganism. Paganism is the real foundation of Christianity, and this cannot be disproved.

11. Our friend attempts to reply to our sixth question by asking a few questions about Christna. He asks if he was a demi-god or a savior. We answer, Yes, he was. He was claimed to hav been begotten by the god Vishnu upon the human virgin Devacki, or Devanaguy. He asks if he performed miracles. We answer, Yes; the claim is he performed many miracles, including raising the dead to life. He asks if he was crucified. We answer, Yes, or something very much like it. He was impaled on a tree by the river Ganges, and he died for the salvation of the world. Our friend calls for authority of the Christna story. We refer him to Sir William Jones's "Asiatic Researches." He acted as judge for more than twenty years in India, and wrote up very elaborately what he learned there. The truthfulness of his statements has never been questioned. We also refer him to the writings of Sir Godfrey Higgins in "Anacalypsis," to Sir Cockburn Thompson, to the writings of Dr. Haug, of Muir, of Max Muller, and of the French writer, Jacolliot. Is it not most absurd to claim that the Hindoos borrowed this story from the Jews? The truth is there is far stronger proof that the story of Christna had a foundation for belief among the Hindoos than that of Jesus had among the Jews. The Hindoos accepted the story of Christna, while the Jews wholly rejected the story of Jesus. That the story of Christna is many hundreds of years older than that of Jesus is proved from Sir Wm. Jones, Dr. Haug, Max Muller, Sir Cockburn Thompson, Jacolliot, and others. That he was held to be before the time of Buddha is clear from the fact that Christna was the eighth avatar of Vishnu, while Buddha was the ninth. Buddha is held to hav been born 625 B.C. In our belief Christna was a myth, but no more so than Christ. Their claims of existence are about equal; neither has much to stand upon.

12. Our friend says he "does not see why we condemn Christianity as it is to-day." We answer, Because we believe it a false system, founded upon false claims, and not the result of divine revelation. We do not believe that God ever begot himself upon the person of a little Jew girl, that he was compelled to take his own life to place himself in an amiable mood toward his creatures. We do not believe he ever created man and woman with passions and failings which must inevitably lead them astray, consigning them to an everlasting hell which he expressly prepared for them. We totally disbelieve in such a hell and such a God. We believe the whole system is wrong, and that it has led mankind from the truth instead of to it.

13. Our friend admits there hav been very bad Christians in the past, but he seems to think they are better now. True, the world has advanced in general intelligence, and Christendom has advanced with it. But what kind of a perfect system of revealed religion is it which changes with the progress which man makes? If it is a perfect, divine system, is it within the power of fallible man to improve it?

14. Our friend asks what nation, religion, or sect hav not persecuted? We answer, the Buddhists, though existing for twenty-five hundred years, now numbering five hundred millions, hav not persecuted. The Confucians hav not persecuted, though they hav amounted to many hundreds of millions. We hav no account that the Therapeuts of Egypt, or the Essenes of Palestine, ever persecuted, while Christians hav been most bloody persecutors—hav taken more life in the name of religion than all other religions in the world. If persecution and life-taking are bad marks of a religion, Christianity is by far the worst religion that has ever existed.

15. Our friend asks, "Is it not a self-evident fact that if Infidels had the power they would persecute all who differed from them?" We answer, No, by no means is any such thing a self-evident fact. Infidels or Freethinkers hav never shown any such disposition. That there might be some among them who would be indiscreet under certain circumstances is barely possible. But it is a belief in an angry, vindictiv, revengeful God who leads his followers to persecute and take life. They wish to help out their bloody-minded and cruel God, hence they persecute and take life. "Those who believe not shall be damned" has been the authority for all the holy murdering and persecuting Christians hav ever done. They believe heretics are doomed to hell forever, and if they can add a little to that hell here they are perfectly willing to do so. Freethinkers believe in no such god and no such hell, hence they do not wish to persecute.

16. Our friend asks, "Do Christians persecute now?" We answer, Yes, they persecute with all the power they possess and all they dare to. They hav persecuted us; they thrust us into a vile prison for a year on a mere pretext, but really because we oppose their views and use arguments against them which they are unable to answer. They aimed to destroy our business and to send us to our grave, but they failed. We still liv and are able to bear the testimony of truth against them.

17. Our friend asks, "Do Infidels build colleges?" We answer, Yes, so far as they are able. They are invariably in favor of the general diffusion of science and education. The Infidel, Stephen Girard, built in Philadelphia one of the finest colleges in the country, but the Christians hav been so mean as to pervert it to uses which he proscribed, and are doing their best to put it to uses he did not wish. The Infidels hav Cornell University in Ithaca in this state; it is confessedly an Infidel institution. And now the Infidels are talking about building another college. Let not our friend crow too loudly against Infidels not favoring colleges.

18. We are pleased that our friend has the fairness to say, "I will admit the more Atheistical some men are the less they stray from doing right;" and again, "I know from my experience with Infidels I hav always found them honorable and just men and women, while again I hav seen ministers who were villains." These are words of truth, though our friend seems to wonder how it can be so. The explanation is, Infidels believe in humanity and not in an angry, revengeful God who punishes his children for being just what he made them. They believe in the rise of man rather than in his "fall," and that the more good he does in the world the better he will be. He looks to himself and his fellow-men around him instead of to a mythical God above the clouds, and it makes him a better man.

19. Our friend winds up by saying, "Search the Bible for truth, pray to God with faith in him, try to seek comfort in Jesus, and he will answer you." We shall do nothing of the kind. We do not believe the Bible is the source of truth. Praying to God we regard as time thrown away, and believe that the prayer of effort is the only prayer that brings answers that amount to anything. We shall not seek comfort in Jesus, for we do not want the kind he is supposed to abound in. We find no proof that he knew more or had more comfort than other people when upon the earth, or that he has very much increased his stock since. We do not believe he will answer us. We tried praying to him daily and sincerely for nearly twenty-five years, and now on looking back we cannot remember of his ever answering us in a single instance. Had we spent that amount of time in the study of truth it would hav been vastly better. We shall search nature for truth, believing she is the only source of truth. We are anxious to learn from her and her eternal laws all we can. She is an unfailing source of truth. We shall turn from all pretended revelations from invisible unknown gods, and regard them only as stumbling-blocks, and blind leaders of the blind. We shall try and do what good we can in the world, and at least to do our fellow-beings no harm. We acknowledge our duty to our fellow-beings and to ourselves, but acknowledge no duty or allegiance to invisible gods and devils. We shall try to make the world a little better and no worse; we shall continue to disseminate truth as we understand it, and according to the best of our ability. We shall try to lead the best life we are able, and abide the consequence.

As the Rev. Smith has had his say, as he has given us the gist of what he has to communicate, we can hardly expect to hear further from him. Brother Smith, good-bye.

Cheap Books.

We hav laid before our readers a list of a part of the standard books we hav recently purchased. We think it will be admitted that they are low in price. We trust our friends will be attracted by these very low prices and send us generous orders. Additions to our list will appear in our next.

The Heywood Case

Presents some features worthy of attention. He was arrested, in the good old law-abiding state of Massachusetts, which has laws in plenty for the punishment of all its citizens who may be overtaken in wrong-doing, without the general government being called upon to do police duty and to arrest her common law breakers. The great government of the United States certainly descends from the proud position which it ought to occupy when it becomes a spying, decoying, espionage-employing police agent to hunt down individuals and thrust them into prison for offenses which the several states hav made ample provisions for punishing. Heywood was arrested under the laws of the United States, when the state of Massachusetts has upon her own statute books laws in abundance to govern just such cases. We declare it to be totally wrong and dangerous in principle for the general government to engage in the hunt after any individual who has committed no offense which the laws of his own state do not take cognizance of. It is not the duty of the general government to look after the morals or immorals of the citizens of the several states, as this belongs exclusivly to the states themselvs. Herein is where Comstockism has worked an exceeding great wrong in punishing offenses against the common law. Massachusetts has laws sufficient to punish the derelictions of her citizens, but at the instance of Anthony Comstock the general government rushes in and makes the arrest of an humble individual who in justice and common sense should be wholly under the surveillance of one of the original states which has a government older and more sacred than that of the United States. A citizen of another state and of the city of Brooklyn goes over into Massachusetts and forcibly arrests one of her citizens for an offense of which the old Bay state is competent to take full control. This is all wrong. It is humiliating to see our central government thus demeaning itself; and it is subversiv of the great principles of liberty and justice which should be our sheet anchor of safety.

It is pitiful that the United States officials should use the power of the general government to oppress such individuals as a spy may bring before them. Henry L. Hallet, improving his brief lease of authority, is responsible for the gratutious piece of tyranny of locking up Mr. Heywood in the court-house till 4 P.M. on the day of his arrest, forbidding the officials to allow Heywood to see his friends for the purpose of obtaining bail, and this before he had committed the prisoner. This is a piece of petty tyranny of which the government of the United States should be heartily ashamed. When the representativs of our great government hav nothing else to do but to show their power by crushing and trampling upon the rights of individuals, it is indeed humiliating to every liberty-loving person in the entire country.

Another crying evil of the rule of Comstockism in our country is that a self-constituted ecclesiastical society, which possesses no responsibitity to the people, should assume, or be allowed to wield, the power to punish offenses which belong exclusivly to the secular and municipal powers, which belong not only to the government of the states but of the United States. It is wholly subversiv of the great principles of our government for an ecclesiastical society to be vested with the power to arrest citizens and thrust them into prison while the secular officers of the government hav abundance of power to attend to all that kind of business. It is only introducing again the modes and practices of the "Holy Inquisition," when the powers organized in the church overrode and suppressed the civil officers of the general governments. This was a sad rule in Europe, though it continued for five hundred years, and the power of ecclesiasticism will ever be a sad rule in freedom-loving America. Comstockism is the activ force of this power of ecclesiasticism, and all good men ought to frown it down.

A Crying Evil

Of our times is the facility with which sane persons are thrust into insane asylums and kept there for months and years with very slight chances of getting out. Several marked cases hav recently been brought to light where persons as far from insanity as ninety in a hundred, at the instance of a designing brother, son, or wife, upon the examination of two physicians (who doubtless received compensation for their services), hav been declared insane and hurried off to prison (another name for the asylum), where their friends can neither hav access to them, nor letters from them be allowed to reach friends to tell where they are or the condition they are in.

It seems to be at least ten times as easy for a sane man to get into an insane asylum as for him to get out. The certificate of two physicians is all that is necessary to imprison him, but to get him out a trial has to be held, attended with a great amount of red tape, and difficulties of various kinds. It is comparativly mild to say it is perfectly damnable for certain physicians and superintendents to conspire with designing relativs to deprive a sane person of his dearest liberties and immure him almost hopelessly with insane and demented people. Far too much of this is done.

The School of Culture.

Since this school has been organized, and takes upon itself to not only be overwhelmed with unutterable disgust at the mistakes of others, while it looks with quiet complacency upon its own far greater and blacker crimes; since it proclaims to the world and publishes in its own organ the coarseness, lowness, ignorance, vileness, poisoning incentives, etc. of those it esthetically and culturedly proclaims as the tag-rag and bobtails of Liberalism, at the same time holding the persons forming its own school as something far more elevated, intellectual, cultured, pure and immaculate—raising a higher standard of morality and being a far better guide to the world—it is perfectly legitimate that we should now and then look a little at the moral state of this self-constituted consensus of the competent, and see whether their conduct in the past sustains their present extravagant pretensions. Their lives thus become a sort of public property to which the Liberals of the country hav a clear right. On this occasion we will introduce one or two expressions that have been given with reference to the Presidio apostle of culture who has furnished the other apostle something damaging to the "tag-rag and bobtails." Here is the first:

THE CULTURED PLAGIARIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It may seem cruel to add another blow to the severe castigation given by you and "Tee Cee Lee" to the "cultured tadpole" of Presidio, but as I hav still on hand several hundred copies of the tract of sixteen pages, entitled "Plagiarism," in which I prove W. E. Coleman both a plagiarist and a liar, I hereby giv notice again that I will send the same to any one who wants it.

In March, 1881, Mr. Coleman assailed me with foul epithets in the Seymour Times, for arguing that Paine wrote the Declaration of Independence. "Shame on the unreasoning, zealous partisans of Paine's authorship, for thus seeking to brand Mr. Jefferson," etc., said W. E. C. "Shame on William Emmette Coleman," said I, in reply, "for disparaging a writer from whom he has plagiarized;" and I charged that in an article of six columns in THE TRUTH SEEKER, in 1879, he copied verbatim about one-third of it, without credit, from my pamphlet of forty-eight pages, published in 1872, entitled "Sunday Not the Sabbath."

This drew from my adversary several very long articles, in which he attempted to prove that the allegation was false. And when, in a carefully prepared article, I proved that it was true, the editor of the Times denied me a hearing. I therefore published the evidence in a tract, in which I prove that W. E. C. borrowed from my pamphlet all that he quoted or summarized from Justin, Irenæus, Clement, Tertullian, Victorinus, Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, Milton, Paley, and Neander; that every reference given by him to the aforesaid authorities was borrowed from mine, and that he added nothing from their works not found in my pamphlet. I spent weeks in laborious research; all that W. E. C. had to do was to copy out my quotations, deductions, and summarized statements, with such slight alterations or abridgment as suited his purpose.

If any one doubts the truth of the above allegation, I can recommend him to procure Coleman's Truth Seeker Tract No. 160, entitled "Sabbath Observance," and send me fifteen cents for "Sunday Not the Sabbath," and then compare the two in the light of my tract, "Plagiarism," which I send gratis.

W. H. BURR.

Washington, D. C., Oct. 30, 1882.

A pretty fair glimpse of the true inwardness of this apostle of culture may here be obtained, but, a farther and clearer glimpse, perhaps, may be had by the following few lines from the physician, or the person who acted as physician, to Mrs. William Emmette Coleman. The party thus writes:

"I know, and can swear, that Mrs. Coleman came to me to be treated of a bad disease which she told me she had taken from her husband, William Emmette Coleman. She said she would never liv with him again after that; and I am pretty sure she kept her word till she died."

Here also, as the curtain rises, we obtain a tolerably clear view of the true inwardness of the professors and apostles of the school of culture. They seem extremely ready to slander and cast opprobrium upon those they deem opposed to them, calling them all the vile names which come convenient to them—those they please to denominate tag-rag and bobtails, but who would scorn to be guilty of the base conduct which can be proved upon the cultured long-tails.

The other apostle of culture, who himself not only basely attacks the conduct of his opponents, using insinuation, innuendo, and slander, to show them guilty of offenses which they hav not committed, but willingly publishes the more recent slanders of his fellow-apostle, richly deserves a little showing up, that his true inwardness may also be understood. But let us not be in undue haste; let patience do its perfect work. At the proper time his apostleship shall receive attention according to his merits.

Vol. III. of A Truth Seeker Around the World

Is now being mailed to subscribers. Those who hav paid for it and do not receive it within the next two weeks, are requested to notify us.

This completes what we consider our engagement for the five dollars that were advanced to us. We hav done far more than we originally promised. The first proposition by Mr. D. C. Coleman, who started the "Round-the-World" ball rolling, was that each one who felt disposed should advance five dollars, and that we should write a book descriptiv of what we saw, and furnish it to those who advanced the five dollars. We at once concluded that we could not say it all in one volume, and that it would require two volumes of 500 pages each. These we promised to those who advanced five dollars each. We hav done better than this; we hav furnished three volumes of an average of nearly 900 pages, being more than twice the amount originally promised. Besides, forty-eight cuts—not originally stipulated—costing many hundreds of dollars, hav been added to each volume. We hope there will be none who feel they hav not received their money's worth. But still there is to be one more volume, making four, but it cannot be sent with the three for $5.00. We hav done all we can for the money; but we trust all who hav got the three volumes will wish to complete the set by having the fourth. To those who hav taken the first three, the fourth, of the same size as the others and similarly illustrated, will be furnished for the moderate sum of $1.50. We are now having this volume prepared, and it will be ready to send out within a few weeks. It will contain a full description of the people and country of Japan, of our voyage across the Pacific, and of our journeyings in California, Nevada, Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, and from thence through Canada to Niagara Falls, Rochester, and on home, together with the several kind receptions tendered us in various places, including the dinners the friends gave us here and at Watkins.

Vol. IV. will also contain a full index to all the volumes, and will be almost indispensable to complete the set. As we wish to know how many of Vol. IV. to print, we will thank all who wish it to notify us, and to remit the sum of $1.50. Those who hav already sent the sum need not send it again. We trust all our friends will be satisfied with the "Round-the-World" volumes.

LIBERTY AND MORALITY. By W. S. Bell.

Mr. Bell has written many good things, but this is about the best of all. We heard him deliver a part of it at the Watkins Convention in September last, and hav read it since published. We can hardly speak too highly of it. In the fore part he marks out clearly the duties of Liberals, what may be regarded as their morals, while in the latter part he shows up in a somewhat humorous light the selfishness, falsity, and immorality of what are called Christian morals.

It is a neatly-printed pamphlet of thirty-six pages, and is most interesting reading. We hav it for sale, price 10 cents.

THE SIDEREAL MESSENGER.—A magazine in the interest of Astronomy, conducted by William W. Payne, director of Carleton College Observatory, and published at Northfield, Minn. It is published monthly—or rather ten copies are published in a year—at the sum of $2.00.

It is said to be the only periodical in the United States devoted exclusivly to popular astronomy.

No. 7 of Vol. I. is before us, and among the contents are: Comet Cruls, Drifting Meteor Trains, Standard Time, Transit of Venus, Unification of Time Throughout the World, Observations of Comet B, with several pages of editorial notes. The articles are well written, and it appears to be ably conducted. It would seem it should be liberally sustained.

Answers to Christian Questions.

By special request of numerous friends we hav brought out in pamphlet form the questions and arguments, with our replies to the Rev. John Smith, Mr. W. M. Whitehead, the Rev. D. R. Breed, Mr. W. C. Hughes, and others. It is thought that it will make a very good document for missionary work, and to hand around to Christian readers. The whole will make nearly 150 pages with a cover, and will be mailed for twenty-five cents, or five copies for one dollar. We shall be able to supply the demand.

The Under Dog, Christianity.

In the whirligig of time, says "Tee Cee Lee," Christianity is now the under dog in the fight. But the only punishment "Tee Cee Lee" proposes is to talk to the brute in such a way as to make him ashamed of himself. That would be very well if Christianity were a tolerably decent dog and susceptible of disciplin. But if the animal is at last discovered to be a wolf, the best use to make of him is to kill him.

Mediumship or Insanity?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav just now finished reading LaRoy Sunderland's article on "Ideology; or, the Trance Idea in History," and I am astonished that he drags into his history so much of a personal character, and that under the guise of a historical narrativ he is aiming his blows at the Spiritualists in particular, although to do so most effectually he givs them a damning of faint praise. They are "head and shoulders above the old forms of mysticism," but his conclusions are that all forms of faith in a future life, or any revelation from the dead, are a sure indication of insanity, and to prove this idea he cites a few cases of suicide resulting from a faith of this character, among them the stale gravestone story about A. J. Davis, which occurred some thirty-two years ago, before Spiritualism was generally known. There is no evidence that either of the party had any consultation with any medium in the case. The facts of the case are that they had disobeyed parental authority in getting married and leaving home to liv among strangers, where, after a time, being unable to make expenses at shoemaking, and otherwise depressed in spirits, they resolved on suicide; and the only evidence that the foolish father had to connect their death in any way with A. J. Davis was that they found one volume of his "Great Harmonica" in their room at the hotel, and the deluded and bigoted father seized upon this pretext to cast a stigma upon an innocent party, and probably thereby shield himself. There is nothing in A. J. Davis's writings to induce any man to commit suicide, and there is no man who ought to know it better than LaRoy Sunderland. Any person wishing for a full account of the affair may find it on page 473 of the "Magic Staff," written by Mr. Davis in defense of his course, and against many such untruthful slanders, then so common. Mr. Sunderland asserts that "that young wife consulted the spirits about suicide [made in quotation marks]; soon after they walked out together, when he shot her, and then put the revolver to his own head; they obeyed the advice given them from that dark unknown." Now I wish to remind Mr. LaRoy that there is not a particle of evidence to prove that either of them consulted the spirits at all, and I defy him to prove it. It is an unmitigated slander from beginning to end, no matter who originated it.

The trouble with this whole article is that while it sets out to giv a historical account of trance, etc., it abounds in nothing but assertions and assumptions. He says, "Myths and invisibilities, of all grades, are utter know-nothings and do-nothings without the trance and a medium's brains. Had they any knowledge of us no mediums would be necessary, and all Spiritualists rely upon what they find themselvs able to believe as to the grades and authority of invisible spooks that reveal messages to them, in a state of trance," etc. There is not a word of truth in that whole statement. Spiritualists do not rely on trance, and much oftener get the best possible kind of evidences while the medium is in a perfectly conscious state of mind. There is no necessity in either rapping, tipping, or writing mediumship for trance at all, and by far the greater number of messages come in this way. There never was a medium who could explain or make a rap at will, and I defy Mr. LaRoy to make one or explain to anybody else how to do it, or how to account for the intelligence which accompanies a rapping message, and until he can do so, his pretended history, and explanations, and assumptions about trance, and his cuts and flings of insanity at Spiritualists are decidedly out of place, and should convince anybody that LaRoy is the know-nothing and the do-nothing in the case. I challenge him to make a single rap, turn a single leaf, or move one particle of inert matter, as is being done in the phenomena of to-day, by the most indubitable authority; until he can do this, his pretended science of what the human mind is or may be is but a species of learned ignorance.

I hav given this subject much attention and earnest thought since 1853, and know what I am talking about when I say that the spiritual idea is the only key to unlock the whole mental fabric. No article having weight can move in my room unless a force is applied sufficient to overcome its inertia, and no weight can describe a motion that conveys intelligence to me unless moved by some intelligence; so that if my jack-knife is moved from the floor, and the blades opened and laid on the table before me, I am justified in assuming it was moved by an intelligent force. If I came to any other conclusion I would be insane surely; and yet such things hav been done for me.

Some few years ago I was writing an article on the divinity of Christ, in a controversy then going on between myself and J. E. Smith, D.D., of our city, and while writing I came to express this idea. I said: "If a man is immortal, it must be owing to something inherent in his nature, and not because somebody died for him." Just as I finished the last word, a perfect shower of raps was made on the table and paper I was writing upon. I immediately put the question, as if talking to persons that knew what I was doing, but whom I could not see: "Does that statement agree with your ideas of the matter?" and again I heard confirmatory raps. I was not aware that any spirits had impressed me to write that statement, and do not now know that they did; but it evidently agreed so perfectly with their sentiments that they were able and did giv expression to their satisfaction by those raps. There was no medium there, nor was I entranced or insane, as our friend would suggest. But see how ready such obfuscated minds are to clutch at straws, when they favor their own conceits. Some time ago this same LaRoy, in an article in The Truth Seeker, was very much gratified to hear of the success of the theosophical doctrins of India, and thought that here was a "probable solution" to this spook question. For the time, he forgot that he had solved it by his personal experiments many years before.

I am as well satisfied that one mind can impress another mind to do and say things, not its own, as I am that water will run from one pitcher into another when held above it. In my psychological experiments, made some thirty years ago, was one case that always impressed me strongly of the absolute independence of the clairvoyant condition. I had a subject who was in the habit of getting epileptic fits, and on whom I was operating to cure. A friend desired to walk along to his house on a Sunday morning, to see the experiments. On the way I said to him, "I will now try to convince you of his absolute subjectivity. When I produce an impression on him, I will cause him to hold out his hand and catch a bird upon it; and the bird shall hav a red ring around its neck, a long fan-tail, black and white speckled, and long bill. I shall simply ask him what he caught, and then require him to describe it to you."

This was a splendid test, as the boy had never heard the word psychology, and did not know what I was going to do. I took him away from the house, after operating upon him for some time, and had forgotten for the time, also, what I had promised my friend, until he reminded me of it, in an undertone not heard by the boy; so we proceeded into the meadow. I stopped and looked up into the air, as if trying to see something, and soon he felt my desire, and in a short time had caught his imaginary bird. I then asked him to describe it minutely, and be particular to tell my friend, impressing him what to say. He said it had a "red ring around its neck, long fan-tail, black and white speckles, and had a long bill." This boy, unconsciously to himself, was giving expression to my thoughts, and even my words.

Upon one occasion I made him to act the part of a general of an army, and to issue his orders and commands. If I had taken down these things, and shown them to him afterward, he would hav said, "I did not do this, as I do not understand those military terms." And with the same propriety LaRoy says no mind can utter anything above the human; and yet a thousand times hav utterances and writings been made far above the ordinary capacity of the medium. Even little children of tender years hav been made to write out whole sentences and paragraphs in the Greek, Hebrew, and other old languages, and of which by the very necessity of the case they could hav had no knowledge. To dispute these facts is only dodging the question, and exposes an ignorance of the subject too profound for successful combat.

It is an easy matter to slur at the productions of mediums, but I venture to say that by comparison with his poetry, at the head of his article on Ideology, Miss Doten's will not suffer, although made in the dreamy condition stated, nor will the writings of A. J. Davis in his "Divine Revelations," made while a mere boy, without education, but under this "superior condition," suffer by comparison with anything that has emanated from this philosopher's pen. Look at this sweeping statement: "The mind is measured by the ideas it evolves. Nor is it, perhaps, unsafe to admit that any mind must be tinged with the trance or insanity whenever it is so hallucinated as to imagin that it has the power of uttering any idea more than human. Such an idea is not far from a state of trance and insanity." This is an ingeniously worded statement, intended to ascribe insanity to any mind who believes that a child can say what only should come from an old man, or that a medium could utter what might only come from a spirit or some intelligence above it, but still it does not say so. The loophole in the statement lies in the word "human." Of course no one supposes that the human mind can receive what is above its capacity. A spirit is but a human being, and if humanity could not receive a thought it desired to giv, or if human speech could not utter it, there would be no effort made to giv it. But this does not prevent a mere child from transmitting by human words the thoughts of an advanced Hebrew or Greek scholar, as has been done on many occasions.

If we admit such statements as the above it places the stigma of insanity on the most advanced minds of the age—such scientists as Varley, Crookes, Wallace, Hare, Zollner, and a host so large that it is unnameable; in fact, almost the whole world, with the very slight exceptions of a very limited few who claim to be ultra Materialists.

It reminds one of the Irishman who had just landed and got into a drunken bender. He went staggering along the street, running against almost every man he met. At last he grabbed hold of one fellow, and wanted to know what kind of a country this was; for, said he, "Bedad, every man I meet is drunk."

There is scarcely a man who can tell whence his thoughts come. They pop into the mind, as Thomas Paine said, and even obtrude themselvs, "uninvited and unannounced;" and he adds further that they are often the most interesting guests, and he had learned to treat them with due courtesy and respect. It is not true, then, that "ideas hav no existence until they are evolved by thinking in human brains." It is usually the case that an idea is by some means felt in the mind, and must afterward be worked out in detail by a process of logical thinking. The idea comes first, and the thinking always afterward, just as the problem is first presented to the scholar, and the solution worked out by a process of thought.

Further on, Mr. Sunderland asserts that his "will" had nothing to do with any psychological experiments "he performed." How he could hav experiments performed without using any "will" to do so, is a puzzle to unravel. Does he intend to intimate that they took place of their own accord? If so, in what manner did he perform them? and does it require less "will" to transmit ideas than thoughts? I think it must require a will to transmit an idea.

What can Mr. Sunderland mean when he says, "A rap on the table-leg by forms of force of which we can know nothing materializes human ideas!" How can a rap materialize human ideas? My opinion is that the raps of the modern mediums hav paralyzed some human ideas, or else we would hear some rational and sensible explanation of the phenomena, instead of the old, oft-repeated, and threadbare charge of insanity. The Spiritualist is called insane because he has adopted the only true explanation, and one that will meet the whole case.

The word spirit has become so hateful to some minds that they lose their patience and ordinary good sense when attempting to discuss the question, and remind one of the old German lady who heard of this after life, but said she did not want to liv it. She said, "When I die I want to be dead." "But would you not want to see your husband and friends and children?" said her friend. "Yes," said she, "but if I see mine friends I must see mine enemies, and so sure as I see mine enemies I quarrels mit em. No, no; when I die I wants to be dead." Mr. LaRoy Sunderland's definition of insanity is not a correct one. The word insane means "madness, without reason, unsound in mind and intellect, incapable of consecutiv thought, rambling and raving, delirious, distracted, habitual weakness of the mind; the state of being unsound in mind, incapable to hold the mind upon any subject of thought for any length of time," etc., which implies a general derangement and weakening of the mental powers. Now, by his own showing, the trance is just the reverse of this. It is an expansion of the mind for the time, which enables the entranced to grasp a subject with more ability, greater mental vigor and clearness; is more complete and consecutiv in thought and argument; has a broader reach in the mental sphere, more poetic, grander and more brilliant in fancy as well as fact. Insanity is a permanent disease, while entrancement is a temporary condition. To say that a production like "Nature's Divine Revelations," by A. J. Davis, written in this exhalted state during many months, and at a great number of sittings, is the production of insanity, is a complete and malicious misrepresentation of terms. Or to say that the sublime poetic conception and beauty of expression contained in the poems of Miss Doten or Mrs. Richmond are the ravings of insanity, is a slander in the faces of facts and common sense.

The relation of similar states, produced under the pressure of the church or other trammeled surroundings, is not a fair comparison with those of modern times; and the claim of modern mediums who refer their communications to spirits of departed human beings is the most rational of all solutions yet given.

A few questions for LaRoy Sunderland, and I hav done.

1st. Please explain how the spirit-rap is made.

2d. How are ponderable objects conveyed about and intelligent movements made in day-light?

3d. How can a tune be played upon an accordion in day light, held by yourself, and any such time as you may request, first having examined the instrument?

4th. How can a person who has no knowledge of Hebrew write in that tongue? How can a child medium do it?

5th. How can knots be tied in an endless rope when the ends are held by a person, and when sealed tightly together, as described by Prof. Zollner?

6th. How can materializations of bodies or parts of bodies take place, as seen and described by Prof.

Crookes, who devoted four years to these experiments in his own laboratory, as described by him?

And after you hav answered all these and ten thousand other questions as difficult, you may then write down mediumship as insanity, and the balance of mankind a great pack of fools.

Ideology.

"THE NINETEENTH CENTURY WONDER."

Prof. Sunderland and all the rest of the Materialists are deceiving themselvs when they think they hav solved the nineteenth century wonder (J. B. Perry in TRUTH SEEKER, p. 618).

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The above, as it would seem, was written in response to my "Fraternal," in your thirty-second number. In my article my object was to assign reasons why all Spiritualists should join hands with us in a Liberal movement now organized against a common enemy. I made no attack upon Spiritualists, and only alluded to a few aspects of the subject that I thought should relieve our allies from any necessity in the future of complaint of Mr. George Chainey or of any other Infidel merely because we cannot invest in any form of mysticism.

I alluded to the significant fact that while the Spiritual press has been closed against me for twenty-five years, all the Liberal papers hav been open to the criticisms of Spiritualism. And, since my article, the Liberal Congress in St. Louis has made honorable mention of all the mystical papers in the country, and commended them to the patronage of Infidelity. And I honor THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Infidel papers in this regard, that they hav always given an "open ring and fair play," both to ancient and modern mysticism. These considerations, it seems to me, ought to soften the asperities in the censures made by our allies of us, and they should prevent their misrepresentations like that above quoted from Mr. Perry. I never thought that I could explain the "mystic rap," and so I stated in my "Fraternal." I admit all the facts. Nor do I suppose the name of any one living or dead could be given, whose opportunities hav been better than my own for witnessing all the different phases of that class of mediumistic phenomena of which the "mystic rap" is the type. The "rap" is by far the most appropriate for designating both the phenomena and the human movement that "by faith" is founded upon it. As to mediums, I hav had four of the best in my family. The only child I now hav living is 53 years of age, and has been a medium forty years or more. And when she was the only one of this class, and pioneered the mystic rap into the New England states, she was estimated as not only the first, but as the very best. I refer to these facts because Mr. Perry and others of his notions may imagin that "Prof. Sunderland," of whom he has made his misstatement, must hav been ignorant of what the mystic rap has done, whereas it is precisely the other way. I hav witnessed all that this rap has done. It is for this reason that I do not invest in this form of mysticism. I hav been constantly learning, and hav taken more pains to find out what the truth is than any other person ever did, as far as I know. And it is for this reason that I affirm that in this human movement, comprising so many excellent people, there is nothing known but this rap; and when it evinces what we call clairvoyance we do not know whether this power is in the medium or in the rapper. But we do know that there is no knowledge of names, dates, or of anything else in this world independent of the human brains of a medium. And, were it necessary, I could describe the favorable conditions under which this rap has affirmed to me the drift you will find in this article—that if the spirits had any knowledge of us, or memory of this world, no mediums would be necessary.

I state what must be admitted when I say that, as a general thing, mediums are ignorant of ideology, and the anatomy of faith. Hence they are easily victimized by this form of mysticism. In this state of things people are constantly dying, and their sorrowing friends want to hear from them, when they send five dollars to a world-renowned medium in New York, addressed to some one dead, and all the knowledge that comes through reading sealed letters, or through any medium, is obtained by the clairvoyance of some unknowable nondescript ghost, obtained through a medium's brain. The responding spirit knows nothing of you or your wishes until you suggest yourself to some medium, or you are yourself mediumistic, and in that case once victimized by faith in mysticism, I should no more hope, perhaps, to convince you of error than if you believed your soul had been converted by the Holy Ghost. As I know by a long experience, mediums hav been as really converted and born again as any Christian ever was. And under the control of faith and your own idea of mysticism, it would be of little or no use to ask you how I am to cross-examin an invisible witness, nor how my external eyes can see a pure spirit, nor how you can be said to see a spirit when it is a material form you see, and one assumed to suit your own idea, and thus to deceive you. Or if I were to ask any mediumist like Mr. Perry how it can be safe for us to build theories of a summer-land upon mystical phenomena he could only answer for his own faith. And here is a serious problem that I hav put to my Spiritual friends, but to which I never obtained an answer: To what responsibility can you hold a ghost that falsifies? And what is your remedy when a ghost inspires a medium like that beautiful young lady, Miss Hattie A. Eager (and a dozen other similar cases I hav known), to predict her own death when disappointed in love as she was? And then, three months after that prediction, under precisely the same inspiration or spirit control, she commits suicide to fulfil that spiritual prediction. And more still: What shall those that are not Spiritualists think of that Spiritual editor in Boston, Mr. A. E. Newton, who, on my having exposed that suicide, declared in his columns in justification of her mediumship, "Admit that Hattie A. Eager was murdered by the spirits, and what then?" And Mr. Newton's "what then?" I answered at the time that the ism itself was but an infatuation, and of the worst kind, as it was constantly leading to infatuation, insanity (as the statistics of our mad-houses will show), and suicide.

Nature's Order.—Mr. Perry was so much infatuated with his own idea of his "wonder" that he failed to notice what I said in my "Fraternal" of nature's order and laws. In this order, people who reject mysticism sincerely and honestly confide, while we can perceive with one eye half way open that in all forms of "faith" in mystical phenomena, real or imaginary, this order is more or less ignored. Nature's order has made no arrangements for gods and ghosts except as poetical fancies. It has made no provision for gods or ghosts to be born of human mothers. The Hindoos reported a number of such births long before the Holy Ghost dallied with that Jewish maiden. That was believed to hav been a very pious and holy mediumship when Jesus was born.

> It was of Christianity the dawn
> When its illegitimate God was born,
> Believed by Christians most;
> And similar stories hav since been told
> Of modern mediums that hav thus been sold,
> And by a similar ghost.

Nature's order is best, and it is far more providential than the Christian God, that has been said to "hear the young ravens when they cry;" but nature provides our food before we are born or can be heard to "cry;" but it compels our birth without our knowledge of the world into which we are entered at birth, similarly as it compels us to die, and without any knowledge of the condition we enter, when, by death, our relation to this earth is severed forever. And I hav always observed these nondescripts are never able to giv any reliable account of dying or death. Question them as you will, and the answer will be found vague and vaporish, precisely as if there was nothing remembered to be said. And certainly there is no proof that our mind can appreciate that will show that our consciousness of this world is not obliterated by death.

Were it essential for us to know before we are born what our state will be in this world, that knowledge would come to us as the air, the water, and our food comes. And similarly so as to death. Nor is credulity the mental faculty for obtaining a knowledge of to-morrow or anything else. And here, to show how great the error is when "mediums" think to pry into locks where nature furnishes no key, I ask attention to the large proportion of their number that become insane, and the cases I hav already referred to of mediums that hav committed suicide and murder. In haste to get to "the summer-land" they murder their friends and commit suicide.

Christian Spiritualists.—So far as the "mystic rap" is made to indorse Christianity, it thereby has "given aid and comfort to its enemy." But unfortunately for the ism, this has always been done from the first, till now, as it shapes its phases to the ideas of the families and the localities wherever it occurs, Christianity is all fraud, and it is far behind the new ism in its estimation of humanity, freedom, and progression. And just now if you wish to see the death-warrant of the Christian ism, read "A Truth Seeker Around the World." If my voice could reach from pole to pole around the globe I would advise "everybody and his wife," and his children especially, to procure and read these truthful and illustrated volumes. They are historical, containing a vast amount of important information of matters that all should know, and to be found in no other work ever published. These volumes are also ethnological, scientific, and critical, embracing a mass of evidence that should annihilate Christianity at once and forever from the face of our globe. It is the enemy of Spiritualism, as it always has been and always will be of the human race. All young people should read "A Truth Seeker Around the World." Spiritualists should read these volumes and see more and more how those mediums err in various localities by indorsing Christianity and that old barbarian book, the Bible. In the very same way mediums hav adopted the errors of mesmerism in making its passes and its notions as to the human "will;" and whether or no they hav adopted psychometry (a grain of wheat in a cartload of chaff), or that notion has swallowed the medium, I cannot say. But I will here state what I know as to the hole of the pit whence that ism was digged. An "M.D.," whose unfounded assumptions I exposed in New York when he lectured forty years ago, has recently donned the garb of a "Christian Spiritualist." And to increase his stock in trade, this "M.D." has made his psychometry indorse the bogus spirit-photograph of what he calls "that noble woman, the virgin mother of Jesus." The Spiritual press has pronounced that spirit-photograph a fraud; but psychometry declares it genuin. Moreover, this same "M.D." has recently claimed to hav introduced Spiritualism by a mesmeric experiment he performed in 1842. (See the first number of a Spiritual quarterly, issued in Boston, entitled "Facts.") Thus in his book, published in 1842, this "M.D." claims to hav discovered so much that there can be little or nothing left for any other man or woman to discover. Here is what he says, "Such has been my progress in these experiments that but few important principles hav been left for future discovery" (Sketches of Buchanan's Discoveries in Neurology, page 70).

Now bear in mind that the nervous system is an apparatus upon which any tune can be played to suit the whim of the operator, and, moreover, that there is no limit to the invention of ideas; and you see how it has come to pass that this "M.D." should hav gas enough to make such a claim as the above. And this is the "Christian Spiritualist" that has recently appealed to us in the Liberal papers that we should raise and put into his mesmeric hand the modest sum of one hundred thousand dollars to enable him to build a college in which he may teach his psychometry and spirit-photographing.

Mystical Phenomena.—All such phenomena, ancient or modern, fanciful or real, are alike to us. They can be of no practical use to humanity. When Dr. Phelps, at Stratford, Conn., called the "spirits" in his house to explain why they had sent him to Philadelphia on a "tom-fool's errand," the "mystic rapper" gave him this answer:

"I told you that cock-and-bull story to see if you would be fool enough to believe it." And how many, very many, hav been deceived in the same way; and so deceived that they are not willing to find out how it is that they hav been imposed upon! It is the sensational idea that kills or cures. The sensational that drives into extremes of folly, madness, suicide, and murder. It is the sensational ideas of faith, fear, and joy that strike certain persons instantly dead. It is the sensational that gets up "revivals," and excites that faith which is the motiv power of Christianity and all other forms of mysticism. It is the sensational idea to which the Christian prays, and that he worships on his knees as an infinit personality. All there is of goodness, the just, and the true, is in human ideas and human conduct.

I refer to the origin of Spiritualism because I am aware that the mass are not and never hav been sufficiently informed in this regard. The 31st of March has been long celebrated as the birthday of the mystic rap, whereas this same rap, without any idea of spirits or mediums, had occurred in "haunted houses" during preceding ages. In Dr. Adam Clark's account of the Wesley family, of Epworth, England, there is what I believe to be a truthful narrativ of this same rap in the family of Samuel, the father of John Wesley, in which we hav a minute account of its different phases. It materialized badgers and other animals, imitated the rattle of crockery, and then annoyed the family for a long time. Indeed, it followed Emily, a sister to John and Charles, for the space of thirty years, and during all this time there was no idea of spirits or mediumship. Nor in any other of similar annoyances in certain localities, said to be haunted, had there been a human idea as to departed spirits and mediumship. Spiritualism might hav antedated its birthday a thousand years or more. And the history of this rap is fatal to the modern ism built by faith upon it. Thus:

1. This rap is now, as it has always been, sporadic in its occurrence. It has always been confined to certain localities and persons, and for reasons never explained. And I cannot believe that if my dead relativs were conscious of me and of this world, that any medium would be necessary for them to communicate with me. Such an idea is absurd.

2. The history of this rap, from the past to this day, is sufficient to show that this human movement called Spiritualism is individual. The idea of spirits originated in the brain of Mrs. Fox, I am sure; for she herself told me so. And, moreover, that same rap had been heard for more than a year in that identical locality—that same mysterious knocking, as it was then called. The house was occupied in 1847 by an Irish family (Mr. Weekman), who had been so much annoyed with it that they were compelled to move out, and left it. During all that time there was no idea of spirits. Nor was this rap heard again till some four months after the Fox family moved into that house, in December, 1847. And then it so happened, the last week in the following

March, they became annoyed by the raps; so much so that the children were afraid to go to bed, and the mother went to their bed-room with them. The raps were heard, when Mrs. Fox noticed that the raps imitated the snaps that one of the girls made with her fingers, whereupon Mrs. Fox conceived the idea of a departed spirit. And upon this human idea the movement that has made Mr. Perry's wonder is founded. Mrs. Fox herself assured me that her idea was of a departed spirit of some one, perhaps a pedler that had been murdered in that house, and so buried in the cellar. And fixing on this rap as a sign, they were made to signify "yes, yes, yes," to every idea that she suggested for that purpose. And moreover, from the 31st of March, 1848, to this day, it has been characteristic of every so-called test ever given, that nothing whatever is obtained from this rap that has not been previously suggested by a human idea as to a medium, the question, the locality, or sealed letter. And now bear in mind that while there are a dozen or more factors in mystical phenomena that are unknown, there are four that are known:

1. The mystic rap is sporadic in occurrence. So it is, so it was, and so it will be. This is known.

2. The movement based by faith on this rap is a mental epidemic, as really as any Methodist revival ever was. It is a human movement, as really as Christianity is human. Its motiv power is faith in human ideas, both false and true. Its trances are human, and its mediumship spread by the well-known laws of sympathetic imitation., and they are to be accounted for and fully explained by Ideology.

3. The first communication was false as to the burial in that cellar. And the first one entranced, two years after (J. J. Hutchinson), by the spirit was thereby rendered insane, and so he remained until he committed suicide. But, as I hav elsewhere shown, he was not the last one of the many who hav thus been rendered insane, and committed suicide and murder.

4. The rap said, "Yes, yes, yes," to all the ideas suggested by Mrs. Fox, and this adoption of human suggestions and human ideas has been its chief characteristic to this day. It has adopted all the follies, fancies, and fallacies suggested for its approval. It has called itself electricity, the devil, the twelve apostles, and the heavenly father, and rendered its mediums idiotic, and exposed them to suicide and murder.

MR. EDITOR: You need not drop my name from your list so long as I and THE TRUTH SEEKER liv. With many wishes for its success, I am, yours respectfully

M. L. SCHOCH.

MODESTO, CAL., Oct. 28, 107.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed, per money order, $10. Place $7.50 to my credit for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send to me, addressed as below, one copy of Mr. A. P. Sinnett's "Occult World," and one copy of Edgar C. Beall's "Brain and the Bible," all mail. I am a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and earnestly wish you well.

DR. W. J. WILHITE.

COLEVILLE, TEX., Oct. 20, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received two volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and I want all four of the first order. I also want four volumes bound in leather, making eight in all. If you take another trip, put me down for $5 for that. I am sixty-five years old, and I want to hav some of your writings for my children.

Yours truly,

R. H. LOVE.

NASHVILLE, ILL., NOV. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I see by tab on testament—THE TRUTH SEEKER—of D. M. Bennett, apostle and forerunner of mental freedom, that I am $5.75 in arrears for the best journal published in the land of Uncle Sam. Being a simon-pure kicker out of orthodox harness, and not believing that Jesus ever did or ever will pay it all, I gladly inclose $5.75, with gratitude for liberality and forbearance. Yours truly,

S. M. BROWN.

WINSTED, CONN., Oct. 31, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Thank E. C. Walker for me on account of his glorious article on temperance in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 28th. He is right, profoundly right, and his is the stand which all true Liberals should take. I won't say I'd like to kiss him, for that's nauseating between men, but if he were here I'd like to hav him kiss and hug my wife (with her consent), and that's the greatest evidence of esteem that I could offer any man.

L. V. PINNEY, Editor Press.

HOMER, MICH., Oct. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We are surrounded by all sorts of Christians here, and in talking with them on the subject of religion, they warn us to flee from the wrath to come, and refer us to the great plan of salvation as the only escape from God's wrath. Would it not be more proper to call it the great plan of damnation? I think it would, taking the Bible for our authority. Please giv us your opinion on the subject.

Yours truly, V. BABCOCK.

TRENTON, TEX., Oct. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Continue THE TRUTH SEEKER by all manner of means. It is doing a good work in North Texas, and wherever it goes. North Texas has a boom in the way of good crops, and never did the priests make more arduous efforts to get up revivals; but what a falling off and what a failure—a few young girls and boys make up the sum total; and, oh, what mourning among the orthodoxy and the priests! Infidelity, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Ingersoll make up the sad refrain. Inclosed find $5; $3 for paper, and balance for books, etc., as described, from a trial subscriber. With best wishes for paper and its editor, I am yours truly,

T. H. MANGUM.

COLD SPRINGS, CAL., Oct. 15, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I received your gentle reminder that I was in area for the glorious TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been painfully aware of that fact for some time. Poverty is inconvenient, and, being only a laborer, and working for a party that seldom has money, I do not often hav any myself. Now, I want you to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address until you are notified of my death, and I will do the best I can about the money matters. I liv in the mountains, and it is so distant from a post-office where money orders can be got that I cannot send money when I please without great expense and time in traveling. Stop, you fool! I herewith send you $3, which you will credit on my subscription, and oblige your fast friend,

B. B. TRAVIS.

LEMOORE, CAL., Oct. 27, 1882.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I suppose congratulations hav by this time become rather an old story, but none the less hearty. We express our satisfaction in your marked successes the past year, achieving a grand victory not only in the exposition of idols and image-worship but for the extension of those attributes, and principles of mind that tell for the liberation of our race from all monarchy and mental slavery. The hopes of the world center here, for as fast as the shackles fall the supreme law of the soul strikes its nativ current, and its pure waters nourish and invigorate every sensibility and function of body and mind, while the traces of those dark lines of the past of ignorance and superstition will vanish as loathsome vapors before the clarifying breath and winds of heav . Ever thine in the conquest of truth,

SARAH G. FOX.

LINCOLN, MAINE, Oct. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, to be credited as follows: One dollar on THE TRUTH SEEKER subscription, which expires next month. Please send me the last edition of "Crimes of Preachers," "The Gods and Other Lectures," "Ingersoll in Canada," and "Garrison in Heaven."

I am a school teacher, and am not afraid to talk with any one on religion. I am proud of being an Infidel, though it is not often that it is to one's advantage to be known as such, in even this "free" country. I talked to-day with an Infidel nearly 80 years of age, and who is nearly to the brink of the grave, yet two days ago he worsted the leading orthodox preacher of the town. Mr. Nathaniel Fellows has always been what he is to-day—a genial, honest, earnest Infidel, and to me, at the age of 23, he is one of the noblest courage-inspiring men I ever met.

GEORGE S. PERKINS.

BERLIN, ONT., Oct. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Pleas stop sending my paper, including tracts, until further notice, as I hav not yet received last paper (that of Oct. 21st), and am afraid the postal authorities hav again spotted my paper, and taken contents and all away; and if nothing worse is brewing for me, I shall be glad, and let the matter drop. But it is rough to hav to succumb to these saintly followers of Jesus—so meek, they do not mind other peoples' business. Should I conclude not to ask you to renew the sending of the paper, you may rely on occasional small donations of money for THE TRUTH SEEKER; that is, I mean to help the cause on as much as I can, little though it be, and were it not for these "bloody" Christians and their influence on the governmental and postal institutions I should strain every nerve to further the ends of correct knowledge concerning all things. You will in the mean time kindly discontinue sending any more papers direct, and oblige yours truly,

C. C. GERMANN.

FLATWOODS, GA., Oct. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav moved again. I hav just come down here from Russellville, East Tennessee, where I hav been doing some Liberal missionary work in the way of social chat and fireside arguments. I would hav lectured some up there, but could not get a suitable building for the purpose. It is certainly the hottest orthodox hole in America. I hav a good many relativs in it, and hav been trying for the last year to break some of the old fetters off of them. I think I hav loosened them on some of them considerably. But I found them hard customers to deal with—the worst fanatics I hav ever met in my life, surely the worst priest-ridden people in America. I talked with men up there who appeared to be men of sense, who said to me that if they knew that all the Bible was false they would not discard it for any other religion because they say no other religion in their opinion can produce as good a state of society, This is what I should say is reducing things to an absurdity of the most horrid kind. But these folks down here hav been born Christians, and hav not been allowed to know anything else from the cradle up. No wonder they are blind. I think I shall stay here this winter with my brother. He is a Methodist preacher, and has been preaching about twenty-five years, and is three years younger than myself. He says he don't want me to talk Freethought to his family, and I hav promised I won't.

Yours truly,

WM. L. WORLEY.

NEWPORT, ME., Oct. 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: "Old Virginia's" short communication in your issue of October 21st is worth the price of the paper ten years. My only regret is that so divine a person did not sign her full name.

For fear, Brother Bennett, you will not get the paper, the Irish World, containing the article, "Thanksgiving for War and Sin," I make the extracts, and hope you will print them with my letter:

RIGHT REVEREND BROTHER: The signal success which has been given to our army in Egypt demands the thankful acknowledgment of the English people to God, who has endowed our generals with skill and forethought, our soldiers with disciplin and obedience, and our whole army with valor.

And the general thanksgiving should be introduced after the words "and to all men the following:"

We glorify thee for the late victory granted to our army, whereby, as in a moment, peace has been restored to Egypt, the highway between England and our Indian empire has been made safe, and the pursuits of peace hav already been resumed by the Egyptian people.

Teach us to see that thy hand hath done it; that thou wast in the midst of our camp to deliver us and to giv up our enemies before us. Bring us all to love and fear thee and to put our trust under the shadow of thy wings.

Can blasphemy go beyond that? Is there anything on this earth more cursed and damnable than priestcraft? Does not the above infamous mockery called prayer prove the truth of my words that behind all this system of infernalism is this unhung villain, God?

SEWARD MITCHELL.

BOZEMAN, MON. TER., Oct. 11, 282.

MR. EDITOR: As the book entitled "Crimes of Preachers" is revised and enlarged occasionally, perhaps you would like an item from this land of Infidel wickedness. Deeming this sufficient for preliminary, I shall come square to the point. On the 19th ult., while on a bear hunt in the mountains in this vicinity, John Newell, John Williams, and B. F. Walker, men of reputable standing in the community, unexpectedly came upon Thomas Hendrickson, a Campbellite preacher, between sixty and seventy years of age, formerly from Kentucky, in criminal connection with a small black mare. These gentleman will make oath to the above fact, and this letter has been written with their appoval.

When the good man saw he was caught he seemed filled with either the holy spirit or shame, the boys could't tell exactly which; both make a man look simple. It is only necessary to add the saint at once discovered he had urgent business elsewhere, and most unceremoniously tore away from our country, just as if he didn't giv a "tinker's dam" for the salvation of any of our souls.

THOMAS BURKE.

P. S.—Since writing the above I hav looked through "Crimes of Preachers," as given in "Champions of the Church," and although I find some equally, I think, as beastly, this one stands out unique and alone of its kind. This old man's name is an obscene word here now—so much so that it is not used in the presence of respectable ladies and gentlemen. If a Liberal in this community had committed this crime and been caught by the wolfish "pet lambs," he would be looking through iron bars awaiting the meeting of the grand jury. Sometimes I think we are too lenient and do not show the spirit of retaliation that duty demands.

LIBERAL NOTES FROM ILLINOIS.

DUQUOIN, ILL., Oct. 20, 282.

FRIENDS OF LIBERALISM IN ILLINOIS: I write you to let you know that I am still alive and on the trail (or rail), with my war-paint all on, battling for the cause of mental liberty. This is the third moon of the third year of my traveling over Illinois, and I hope to complete the circuit of the entire state during another year's travel.

During this fall and winter I hope to be able to visit all of the cities, towns, and places lying between here and the Wabash, Ohio, and Mississippi rivers where there is a possible chance of accomplishing anything for our cause. Friends living in Southern Illinois, wishing me to visit their town or city, will do me a favor by addressing me here. I want to organize local auxiliary Liberal Leagues in every place where there are five or more Liberals, either Materialists, Spiritualists, or those who hav no fixed opinions with regard to a future state of existence. Let us not despise the day of small beginnings. The largest trees often grow from very small seeds. The germ of our American republic was incubated in a gathering of less than six brave and noble men. I also hope that every one in this state of Illinois who can will become members of our State League. Please bear in mind that one dollar makes any man or woman a life-member of the State Liberal League of Illinois, and every dollar of the money thus contributed is expended in carrying on the Liberal work in the state of Illinois. Just as soon as I receive your names I will return you a certificate of membership. Please do not delay. If it is possible for me to procure the means to do so, when I send out to the members the notices of the time and place of holding the next annual convention of the State League of Illinois, I will accompany it with a pamphlet containing an account of the organization of the State League, the objects of the Liberal League movement, and a full and complete list of the names and post-office addresses of the members up to that date. There is no good reason why the Liberals of Illinois should not hav as large and as effectiv an organization as any other state is the union. We hav more local Leagues than any other state except Kansas, and we had by far the largest representation at the last National Liberal League Congress; and now, if we all take hold with a will, we can hav as good State League conventions as hav ever been held at Watkins or Hornellsville by the State Liberal League of New York. The question for us to decide is, Shall we do it? Now, my Liberal friends, I hope you will giv this matter a serious thought, and then let me hear from you. My post-office address, until further notice, will be P. O. Box 604, Duquoin, Perry Co., Ill. I remain yours for universal mental liberty,

F. F. FOLLET,
Sec'y State Liberal League of Illinois.

McHENRY, Ill., Oct. 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 in payment for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I wish, while the pot is boiling, to throw under a chip or two to help increase the flame of prohibition, which E. C. Walker so sorely deprecates. Mr. Walker argues his case as though he thought the community had no rights that a drunkard was bound to respect; that society has no right to protect itself against the evils growing out of a free use of intoxicating drink. I will admit that Mr. Walker's position would appear more plausible if the evil effects of intemperance began and ended with the inebriate. But they do not. The maudlin at his midnight cup is happy, while his wife and family are suffering untold misery and agony as the inevitable sequence of his debauchery. Neither does the evil end with the suffering and degradation of his family. The lives and property of all are in jeopardy, and crime and accident are the result; and the community suffers the loss and pays the expense.

While I am writing, news comes of a probable homicide committed last night within a few rods of my own door. A young man was stabbed in the back with a dirk-knife. Both men were intoxicated. If the young man dies we will hav a murder trial, with thousands of dollars of costs, that we can hav the pleasure of walking (or Walkering) up to the captain's office to settle. I take it that Mr. Walker don't pay many taxes, or he might be made to see that drunkards are not the only persons who hav rights to be considered in this question. His "do-as-you-please" policy is the legitimate parent of not only the aforementioned calamity, but of a majority of the crime and suffering in our land. I am for prohibition—immediate, absolute, and eternal—prohibition of manufacture, sale, and importation. Not but that we use alcohol for medicinal purposes in our family—and if every one would use it as we do, we would think it a blessing rather than a curse—but, knowing as we do the history of intoxicants, we are satisfied that the public good demands total prohibition; and are willing and anxious to forego any and all use we hav for it, for the general good of society. And when the majority come to the same conclusion, I deem it not only our right but our duty to enact such laws as will secure life and property against the damaging effects of alcohol.

Dr. Chapman, of Cawker City, Kan., in writing for THE TRUTH SEEKER last summer, speaks of the prohibition law of that state as a failure. I think he is mistaken. I think that, notwithstanding the fact that the courts hav thrown stumbling-blocks in the way of the law, it has done an immense amount of good, and that it is growing in favor with the better class of citizens throughout the state; and I hope Gov. St. Johns will be sustained and re-elected for his temperance principles.

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER for the impartial hearing it givs to friends and foes. I like that the anti-prohibitionist shall hav his say, and we will weigh his arguments, if he has any; and it is a satisfaction to know we hav one editor to whom we can go and giv expression to the result of our conclusions, and place ourselvs right on the record. I am for prohibition especially in the interest of suffering mothers and children, and for free and unqualified political franchise, without regard to sex or color.

Respectfully submitted. GEORGE GAGE.

PARK CITY, UTAH, Oct. 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I do not want to miss a single number of the fearless seeker after truth should I liv as long as Methuselah. THE TRUTH SEEKER—long may she liv to disseminate light and knowledge among the children of men to aid them to free themselvs from the slavery of creeds and dogmas!

D. M. Bennett, the war-horse of Freethought, may his great versatil mind and powerful intellect continue to grow to the perfection and wisdom of truth. As he has outlived and put under his feet his persecutors, so may he outliv all error, the greatest of which we, as Americans, are laboring under is our financial and consequent social system.

I am surprised to find among Liberals, who do so much to free the mind from the superstitions and slavery of creeds and dogmas, men who devote so much of their time to continue the enslavement of the body. Pauperism and Liberalism are diametrically opposed to each other. You cannot educate a man who has no time to read or think. You cannot enlighten or Liberalize a man's mind who has no time to spare from his labor to inform himself or accustom his mind to the process of thinking. In no country where the golden calf is worshiped to the exclusion of a medium of exchange adequate to meet the demands of trade can the laborer find time to inform himself or procure the means with which to educate his family.

I hav often asked myself the question, Can a man be sincerely and truly a Liberal, a Freethinker, and yet worship at the shrine and bow the knee to that god who has done more to oppress and enslave mankind than all the other gods combined, and at whose shrine the whole family of man, with often exceptions, continue like cringing slaves to bow crying, "Aba father, great God, and our God, without thee we are as nothing and can do nothing. Thy shining robes and jingling sounds must continue to fill the vaults of Shylock, to enable him to rob us of our just earnings, and send us starving to a pauper's grave. We are willing for the sake of perpetuating the relic of barbarism handed down to us from time immemorial, and suffer all sorts of indignities because of thee, thou sweet morsel of slavery and oppression, for we know of no other god that can take thy place, and that can save us, and we hav no time to lose in searching after one?"

Bob, one of the godhead of Liberalism, Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll, seems to be an ardent worshiper at the altar of god (gold). His stupidity upon the financial question is only equaled by his sublime cheek in introducing it into his theological discussions. His "soup-ticket" speech of two years ago is a standing menace to his credit as a thinker and reasoner. I cannot think Bob is ignorant in regard to the financial question, and I do not want to believe that he is one of the subsidized to continue in power the great class and monopoly legislation party of America. Fie upon Liberalism that, while endeavoring to free the mind, is laboring to perpetuate the slavery of the body. "Consistency, thou art a jewel." As this is my first, and for fear you will not appreciate my effort, and that this will find its way into the waste-basket, I will close by requesting you to answer the following question, What constitutes a Liberal? As I hav only quite recently merged out of the darkness of godism, I would be pleased to hav the answer in full.

ROB ROY.

STOCKTON, CAL., Oct., 282.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to state my views on Mr. Seward Mitchell's communication to your paper. At the commencement he displays a remnant of the spirit of orthodoxy in arrogantly and defiantly condemning the publication of Mr. Otto Wettstein's articles of faith or belief; at though one gentleman of this great, grand, glorious, and free republic of Freethought has not as much right to express his views as another. He says, "If death is an eternal sleep, in the name of all that is just and right, never print another paper." If he has been following after strange gods, if he has been pursuing a fancy of his creation, a phantom of his imagination, and others do not choose to follow him—because of this, THE TRUTH SEEKER must die. What! stop the grand old ship, THE TRUTH SEEKER, because we hav one sea-sick passenger—the life-saving craft that has braved many an ugly storm, and in her onward course has gathered into her spacious hold many a shipwrecked soul grasping at straws and chips from the shattered and sinking hull of orthodoxy! Stop that noble ship that has been successfully sailing for years, and has taken into every port of our globe the fruits and spices, the delicacies and luxuries of freedom and liberty! Why, she is freighted now with a cargo of the refined petroleum of intelligence, to kindle and sustain the new light of truth and universal love, and her destination is around the world. Stop her! Oh, no, Mr. Mitchell; we could not think of it. She is full-rigged and fresh-calked, and her old trustworthy old pilot is aboard. There is no danger.

It is very evident that Mr. Mitchell has been all his life aboard some old orthodox craft, where "honesty, starvation, injustice, lying, cheating, stealing, crime, and indescribable misery" hav been prevalent, and he has become so well accustomed to it that he thinks "a man is more than insane to attempt to reform it, time worse than wasted," etc. Grand reasoning, wonderful logic, brilliant ideas! If our forefathers plowed with a stick and harrowed with a bush, harvested with a jack-knife, threshed with a flail, and ground their meager crops in a stone mortar—thus, through their ignorance of agriculture, producing poverty, starvation and want—because Mr. Mitchell's pet idea is questioned—we must not use the steel gang-plow, the diamond harrow, the header and steam-thresher; we must not avail ourselvs of the improved flour-mill to convert our crops into flour to feed our fellows and keep poverty, starvation, and crime out of our midst; because the lurid flames of hell hav been extinguished and the dull, insipid eternal rest business has been ridiculed and eradicated from the mind of intelligence, we must cease to use our modern improvements that make life happy. We must not invent any more comfort-producing or pain-reducing facilities, because the cold chills creep over Mr. Mitchell's soul as he sees the shoreless lake of fire, with waves of fierce damnation and white-hot billows of consuming wrath quenched and destroyed.

"We are wasting our time even in the performance of one good deed," and there is absolutely nothing to liv for. Has Mr. Mitchell never done one good deed? If he has he ought to know that every good deed bears with it its own immediate reward, and no good deeds are in vain. But he seems to want to pay here and then pay again, and if his greedy soul cannot realize this he can see nothing worth living for.

> Seas roll to waft me, suns to light me rise,
> The earth my footstool, my canopy the skies.

It has been said that there are moments in human life worth ages, and I think that I may safely affirm that our happiest days, our most delightful hours, our sweetest and most blissful moments, are never associated with thoughts of life beyond the grave. We are not fretful and melancholy because we were not conscious of an individual existence one hundred years ago. As far as we were then concerned, it was eternal sleep; and if one hundred years hence we are again in the same condition, should that interrupt our present joys? We lose nothing that we hav any right to expect to retain—we were clay, inanimate dust, unconscious, inorganic clods; and if we to that state return, has there been injustice done? Better that than to be consigned to that place where "sinners must with devils dwell, in darkness, fire, and chains."

Even if there is really a future life what can we do about it here? We did nothing in causing it to be.

If so be there is not, we are equally as powerless in preventing the flame of life from being quenched. It is worse than a waste of time to engage our whole energies in exchanging a real world for an imaginary one. It will be a happy time when men devote their time and attention in securing the benefits of this world, and let all others take care of themselvs. One truth is clear, that the mind dates its birth from time of the organization of the body, and why th y should not end together is beyond my concepti n. Perhaps Mr. Mitchell's philosophical S rtualistic brain can solve the question.

JOHN D. STANLEY.

REPLY TO A. B. PIKARD.

BARRE, MASS., Nov. 6, E. S., 82.

MR. F KARD: My object in the article you noticed, applying masculin pronoun to God, was more to show that hose who deny the existence of a personal God, but pr ofess to believe in a supreme, spiritual intelligence or power without gender, invariably prove they do not believe their own theory, as they use a masculin pronoun wherewith to express this genderless intelligence. I only suggested "it" as a substitute to show their inconsistency.

Yes, the "want of a third person singular without gender" is often felt when we do not wish to indicate the sex of the person. Some thirty-five years since in one of our Massachusetts towns at a teacher's meeting this deficiency was discussed without any remedy being proposed. I am glad if my strictures hav excited your activ interest, and will lend whatever little influence I possess to aid in such a reformation as your propose, which meets my fullest approbation.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

READING, PA., Nov. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I need not say it was not because I was not glad to welcome you home once more that I hav not sooner reached forth the hand of welcome. I knew there would be a rush for your hand and your attention, from all sides, by warm and loving friends; I therefore waited, that I might giv you a more quiet welcome. I prize your letters; I prize your brave missionary work; I prize your method with the priests of a foreign superstition. It is so much better than telling them they are wrong and don't know anything; I prize you for THE TRUTH SEEKER; I prize you for having been in prison—in short, I prize all you hav done in awakening the minds of the world to thought and progress. In view of all this, and much more, most noble traveler, I bid you "thrice welcome" to your glorified sanctum, from which we will still be supplied with the truth as it is in good common sense. I am very much interested in the discussions on temperance, prohibition, mind, matter, and soul. They are deeply interesting. I am truly,

L. E. HUGGINS.

Men of the Hour.

THOMAS ALVA EDISON,
THE GRAT INVENTOR.

New York has quite a large number of public electric lights irrespectiv of those which are already in use in private offices, portions of hotels, and so forth, and the total of electric lighting in the metropolis is very considerable. But it cannot yet be said that the new light has anything like a general application in New York. The time is, however, drawing near when a large and certainly an important portion of the city will be lighted with the electric light instead of gas, in offices, stores, etc. Where the light has been already applied it has been found highly satisfactory. The great inventor whose portrait introduces this article, as the head of a firm, has spent more than a year in providing the huge machinery, miles of wire and other things necessary to the general use of his light in the down-town portion of New York. In but a few weeks from this date it will be used exclusivly in scores of business buildings now illuminated by gas. The time is, therefore, opportune to giv a sketch of the life and inventiv career of the man whose genius has largely contributed to this result, which will doubtless be the pioneer of others of even greater importance.

Edison first saw the light in Milan, Erie county, Ohio, February 11, 1847, so that he is still a young man. The number of patents already granted him approaches two hundred. He is of mixed Hollander and English blood, his grandfather having been a Dutchman who settled near Newark, N. J., and who married into the Ogdens, a family of English descent. Edison began his working life as a newsboy when only about eight years old at Port Huron, Mich. Five years afterward he succeeded in procuring a contract for the exclusiv sale of newspapers on the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, to which fact is due the report that he is a Canadian. His business grew rapidly under his clever and energetic management, and was supplemented by an essay in journalism, the Grand Trunk Herald, which he printed with his own type and his own hands. The progress of the war at this time assisted his paper, which had at one time 450 subscribers. Dropping his publication, he began the study of chemistry, prosecuting it in connection with his newspaper business. When his experiments on the train had resulted in his setting fire to a car by the ignition of phosphorus, he was forced to abandon it. He next pursued telegraphy as a means of livelihood, and became extraordinarily apt as an operator. In 1867, while living in Cincinnati, he began experimenting with the view to send two messages at once over the one wire, and succeeded in doing this in Boston not long afterwards. This was the first of the many inventions which hav earned for him and his country immortal honor. His phonograph first attracted the attention of the leading scientific men of Europe by reason of its exhibition at the French Institute in 1878. No better idea of the multiplicity and value of his inventions can be given than by mentioning the leading features of his exhibit in Paris at the Electrical Exhibition, 1881, where his was the largest, most important, and most varied of the many exhibits. It included his system of electric lighting by incandescence, his disk dynamo-electric-machine, his microtasimeter, which measures the smallest changes in temperature; his odoroscope, which renders visible the presence of certain essential oils and hydrocarbon vapors, and also registers their action; his electromotograph, which produces the human voice at a distance, like the telephone, but with a greater intensity, and so forth. Mr. Edison's career as an inventor, brilli nt though it is, will probably prove but a portion of the obligation which the world will owe him for some of the most delicate as well as serviceable applications of electrical science.

"Crimes of Preachers."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker,
Sir: "Crimes of Preachers" has become an indispensable book. The fifth thousand has been issued! It is finding its way into the homes of the dupes of priestcraft who are learning that preachers as a class are more apt to be criminals than ten times the number of any other class of men.

When it comes to giving the name, church, place of residence, and crime charged against clergymen, we hav a book worth having. Thanks to the good friends who hav sent me newspapers gi ing accounts of the cuttings up of the guides to holiness. Let this continue, and my next edition will be largely ben e ted, for this labor of love will be issued yearly.

I hav made a list of the crimes charged against preachers from July 10, 1882, to Oct. 28, 1882, which I giv below, omitting the names, as they will appear in the next edition of "Crimes of Preachers."

Whole number of sky-pilots who within that short time hav been charged with crime, 48.

Methodists, 15.	Presbyterians, 9.
Episcopalians, 7	aptists, 5.
Catholics, 5.	Campbellites, 3.
Congregationalists, 2	Lutherans, 2.
Unitarians, 0.	Universalists, 0.

These 48 lambs of God hav been charged with 13 Adulteries,

1 Assault with intent to murder
3 Assault and battery,
4 Bastardy,
2 Beating wife,
4 Bigamy,
4 Breach of nage promis,
4 Desertin wife and children,
3 Drunkenness,
4 Elopement with women,
3 Fornication,
1 Fraudulent divorce,
3 Forgery,
2 Gross fraud,
7 Indecent familiarities with women.
12 Immoral assault on women,
9 Insulting ladies,
1 Indecent exposure of person,
4 Inhuman cruelty to wife and children,
1 Incest,
3 Larceny,
6 Lying,
2 Murder,
1 Nuisance,
2 Perjury,
1 Rape,
5 Swindling,
13 Seduction,
2 Suicide,
2 Slander.

123 heinous crimes in 109 days!

The first edition from May, 1876, to May, 1881, showed 89 criminal preachers to each year. The second edition showed 202 from May, 1881 to May, 1882. This if continued as begun will giv about 170 for the next year.

Of these 123 crimes 67 hav been the common ministerial complaint-sexual!

Let us hope that every Liberal in America will send twenty-five cents to the author or publisher and hav one of these books ready to answer the blatant priests who so faithfully charge all crimes upon Infidels.

The book will be issued yearly. Send newspapers to the author at Waverly, Iowa, containing accounts of cleri al villains. M. E. Billings, Author.

THE

WILLIAM WILSON,

MEDICAL ELECTRICIAN, LECTURER ON ELECTRICAL THERAPEUTICS, AUTHOR OF THE "TRIAL OF MEDICIN," THE "LANGUAGE OF DISEASE," "MEDICAL FALLACIES," ETC.

WILSONIA,

The acme of perfection in Magnetic Clothing, superseding every kind of electric or magnetic garments. The "WILSONIA" will cure every form of disease, including Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Consumption, Kidney Complaint, Gout, Catarrh, Heart Disease, Deafness, Nervous Prostration, Mental Aberration, Impotence, Sterility, Sciatica, and all forms of disease resulting from impaired nerve force and loss of manhood.

"ONE DISEASE-ONE CURE," IS OUR WATCHWORD.

Names of diseases hav no meaning in our system. The same garments that hav cured Catarrh will afterward cure a cough, Paralysis, Rheumatism, or Bleeding of the Lungs.

DISEASE CANNOT EXIST WHERE "WILSONIA" IS WORN AS DIRECTED.

Read the following testimonials:

93 Conselyea st., Brooklyn, E. D., N. Y., Sept. 2, 1882.
Mr. Wm. Wilson, Dear Sir: Seven months ago I bought your garments for the cure of spitting blood, from which I suffered for several years. I spent considerable money for doctors, but the bleeding would still come on at intervals, which both weakened and alarmed me. Since wearing the garments the bleeding has stopped, and I am now as strong as ever. Through their great benefit to me, I can and feel it my duty to cheerfully recommend the Wilsonia to all persons suffering as I was.
Respectfully yours, MRS. A. BRYANT.

Catarrh and Muscular Rheumatism.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1882.
Mr. Wm. Wilson, Dear Sir: Being compelled to walk lame from the effects of a broken leg, I was recommended to try your Magnetic Garments, and I am happy to say that they hav given me great benefit, being able to walk as good as ever; and also my son, who was troubled with catarrh for years, has tried these garments, and now he is perfectly cured. Very truly, BERNARD MARKEY,
360 Degraw street, cor. Smith.

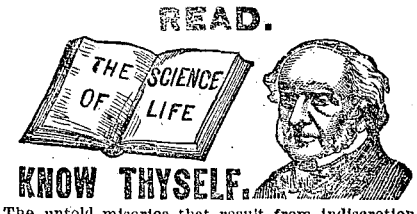
Brooklyn, N. Y., Aug. 9, 1882
Mr. Wm. Wilson, Dear Sir: It is now nearly a year that I hav worn your appliances, and I am very sure that when the year expires all disease will be driven from my body. I suffered from a complication of disease, viz., general debility, severe heart trouble, but worse than all, the worst known form of blood-poisoning. At the end of every two months I experienced a curious and powerful breaking up of the disease and expulsion of impurities. The last attack was the appearance of numberless boils. Foolishly alarmed, I consulted an eminent physician of New York. To my astonishment he prescribed mercury, but my head was level enough not to take a particle of his poison because I concluded to trust entire y to the Wilsonia And now I hav the benefit of it, for everything is healing up rapidly, and I am almost certain that it is the last symptom. Respectfully yours, H. LANGE.
cor. Jay and Nassau sts.
P. S.—Oct. 15. Since writing my former testimonial, I hav fully recovered and will be glad to answer any inquiries. H. LANGE.

CURE OF GENERAL DEBILITY.

Lebanon, Ky., Oct. 21, 1882.
Prof. Wilson: About a year ago I purchased a set of your appliances. I am glad to say that my health has improved under the wearing, and that they are exceedingly pleasant garments to wear. I feel free to recommend them to all delicate people. Yours very respectfully,
J. T. LISLE.

WONDERFUL CURE OF CONGESTION OF THE SPINE AND PARALYSIS.

Jersey City, N. J., Nov. 1, 1882.
Mr. Wm. Wilson, Dear Sir: In June, 1880, I was prostrated with congestion of the spine, which was followed by a complete paralysis of the lower part of my body, commencing at the lower bones. Was confined to my bed during the following thirteen months, unable to move my lower limbs without assistance: could not lie on my back for an instant: my body was swollen, cold, and without feeling from the hips down to the end of my toes. I was attended by three different physicians, neither of whom gave me any hope of recovery. In May, 1880, I was clothed with a complete suit of Wilsonia. I wore them as you directed night and day, and in less than three months after putting on the garments I could stand up, and with the aid of a pair of crutches could walk across the room. Since that time I have been slowly but steadily regaining my health and strength, until now I am able to walk about with a cane and attend to business, and am constantly growing stronger. Not only are my friends surprised and delighted at my recovery, but the doctors say that I am one man in a thousand.
It seems almost incredible that a man so utterly helpless as I was after receiving the best medical treatment, and being told by the doctors that I would never be able to walk again, could be so nearly completely restored to health and strength as I am. But such is the fact, as hundreds of people in this vicinity can testify. I send this testimonial unsolicited by you, believing it my duty to let suffering humanity know that they can be cured without filling the system with poisonous drugs (which in my case did almost irreparable injury). It is impossible for me to describe my feelings, and I can only say, God bless Wilsonia.
I will be pleased to give all the information possible respecting the merits of it, either in person or by letter, to the afflicted. I am, sir,
Yours very respectfully,
WILLIAM H. COCHRAN,
100 Monticello Ave., Jersey City Heights.



325 Herkimer Street,
Brooklyn, N. Y., Sept., 1882.
Mr Wm. Wilson: In reply to yours of the 28th ult., I am perfectly satisfied with the results of the Wilsonia garments. The effect of wearing them has been a great improvement in my general health, and a check in the progress of the atrophy (muscular). I shall continue to wear them. Yours respectfully, PHILIP C. NEILL.

Write for pamphlets, and note, WM. WILSON, the inventor, can only be seen at 80 COURT ST., BROOKLYN.
I will not be responsible for goods purchased elsewhere. Office hours, 9 A.M. to 7 P.M. Consultation free.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is some good in all misfortunes. Even adversity has its uses, for in the effort to conquer life's ills we often find new and untried avenues to success. Energy, ambition, and perseverance are stirred into activity, and all the life in us is merged into the one battle for victory.—Elmina D. Slenker.

SOME critics dare accuse Emerson of believing that the universe, to be complete, must be a whole, consistent in all its parts, which could only be affirmed of that which emanated from the mind of an infinit god. In this connection a bold synthesis is as much in place as the most thorough analysis. The parts of that sublime plan of such high origin are daily seen to be badly adjusted, producing often as much evil as good. In the face of this fact we dare assert that a perfect god should produce perfect fruit. A careful analysis which ramifies the works of deity yields no more satisfactory result to the unprejudiced mind.—Alhaza.

WHEN a man kisses his child, said Epictetus, he should whisper to himself, "To-morrow, perchance, thou wilt die," but those are words of bad omen. "No word is of bad omen," said Epictetus, "which expresses any work of nature, or, if it is so, it is also a word of bad omen to speak of the ears of corn being reaped." Another Greek sage, on learning that his son had died, simply remarked, "I knew all the time that my son was mortal."—M. A. Antoninus.

ON THE ILLNESS OF A BELOVED CHILD.

Now health forsakes that angel face,
Nae mair my dearie smiles;
Pale sickness withers ilka grace,
And a' my hopes beguiles.

The cruel powers reject the prayers
I hourly mak' for thee!
Ye heavens, how great is my despair,
How can I see him dee. —Burns.

"You need not read the book if you don't like it." "But maybe you like it." "I do; it's a very good story." "What makes you think so?" "Because you tell me that the end is melancholy. That is true to nature, for the end of all our lives is melancholy; to ourselvs, because we look back to see how few of our best wishes we hav realized; to those around us it must be full of melancholy, if they care for us at all. I hate sad stories because the whole world is sad." "Oh, rubbish! the world is well enough if we could only take the pleasures that offer themselvs, without waiting for pleasures that can never turn up. It's like the foolish virgin who went through a whole field of wheat without plucking an ear because she always expected to find a bigger one farther on. She ought to hav died of shame at her own greediness when she got to the end of the path and found there was nothing but dwarfed stubbles."—Charles Gibbon's Queen of the Meadows.

A SOLDIER dying in the hospital was asked by a super-serviceable agent of the Christian commission if he had found Jesus. "I didn't know that he was lost," was the reply; innocent or sarcastic we need not inquire. But what the dying soldier did not know is the most potent fact of Christian history. Nothing is surer than that Jesus has been lost for more than eighteen centuries. The myth of his transfiguration is the type of his historic transformation. It says, "There came a cloud and overshadowed him." There did indeed; a cloud of legend and myth and fancy and exaggeration, of speculativ mist, of ecclesiastical smoke, the breath of incense, but on this account no more transparent. It says, "He feared when he entered into the cloud." He might well hav done so if he had known how it would falsify his human nature till men should say, "It is a god! it is a god!"—Chadwick's The Man Jesus.

THE liberty which Luther claimed was in the main a practical one. In his famous doggerel,

"Who loves not woman, wine, and song, Remains a fool his whole life long."

But he would not permit much speculativ liberty. The suspension of judgment on which modern science insists, he would hav denounced as doubt, as a temptation of the devil. The obstinate questionings of unseen thing which makes Shakspere's plays so free and human never sounded in his ears, or if they did were dismissed with a text from scripture such as, "Get thee behind me, Satan!"—Cornhill Magazine.

KEEP thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life. Put away from thee a froward mouth, and perverse lips put far from thee. Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee. Ponder the path of thy feet, and let all thy ways be established. Turn not to thy right hand nor to thy left: remove thy foot from evil.—Proverbs iv, 23-27.

AT thirty man suspects himself a fool;
Knows it at forty, and reforms his plan;
At fifty chides his infamous delay,
Pushes his prudent purpose to resolve;
In all the magnanimity of thought
Resolves and re-resolves; then dies the same.
—Young.

THEN Manahem smote Tiphsah, and all that were therein and the coasts thereof from Tirzah; because they opened not to him therefore he smote it; and all the women that were with child he ripped up (2 Kings, xv, 16). Could we permit ourselvs to suppose that the almighty would distinguish any nation of people by the name of "his chosen people," we must suppose that people to hav been an example to all the rest of the world of the purest piety and humanity, and not such a nation of ruffians and cutthroats as the ancient Jews were.—Paine's Age of Reason.

TRUTH and honesty show themselvs in various ways. They characterize the men of just dealing, the faithful men of business, the men who will not deceive you to their own advantage. Honesty is the plainest and humblest manifestation of the principle of truth. Full measures, just weights, full service, strict fulfilment of engagements are all indispensable to men of character.—Dr. Smiles's Duty.

Odds and Ends.

MARKSMEN laugh at their own volley.

AN extraordinary thing in ladies' bonnets—an unpowdered face.

THE cultured no longer call it hash. Mosaic nutriment is the correct form.

THIS is the difference between a hen and a bride: You swear a "shoo" at one and throw it at the other.

BEFORE the wedding-day she was dear and he was her treasure; but afterward she became dearer and he treasurer.

THE New York Herald asks, "Does moonlight soothe?" It does, with the trifling assistance of a pretty girl and a rustic bench.

TOM TUCKER: In order to become a good swimmer you must always keep your mouth shut. This is the reason women do not learn to swim.

"OUTSIDE the Catholic church there is no redemption," said the Roman Catholic priest. "I'm damned if it's so," said the Protestant minister.

DIALOG near the sea on a hotel piazza: "I do not see how you ladies can remain here two months looking on the changeless ocean." "But the men change," was the reply of a lady.

OLD cheese is just the correct thing. Mite makes ight, you know.—New York News. It never occurd to us before, but it does look that whey.—Camden Post. You're a hard kase.—New York News

THIS tired-out sanctum joke is again on its travel: A subscriber writes to an editor in the West, "I don't want your paper any longer." To which the editor replied, "I would not make it any longer even if you did; its present length just suits me."

"YOU write a beautiful hand. I wish that I had such a hand," said Mr. Flasher to a lady clerk at the hotel. "Am I to consider this as a proposal?" asked the bright lady. "Well—er—yes, if my wife is willing to let me off," replied the accomplished Flasher.

SHE: "This is a pretty hour of the night for you to come home after promising me to be home at a quarter of twelve. You are the biggest liar in Austin." He (pointing to the clock): "Well, ain't three a quarter of twelve? It ain't my fault if you don't know arithmetic"

IN riding over to Lost Mountain from Marietta I came across a young man who was digging postholes for a barbed wire fence, and when I told him what I wanted, he replied:

"I'll go with you. I was in that fort myself, and I kin point out every position."

When we reached the ground he began telling where this and that regiment was stationed, and finally he halted beside a huge boulder and said:

"Right here, stranger, was where I squatted for four hours. I rested my gun right thar on that ledge, and I reckon I killed twenty-eight Yanks that day."

"No!"

"Solemn fact, and I know a dozen men who'll swear to it."

"Let's see? This battle was fought in 1864."

"K'rect you are."

"That's about eighteen years ago?"

"Jist about."

"And you are about twenty-five years old?"

"I was twenty-five this spring."

Then I looked at him for a long time, but he never winced. When we were going home, and after a long period of silence, he suddenly remarked:

"Stranger, don't you believe I was thar?"

"Perhaps you were, but you were not quite seven years old on the day of that fight."

"That's what I've been figuring on," he continued, in a very serious voice, and I'll tell you what I'm willing to do."

"Well?"

"I'll call it twenty-four instead of twenty-eight dead Yanks in front of my position. That's fair, isn't it?"

I told him that nothing could be more liberal, and cordial relations were at once established.

JIM'S EDUCATION.

Old Ned's son returned from college the other day. The old man had looked forward to the event, and had arranged a dinner, to which he invited a large number of acquaintances. The young man was modest, and, to the great humiliation of his father, made no attempt to display his learning. The old man waited several days, and when at last he saw no evidences of his son's education, he approached him and said:

"Jim, it do seem ter me dat yer's putting yer edycation ter a mighty po' use. I ain't heard a big word from yer yet. I can un'erstan' yer jist as well as I did 'fore yer went to dat school. Ef a man's edycated I wants him ter talk so as I can't un'erstan' him. Me an' yer mudder hab been talkin' 'bout dis matter, an' we'se grieved way down in de flesh. Jim, what's de big word for grasshopper?"

"Orthopterous insect of the genus gryllus, according to Webster," replied the young man.

"But de tuther day when dem folks was heah yer spoke ob a grasshopper jest de same as de ignorentest nigger in de country, an' brought shame down on the heads of yer mudder an' myself. What's de big word fur goat?"

"Mammiferous quadruped of the genus capra," answered the young man.

"But why didn't yer say so, 'stead of sayin' goat like a nigger an' bringin' de tingle ob embarrassment ter yer fader's face? What did I gin yer dat schoolin' fur—ter talk like a unedycated son ob a po' white man? Think dat I'se gwine ter keep yer heah in idleness less yer ken refleck credit on de family? Jim, what is de big word for blamed fool?"

"I don't know, sir."

"Yer doan'? Den yer ain't 'quainted wid yerself. Yer doan' recognize whar yer stands. Go out dar in de field wid a mule an' identify yerself.—Arkansaw Traveler.

Humanity and the Progress of International Law.

An address delivered

BY EDWARD SEARING

Of the New York Bar before the Society of Humanity

An illustration from history that intellectual and moral growth is measured by the decay of theology.

The president of the League says: "It shows how International Law became one of the corner-stones of the 'Era of Man.' I wish every Liberal and every patriot would read it. T. B. WAKEMAN."

Elmina says: "It is truly an excellent work, and I hav been much interested in it. Hav gained many new ideas from it, and thank thee for writing it. It embodies a wide field of gleanings, and presents its theory in such a strong and vivid light that to read is to believe and appreciate. We need just such books as this to keep us from being selfish and self-absorbed. I feel that I am better for having read it, and I trust that through its teachings many many more may be led and guided into truths leading to the happiness of the whole human race. We are indeed only one of the great mass of mankind, and our hearts should pulse in unison with all other hearts, and one good law bind all to nature in true morality and a noble life.

"Thine gratefully, ELMINA D. SLENKER."

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The singular audacity with which he attacks the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

Notes and Clippings.

A SOFT answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words lead to assault and battery.

A REMARKABLY large aerolite, weighing more than half a ton, has fallen at Aix, in the department of the Haute Garonne, France.

AN Ohio paper says, and probably correctly, "The South will make seven million gallons of cotton-seed oil this year, and you will buy some of it nicely put up and labelled finest Italian olive oil, warranted pure."

A YOUNG missionary visiting Thibet for the first time recently expressed his horror at finding the practice of Mormonism reversed under the protection of the king of Cashmere. The law allows women several living husbands, and a lad gave the names of five men when asked who his father was.

NEWS of even a greater disaster than the Manila hurricane comes from the far East. In central Japan whole villages hav been swept away by floods, and thousands of lives are said to hav been lost. The more it is studied the more remarkable the weather of the present autumn appears to be.

THE boys of Northfield College, Minnesota, were having a great deal of fun in changing a physician's sign for that of an undertaker, when a big kettle full of warm tar was emptied upon them from the roof of the house. More than twenty of them had to throw away their clothes and get their hair cut very short.

BECAUSE of an insinuation that he had not properly accounted for money furnished by the Rev. Dr. Curry, agent of the Peabody fund for holding normal institutes, and other persons, the Rev. J. W. Denton, Arkansas State Superintendent of Public Education, committed suicide at Fayetteville. The charge against him had been fully disproved, but injudicious persons kept reiterating them, and thus drove the unfortunate man to his doom.

THE Lutheran and Dutch Reformed congregations of Shillington, Pa., held their service in the same house at different hours, but concluded to consolidate their Sunday-schools, the understanding being that the children should become Lutherans or Dutch Reformed, according to the dictates of their own consciences. Charges of proselyting were soon made, and the schools were separated. They are now in the courts with a quarrel over the ownership of the organ, library, and other things.

IN a paper read before the British Medical Association it is stated that delirium tremens is relativly very rare among women, and that alcohol produces fatal effects less rapidly upon them than upon men. These points, said the essayist, were the more remarkable because he had learned that while men were the great consumers of beer, women were the great consumers of spirits. Intelligent publicans had informed him that where they sold one pint of spirits to men, they sold seven to women. It is not mentioned that six of the seven pints bought by women are drank by bibulous husbands at home; but while that fact would disarrange the above conclusion, it is undoubtedly true.

STILL another clergyman of Agnostic tendencies has been installed as a Congregational pastor. He is the Rev. William Hayne Leavel, of Brighton, Mass. He believes in the authority and infallibility of the scriptures "for all purposes for which they are intended by God," but he declines to commit himself to any theory as to the "mode of operation by which the Holy Spirit had secured the absolute correctness of the work of the writer as to all moral and spiritual truth as related to the ends of revelation." But it is his view of the doctrin of atonement that almost, but not quite, brought him under the condemnation of the ministers who installed him. He says that the atoning work of Christ is a mystery, and he has no settled belief regarding it, further than that "to every man will be given an opportunity to become reconciled to God through Jesus Christ, and to be renewed by the power of the Holy Spirit. What the opportunity shall be, when, where, and how it shall be given, God is to decide."

COL. R. G. INGERSOLL was asked for his opinion of the causes of the Republican disaster of election day. The following is his reply, written out by himself: "First, the extravagant appropriations. Secondly, the refusal to reduce taxation. At least $75,000,000 should hav been taken from the burdens borne by the people. Twenty millions should hav been taken from sugar, and the entire tax from tobacco. The Republican party should hav taken such steps that all internal taxation could within one year from now be abolished. People are tired of paying war taxes in times of peace. Thirdly, they want the collectors and treasury agents and all sorts of detectivs and spies discharged. Fourthly, the Republicans should not hav postponed the tariff reform. The Tariff Commission was a mistake. People saw that it was only an affidavit for continuance; a ruse for delay, and that the Republican party was not going to act. Fifthly, prominent Republicans hav been trying to kill each other. The great struggle has been for office. We hav too many politicians and not enough statesmen. The fight against Cornell was unfortunate. Pennsylvania was tired of the Cameron rule, and everywhere there seems to hav been hatred and disgust."

OSCAR F. HEWETT tells this story of Artemas Ward: The following morning was as rare and sunny as was Artemas himself. He could not resist an invitation to visit the "Young Ladies' High School." While walking to the academy a street runaway occurred. A terrified horse went tearing over the pavement with what Artemas called "the fore-quarters" of a wagon clattering at its heels. This incident Artemas ingeniously utilized in his address. "The vehicular elopement which has just taken place, young ladies, has furnished us with a timely topic of discourse. Young ladies' seminaries are ever exposed to runaways. Once, when traveling with my show, I came upon a female institute. There were ladders, and lads, too, as to that, at every window. Manly perpendiculars carrying fainting horizontals to the ground. 'Fire!' I shouted. 'None of that,' replied a solemn voice from the orchard. 'There ain't no fire; these are only young fellows running off with their sweethearts.' There is moral entertainment for man and beast in this runaway. No horse, if attached to a wagon, that is, if sincerely attached to it, will run away with it, but the more a young man is attached to a young woman the more he will run away with her, leaving no traces, in fact none of the harness, behind. Young ladies, since I hav stood before your beautiful faces I hav lost something, and if you or the boy that sweeps out find a red object, looking like a coral breastpin that has been stepped on, you may know it is my poor, busted heart."

GHOST stories, which hav suffered an eclips for some time, appear to be undergoing a revival. Here is one that is entitled to credence, if any are. It is usually only servants or ignorant persons who see ghosts, or visions of the Virgin Mary, but in this case the apparition, according to a correspondent of the New York Sun, was seen by two persons simultaneously, both of them possessed of more than common vigor of mind. President Tyler had a sister who was reckoned one of the most gifted women of her day. She was the namesake of Patrick Henry, and the pet of Jefferson. She lived with her father, Gov. Tyler, at Greenway, in Charles City county, Va. One night, while sleeping in the bed with a cousin, a young woman of her own age, she awoke and saw her mother, who had been dead for some months, sitting in the window seat. It was a bright night in summer, and under the window was the bed of a younger sister who was an infant at the time of her mother's death. The apparition leaned over the child and gazed intently on it. Miss Tyler remembered to hav heard that an apparition would remain as long as the eyes were fixed on it. She looked steadily at it without least alarm. Now comes the strangest part of the story. The girl lying by her side said quietly, "Maria, there is your mother." Then the form melted away. Some years afterward, after Gov. Tyler's death, his daughter was at Greenway again. She was then married, and was visiting the first wife of her brother, President Tyler. He was absent in Washington, being in the Senate. One night one of Mrs. Tyler's children became ill, and her sister-in-law went to the nursery to help take care of it. She suggested that she should get a remedy from her own room, and, taking a candle in her hand, started for it. On her return, as she passed the staircase, she saw her father standing before her. The same idea flashed into her mind that she could hold the apparition by her fixed gaze. She observed it carefully, and recognized a certain suit of brown cloth which she had sometimes seen the governor wear, and she was self-possessed enough to look for a mole on his forehead which was a birthmark. Mrs. Tyler after waiting some minutes called to her to hasten, whereupon the figure vanished.

THE Protestant Episcopal Church Congress which met in Richmond, Va., two weeks ago, took as the topic for discussion on one evening, "The Relations of the Church to the Colored Race." The discussion called forth varied and suggestiv opinions. Bishop Howe, of South Carolina, said that the two races ought to be united under one bishop. A general sympathy on the part of the whites and a becoming modesty on the part of the blacks would unite the two races. The difficulty must be met by recogizing in the canon the differences recognized in nature. The Rev. J. E. C. Smedes, of Raleigh, admitted with mortification that the Episcopal church was not doing as much among the colored race as was done by other denominations. The Rev. C. F. Tiffany, of New York, thought the Episcopal church specially fitted for the colored people, "saturated as it is with the elements of morality and religion." The Rev. Dr. Tucker, of Jackson, Miss., said that the very fact that this topic was discussed showed that there was a difference between the relation of the church to the colored and the relation of the church to the white race. He charged the negroes with an innate want of honesty, truthfulness, and virtue. All attempts on the part of masters and others to instil better principles developed the vilest hypocrisy. Dr. Hopkins, of Pennsylvania, entertained views not unlike those of his Mississippi brother. "The African," he said, "mistakes emotion for religion, and after shouting and feeling warm and good he takes that for piety, and it is no matter how many hen roosts he robs." But these views did not meet with a hearty reception. The Rev. Dr. Williams, of Baltimore, spoke especially against the assertions of Dr. Tucker as to the depraved character of the negroes. He laid stress upon their behavior during the war, and showed how they were left to protect the women and children when the men were in the army. The Rev. Mr. Shackelford, of Virginia, also defended the colored race, and contended that in many instances he had known them to be in gratitude and justice in advance of the white men. Bishop Dudley, of Kentucky, closed the discussion by saying that great injustice had been done the race by Dr. Tucker. As for himself, he, as a Southern man, was willing to sit with the negro, "be he as black as he may be, if he is the right sort of clergyman or layman." These varied views, as reported, show not only that there is much difference of opinion among Southern men concerning the condition of the negro, but that the importance of arriving at some method whereby it can be improved demands the attention of those who by long association and observance know most about the colored race. They hav a problem before them that is about as far from being solved as it was before the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Over the Mountains.

DEAR FRIENDS: I have now to tell you about my journey homeward from the plains of California. After leaving Sacramento on our northeasterly course we passed by several insignificant stations, which hardly need to be mentioned. The first place of much note which we reached is Rocklin, some twenty-two miles from Sacramento. It is principally a railroad town of about a thousand inhabitants, and there is a round house of twenty-eight stalls, and a machine-shop for railroad purposes. The celebrated Rocklin granite comes from here of which the state capital was built.

Auburn, fourteen miles further on, also contains about a thousand inhabitants. It is the county-seat of Plain county. The country is a little rough, but gardens, vineyards, and orchards abound. We have now reached what are called the foot hills of the Sierra Nevadas.

Colfax is twenty-two miles further away, and is a railroad town of about a thousand inhabitants. It was named in compliment to Schuyler Colfax, who was regarded as an early and warm friend of the road. That he found the support of the road somewhat profitable there are grounds for belief.

Gold Run, eleven miles further on, is a small mining town, for now we have reached a rugged country where mining is carried on extensively. Hydraulic mining is employed hereabouts largely, and hills of much size are washed away to be carried down to the valleys below, and to deposit worthless clay and gravel upon the most fertile land. We are now climbing the mountains pretty rapidly and are passing much very grand scenery. We have passed the north fork of the American River, as well as the north fork of the North Fork, and they dash and foam along as they leap over their rocky beds in a truly grand manner. Some of these wild water channels are said to be fifteen hundred feet below the track of the railroad.

Dutch Flat, but a few miles further on, is a mountain mining town of some note. It is situated in something of a hollow, and has two thousand inhabitants. It has many good buildings, with pleasant gardens, vineyards, and orchards. Stages leave here daily for Little York, You Bet, and Red Dog.

Near Shady Run, some seven miles further on, is one of the grandest gorges in the Sierra Nevada Mountains. It is called the Great American Canyon. At this point the American River is compressed between two walls two thousand feet high, and so nearly perpendicular that one can stand on the brink of the cliff and look directly down on the foaming water below. The canyon is about two miles long, and so precipitous are its sides which are washed by the torrent that it has been found impossible to ascend the stream through the gorge even on foot. It can easily be imagined that this locality possesses special features of grandeur.

Blue Canyon, five miles further on, is a freight and lumber station. A pretty large amount of lumber is got out here, and taken to the towns in the valleys below for market.

Emigrant Gap is five miles further on, and is the place where the old emigrant road crossed the divide and followed down the ridges to the valley of the Sacramento. The emigrants passed over the gap, while the railroad train passes under it, and the speed and ease of traveling are greatly increased. The iron track and horse have made a wonderful change in the facilities for getting through this rough country.

Cisco is eight miles ahead, and formerly, when the Summit tunnel was being made, was a place of some importance, not less than five hundred people being here, but now a few dozens are all.

Cascade is four miles away, and we are now nearing the grandest parts of the Sierras. Here we cross one of the branches of the Yuba, which jumps and leaps down the rocks in a showering of silvery spray. We are now among the snow-sheds and tunnels, which are a peculiar feature of this portion of the road. The snowfall is here some twenty feet per year, and it is an absolute necessity for the roads to be protected from this immense fall. The snow-sheds are constructed of heavy timber, sometimes square and sometimes round, and strongly framed together. The roofs are heavy, and capable of holding up enormous loads. The cost of construction of these sheds is about $10,000 per mile, and there are some fifty miles of them on the higher parts of the Sierras. They sometimes takes fire from the passing trains, but the facilities of the railroad company are so extensive, and the number of their employees so great, that the repairs are soon made. Sometimes these sheds are continuous for miles together, and sometimes there are vacancies of a quarter of a mile or less where the snow does not pack in so badly. These interstices afford a good opportunity for one to look out and take a view of the wild mountainous country, of the hills of granite, and of the numerous fir and spruce-trees, which abound in this mountainous region.

We now are approaching the summit, the highest point of the Sierras, where the railroad crosses them, over seven thousand feet above the level of the sea, but by no means the highest peaks of the mountains, for within sight are several elevations ten thousand feet in hight. Here the eternal snows are not wholly lost sight of. In many places I noticed heavy banks of snow now at this warmest season of the year.

There are also several tunnels here through the mountain of rock. The longest is over 1,600 feet in length, while others vary from 800 to 1,000 feet. Between the tunnels and the snowsheds the means for observing the mountain scenery is none too good.

The summit is 245 miles from San Francisco, and the outlook here is wild and bleak in the extreme. We are now on the dividing ridges which separate the head waters of several mountain rivers, which by different and tortuous courses find at last the same common destination—the Sacramento River. On our left, far down in that fir-clad gorge, the waters of the South Yuba leap and dance along as though they enjoy exquisitely this frolicsome sport, and the almost countless rapids, cascades, and waterfalls are a constant source of interest. The stream heads against and far up the summit, one branch crossing the road at a station called Cascade. East of Cisco the head waters of Bear River between the Divide and Yuba, which winds away beyond out of sight, and behind another mountain ridge. The American River is on the right, and these streams alike find their resting-place in the wide and beautiful Sacramento.

There is said to be no grander scenery in the Sierras than in this locality. Here are towering mountains, deep gorges, lofty precipices, sparkling waterfalls, crystal lakes, and vast masses of eternal snow, which remain here from year to year, and probably from century to century. This is a locality of considerable resort by those fond of hunting, fishing, and roaming over the wildest scenery to be found anywhere. It is cool here, even in the summer; the air is pure and bracing, and a few weeks are pleasantly spent here by the tourist who has plenty of time on his hands. The timid deer abounds, and the grizzly bear is not unfrequently met with; angling is excellent, as these mountain streams teem with trout and other excellent fish.

At Summit is a fine hotel for the accommodation of tourists, and from this point excursions are often made to Lake Tahoe, Lake Donner, and other noted and interesting localities.

Soda Springs are situated near the foot of Summit Valley, and their waters, uniting with others, form the head waters of the American River. The springs are very large and much celebrated, the waters being pronounced the best medicated waters in California. It is pleasant to drink, possessing a taste equal to the best manufactured soda water. Great quantities of it are bottled and shipped in various directions. Near the Soda Springs are others of a different quality, and boiling hot. Many people from the western part of the state visit the springs, and pass several weeks in this medicated and romantic locality.

Strong's Canyon is eight miles east of the summit, and bends around the southern end of the valley which borders Donner Lake. The crossing cold stream commences the ascent of the mountains, The snow-sheds and tunnels are continuous here, and but few peek-holes where one can look out to see the grandeur all around. The train now is on the descending grade, and we feel that we shall not permanently remain among the clouds.

Truckee City is five miles further east, and this is a place of some importance. It is situated on the north bank of the Truckee River, in the midst of what was once a heavily-timbered region, but which has been mostly cut away to supply the demand for lumber through the mining towns. Piles of lumber are in all directions around the town, and one easily understands that lumber is the principal business conducted here. The very sharp roofs of the wooden buildings of the town tell the fact that the snow falls here deep and moist, and if they were not constructed in this way they would be inevitably crushed in by the heavy weight which falls upon them. The town has about 2,000 inhabitants, who are directly or indirectly engaged in the lumber business.

A line of stages leaves Truckee daily for Donner Lake, two miles away; Lake Tahoe, twelve miles away; and Sierraville, thirty miles away. A good wagon road connects Sierra City with Truckee, via the Henness Pass and Donner Lake.

Lake Tahoe is now so near that I must repeat to you the description given of it, as it is unquestionably one of the most beautiful and romantic lakes in the world. It is said to be located in two states and five counties, the line which separates Nevada from California passing through it. Where this line passes through it the water is 1,700 feet deep. A small steamer, the Stanford, plies on the lake and is much patronized by excursionists. Tahoe City is at the foot of the lake, and here are good accommodations for visitors. Six miles from this point is Sugar Pine Point, a spur of the mountains covered with splendid forests of sugar pine, the most valuable timber found on the Pacific coast. Five streams run into the lake from this elevated land. Emerald Bay is a beautiful, placid inlet, two miles long, which seems to be hiding itself among the pine-clad hills. It is but about four hundred yards wide at its mouth, but widens to a breadth of two miles, forming what is called one of the prettiest land-locked harbors in the world. At the south side of Tahoe, near the site of the old Lake House, Lake Valley creek enters the lake through one continual series of verdant meadows, dotted with milk ranches, where the choicest butter and cheese are manufactured. Several miles away is what is called "The Cave," a cavern on the hillside overhanging the lake and one hundred feet above it. On the north end of the lake are the celebrated Hot Springs, and these are located just within the state of Nevada. Near them is a splendid spring of clear, cool water, and devoid of mineral taste. Cornelian bay is a beautiful indenture in the coast, with a fine gravel bottom. The shores of the lake are generally smooth and gravelly.

The length of the lake is about twenty-two miles, and the width ten miles. The water is remarkably clear, so that fish and pebbles can be distinctly seen from the surface at a depth of more than fifty feet. Tahoe is an Indian name, and means "big water." It is pronounced by them "Tah-oo," while the pale-faces pronounce it "Ta-hoe."

Donner Lake is a lovely little lakelet, often called the "Gem of the Sierras." It is two and a half miles north of Truckee. It is about three and a half miles long, and a mile in width, though of irregular shape. It has a depth in the deepest place of two hundred feet. Like Lake Tahoe, it is thought to be a crater of an ancient volcano, as the surrounding mountains present unmistakable proofs of igneous formations. Like the waters of Lake Tahoe, it is clear and cold; every pebble can be distinctly seen in the deepest places. Donner Lake is surrounded on three sides by towering mountains, covered with a heavy growth of fir, spruce, and pine trees of immense size. This beautiful lake lies so near the railroad that a fine view of it is obtained from the train. Within sight are four tunnels and many miles of snow-sheds, while behind, and seemingly overhanging the road, the mountains, bald, bleak, and bare, massive piles of granite, tower far above their precipitous sides, as though bidding defiance to the ravages of time.

Long before the railroad passed over this rugged country a "Pony Express" was started through this wild region in 1870 to meet the pressing business of the Pacific Coast. The first overland mail was carried between St. Louis and Los Angeles in 1858 in about twenty-three days, three days' shorter time than was required by the mail line via Panama. The "Pony Express," which left St. Joseph, Mo., and San Francisco, simultaneously, April 3, 1860, succeeded in transporting it through safely on its first trip in ten days, on its second in fourteen days, the third nine days, the fourth ten days, the fifth nine days, the sixth in nine days, a distance of two thousand miles. This rapid transmission of business correspondence was of great value to the business men of those days.

This service required courage and endurance, as well as enterprise and the expenditure of large sums of money. The moment the ferryboat touched land on the opposite shore the pony expressman mounted his horse, and by day or night, in starlight or darkness, whether sun-dried or soaked, snow-covered or frozen, among friends or foes, lonely or merry, onward he sped his way till at the next more-than-welcome station he leaped from his saddle to rest. Here another was ready whose horse, like himself, had been waiting, perhaps without shelter, and with a cheery "Good night, boys!" he galloped off, and was soon lost in the dark or in the distance. He rides on alone over prairies and mountains, whether uphill or down, on rough ground or smooth, until he descries in the distance the goal of his hopes and the station is reached. To tell the losses of men from the Indians, and of horses and other property, both from volunteers as well as from Indians, with the many thrilling adventures of those who participated in this daring enterprise, would require a volume of large size.

As we pass on eastward through this wild region, where lumbering is the principal business conducted, the V flumes for the transportation of lumber are seen all along by the side of the railroad. It is a conduit for water, made of wide boards, usually in the shape of the letter V, and perhaps fifteen inches in depth. In this narrow channel hundreds of thousands of feet of lumber, in the form of boards and timber, are transported for miles. The descent is generally tolerably rapid, and the lumber moves along as fast as a man would wish to walk or run. At the point where the lumber is to be deposited, the terminus of the flume is elevated ten or fifteen feet from the ground, and the water and lumber pour over indiscriminately, the water running away and the lumber piling up in an irregular manner, all sorts together, to be handled, assorted, and piled away accordingly. Logs are often conducted to the mill in a similar manner. This mode of transporting lumber is much in use here.

Boca is eleven miles east of Truckee. The lumbering business is well represented here, and the rapid Truckee River, by which the railroad runs for many miles, is used for conveying the logs, often singly. An extensive brewery is also here, which enjoys a high reputation for the fine quality of beer it turns out. This rapid river affords an abundance of sites for mills, and the water is in plentiful quantity. After this we are no longer in California, having crossed the line into Nevada.

We pass by the small stations of Bronco, Mystic, Essex, Verdi, to Reno, which is twenty-six miles from Boca. We ride all the way, or nearly so, by the Truckee River, and have an abundance of wild mountainous scenery.

Reno, the county-seat of Washoe county, is a flourishing looking town of over fifteen hundred inhabitants. It was named in honor of Gen. Reno, who was killed at the battle of South Mountain. It has improved very rapidly within the past few years. Now it has two daily papers, and puts on many city airs. Some good farming land surrounds the town, but the land is generally so impregnated with alkali, and has such a scarcity of rain, that it is not very productive.

The greatest mining region in the world is within reaching distance of Reno, Virginia City being located over the mountain to the southeast, at a distance of twenty-one miles by the old wagon-road, and fifty-two miles by rail. Before the completion of the railroad, Virginia City was reached by stage, over a fearfully steep, zig-zag mountain road, but the increased distance is half-a-dozen times made up in the increased comfort of the newer route.

Being anxious to see something of this mining world, I concluded to stop over at Reno, and use a day in visiting Carson City, Gold Hill, and Virginia City.

CARSON CITY.

I had but an hour to wait at Reno before the train on the Virginia & Truckee Railroad started, and I was soon on my way to the capital of Nevada. This railroad was commenced at Carson City, in March, 1869, and was completed to Virginia City in November, 1871. The grade in places is as high as 115 feet to the mile. It has six tunnels, with an aggregate length of 3,000 feet. We passed several small stations. It is over thirty miles from Reno, being situated in Eagle Valley, rather a pretty stretch of level country, surrounded by ranges of hills or mountains of considerable hight belonging to the Sierras. Carson River flows through this valley. It is the oldest town in the state, and has a good many fine private and public buildings. Among the latter are the Capitol, the Court House, the United States Mint, etc. It has about 4,000 inhabitants, is profusely decorated with shade-trees, and has an abundance of good water. Carson City is in the center of the best farming country on Carson River, and the best in this portion of the state. The town has a busy appearance, and is the depot where heavy supplies are obtained for the extensive mining country to the south.

I stopped here to visit the Voltaire Mines, largely owned by my friend, A. H. Frank, of Buffalo. The mill is a mile and a half south of Carson, and I had a pleasant ride out to it, catching a ride with a gentleman with a fine team going in that direction. I passed for some distance by the side of an extensive flume from the Sierras, which brings lumber and fire-wood in abundance for several miles. I found the Voltaire Mill in active operation, under the management of Mr. Coho, the partner of Mr. Frank. The silver ore is carted nearly two miles from the mines to the mill, where it passes through the stamp mill, and is roasted in a furnace for a certain number of hours, which drives off the sulphur and some other elements. It is afterward economically treated with quicksilver, and distilled off in the manner before described. The capacity of the mill is such that it can work up more ore than is obtained from the mine, and considerable is taken in for that reason to manipulate for others. Mining is unquestionably a hazardous business, sometimes attended with great profit, and sometimes a steady stream of money out of pocket. I should judge the Voltaire Mill is doing very well. I succeeded in obtaining a new subscriber or two for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and was ready for the next train for Virginia City, some twenty miles away. We passed through the small places, Lookout, Empire, Silver, and came to Gold Hill, which is really a part of the town of Virginia City. This is an unsightly country, very uneven in character, and thoroughly dotted with mining mills and the small mountains of débris which hav been brought up from the bowels of the earth. Virginia is on the southeastern slope of Mount Davidson, at an elevation of 6,200, with the mountains rising 1,627 feet still higher in the vicinity. The town is built on the side of the mountain, with one main street and numerous cross streets, very uneven in character, and upon the whole extremely unsightly.

At both Virginia City and Gold Hill are located great numbers of smelting furnaces, reduction works, and stamp-mills, thundering away day and night. At least this has been the case in the past, when the mines and lodes here were turning out munificently of its precious treasures; but Virginia and Gold Hill are at present under a cloud. The rich veins seem to be exhausted, and new ones are not readily struck. Some of the establishments are working over the refuse which has lain for several years neglected, while others are entirely idle. The town has boasted of 16,000 inhabitants, and when the Comstock lode was booming everything wore a flourishing appearance; but now half the buildings are unoccupied, a general appearance of unthrift pervades the town, and money is not nearly so plentiful as it used to be when the "Big Bonanza" was doing its best—not only making wealth for the money-lords of San Francisco, but dispensing it freely in the vicinity of the mines.

The first gold mines of this locality were discovered in 1857 by James Kirby and some others who commenced mining in the Gold Canyon, called afterward Gold Hill. The working of the mine was continued with indifferent success till 1859. The first quartz claim was located by James Finney, better known as "Old Virginia," on the 22d of February, 1858, in the Virginia mining district, and on the "Virginia Croppings." The old prospector gave his pet name to the city, croppings, and district. In June, 1859, rich deposits of silver ore were discovered by Peter O'Reilly and Patrick McLaughlin on what is now the ground of the Ophir Mining Company. They were engaged in gold-washing and uncovered a rich vein of sulphuret of silver when engaged in excavating a place wherein to catch a supply of water for their rockers. The discovery was made on ground claimed by Kirby and others. A Mr. Comstock was employed to purchase the claims of Kirby and those holding with him, hence Comstock's name was given to the lode.

This lode is about four miles in length, the outcroppings extending in a broad belt along the mountain-side. It extends under Virginia City and Gold Hill, the ground on which these cities are built being honey-combed and undermined in all directions; in fact, the entire mountain is a series of shafts, tunnels, and caverns from which the ore has been taken. The vein is broken and irregular at intervals along its length, so far as traced, owing to the formation of the mountain. It is also very irregular in thickness. In some places the fissure ranges from thirty to two hundred feet in width, while at other points the walls come close together. The greatest variation in width occurs at a depth of six hundred feet from the surface. The principal silver ores of this lode are stephanite, vitreous silver ore, native silver, and very rich galena. Pyrargyrite, or ruby silver, horn silver, and polybasite are found in small quantities, together with iron and copper pyrites, zinc-blende, carbonate of lead, pyromorphite, and native gold.

The number of mills in and around Gold Hill and Virginia City, and at other points which work on ore from this lode, is between seventy five and eighty. They are scattered around through several counties. The product of the Comstock lode has been beyond that of any other vein of which there is any record, furnishing the largest amount of bullion produced upon the Pacific slope. I am unable to give you the number of millions of dollars that have been taken from this rich lode, but the sum is up among the hundreds of millions, and sufficient to make many men extremely rich.

As before mentioned, it was the San Francisco capitalists who were able to manipulate these mines, to furnish the capital necessary to work them, and to receive the enormous accruing returns. The world has seemed to not have produced its equal. But it is to be feared that the glory of this locality has departed, that the mineral wealth has been largely extracted, and these hills may never again see such a booming time as they have enjoyed in the past. Prospecting is still kept up, and the hope is indulged that other rich veins will be struck, and that prosperity will again return to these rough mining towns. I concluded if I could have but a hundredth part what the works hereabout cost, including the shafts, the stamp-mills, the smelting works, the engines, and all the first-class and expensive machinery, it would be far more than I could ever use. I was in one of these establishments, and was struck with the massiveness and perfection of the engine and other machinery. The cost of all of it has been many millions of dollars.

These mines extend down deeper into the earth than any other mines of which I have knowledge. The great depth of 2,300 feet is reached, and the increased heat in making the descent to that depth is so great as to be almost unendurable. It was my desire to go down into one of these deep mines and experience for myself the great change in temperature which exists here, but I found that the day had so far advanced that it would be impossible to make the descent on that day, and that I would be under the necessity of waiting over another day. I felt in a hurry to be getting on toward home, and concluded to not remain over. The descent is made in the steam shafts by steam power, but some of the shafts are more or less wet, so that the descent is not attended in full with absolute pleasure. There is a story in circulation here that Col. Ingersoll two or three years ago made a descent into one of these deep mines, in which he almost roasted, and upon emerging he eagerly took the fresh air and made the the remark that were he to have to go much nearer hell it might be well to join some church.

I called upon several friends and patrons, and they urged me to stop over another day with them, and perhaps speak in the evening, but feeling in haste to get on I did not comply with their wishes. When the train was ready to start for Reno I was among the passengers, and in three hours we reached Reno. Here I stopped over night, and had the pleasure of seeing some TRUTH SEEKER patrons, and in the morning I was ready to resume my eastward journey.

For two or three hundred miles east of Reno the country of Nevada is among the most barren and beautiless of any I have seen in all the world. The land is diversified between hill and plain, but little grows in all this dreary waste but sage-brush, and perhaps another ill-looking shrub called grease-wood. Wood does grow in some places, for I see long ranks of it which have been brought in by mule teams, but there is little that is lovely to be seen. The soil is partially white with the alkali, which seems to abound here everywhere, and nothing but the sage-brush seems to want to grow upon it. I must, however, mention the principal points through which we passed.

Vista is a small station east of Reno, and is situated on the nothern edge of what is known as the Truckee meadows. In early days these meadows were a noted rendezvous of emigrants, who on their wearisome journey to the land of gold tarried here for several days to recuperate themselves and teams after crossing the desert. The meadows have an extent of some twelve miles in length by two miles in width, inclosing a pretty large body of good grass land. Vegetables and small grains are also successfully cultivated here.

Clark's is eleven miles further on, and, although the arid desert occupies the interim, here are fenced fields, and fair crops of vegetables appear to be raised. The mining towns in the south afford a good market.

Salvia is seven and a half miles further east; near it is a lava bluff, called Red Rock.

Wadsworth is over seven miles on our journey, and is situated on the eastern bank of the Truckee River, and is sometimes called the western border of the desert, for west of this the country can hardly be ranked as a desert, for considerable vegetation is grown. The town has some good buildings, and a population of some six hundred. The railroad company have a division shop here, with a round house with twenty stalls, car, machine, and blacksmith shops. A piece of ground has been fenced in near the railroad shops and well watered, so that it looks green and lovely with vegetation. A good deal of freight leaves this point for the mining regions south. Pine Grove Copper Mines lies six miles south of Wadsworth. Ten miles further south are the Desert Mines, which consist of gold-bearing quartz lodes. Some very rich mines are said to be located near there. Ninety miles south, at Columbus, are the famous Borax Mines of Nevada, which are counted very rich.

Desert is seven miles further on, and little can be said for it, save it be that it is truly a desert. We are now descending considerably.

Hot Springs is eleven miles further on our journey. On the left-hand side of the road can be seen several hot and bubbling springs, which are always a decided curiosity. They have been called the escape pipes or safety valves for the superabundance of heat which pervails below the crust of the earth. Extensive salt works are located here, and a carload or more of salt is shipped daily. The salt springs are some four miles west of the station. The Saxon-American Borax Company have erected works here at an expense of $200,000. These are half a mile south and in full view.

Mirage is nearly seven miles further on our eastern journey. The station derives its name from the curious phenomena which take place here, and which are not uncommon in other deserts. In early days the toil-worn traveler, when urging his weary teams across the cheerless desert, has many a time had his heart lightened by the sight of clear running streams, waving trees, and broad, green meadows, which appeared to be but a short distance away. Often has the poor emigrant turned aside from his true course and followed the delusive vision for many weary miles, only to learn the painful fact that he had been following a phantom—a will-o'-the-wisp. It still remains a mystery what causes these optical illusions. Many have seen the green fields and leafy trees—or, rather, the appearance of them—apparently but a mile or so away, and as bright and beautiful as though a presentation of Nature herself. It is easy to understand how disappointed a poor, fatigued, famished emigrant must feel when, after a hard day's travel, as the sun is declining in the west, he sees at a short distance ahead the welcome signs of flowing streams, green mountains, and waving forests—to only find that he has been deceived, and that there was no reality in it.

White Plains is eight miles further on our journey. This is the lowest elevation on the Central Pacific road east of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. As an indication of this fact, the plains immediately in the vicinity are nearly white with the alkali which has at some time been in the form of a solution and then evaporated by the continued aridity which usually prevails in all this section. Solid beds of alkali even slope away to the sinks of Carson and Humboldt lakes. No vegetation here meets the eye when gazing over this dreary expanse. The sun's rays seem to fall perpendicularly down upon this barren scene, burning and withering as though they would crush out any and every attempt which the other forces of nature might make to give the parched earth a carpet of green. The water to fill the big tank at the station is pumped from the "sink" by means of a stationary engine, which is situated about midway between the station and the sink.

Brown's is twelve miles further on, and is situated about midway of the northern shore, directly opposite. Humboldt Lake, a body of water about thirty-five miles in length by ten miles in width, really a widening of the Humboldt River after coursing through three hundred and fifty miles, lies in this vicinity. Through this basin the water flows to the plains beyond by an outlet at the lower end of the lake, uniting with the waters of the sink of Carson Lake, which lies about ten miles to the west. During the wet season, when the swollen rivers have overflowed the low lands around the lakes and united them, they form a large sheet of water, eighty miles or more in length, with a large river emptying its waters into each end, and for this vast volume of water there is no visible outlet.

Across the outlet of Humboldt Lake a dam has been erected, which has raised the water about six feet, completely obliterating the old emigrant road which passed close to the southern shore. The necessities of mining have utilized the waters of the lake, and now they are employed in turning the machinery of a quartz mill. In the lower end of the lake is an island—a long, narrow strip of land—which extends up the lake and near the northern shore. Before the dam was put in the outlet this island was part of the main-land. There are said to be several varieties of fish in the lake, and an abundance of water-fowl during portions of the year.

Leaving the station and passing along the shore of the lake for a few miles, an intervening sand-ridge hides the lake from view, and about eight miles west is observed a fine view of the sink of Carson Lake, which is a small body of water lying a few miles north of the main Carson Lake, and connected with that and the Humboldt during the wet season.

Carson Lake lies directly south of Humboldt Lake, and is from twenty to twenty-five miles long, with a width of ten miles. In the winter its waters are said to cover considerable more area, the sink and the lake being one.

The Carson River empties into the southern end of the lake, discharging a large volume of water. What becomes of the vast body of water continually pouring into these lakes is the problem not fully solved. Probably it soaks away into the arid earth as the waters of the Jordan do into the parched earth about the Dead Sea. Some claim the existence of underground channels, and marvelous stories are told of the unfortunate people who have been drawn down and disappeared forever. If underground channels exist it would seem singular that the lakes, which are ten or fifteen miles apart in low water, are united during the winter floods, and that when the waters have subsided from these alkaline plains, no openings for these channels are visible. Much of the water doubtless escapes by evaporation, and much soaks away into the arid earth. The sun is so powerful on these lava plains in the summer season that the water evaporates as soon as it escapes from the cooling shadows from the hills. It has been demonstrated by experiment that the evaporation of the two bodies of water in hot weather equals six inches every day. In the humid air of winter it is much less.

Carson River, which gives its name to the lake, rises in the eastern slope of the Sierras, south of Lake Tahoe, and opposite the head waters of the American River. From its source to its mouth is nearly two hundred miles. Under the name of Carson Valley, the land bordering on the river has the reputation of being the best farming land in the state.

Lovelocks is sixteen miles further east, and derives its name from an old meadow ranch which is situated near, upon which, during the summer, a large quantity of hay is cut and baled for market. Attempts have been made at farming, but with indifferent success. Cattle and sheep raising is the principal occupation of the people. It is stated that the number of stock in the valleys of the Humboldt and Carson are 963 head of cattle and 30,000 head of sheep.

The great Nevada Desert is the largest portion of the Nevada Basin. Much of it consists of barren plains, destitute of wood and water, and abounding in low broken hills of the most dreary and barren appearance. This is part of the great belt which is traced from Oregon to Arizona, and far into the interior the desert sandhills and flats occur at intervals, but the main bed of the desert is lava and clay combined, one about as deficient in life-giving power as the other. The action of the elements has covered these clay and lava deposits with a coarse dust, resembling sand, which is blown about and deposited in curious drifts and knolls by the wind. Where more sand than clay is found the sagebrush obtains foothold and bravely tries to hold all it gets.

Oceana is reached after passing over twelve miles of dreary road. It is in a rough, uneven section of country. To the southeast are located a number of mining districts, in which are several stamp mills and smelting works. West of the station the desert is especially dreary and desolate.

Ten miles further on is Rye Patch, obtaining its name from a species of wild rye that grows luxuriantly on the moist ground near the station. On the right, against the hillside, is a hot spring, over whose surface a cloud of vapor is generally floating. The medicinal qualities of the water are highly extolled by those who have been benefited by them. On the other side of the track is a ten-stamp quartz mill for working up the ores brought from the mountains. There are several mills a few miles away.

Humboldt is eleven miles further east, and here is a regular eating station, where trains each way stop thirty minutes for meals. Here, also, is the clearest and coolest mountain spring to be found on the entire road. The water is conducted to the station, and shoots up in front of it in a beautiful fountain, causing one to forget for the moment the dreary waste that has been passed over.

In the country around this station are abundant objects for study. These barren plains, broken hills, and curious lakes were once the center of extensive volcanoes. The singular formation of the soil, the lava-deposits of a by-gone age, the fossil remains and marine evidences of past submersions, and, above all else, the grand and unsolved problem by which the waters that are continually pouring into this great basin are prevented from overflowing the low land around them, are objects worthy of the closest study. From this station the noted points in the surrounding country are easy of access. About seven miles to the northeast may be seen the Star Peak, the highest point in the Humboldt range, on which the snow continues to hold its icy sway through the whole year. Two and a half miles southeast are the Humboldt mines, five in number, rich in gold and silver. The discovery of a borax mine is said to have recently been made in the immediate neighborhood. Five miles north are the Lanson Meadows, on which are cut great quantities of grass of an excellent quality. Thirty miles north are the new sulphur mines, where this satanic mineral has been found nearly in its pure state. It is so hard it has to be blasted out the same as rock. Here are to be seen the effects of irrigation in this sandy, sagebrush country. The garden at the station produces vegetables of all kinds. Fruit trees also look promising here.

Mill City is eleven miles further on. It is a place of no great note, though a large cattle business is done here. Stage lines also run from here to towns fifteen to twenty miles away.

Two unimportant stations are Raspberry Creek and Rose Creek, seven and ten miles away.

Winnemucca is the county seat of Humboldt county. It is 416 miles from San Francisco, and 1,451 from Omaha. It is in a somewhat extensive basin, and has an elevation of 4,331 feet. The town was named after a chief of the Piute Indians who formerly resided here. The town has nearly a thousand inhabitants, with many lively business houses. But as mining towns are not very lively at this time, Winnemucca is a little drooping. I met here an esteemed friend and patron who takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and subscribed for four sets of around-the-world volumes. He has for several years been a druggist in the town. A good deal of mining is done in this vicinity, and quite a number of mills and furnaces are in operation. In the Winnemucca range many lodes of silver-bearing ore have been located, from which great expectations are indulged. Stages leave here daily for mining camps in all directions and at long distances away. Boise City, for instance, is 255 miles off, and the fare $40.

There are in this part of the state many peculiar lakes, called Mud Lakes. The one that particularly bears this name is fifty miles west across the Humboldt. It receives the water of Quinn's River and several smaller rivers during the rainy season. It has no outlet, and is fifty miles long and twenty wide at high water. In summer it dries up to a mere stagnant pool. At the head of the lake is Black Rock, a noted landmark in this part of the country. It is a bold, rocky headland, rising about 1,800 feet above the lake, bleak, bare, and extending for several miles. It is an isolated prominence, and stands solitary guard over a great expanse of country.

Pyramid Lake is about twenty miles south, and receives the waters of the Truckee River. It is thirty miles long and twenty broad when the waters are at their highest.

Winnemucca Lake is a few miles east of Pyramid Lake, and is another stagnant pond, about fifteen miles long by ten broad. This lake is connected by a small channel with Pyramid Lake, which in turn is connected in a similar manner with Mud Lake. But it is only at high water that they are thus connected. Winnemucca is the western terminus of the Humboldt division of the road.

Six miles on east is Tule, an unimportant station, save that it was here that some mines were early discovered. Mr. Barbeau, in 1860, while herding stock, discovered the silver ore, and from that beginning prospecting was carried on with vigor, and many valuable bodies of ore were located.

Continuing on our journey ten miles further, we came to Golconda, a small station with a few good buildings. Large herds of cattle range near by in the surrounding valleys and on the bluffs, though it looks as if cattle must here find rather dry picking. As the name implies, rich mines of gold and silver are located both on the north and south and within a few miles.

The next point reached is Iron Point, eleven miles east and of insignificant character. The bluffs draw very close to the railroad here, with barely room for a river and a narrow strip of meadow land.

Stone House is twelve miles further on, and was once an old trading post, strongly fortified against Indian attacks. The Stone House stood at the foot of an abrupt hill, by the side of a spring of excellent water, but is now a mass of ruins. South of this station are many more of the hot springs that abound in the Nevada basin. The bottom grows nothing but sage brush, and is both of the volcanic, sandy nature and alkaline. "Dreariness" expresses the situation.

We pass the insignificant stations of Coin and Perite, seven miles apart, and the first seven miles from Stone House, and then four miles to Battle Mountain Station, where the trains east and west stop for dinner. The waiters are Chinese, and they show much activity in waiting upon the hungry travelers. The water which supplies the little fountain in front of the Battle Mountain House is conducted in pipes from a spring in the side of a mountain three miles to the south.

This is the distributing point for a great number of mining districts, towns, and camps, both north and south of the road. Stages and fast freight lines leave daily for the northward to Tuscarora, eighty miles; Cornucopia, one hundred miles. The shipments from Battle Mountain Station average five hundred tons per month, with a steady increase. The surrounding country is alive with herds of cattle, particularly on the north side of the river, and this station has become quite a point for the cattle buyers of California to come to to purchase.

To the south of Battle Mountain runs a three feet gage railroad, organized in September, 1879, and completed three months later, and two years later sold out to the Union Pacific. Its general course is southward, up the valley of the Reese River, ninety-three miles to Austin. The grades are easy, and the country tributary rich in mines, agricultural lands, cattle, and sheep. The stations and distances along the way are as follows: Galena, eleven miles; Mound Springs, ten miles; Bridges, twenty-two miles; Wallers, thirteen miles; Hallsvale, ten miles; Caton's, ten miles; Ledlies, ten miles; Austin, seven miles. Twenty mining districts are tributay to this road, many of which are rich and have stamp mills and melting furnaces.

Austin is situated near the summit of the Toiyabe Range, on the ground where the first silver ore was discovered, in May, 1862, after which prospecting was very lively for two years, many valuable mines being brought to light; and soon mills were erected at different points. Austin contains a population of 2,000, nearly all of whom are engaged in mining operations. There is considerable trade here in supplying the mining district, which extends from fifty to one hundred miles round about. A paper is published here in this mountainous district.

Hot springs abound in the vicinity of Battle Mountain, some of them strongly impregnated with sulphur and other minerals; but hot springs are so general throughout Nevada that these attract no particular attention.

On our eastward journey we pass over eleven miles of the road and then reach Argenta, formerly an eating station and a distributing point for the Austin and Reese River country, but now descended to a side track. Paradise Valley lies on the north side of the river, nearly opposite the station. It is about sixty miles long by eight wide, very fertile, and thickly settled. The northern part, called Eden Valley, is about twenty miles long and five wide, and is of the same fertile character.

Paradise Creek is a clear, cold mountain stream, and upon it are numerous grist and saw mills. It rises in the Owyhee mountains and flows through these valleys to the Humboldt River. Salmon trout of enormous size are found in the stream and its tributaries. Bears, deer, silver-gray foxes, and other game abound on the hills and in the neighboring valleys. This section of the country is noted for its stock-raising. Tens of thousands of cattle are roaming along the Humboldt and adjoining valleys and surrounding hills. It is computed that there are not less than 350,000 head between Promontory Mountain and the Sierra Nevadas. One firm near this station has 40,000 head, and one ranch fences over 28,000 acres.

A few miles west of Argenta Reese River Valley joins the Humboldt—coming in from the south. It is very diversified in features, being seven or eight miles wide in some places, and then dwindling down to narrow strips of meadow in other places. Some portions of the valley have a fine soil, capable of high cultivation, while other portions are barren sand and gravel. This valley has also been known by the name of "Whirl Valley," because of the numerous whirlwinds which prevailed here, taking dust and fine sand skyward. Reese River, which flows through this valley, rises in the south, some two hundred miles distant. It has many tributaries, which gather in the mountain slopes. The river sinks in the valley some thirty miles before it reaches the Humboldt, and it is only during the very highest water that a portion of Reese River reaches the Humboldt.

Near where Reese River sinks in the sands was fought a brisk battle thirty years ago, between the whites and the Indians. A party of marauding Shoshones had stolen a lot of cattle belonging to the emigrants and settlers, who banded themselves together and gave chase. Here they overtook the Indians and the fight commenced. From point to point, from rock to rock, down to the water's edge, the Indians were driven, who, when finding themselves surrounded, fought desperately. When night fully set in the settlers found themselves in possession of their cattle, and so many of the redskins had bit the dust that the power of the tribe was ever afterward broken. From this battle the name Battle Mountain was derived.

Resuming our journey, eleven miles more brought us to Shoshone, which occupies an elevation of 4,636 feet. Across the river, to the right, is Battle Mountain, rising clear and sharp from the river's brink. Silver and copper mines of some value have been discovered in this locality. Opposite Shoshone Rock Creek empties into the Humboldt. It rises about forty miles to the northward, and is bordered by a beautiful valley about four miles wide. The stream is well stocked with fish, among which mountain trout are abundant. The country about the headwaters of the stream abounds in a great variety of game.

Ten miles more brings us to Be-o-wa-we, which is in a narrow pass called Copper Canyon. The Cortez mines and mills are located thirty-five miles south of this station, with which they are connected by a good road. Here on the Red Ridge is the dividing line between the Shoshones and Piutes, two tribes of Indians who seem to make it their business to prey upon emigrants and settlers, to steal stock, to eat grasshoppers, and to rob each other and everybody else who comes in their way. The Shoshones, especially, are a very degraded class of Indians, and until recently were like the Ishmaelites of old—their hand against every man's and every man's (in self-defense) against theirs. Since, however, they have found they can do quite as well by begging as by stealing, they have adopted the former and dropped the latter. The term Be-o-wa-we signifies gate, and is literal in its significance.

Passing through this gate, our cars wind along the hillside over the low meadows, which here are narrow. The bottom is broad, but covered with willows, with the exception of the narrow meadows mentioned. Amid these willows the stream winds and twists about through innumerable sloughs and creeks, as though undecided whether to leave this shady retreat for the barren plains below. The traveler very likely may see a flock of pelicans disporting in the water, on their return from their daily fishing excursion to Humboldt Lake. These birds, at certain seasons of the year, are to be found here and there along the river for some twenty miles, and in great numbers. They build their nests in these willow islands, and rear their young undisturbed; for even an Indian cannot penetrate these swampy, treacherous fastnesses. Every morning, it is said, the old birds take their flight to Humboldt Lake, where in the shallow waters they load themselves with fish, returning toward night to feed their young, and then ramble about the bottom.

MR. COURTLANDT PALMER lectured before the Manhattan Liberal Club on the evening of the 10th on "The Glory of Liberalism." Together with a comprehensiv picture of the chaos of old beliefs, he drew a vivid delineation of the new era of scientific expression and belief, illustrating his subject from poetry and philosophy. The chief glory of Liberalism that he depicted was in the development of the altruistic side of human nature in which he saw the utmost possibility for the advancement of the race. The lecture consisted mainly of the devolopment of this branch of the philosophy of Auguste Comte as polished and rounded by the advance of modern Liberal ideas. It was a magnificent effort, and was listened to by a large and appreciativ audience.

Snakes.—Concluded.

It is said that Rev. J. E. Richards, of St. Johns, in a sermon, said that "God must hav made Adam a very small child, and that he afterward grew to be a man." Now, if the Rev. Richards is correct, little Adam must hav been a very smart child, for the good book teaches that the Lord brought all of the animals to Adam, that he might giv them names. If God was of the opinion that owing to the great press of business on hand, he could make a saving in the raw material and save valuable time by making a twenty-pound child instead of a 200-pound man, it is quite likely that the learned theologian is correct in his statement.

But why did not God warn his children against the danger of snakes, by sticking up a notice on every tree in the garden, saying, "Beware of snakes!" Owing to the great press of business on hand, it is likely that God forgot to giv a lecture on the subject of snakes, and warn his children, as he should hav done had he possessed as much love for his children as I hav always had for my children.

I will now tell a big snake story which is fully equal to any of the snake stories of which I hav already made mention.

According to the Shastra, a book in India, which, like the Christian Bible, is said to be of divine origin, the earth is a circular plain, resembling a water-lily. Its circumference is four hundred millions of miles. It is borne upon the backs of eight huge elephants; the elephants stand upon the back of an immense tortoise, and the tortoise upon a thousand-headed serpent. Whenever the serpent becomes drowsy and nods, an earthquake is produced. On such occasions the people rush out of their houses and shout, beat drums, blow horns, and beat gongs, for the purpose of rousing him, and thereby prevent other earthquakes.

Now, owing to our education, we are inclined to think the good people of Hindostan who believe this snake story to be true, are mistaken. And yet, in my judgment, it is just as likely to be true as the Christian snake story about a snake talking to a woman, for which act he was cursed and made to crawl on his belly, instead of crawling on his back, and to liv on dust. But in these times there are some snakes who prefer frogs to dust for a square meal, and God don't seem to care any more about it than he does to see a man in these days work on Sunday, an act for which he used to be killed.

We will venture to tell still another sacred snake story, and I will not say that it is not true, for the reason that it is possible that the divine book from which I take it, like the Christians' sacred book, may hav a passage which reads, "He who believeth not shall be damned." So it is probably the safest way to believe all snake stories.

According to the Shastra, Vishnu, a sort of god or deity, after the destruction of a former world by a deluge, composed himself to sleep on a thousand-headed serpent, which floated upon the surface of the waters. During a nap of some million of years a water-lily grew from his body, and from this flower issued Brahma, the creator. Having formed the world anew and created many gods, he proceeded to create man. But whether he made man a little child, and out of mud (dust), according to Rev. Richards's idea of the origin of the human species, I cannot say. But if I were a god, I think that I could do better than to go to sleep on the back of a big snake, with a thousand heads hissing me to sleep.

However, men differ in their opinions upon the snake question. The deeply-learned theologian, Rev. J. E. Richards, evidently values his opinion on the snake and other questions at a pretty high figure, for I gave my honest opinion as to his religious belief, and, not supposing that he believed the Bible snake story, I said that he didn't believe the Bible was the word of God. So he has sued me "as a Christian duty," for ten thousand dollars damage, and in a few days I shall hav to place my neck on the block, when the great ax in the hands of experts will undertake to cut my Infidel head off at a single blow; after which the good man and his four lawyers will go for my pocketbook, in the interest of Jesus. And if they shall get ten cents—which I do not believe they will—I shall ever after hate all snake-story books.

Valued Words.

From The Spiritual Offering.

"A New Departure" is announced in the last issue of that stanch Liberal paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. We cannot do better than to giv the first paragraph of Mr. Bennett's editorial upon the subject, thus allowing the veteran editor to speak for himself:

With a view of increasing the number of the patrons and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we hav resolved to lessen the price at the commencement of the tenth volume on Jan. 1, 1883. This is not because we hav been making too much money, nor because by the publication of this fearless weekly we hav been enabled to lay up treasures where moth and rust do not corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal; for the fact is, we are publishing the largest Liberal journal in the world; and in view of the quantity of reading matter we weekly lay before our readers, we are publishing at a lower price than any similar publication. We are giving seven hundred inches more of reading matter every week than is contained in any other Liberal journal with which we are acquainted.

Of all the so-called Liberal papers (some of them very illiberal) THE TRUTH SEEKER has been the fairest and most favorable to Spiritualism, and we hope this "new departure," reducing the price to $2.50, may add many thousands to its subscription list.

W. F. Jamieson Again in the Lecture Field.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please announce that I will be engaged this winter in giving courses of lectures, and will help on the Liberal work by voice as well as pen. I will write no less, but will speak more than I hav this summer. All who wish to engage lectures will please address me at Pepin, Wis. Respectfully,

W. F. JAMIESON.

Editorial,

A Bitter Fling.

In the issue of Liberty for the 11th inst. Benj. R. Tucker, on the arrest of Mr. Heywood, has this passage:

In this connection we must express our indignation at the cowardly conduct of D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who prates about Mr. Heywood's tastes and methods. We do not approve of Mr. Heywood's taste and methods, but neither did we of Mr. Bennett's, when we did our little best a few years ago to save him from Comstock's clutches.

Friend Ben, indeed, seems to labor under a great amount of indignation toward us. We hope it will not strike in and kill him. When we both stand upon the same platform—disapproving Mr. Heywood's taste and methods—it would seem there is hardly sufficient ground for so much indignation; though it is perhaps because we "prate," while he simply makes the assertion that he does not approve of Heywood's taste and methods. Probably our "cowardly conduct" consists in disliking Mr. Heywood's taste and methods the same as Mr. Tucker does himself. If we are guilty of cowardly conduct because we disapprove of Mr. Heywood's taste and methods, how is it with himself? Is he not cowardly at all? Or is it also our "prating" that makes our conduct cowardly?

We hav entertained naught but a friendly feeling for Mr. Tucker, and cannot help regretting that he has such a serious attack of indignation. And then he boasts of what he has done for us. We were not aware that he had made such efforts in our behalf, nor were we aware that we had received any special benefit from his efforts. We shall try to feel grateful, however, all the same. But should we get into Comstock's clutches again, we hope friend Tucker will not unduly trouble himself on our account.

"The Brain and the Bible."

We hav purchased the plates and copyright of Edgar A. Beall's valuable work, "The Brain and the Bible; or, the Conflict between Mental Science and Theology," with a preface by Robert G. Ingersoll. This excellent work was published at $1.50, but we hav resolved to sell it at one dollar. At this reduced price it ought to hav a large sale.

Mr. Beall is a practical phrenologist, besides being a most intelligent Liberal. His work treats upon the science of mind and its organs, and at the same time shows clearly the fallacy of theological claims. Price, bound in cloth, $1.00.

WE announced a week ago that we had commenced sending out Vol. III. of "A Truth Seeker Around the World;" but the binders are holding us back. We beg our patrons to not feel uneasy if they do not receive the book as soon as they expect it. We mail them alphabetically, so those whose names come early in the alphabet will get them first, while those beginning with S, T, W, Y, etc., will necessarily be the last served.

In this connection it should be stated that while $1.50 pays for Vol. IV., that means in cloth binding. Those who wish it in leather binding, with vermilion edges, will need to send in seventy-five cents additional; and those wishing it in morocco, with gilt edges, must remit one dollar extra, or $2.50. We shall mail them as rapidly as we can obtain them from the binders.

WE erred in our statement in last week's paper that W. S. Bell's pamphlet, "Liberty and Morality," sells for ten cents. The price is fifteen cents, and is cheap enough at twice the money. We wish to sell not less than five hundred of them.

LESSIE N. GOODELL, of Amherst, Mass., will lecture at West Pawlet, Vt., Nov. 18th and 19th.

Communications.

Pious Missionaries and Tricky Interpreters.

The men who invade the wilds of the far West, bearing the sword of the spirit, are not less aggressiv in their way than those who wield the sword of the flesh. Wherever an Indian agency is established, before a military post has been fairly equipped and manned for the protection of settlers, the man of Bibles, and tracts, and prayers appears on the scene, and boldly begins his ghostly campaign. He strikes at once for the upbuilding of the spiritual kingdom among the children of the forest. It makes no difference in what capacity he goes—whether as Indian agent or inspector, or in the humble character of a servant of the church—he looks first to the interests of Zion, and never loses sight of the cross. As a rule, these pious functionaries bring to their work no knowledge whatever of the real character of the Indian. They know that he is a heathen and a wild man of the woods, and that is all they know about him. Of his habits of thought and peculiarities of disposition; of the fixed and stubborn character of his religious belief, and of the philosophy of that system of worship to which he clings with such pertinacious zeal, they know about as little as the Indian knows of the Westminster Confession of Faith.

It happens, of course, that when the good but green missionary goes forth to expound "the word" and explain the mysteries of dogmatic theology to cunning savages steeped in hereditary hatred of everything that crosses the simple faith of their fathers, he finds himself woefully beset with strange and embarrassing difficulties. He finds that the red brother is not only blindly ignorant of all that relates to the bad conduct of our giddy old grandmother and her luckless spouse in the Garden, the scheme of redemption, regeneration, remission of sins, the mystery of the godhead, etc., but he is provokingly indifferent about all such matters. He is dead against any disturbance of his dream of the Great Spirit and the happy hunting-ground, and the fine talk of the pale-faced medicin man about Calvary and conversion he regards as mere childish fancy or bald sacrilege. As the white man has stolen his lands and driven him like a beggar into the last ditch, he imagins that the ghostly comforter wants to steal his religion, depose the Great Spirit, and rob him of his happy hunting-ground.

But the zealous preacher meets with still another difficulty, which often leads to misadventures that are as disheartening as they are sometimes ludicrous. The Indians are wholly ignorant of the language he speaks, and he knows not a word of theirs. He must employ an interpreter before he can fire a shot at these savage foes of the spiritual Zion. It generally happens that the interpreter is a man who has lived a long time among the Indians; who has adopted their customs and modes of life; who sympathizes with their religious feelings, and respects that curious phase of spiritism which forms the body of their faith; and who, from habit, association, and interest, is practically one of their number. He is so much of an Indian, in fact, that he has little respect for the white man, and sometimes less for his religion. Of course, he makes a dangerous support for the missionary, but the pious teacher can find no other. The interpreter often makes a sad mess of it in turning the preacher's fervent discourse into the lingo of the red man; and in many cases, from sheer love of mischief, he deliberately falsifies the good man's words by a wrong interpretation.

A few days ago an intelligent man, who has lived many years among the Indians, and who is familiar with their language, related to the writer several amusing incidents showing the sad mishaps that befall missionaries who venture to tackle the red-skins under such unfavorable circumstances. Time out of mind there has been with a certain tribe in the Indian Territory an odd character, in the person of an old Dutchman, who is a fine scholar, but rude, reckless, and eccentric. Old Knipper Krauss is a renegade Jew, with still a lingering respect for the ancient faith, a hearty contempt for Christianity, and a great fondness for money and the wild ways of the Indian. He was enrolled as a member of the tribe many years ago, and has acquired a complete mastery of their language. Of course, he is a capital interpreter, and he is a noted liar and a genuin heathen as well.

Not long since a pious preacher, fired with zeal for the cause, was appointed agent for the tribe to which "Old Knip" belongs. When the good man arrived at his post of duty, the first thing he did was to hold forth to the assembled tribe. But two interpreters could be found—Old Knip and the gentleman above referred to. The latter declined, and Old Knip was chosen; but he insisted that the other interpreter should leave the building. He did so, but concealed himself where he could hear all that was said. The tricky Dutchman was now in full command. The preacher discoursed eloquently about the fall of Adam, the thief on the cross, vicarious atonement, the conversion of the heathen, and the fountain of grace revealed in the gospel. He told the Indians that the Savior—the only Great Spirit that can save the poor red man—was nailed to a cross by a lot of wicked Jews, over eighteen hundred years ago, and cruelly murdered; that he rose from the grave and was now interceding for all the lost sheep, including the benighted children of the forest. He advised them to build a church, to open farms, and to liv like white men. Old Knip interpreted rapidly and fluently, and the Indians seemed delighted with nearly every telling point the preacher made. The good man was elated with his success, but my friend knew that the old Jew had cheated shamefully in the transaction.

The next day the Teutonic trickster confessed his fraud on the missionary, when confronted by the only man, except himself, who had understood both the sermon and the interpretation.

"Now tell me," said my friend to Krauss, "what did you tell the Indians when the preacher spoke about the thief on the cross, and the Savior being killed by the Jews?"

"Vell," said Old Knip, "I schpeak it dis vay: 'Pig medicin man he tell you der vhite men not can come schneaken roundt any more, und stealin' der ponies und cattles und lands und eferytings. Dot Great Spirit mit such liars und tiefs make hell right avay—he schust kill 'em.'"

"Ah! I see why the Indians liked that. You are a cunning old dog"—giving Old Knip a friendly punch in the ribs. "And how did you interpret what he said about plowing, building houses, and living like white men?"

"I make 'em read dis vay: 'Dot great father von Voshington he build houses for you, und gif you blows, und horses, und vagons, und guns; und he make you rich already;' und I tell der Indians dot vas all a lie."

"You know, uncle Knip, that the preacher quoted the parable of the lost sheep, and told the Indians that there is more rejoicing among the angels in heaven, when one sinner repents, than there is over ninety-nine just persons who need no repentance. How did you interpret that?"

"I schust laugh me vild aboudt dot," said Old Knip, in great glee. "I say nodings aboudt der sheep. I tell 'em: 'Pig medicin schief he say you must right avay sell der mules, und cattles, und horses vot you steal in Texas; und ven you qvit und not can steal any more, all dose naked gals in der picture mit vings vill schmile und pe so glad."

By "dose gals mit vings" he referred to a picture of winged women, appearing as angels in Paradise, which hung on the wall of the council-room where the sermon was preached, and to which he had called the attention of the Indians while interpreting the parable of the lost sheep in the masterly style above given.

In this way the old Dutch sinner had perverted and falsified every sentence of the good man's discourse. His pious expostulations had been turned by old Knipper Krauss into a ridiculous jumble of impiety, sentimental vaporing, cunningly-shaped falsehoods, and very bad advice. REYMOND.

The Mills of Justice.

Despite clerical calumny and cultured Liberalism, the church, in the name of an injured humanity, stands arraigned, and in this attitude must remain until it has expiated a most heinous crime. Of all the outrages ever perpetrated upon a people, that of withholding knowledge is the greatest. Some wrongs may be veiled by forgetfulness, others by the spirit of forgivness; some, again, by the alchemy of philosophy, may be converted into disguised blessings; but this, wholly incapable of extenuation, but deepens and intensifies with time. "Had we but known!" is coming from the lips of millions. Had we but known, of what a world of regret, of what loads of remorse, of what a host of sorrows we might hav been spared. Had we but known, how many a breaker we might hav avoided, how many a bark now lying stranded and shivering might hav passed happily to its goal! For the paths of thorns over which we hav trodden, for the errors which blot the pages of life's history, for the complaints of wretchedness which hav made this otherwise fair earth a pandemonium, to the church we feel largely indebted. Having, by its insatiate greed, its inordinate love of power, made ours the heritage of ignorance when it might hav been wisdom, it cannot, by any manner of means, escape the burden of responsibility. Every aim of its existence has been to keep the minds of men in darkness, every thought calculated to illumine it has strenuously sought to suppress, every book that would hav blessed mankind with instruction it has branded with condemnation, every lover of his race it has, with the malice of a fiend, made the victim of persecution. By its serpentine sinuosities it has possessed itself of society, household, and individual. Scarcely a single mind can be found exempt from its deleterious influence, scarcely a hearth-stone that has not felt the effect of this blighting malaria. It is mainly to this self-assumed instrument of civilization that we owe our almshouses, asylums, and prisons, as well as the myriads of mendicants infesting the highways and byways of metropolis and province. Had this dominant authority encouraged the diffusion of knowledge instead of obstructing it, had it patronized the sciences instead of torturing them, had it employed reason, instead of strangling it, in short, had it been as zealous in promulgating that which the world should know as it has in thst which it never can know, there would hav been little need of those eleemosynary institutions, whereas the culpable omission has made them a mortifying necessity. Had the "Rights of Man" and the "Constitution of Man" been half so sedulously studied, so vigorously propounded, so assiduously inculcated, as hav been the fallacies and sophistries of ecclesiastical teachings and divine commentaries, its mission would not hav been the theme, as it now is, of derision and reproach. By exacting implicit obedience to an imaginary deity, while affecting a contemptuous disregard of natural laws—the only laws to which we do really owe allegiance—it has defrauded humanity of its most sacred right, the nature-conferred right of happiness. Startled from its lair of security, the church well knows the hour of retribution has come. Every pulpit in the land speaks the ominous language, and every denial is equivalent to an acknowledgment. Henceforth it must be either a fugitiv from justice, or a culprit at the bar. After centuries of patience and silence, at last is heard the voice of the avenging Nemesis. Clearer and more distinctly will it ring along the aisles of futurity, until the last trace of this malevolent spirit that dares deny the right to know is extinguished forever.

A Reply to Mr. Hale.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It may seem rather late in the day to reply to Mr. Hale's remarks (Oct. 14th) to my questions and suggestions (Sep. 16th) upon his article, "Is Mind Material?" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 26th, and Sep. 2d; nevertheless, I am constrained to do so, as none of his opponents hav taken up his main argument or proposition to Mr. Winter—"That if material organization or evolution is the cause of all things, then all things are the result of that cause." That proves itself, as Mr. Hale asserts, and requires no comment. He then adds, "I only know that if his [Mr. Winter's] theory of Materialism is true, and the cause of all things, then all these false theories and shams, as he calls them, are the offsprings of that theory, and I trot them out for his inspection, to see whether he will 'acknowledge the corn.'"

Let me say to Mr. Hale that I will gladly "acknowledge the corn," whether Mr. Winter does or not, for that "corn" is the very point in evolution that affords me the greatest satisfaction, viz., that "all these false theroies and shams;" all the cruelties, wars, and bloodshed; all the suffering, woe, and misery, sickness, and death; all the tornadoes, earthquakes and thunder-storms; yea, the very existence of rattlesnakes, bugs, and musketoes, are the "result of material organization or evolution," and not caused by a designing god, who, from the foundation of the world, for his own mere good pleasure, elected some to everlasting happiness, and others to everlasting misery.

Oh, how much rather I would feel that we are in the power of the elements and dependent on the forces of nature, than in the hands of such a tyrannical, capricious, unjust being, only almighty in his fiendishness, and eternal but to torment the innocent victims of his infinit wrath. Yes, let me believe that nature is the author of all evil, and in the product of humanity, even, did the best she could, rather than that such a god exists; that she is responsible for all the imperfection of this universe, rather than a god could or would do no better than create but to destroy, and when failure resulted from his experiment, repented, and was grieved at his heart. Yes, grieved; like any poor, short-sighted mortal who, for want of foresight, or from lack of judgment, had made an irretrievable mistake, and afterward discovered the blunder. Yes, Brother Hale, of the two horns of this dilemma, I joyfully "acknowledge the corn," and flatter myself that many another poor wretch will also, rather than accept such a monstrous doctrin as the Bible God embraces. But I must leave this point, only introducing it because every writer versus Mr. Hale has apparently dodged the question on the main issue.

I now come to my own strictures, "Gender and Personality of God," which must be used by every one in writing or speaking of him (it) where these attributes are believed to exist. If Mr. Hale, with whom I am on the best of terms, can invent no more significant word than "it" wherewith to define a being without person and gender, I hav no objection; but I hav always observed that those persons who believe in a "spiritual eternal power, supreme intelligence," and deny "it" personality and gender, usually somehow fall into the error of using the masculin pronouns he, him, his, when writing or speaking of this impersonal, genderless being or god. So difficult is it to avoid this form of expression, that the believer in a "great first cause" is often betrayed into using he, him, his, while denying all faith in a personal masculin deity or god.

Stalwart Liberalism.

I had to take the hide off from a few half-breed Liberals last week. Let me make amends this week by citing a few examples of the stalwart kind. I mean half-breed now in the quite literal, biologic sense; and stalwart in the whole-breed, able-bodied, courageous sense. Our current politics degrade some of our best words and elevate our worst, so that it is necessary to define and explain.

Of the half-breed writers and speakers I am amazed, just at this moment, on starting out to enumerate them, to find how few there are. The fingers on one hand are too many to count them. Of the speakers, Underwood is really the only half-breed who is now on the platform or who has ever had the public ear, or obtained any popularity; and he got that while he was a "bobtail," and before he reverted to the tadpole stage. Now he is losing it—popularity I mean, not the tail—faster than ever he won it. The "bobs" hav the advantage of him now; they hav got something to twist, something to step on and tie tin kettles to; and it is generally supposed by this time he wishes he had stayed with the "tag-rag" and not taken on a new tail.

Of the half-breed writers this man Coleman, who has just made the puddle ring with his tadpole peep, is the only one driving a quill on that side, unless we go into the semi-Spiritual ranks and include some quarter-breeds, like Bundy, Stebbins, Ellis—well, these are all we ever heard of. Not a formidable list at its utmost stretch. Not a woman among them of any account. None but the brave deserve the fair. Of course, these undeveloped cowards don't deserve them, and don't get them.

Now, on the stalwart side, see what a formidable list we roll up. There is our late president of the National Liberal League, our Nestor of Liberalism, Elizur Wright. When you think you hav a half-breed peep from him you may know that you hav got into the wrong puddle.

Then there is Horace Seaver, veteran editor of the Investigator.

> "Guess you will toot it till you are yeller
> 'Fore you get" a half-breed note from him.

Then there is T. B. Wakeman, now standing at the head of the organized Liberalism of this country, not only by a few formal votes of the delegates who elected him, but by the heart-warm suffrages of all the genuin Liberals in this republic. He is only later in this list, as he is later by birth, than these veterans in the field. He is coming bravely forward, and will fall heir to their honors by hereditary right. He, the scholar, the thinker, the scientist—he knows what he knows, for certain, and without wavering, and is able to tell it thoroughly and well. Liberalism with him is bred in the bone, and pervades his whole anatomy, from top to toe. Anything half-breed cowers in his presence with a previously unrevealed sense of its own worthlessness.

James Parton, historian, biographer, and wit; in all his writings or lecturings not a half-breed utterance has ever been heard from him. Always "courage, onward, never despair," are the conspicuous words of his dictionary.

Courtlandt Palmer, the earnest student of science and investigating searcher into the origin, meaning, and destiny of the human race—he proclaims by tongue and pen with equal eloquence the results of his studies, and no call to halt in Liberal progress ever comes from him.

Then there is Geo. C. Miln. A man with his symmetrical proportions, keen eye, and superb voice could not but be a stalwart in mind as well. He fears no grip from the Christians' devil, nor no sentence from the Christians' last and only lone-lorn God, and the half-breed pool will get no comfort from him.

Then we come to Geo. Chainey, very much such another man of force and character as Miln, and scarcely less so. His spoken words and essays are as stalwart as the stoutest, and half-breedism gets short shrift from him.

To Miln and Chainey must be added S. P. Putnam. These three are the bright particular stars that Unitarianism has recently contributed to Liberalism, and we are much obliged to Unitarianism for the handsome present. We wish we could reciprocate—if only we had any crabs who could go backward. If Coleman and Underwood could be appreciated for their work's sake, and be deemed any fair return, Unitarianism shall be welcome to them, and we will deliver the damaged goods any day.

Putnam came to New York some years ago as poor as the church mouse he left behind him. He brought with him a little of the flowery declamation of the sermonizer, but he has been growing ever since, gradually leaving off all pulpit and polemical mannerisms and getting down to scientific hard pan. He is now one of our best writers and speakers, and is welcome on every platform in and around New York.

Parker Pillsbury, front rank, fiery-furnaced Nestor of antislavery—prepare to meet thy dearest, most reliable, most protectiv fetich ere you mention half-breed to him.

H. L. Green, born organizer, manager of conventions, ready speaker; the day will never come when he will cry, "Don't! Let's let up on the Christians!" No half-breed badge for him.

E. C. Walker, another born organizer, manager, good speaker, and clear, terse, vigorous writer. The stalwart flame is seven times hotter in him than is needed for any modern Liberal Abednego, and there is not a half-breed hair in his head.

A. B. Bradford, veteran contributor to all our Liberal journals, and a speaker of great force and dignity on our platforms. You may bet your life he takes no half-breed in his.

W. H. Burr, the antiquarian, with the keenest eye for Liberal fossils of any man on this continent. He knows Coleman and Underwood to a charm, and already has them nicely labeled and laid away in his museum of mummies.

W. S. Bell—Liberty Bell, Morality Bell. He has just united "Liberty and Morality" in a lecture now published in a most excellent little book, and he too cannot find it in his heart nor in his head to holler, "Go slow," "I'm tired," "Don't shock the feelings of any tender-hearted, thumbscrew Christian."

In an enumeration of the Liberal writers and speakers some mention ought to be made of Col. Ingersoll. He is a stalwart without qualification as far as he goes. He calls no halt of the Liberal army now in hot pursuit after the Christian rear, and the half-breed standing pool will "cream and mantle" without countenance or contribution from him.

There are many other writers who ought to be mentioned, but this list grows and I must stop somewhere—must stop now.

Of all our Liberal journalists, too, a large majority are stalwart, fearless, courageous, uncompromising. THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Man, This World, the Liberal Age, of Milwaukee; the Iconoclast, the Liberal, of Mo.; the Valley Falls Liberal, of Kansas; the Pepin Gazette, the Agnostic, of Texas; the Jewish Times, of San Francisco; Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, of New York—not one of these has any half-breed tendencies.

This is a powerful array of Liberal journals. Now look at the opposit extreme. Count up the only unmitigated, set-in-the-breeching, hold-back, half-breed journals. The whole lot of them amount to only just two—the Philosophico-Religico of Chicago, and the Free Religioso Virtuoso of Boston; Bundy at one end of the see-saw, and Underwood at the other.

There is one journal, the Age, of Indianapolis, that may be deemed on the border-land; but at the same time so keen and vigorous a writer as its editor cannot for any great length of time, nor to any great degree, train in the half-breed ranks.

Now, these writers and speakers and journalists are all men, and I hav not said a word about our Liberal women. The list of them is quite as long as that of the men, but I hav not space to characterize them in detail. I can mention only a few, and leave comment on them for some future article: Mrs. H. S. Lake, Mrs. Juliet H. Severance, Amelia H. Colby, Mrs. E. A. Meriwether, Mrs. Joslyn Gage, Lucy Colman, Augusta Cooper Bristol, Ella Gibson, Mary E. Tillotson. These are all well known, both as writers and speakers. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, Susan Wixon, and Amy Post as writers—especially Mrs. Post as a moral and social force in Liberalism.

Now these are all nativ tongues and pens, and to the manner born. To close this article, I wish to take prominent notice of one of our Liberal guests who has been with us the past half year, and is now on his way to our Western coast, whence he will sail for his Australian home. We thank Australia for the loan of Charles Bright, the favorit of a season, to us in America. He has quite literally won golden opinions from all sorts of people here. He has spoken with equal acceptance on Spiritual, Liberal, and Infidel platforms. He is thoroughly well read, keeps track of science up to its latest revelations, and knows well how to group his points and present them to his audience. He speaks extemporaneously, referring but rarely to the briefest of notes. He speaks, too, with great fluency, the purest of English, with a trace of tone which reveals that he was born in England, and which is one of the charms of his speech. He is quick in his movements, alert in all his senses, and there is no heavy weight about him. In social life his conversation is as radiant and bright as his name, and one is constantly reminded what a fitting patronymic he was sent into the world to be known by, and tempted to pun on the Bright. He has spoken several times in New York, Boston, and their vicinities. He has been heard with special pleasure before our New York Liberal Club, where his farewell lecture was delivered last week on "Scientific Morals."

It is a matter of special regret with all Liberals that Mr. Bright cannot remain in America. There is a rare field for work and usefulness here if he could only remain, or return, to occupy it. He is one of the few lecturers who are equal to the half-dollar test for a ticket to go and hear him, and he would certainly get a following that would pay. A heart-felt good-bye to Charles Bright.

But welcome the coming while we speed the parting guest. Another lecturer has just landed on our shores, and is making the tour of the United States—Mr. Charles Watts, of England. But of him another time.

THEE CEE LEE.

A Bundy Lie Nailed in Plain English.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I believe that every truth seeker is ready to denounce a liar wherever he may be found. If we seek after truth we must feel that any person that will wilfully lie to injure another is an enemy to truth.

I hav found a liar—a mean, wilful, lying hypocrit; a whited sepulcher. I want to expose him, and boldly ask the use of your columns to do that work. I do not ask you to become responsible for my words. I am able and willing to stand all the consequences arising from this and any other letter I write.

THE LIAR

Is Col. John C. Bundy, the editor of the R.-P. Journal, of Chicago, Ill. Your readers may be disappointed, and say, "Oh! giv us something new, for everybody believes Bundy to be a liar." I answer that is very true, but I hav got something better than belief. I hav got the proof that he is a liar, and anybody that is particular to test the honesty of Bundy can find a first-class opportunity to do so.

Bundy's stock in trade is to prate about his honesty. If we can find a stick long enough to prick that bag of corruption we shall relieve him of that commodity.

The only thing I can do toward it is to publish to the world absolute facts that cannot be denied by Bundy or Bundyites.

THE LIE.

In the leading editorial of the R.-P. Journal of Oct. 28th Bundy, among other mean slanders, says: "Heading the procession was the noble form of Bliss, the vulgar and self-confessed trickster." (I hav emphasized a part of it that just shows where Bundy surely lies.)

I am willing to be called "vulgar" if Bundy is refined, and would not "kick" at anything but the charge of being a Bundyite.

But to the lie, for it is a lie; a lie that never had a covering of the shadow of truth; a damnable lie; a lie concocted by a notorious liar in Boston, published a half-dozen times by the R.-P. Journal to injure me in the eyes of my fellow-men. When John Bundy penned those words he knew it was a lie. I know he knew it was a lie. Everybody that ever took the pains to look over the record of my public acts as a medium and a man knows that I never was a "self-confessed" trickster, and that John Bundy lied when he said so.

My enemies, as well as friends, know that Bundy lied. Every judge, lawyer, editor, and visitor to the court-room when I was on trial, knows that Bundy lies about this matter. John C. Bundy knows I was offered my liberty a half-dozen times if I would become a "self-confessed trickster" and save myself from a prison cell, but did I do it? Write to James H. Heverin, counsel for the prosecution in my case, and ask him if I ever "confessed" that I was a trickster. Write to the Philadelphia Times and ask them, "honor bright," if I ever confessed such a thing. They will tell you, "No, never; Bliss refused to do it every time." If they tell the truth they will say to you that I lay in a prison cell three and a half months rather than do such a dishonorable act.

Now John Bundy would try to make the world believe that I am a self-confessed fraud. I say he lies; meanly lies; lies to kill. I throw it in his teeth, and dare him to put his statement in the form of an affidavit and place it in my hands, that I may confront him in an open court and put him behind the bars (where he belongs), a convict upon the charge of perjury.

Pardon my outburst of indignation, Brother Bennett. I cannot help it. I am not afraid of the truth, but I am of a lie and a liar. I will some day hold John Bundy personally responsible for this lie, and see which is the better man of the two.

Fraternally yours,
Wakefield, Mass. JAMES A. BLISS.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing seven hundred square inches more reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1882.

Unnecessary Disturbance.

We publish the following, not because of any marked courtesy or argument which it evinces, but to giv even those a chance to be heard who seem neither to fully comprehend us, nor to be able to express themselvs in a gentlemanly manner. It seems to take all sorts of people to make up the world, and this writer is simply a specimen of one of the sorts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is with considerable surprise, and, I must say, pain also, that I hav read your reply to Mrs. Heywood's announcement of her husband's recent arrest. You will probably say that in the position which you now assume there is not anything which can reasonably cause surprise, inasmuch as you hav had your "hand in the lion's mouth" and know full well how hard the animal can bite. Shuddering even now at the retrospection whenever the fangs of the beast are brought to your notice, you are naturally surprised that another, who has had a similar experience, should be so rash as to risk a second experiment. Having yourself tried to play the hero, and at the same time to evade the consequences; and having, after all your gymnastic efforts, been caught and compelled to accept and endure the legitimate reward of your temerity, you do not, of course, desire a repetition of the proceeding. Judging other men's motivs, as well as the strength of their convictions and their powers of endurance, by your own, you do not seem capable of rising to the consciousness that there are men in the world—men who, having struggled and suffered for the establishment of a principle, are still prepared to endure and endure again until that for which they spend their lives has been achieved, or the time for rest has been legitimately earned.

Seeing the success with which his methods hav been crowned in your case, it is not a matter for wonder that Anthony Comstock is emboldened to pursue the same course with others. Having discovered and manifested to the world the true nature of the animal, which was concealed by the spurious hide with which you enveloped yourself, it is not surprising that he should imagin himself able to carry to an equally successful issue the same experiment upon another subject. Having heard the whinesome bray which, after the bite, took the place of the simulated roar that preceded it, he is naturally desirous of listening again to the music of a similar transformation. And this is where comes in the pain which your letter causes. It is mournful to see one prove himself so far recreant to the principles which he has, throughout his life, professed to maintain, as to ally himself—in a manner to him the most effectual possible—with the enemy, whose boast and business it is to trample those principles in the dust and persecute their upholders and defenders.

Because forsooth you do not approve of all that Walt Whitman has published, therefore Mr. Heywood would do well to refrain from disseminating his writings! And because Mr. Heywood has done some things which, in your judgment, had been better left undone, therefore Anthony Comstock is justified in the outrage that he has committed, and no "principle of Liberalism is involved" in the question which is thereby raised! How charming is the logic which Bennett can use when Heywood is under the shadow of the law! How different from that obtained when it was upon Bennett's own head that the panther's claw was placed!

But you do not even wait for definit premises upon which to erect your logical superstructure. You admit that you do not know the charge upon which Mr. Heywood was arrested. You simply make a guess, and make that the text from which to preach your justification of the dastardly proceeding. Your surmise may be right or wrong, and, for the sake of the argument, I will assume it to be the former, and ask whether, in that case, Mr Heywood would now be in any better position than he is had he circulated such literature only as commended itself to your taste? Certainly not, except upon the hypothesis that you hav revised your "views" and made them to accord with those of the Comstock association and society in general. This, perhaps, you hav done, and none could blame you for so doing. You hav had incentiv enough, and no one can censure a little fellow for not being bigger than he is. And again I ask, if Mr. Heywood had confined himself to the circulation of that which was "permitted," and would bring no risk to him, what "principle of Liberalism" could be subserved by it? That would be simply a slavish acceptance of iniquitous legislation and cowardly acquiescence in its decrees.

The principle of Liberalism involved in the matter as it now stands is the right of every individual to the free expression of his opinions, and the unrestricted transmission of that expression through the length and breadth of the earth, without regard to the extent to which such opinions may be obnoxious, agreeable, or indifferent. By his conduct Heywood has dared to maintain this principle. That you are unable to comprehend him is not surprising, since you giv the key to the mystery in the remark that "he has not seemed to us a man with a coarse, animal nature." As kindred natures only can arouse the sympathetic and appreciativ feeling within us, so it is not astonishing that you cannot understand Heywood. We will allow this inability to serve as the mantle of charity with which we will now cover your whole proceeding with regard to this question. Faithfully yours,

Boston, Mass., Nov. 5, 1882. JOHN STORER COBB.

REPLY.—We shall not attempt to notice all the unfair and untruthful insinuations and representations with which the foregoing article abounds, but some of them we will briefly review:

1. Mr. Cobb thinks that scarcely any conduct of ours would need to cause surprise, inasmuch as we hav "had our hand in the lion's mouth and know full well how hard the animal can bite!" He then continues, "Shuddering even now at the retrospection whenever the fangs of the beast are brought to your notice, you are naturally surprised that another, who has had a similar experience, should be so rash as to risk a second experiment." There is not a particle of justice in these insinuations and innuendoes. We hold that our conduct has been consistent, that we hav not changed our position in the slightest degree, and that the "fangs of the beast" hav not caused us to cower, as we will soon show.

2. He further says, "Having yourself tried to play the hero, and at the same time to evade the consequences, and having after all your gymnastic efforts been caught and compelled to accept and endure the legitimate reward of your temerity, you do not of course desire a repetition of the proceeding." This is simply false and contemptible. We hav not tried to play the hero; we hav not tried to evade the consequences of our conduct, nor hav we indulged in "gymnastic efforts." What he means by "gymnastic efforts" we cannot say. We hav never suspected that we are a gymnast in any sense of the word. If one who has been imprisoned for bastardy understands what "gymnastic efforts" are, Mr. Cobb ought to know how it is himself.

Our experience is briefly told. We were arrested for selling a copy of "Cupid's Yokes," which selling was simply done as an act of courtesy to Miss Josephine S. Tilton, Mr. Heywood's sister-in-law, who at a public meeting had a book table next our own. For this we were arrested, detained many days, held to bail, and submitted to much inconvenience and expense. We felt that we had been outraged in our rights as an American citizen. We felt with thousands of others that though the pamphlet was not written in the best possible taste and style, it was the convictions of an honest man, who had a right to express himself upon the vital subject of the social relations, that every person had a right to read his arguments, and that every person had an undisputed right to sell or own his pamphlet.

We announced in our columns that, considering we had a perfect right to sell the pamphlet, we would do so, though a prison was the result. This was while Mr. Heywood was in prison for selling the same pamphlet. If those were "gymnastic efforts," we were not aware of it. We sold many copies of the pamphlet, were arrested again and sent to prison for thirteen months, and served out our time. If we tried to "play the hero," we certainly did not "evade the consequences." Neither hav we changed our position in the matter. We hav sold many of the pamphlets since we left prison, and are selling them to-day. We still claim we possess the right to do so, and if another term in prison is our portion we shall not particularly try to evade "the fangs of the beast."

3. Our correspondent's fling about our incapability "of rising to the consciousness that there are men in the world," we will let pass for what it is worth, with the remark that if he is the measure of what constitutes a man, we decline to rise.

4. Here is another brilliant passage: "Seeing the success with which his methods hav been crowned in your case, it is not a matter for wonder that Anthony Comstock is emboldened to pursue the same course with others. Having discovered and manifested to the world the true nature of the animal, which was concealed by the spurious hide with which you enveloped yourself, it is not surprising that he should imagin himself able to carry to an equally successful issue the same experiment upon another subject." Insolence can scarcely transcend this. To us it seems that under the circumstances no true gentleman would write in this way. Though Comstock succeeded in getting us in prison, it cannot be considered that his efforts were crowned with success, nor was his position strengthened thereby. Perhaps nothing has hurt him more, and no person has shown him up so effectually. The Christian cause was certainly not strengthened by our imprisonment.

5. Here is another morceau: "And this is where comes in the pain which your letter causes. It is mournful to see one prove himself so far recreant to the principles which he has throughout his life professed to maintain as to ally himself—in a manner to him the most effectual possible—with the enemy, whose boast and business it is to trample those principles in the dust, and persecute their upholders and defenders." Hardly anything could be more untruthful than this. We hav not proved recreant to principles which we hav maintained or proposed to maintain all our life, or any considerable portion of it. We hav trampled no principles in the dust, nor hav we attempted to persecute the upholders of principles. Because we defended at the risk of our life the right to sell "Cupid's Yokes," it does not follow that we are under obligations to defend all sorts of nastiness, nor do we believe that the circulation of such nastiness is in any sense a "principle."

6. Mr. Cobb's effort to show that we consider Comstock justified in the outrage he has committed is as false as all the rest of it. We hav never justified anything Comstock has done, nor do we think him capable of performing a good deed from a good motiv. We certainly hope he may not succeed in getting Heywood in prison again. We assuredly hav not reversed our views, nor made them to accord with Comstock or his society.

7. Mr. Cobb undertakes to make a point on us because we had not been fully apprised of the specifications upon which Mr. Heywood had been arrested, but he was no more successful here than in other directions. It seems by subsequent reports in the Boston papers that we were correct.

8. The slur about our being a "little fellow" and about our incentivs, is, perhaps, very sharp. We will let it pass as such. If the correspondent is the model or pattern to which we should try to enlarge ourselvs, possibly we may wait a while before trying the swelling process.

9. To the question, "I ask if Mr. Heywood had confined himself to the circulation of that which was permitted and would bring no risk to him, what principles of Liberalism could be subserved by it?" we hav to answer that he would at least hav violated no principle that we are aware of. We know of no principle of Liberalism that requires a person to outrage decency, or to print and circulate anything that insults the better sense of mankind. We do not believe that any principle of Liberalism requires any one to make it their chief object to circulate that which is indecent, distasteful, or offensiv to ninety-nine people in a hundred. The principles of Liberalism call upon all its votaries to not only lead good lives, but to do nothing in opposition to that which is pure and clean. Such principles as require a man or woman to delve in that which is nasty, unclean, and indecent, whether published in a paper, issued in slips and circulated, or spoken in public meetings, according to our views are not the principles of Liberalism, and had better at once be disclaimed.

10. Possibly we are unable to comprehend Mr. Heywood, and not competent to appreciate the "great principles" which actuate him in giving circulation to that which to us seems improper and indecent, and therefore Mr. Cobb is extremely generous in allowing our inability to so understand to "serve as a mantle of charity to cover our whole proceeding with regard to this question."

11. While upon this subject perhaps it is proper to define our position clearly, though we may possibly repeat ourselvs somewhat. We are decidedly in favor of free thought, free discussion, free speech, a free press, and free mails. We do not believe in prohibiting the expression of honest thoughts and convictions. Still we believe in maintaining purity and decency. Because we regard free speech, a free press, and free mails as a principle worth contending for, and worth suffering for, we do not believe in the practice of talking and circulating that which is impure and offensiv to the usual sense of decency. While we favor free speech, and will do our utmost to defend it, we condemn that looseness of speech which leads one to talk constantly of that which is low and indecent. We are so obtuse as not to be able to see any principle involved in delving in the low and indecent. As much as free speech is to be esteemed, there are certain things, certain duties and functions of human beings, which should be performed in secret, and should not be talked of in public, nor documents circulated in reference thereto. Included with such subjects which decency requires should be tabooed in mixed assemblies, and reading matter for general circulation, are remarks about sexual commerce, and the organs of generation. There are times and places where a consideration of these subjects may be proper, in works upon physiology and in considering the propagation of our species, and the functions of the two sexes. All young persons should be informed of their own functions and their own organizations, with results of excesses and improprieties; but because this is true it does not justify constant allusions to these subjects at improper times and improper places. We can scarcely respect the motivs which impel any one to do so.

12. While we accord to Walt Whitman the meed of a poet, a philosopher, and a good Liberal, we think he has written some things that had better hav been omitted. We do not condemn his works in the volumes as published. They hav been accepted and approved by many of the highest literary judges of our country; and we sell them as we do other works, and are willing to take the risk of being sent to prison for doing so. Every person in America has the right to own and read Walt Whitman's poems; but still we do not approve of selecting out and circulating separately such paragraphs as the common sense of mankind pronounces indecent, and simply because they are indecent. We cannot, as we hav said, see that any "principle" vital to Liberalism is involved in doing so, that Walt Whitman is thereby benefited, or that any good cause or purpose is promoted.

13. We believe that the Liberals of America hav a moral character to maintain, and that it is their duty to defend that which is pure and high-minded. It will never do for them to become the champions of nastiness, filth, and impurity. They are equal to the average public in maintaining purity and morality, and there is no reason why they should be regarded as the defenders of indecency and uncleanness.

14. We claim to hav the same right to entertain our convictions upon this subject that we accord to those who differ from us, and we see no reason why we should not exercise the right of giving expression to our convictions, or why we should be abused for such expression. While some condemn us for the views we hold, we hav the best reasons for knowing that many, for whose opinions we hav the highest respect, approve of them. There will probably never be a perfect unanimity of views as to what constitutes the obscene; also as to the exercise of individual rights. What is obscene to some minds is not at all obscene to others; what some regard as impure others look upon as strictly pure. People will undoubtedly ever differ upon these subjects. Neither can one person exactly lay down the rules as to what another may do, or may not do. Some go so far as to maintain that a man has the right to do wrong. He doubtless has, if he does not infringe thereby upon the rights of another. No person has the right to do wrong to another; neither has one the right to outrage the finer feelings of another. A man doubtless has a right to hav any book in his possession which he desires, the same as he has a right to hav any kind of painting, whether physiological or anatomical, portraying the human form; but while having the right to keep such a picture in an interior room of his house, he has no right to offend public sense by giving it an offensiv public exhibition. So it is with questionable selections. While a person has a right to make them for his own use, he has no right to make himself offensiv by forcing them upon others.

15. Among the results of the late election in the change of the rule of political parties, one of the prominent ones will be the curtailing of Comstockism. Under the continued rule of the Republican party he wielded his most oppressiv power, which people will now hav good reason for expecting will be materially lessened. When Republican laws, Republican courts, and Republican presidents cease to be tools in his hands, it may be expected he will be unable to get people into prison with the same facility as in the past. Our hope is that Mr. Heywood will be wise, and that Comstock will not be able to deprive him of his liberty.

"How Are the Mighty Fallen!"

The following has been received from our positiv friend, T. Winter:

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Can it be that the great Infidel paper, the New York Truth Seeker, has become the mouthpiece of a nondescript religious clique, who seem to be neither fish nor flesh, neither Infidel nor Christian (funny sect this), who now regard an honest Infidel Materialist as an enemy and a criminal against their immaculate Spiritualistic piety, and must cease from speaking or be stigmatized as a common disturber of the somnolent Spiritualistic peace? May I, with civility, inquire, Is this Spiritualistic gag to be locked on the jaws of honest and intelligent Materialists, and every vestige of true liberty stamped out? Must the Materialistic pen be still, and the bold and invincible mind of sincere Infidelity stagnate because, forsooth, some anti-Materialistic parties are extremely anxious to flood the world with an unexplainable phenomenon or phantom, much more calculated to distract the human mind than enlighten or edify, and whose tendency is to send credulous persons headlong to some dismal abode set apart for all those unfortunates whose mental aberration and misery lurk where maudlin drivel issues from demented moral wrecks? Who, I ask, ever knew a gennin Materialist insane? None whatever. But now, at this moment, quite a number are hopelessly insane as the result of this Spiritualistic theory. It produces in the minds of nervous and excitable persons a tremulous fear, and ofttimes terror, much better felt than expressed. Apparitions, ghosts, and goblins ever hav terrorized the pueril mind, and it is time to stop that which is adding so largely to the sad inmates for the asylums for the insane. As a Materialist and philanthropist I deplore the serious effects growing out of religious superstitions of all kinds, with its wild and frenzied lunacy, and for no other purpose than to plunder the dupes. And is not this Spiritualism a religion? If not, what is it? From my standpoint it appears the most insidious and deleterious of all faiths, inasmuch as it dumps all humanity into the same fanciful and utopian spot, and that spot no fellow can find out. But these Spiritists seem to want a rest. They do not relish T. Winter's long pole which stirs up the muddle and the puddle, and exposes some of its weak points. They seem to need taffy instead of hickory-nut Materialism. But an honest heart can never play hypocrit. Materialists like to call things by their right names, and if the square and honest truth requires strong words to express its meaning duty must be done if the planets fall. Be it known unto all men that Materialism is not nonsense. But whatever is outside of it can never be regarded by a sound intellect as bearing the genuin stamp of sense. What, I ask, is the use of progress on a false track? Is Materialism stagnation? Never, it's no fossil—nay, ever onward in discoveries of nature, but not supernature. It dabbles not in speculativ fancies or hobbies. All its researches are for material properties, not outside the universe, but in it, and although there is very much yet to learn, all the searching forever will never discover anything immaterial. But if there be minds that can be tickled with a straw, all right; go on with your tickling.

But there is one individual which you can neither tickle nor gull, Which is Reply.—Our positiv and dogmatic friend seems to hav a great tendency to run astray, and is extremely liable to be wrong in his conclusions. It is a part of our duty to hold him to the facts, and to show him his errors.

Whether it is correct in any sense of the word to denominate us "mighty," or whether the word should not be spelt mitey, is simply a matter of opinion. Some possibly would favor one orthography and some the other. But we deny that we hav "fallen," and that because one accept the possibility of the grand old universe, providing us with a continued life, he must necessarily "fall." It is barely possible it is just as much rising as falling. Neither is it fair and truthful to term those who accept that possibility as "a nondescript religious clique, who seem to be neither fish nor flesh, neither Infidel nor Christian, who now regard an honest Infidel Materialist as an enemy and a criminal against their immaculate Spiritualistic piety." This is not candid; it is not honest. Mr. Winter appears to be so full of prejudice, so full of hatred toward those who accept the possibility of a continued life, that he can scarcely speak a fair and candid word with reference to them. He does not speak the truth when he denounces them as a "nondescript religious clique," and partly religious sect. They are no more "a sect" than Materialists, "no more "religious," and no more "Christian." Dogmatism and assertion are never arguments.

So far as our "falling" or changing is concerned, we hav a few words to say. We know we held the same views we now do on these subjects when we started The Truth Seeker over nine years ago, and that we hav never said a word since in opposition to, or inconsistent with, the same. We hav not deemed it necessary to be always harping upon the subject, but when we hav been called upon for our views we hav frankly given them. Nearly eight years ago a friend in Idaho wished us to giv our views upon Materialism and Spiritualism, and we cheerfully complied, giving for a few weeks our views upon matter, motion, life, and mind. We extract the following from what we published upon that occasion, or more particularly what we said of our belief of the possibility of a continued life:

It is not our purpose to here cite instances, nor to detail phenomena that thousands of times hav occurred, but simply to recognize the fact that they do take place. In doing this it is by no means necessary to accept all the claims of charlatans, frauds, and enthusiasts, of which undeniably large numbers exist. In all the phases of matter, motion, and life, in order to learn the actual conditions around us, we need to exercise our powers of observation, our reason, and our best judgment, and no less so in this direction than in others. As base coin does not disprove the existence of the true, as falsehood can never disprove truth, nor fiction disprove fact, so fraud cannot disprove that which is real and actual.

Having then received such proofs as convince us that intelligences disconnected with physical or crude bodies do exist, we hav been led by degrees to believe that there is a domain in the universe peopled with beings invisible to us, but nevertheless having an existence as really as we hav, and as really as all the unseen matter and forces we know do exist. We hav gradually come to believe that our existence is dual, that this is the rudimental, and that the ultimate is beyond. We cannot see that this belief or acceptation is inconsistent with any of the known laws of the universe, or of any of the recognized powers of matter. Here we meet the views and hopes of countless billions of human beings of all nations and all lands, who, for many thousands of years, hav entertained a cheering hope of a continued life after the portals of death are passed.

The belief in a future life is by no means repugnant to our consciousness or any of the feelings and instincts of our nature. Life is dear, existence is sweet, and the longer it can be pleasantly continued the better. We recoil not at contemplating the possibility of a future existence, and dwell upon it with no painful emotions. Recognizing the eternal change and progression of matter, of the higher forms of life that hav succeeded the lower, in all time, we can easily accept what appears to us a fact, that we hav not yet reached the ultimate—the highest form of life matter is capable of producing. We can not limit the powers of matter and the achievements it yet has in store. Grand and glorious as the universe is in its cruder and more tangible forms of existence, the recognition of the possibility of a continued life for man exalts and enlarges its grandeur and gloriousness immensely. In fact, this may be considered the grandest and sublimest part of the infinit whole, and we embrace the belief or theory with undisguised satisfaction.

It is not easy for us to understand how individual organizations that had a beginning thirty, forty, and fifty years ago can become immortal or never-ending. It has seemed to us a logical proposition that whatever form of existence has one end must hav another—that what has a beginning must sooner or later hav an end. Thus it has been easier for us to accept the probability of a continued existence than an immortal one. Though we are frank to confess that if in the powers and possibilities of the universe immortality can be evolved by regular advances and evolutions, we certainly hav no objections, and will gladly accept the fact when made conscious of it. A cessation of existence—a going out again into the darkness of nonexistence—is perhaps as distasteful to the mind when placed ten thousand years in the future as but twenty-five. If, then, in the unlimited powers of the universe there exist the possibility of individualities, persons and beings, having an endless existence, we shall not raise the slightest objection, and shall accept it for the orders of organized life below us as readily as for ourselvs.

It has with many Materialists been a formidable argument against a future existence, that the immortal part, or soul, if composed of matter, though it require but a small portion for an individual, would, in forming an infinit number, exhaust the earth, the solar system, and the entire uuiverse in furnishing material for souls. When, however, we reflect that matter is as infinit as time and space, that it is absolutely limitless and exhaustless, the argument loses its force.

We cannot giv more here of what we said then, but as we talked at considerable length those who wish to read it can procure the pamphlet, "Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind," for ten cents.

We hav said enough to thoroughly disprove Mr. Winter's charge that we hav changed or fallen. We may be in error in the possibilities we accept, but at all events we hav not changed, we hav not "fallen." We hav on many occasions talked out freely and unreservedly.

The unfairness of Mr. Winter is further shown by such offensiv terms as "Spiritualistic gag, to be locked on the jaws of honest and intelligent Materialists, and every vestige of true liberty stamped out." What utter bosh this is! Spiritualists are certainly no more noted for applying the gag than is Mr. Winter himself. We hav been just as ready to publish the lucubrations of one side as the other, and Mr. Winter, though teeming with unfairness and hate, has been admitted as often to these columns as any other individual. We hav published for both sides, though what has been said was often far from meeting our views. How unfair and untruthful, then, to fling out the whine about the Spiritualistic gag! We hav not published all that has been said on either side simply because it was impossible, but no discrimination has been made against Materialists. We hav willingly published what bore some resemblance to argument, though we must say that dogmatism, drivel, and hate are not extremely welcome. We shall continue to publish what both sides hav to say, but wish to stipulate that communications be tolerably free from dogmatism, unfairness, the calling of hard names, and out-and out misrepresentation. The most ardent Materialists are not required to be "still," nor is the bold, invincible mind of sincere Infidelity to "stagnate." They hav ever had a chance to be heard in our columns, and such flings are simply unfair and uncalled for.

The truth is, Mr. T. Winter seems so completely filled with prejudice, and the spirit of hatred to those who cannot accept his conclusions, that he can scarcely speak of them without spitting out dogmatism and venom, and using unfairness and misrepresentation. If he has abounded in solid argument and candor we hav failed to perceive it.

There is simply a difference in the proof as it strikes different minds. Some think they hav received satisfactory evidence that invisible intelligences exist, and they accept the possibility of the universe producing the same. The opposit party see nothing of this, and are constantly ready to denounce as fools, frauds, and swindlers those who presume to differ from them. The great unsettled question, "When a man dies shall he liv again?" still comes up, and probably will for thousands of years to come.

It would perhaps be fortunate if those who take the negativ of the question had more truth and data to offer than the opposit, but it does not seem to be so. T. Winter & Co. seem to hold no patent upon the powers and possibilities of the universe, nor hav they investigated more thoroughly than others. If they know more than others on this hidden question, it does not quite appear, for dogmatism and calling hard names are not proofs of honest investigation. A man who has bona fide proofs and arguments to offer does not need to resort to dogmatism and uncivility. Nor does it appear that T. Winter & Co. hav investigated patiently. They seem to hav arrived at a satisfactory conclusion, and they are willing to denounce those as frauds, fools, cheats, and liars, who hav not been able to reach the same conclusions. If Mr. T. Winter has learned more about the mysteries of the great universe, and has discovered just what it can do and what it cannot, it is fortunate, but it does not appear that he has studied the subject more than others, nor that he knows anything more about it. His special stock seems to consist in harsh expressions, calling hard names, accusing others of being frauds and cheats, and of extreme discourtesy. If, fortunately, Mr. T. Winter knows more than anybody else about the capabilities of the universe, he has considerable yet to learn what constitutes a truthful, courteous gentleman. If he has learned more of the truths of nature than others, let him show us the same, but let him not constantly call us fools, knaves, and liars. Very common persons can use that kind of language. It is not the length of T. Winter's "pole of reason and truth" that is so offensive as his continued spouting of uncharitableness, dogmatism, and insolence. If he drops these his reason and argument will be acceptable.

We will not take the time here to narrate what we hav witnessed to cause us to hold it possible that our life continues, but we hav received them where fraud was impossible. We feel by no means positiv that we hav found all the truth in this direction, but we hav received some evidences that we cannot cast away. We are inclined to regard the possibilities of the universe as grand and great. We hav also met with many hundreds who hav seen more than we hav—men of intelligence, candor, and of an investigating spirit. Many such hav assured us that they hav received proofs which they were bound to accept that we hav another lease of life after this. They may be mistaken in their proofs, they may be mistaken in their conclusions, but that they are honest, and that they hav investigated we feel assured. That their opinion is worth as much as that of Mr. T. Winter, and that they hav as great an amount of intelligence we are prepared to believe.

The Truth Seeker will be sent three months to new subscribers for 50 cents.

Ideology.—Concluded.

Crime against Selfhood.—Every form of mediumship between gods and ghosts, real or imaginary, is a crime against humanity. The yielding up of selfhood and self-control to an idea of an unknown personage cannot be justified. A matured mind can hav no normal right thus to abnegate its own selfhood. Most of the mediums in this country who travel and make a business of giving "tests" I hav had more or less knowledge of, and, while I admit that in all other respects they may hav been very excellent people, yet I am compelled to say that, as far as I know, they were deteriorated in health and in integrity of character by their mediumship. Their lives are shortened, not to speak of the number that commit suicide in order the sooner to reach the "summer land," nor the many that hav been rendered insane by entrancement. For there never was a state of real catalepsy or trance without more or less hallucination. What else can follow when, to become a medium, you must yield up your own selfhood and self-control? Thus Miss Lizzie Doten, alluded to in my contribution on the trance, when she was inspired and under spirit control, I asked her spirit guides to explain to me how I should be able to tell where the human ended and the spiritual began in the trance mediumship. And in answer he, she, or it gave the following reply: "O doctor, you are not on the spiritual plane; we cannot explain it to you." And just here I find at hand, from the pen of T. R. Hazzard, a prolific spiritual writer, in the Spiritual Offering, a paragraph that I quote:

> When fully entranced, a well-developed medium becomes, humanly speaking, a mere nonentity, or body without a soul, a thing comparable to a looking-glass, that must perforce reflect the exact resemblance of whatever is placed before, or rather enters into it, whether it be an angel reclothed with mortal elements or a goblin damned. For the time being, during the absence of the spirit, the medium is not one whit more responsible in a criminal, moral, or spiritual point of view, for what takes place in its absence from the body than is the inanimate looking-glass for the objects it reflects."

And this describes the crime against humanity and human selfhood! When the human mind is held in abeyance (or absent, as this writer says, from the body), it is dead to all the purposes of humanity. And this is a crime that with impunity no one can commit.

Mr. Perry's Misstatement.—And what now, if it should appear that Mr. Perry was himself in error, and the most deceived in his statement above quoted? He has erroneously attributed to me what I had, in these columns, explicitly disavowed, not only for myself, but for all other Materialists and the entire scientific world. (See my "Fraternal" in No. 32 of this paper.) Nor can I now determin whether I should account for his misstatement by his careless habits of thought or his obfuscation "by faith" in mysticism. I never ignored nor denied the facts, nor thought that I had solved the problem as to how the rap is made upon the table leg. The rapper has personified itself for any or all the dead of past ages, and adopted any name to gratify the medium and please other parties most interested in that sort of information; for such are some of the well-known factors in Mr. Perry's nineteenth-century thunder!

And I should, perhaps, add here that it is but a comparativly small number of the rappers that are clairvoyant enough to giv what are called tests as to the personal identity of the dead. The mediums in such cases I believe to be more sinned against than sinning. And the number is not large, I think, that indorse Jesus, as the mystic rap has always done. When made in Christian families, as then, it indorsed the Bible, hell, and the devil, Millerism, the resurrection from the grave, and the smash-up of this globe! And yet more than ninety per cent of the rank and file in this movement are Liberal and progressiv. And still a larger proportion of these speakers, of which Cephas B. Lynn is a type, are good and true men and women, that go for progression and humanity. I mentioned, also, Col. D. M. Fox, editor of the Spiritual Offering, Ottumwa, Iowa, as I perceived that his was one of the mediumistic papers that did not come to the knowledge of the recent Liberal Convention at St. Louis. It was a generous recognition that convention made of all the Spiritual papers it had any knowledge of.

Mr. Perry's Wonder.—As I hav more cases than I could put in one volume, any one of which would be sufficient to offset and upset all that Mr. Perry has narrated of his wonder, I must beg the reader to bear in mind that I hav to use mediumistic terms. I do not know what a ghost is, nor is it of the unseen that I speak. It is physical phenomena that I describe in illustrating ideas, true or false. And while I can here giv but a few cases, they are tersely reported, and they are characteristic of all so-called test cases. Manifestly no real test can be applied where a part of the factors are unknown. And this is the gap that faith comes in to fill. Now faith, saving faith, is that trust the mind reposes in that evidence the mind itself has created (Heb. xii, 1). Hence in this manner you can make a god or ghost of the North Star. And yet we hear those victimized by mysticism boasting of what they know of the unknowable! It is unknowable for the reason that the human mind has no capacity for such knowledge. Can the factor know its own father and mother? And what greater folly than when mediumists speak of a future immortality as a matter of positiv knowledge! We are all alike in this regard—we can believe as we please. But as to the fact we know just nothing at all, nor is it best that we should know.

I never attended a circle unless invited. The Fox mediums assured me that if any communication was made to me it must come from some one dead whom I had previously known and loved. Upon this statement I relied until I found good reason for pronouncing it an error. And albeit I hav never yet found any mediumistic ghost that had had any previous knowledge of me, I never repelled either the medium or the spirits. I never told a spirit it had falsified to me. When in the presence of a medium that has no knowledge of me I always hav an abundance of messages, and all I need, I am sure. But never did I hear the first rap from any relativ or friend, or from any one else that I ever knew before their death. In the mean time I hav had communications made to me purporting to come from people that were still living, and never had died. Moreover, I could giv the names of a dozen of my friends, who were mediums and Spiritualists, who solemnly promised me before they died that if Spiritualism was true, they would certainly find some medium and make a demonstration to me, and prove their identity beyond all doubt. I always treated the mediums kindly. And if this were the place, I would giv you the statements the spirits hav made to me affirming that all they knew of this external world they had to find out by contact with it, and with the medium's brain, eyes, and ears. A spirit has no external senses for acquiring any knowledge of this physical world, nor do they hav any remembrance of this or any other world as their rudimentary state. And now for my illustrativ cases, as an off-set to those given by Mr. Perry:

1. A Medium that Never Failed.—I was in Baltimore, and by a Spiritual friend was taken to see Mrs. F. and the wonderful tests given through her brain. Mrs. F. challenged me to test the spirits, as she affirmed the spirits, through her, never failed. And when this statement was made to me there were sounds upon the table loud enough to be heard all over the house. The next day I addressed some questions to a Mrs. H., a friend of mine who had given me a pledge on her death-bed that if Spiritualism were true she would make a demonstration to me, through my daughter, who is a good medium, that Mrs. H. knew and loved, or, if not through her, she would find a medium if it were possible, in order to fulfil her promis. I allowed Mrs. F. to hav my letter in her keeping twenty-four hours. When I called for the answer the spirits said they were ready, and they were sure the answer was correct. On reading the answer I found it purported to hav been written by my mother, who was not dead, thus:

> My Dear Son: Your mother greets you from the skies, and in the love of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Your aff. mother,
> Cynthia Sunderland.

My mother's name was not Cynthia.

2. How a Test Medium got Choked.—I was in this town invited to attend a circle composed of mediums, all of whom were certain that I would get a good test. Mrs P., who sat next to me, as soon as entranced, personified an Indian, and said she (or he) saw streams of light emanating from my head. On my hinting that I did not need any soft soap at that time, she said: "O doctor, I see your mother! She stands behind your chair. She wants to talk to you now." Whereupon I said, "Please ask my mother to tell you what her maiden name was before she was married?" There was a slight pause, when the medium began to shake and cough. She then opened her eyes, and seizing my hand, she said:

"O doctor, I begin to fear there were no spirits in it!"

All the other mediums looked dumbfounded, and Mrs. P. continued to hack and cough, as if something had got stuck in her throat that she could not get up or down.

3. A Test Decidedly Bogus.—Dr. R. was an artist well known in Boston. His Spiritual career lasted only one year. He was a rapping and healing medium. The sensational ideas, however false, often result in what are called miraculous cures, or cures in answer to prayer. Dr. R. had a brother who had been absent some ten years—so long that all the family believed him dead; and the manifestations through Dr. R. purported to come from this absent brother's spirit. It gave the brother's name, his age, the name of the ship in which he had sailed, and described the storm in which all were lost. "A good test," Mr. Perry would say; "the wonder of the nineteenth century!" Thus the tests and the healing power of spirits were continued. The neighbors came in crowds and all went away healed and perfectly satisfied. Each one had talked with his dead relativ—father, mother, husband, wife, brother, sister, uncle, aunt, and up to the great-grandfather. How could they doubt? It was most wonderful! And thus, while that same nondescript ghost was in full blast at the table-leg, and as Dr. R. was bowed writing its prescriptions for the sick, he heard a rapping upon his outer door, and as he lifted his head he saw his brother enter his office, alive and well. That ended the mystical rapping and healing in Dr. R.'s house forever.

4. The Test by Writing on the Arm.—Mrs. L., of South Reading, Mass., had a brother that entered the army in 1861; and, never having heard from him till 1865, she and her family believed him dead. She was a Spiritualist. The medium Foster visited her locality, and Mrs. L. went to see him forthwith. She paid his fee; and without asking him a single question he said to her:

> You are a Spiritualist. I see your brother materialized standing near you. He is a soldier, and I see the place where he was shot—in the side.

While saying this he rubbed his arm, and, rolling up his sleeve, he showed Mrs. L. her brother's name, William, in raised letters on his arm. Nor had she a doubt but these letters must hav been made by her brother, and no one else. She went home weeping. A good test, Mr. Perry would hav said. In about three months after that satisfactory test, that demonstration of the personal identity of a dead man, was made, that brother, alive and in good health, came into her house and assured her that he was not dead, and never had been wounded. As these tests were made, so are they all made, by clairvoyance; and what this is the two cases following will further show.

5. Magnetic or Clairvoyant Reading.—My friend, Mr. W. P. Lippincott, formerly of Philadelphia, moved to Iowa with Abner Kneeland. I visited him at Vernon in 1866, when he became so much interested in what I told him I had witnessed that he subscribed for a Spiritual paper. His wife died soon after. He saw in his paper the advertisment of J. V. Mansfield, who announces himself as the "world-renowned medium for reading sealed letters." [Why sealed, but for the deception?] Mr. Lippincott wrote a letter to his wife, and, sealing, he sent it with five dollars to Mansfield. In that letter he addressed her by her full name, and gave his own name, asking her to tell him the name of the fugitiv slave that they had once concealed in their house in Philadelphia. In due time this sealed letter unopened came back, and with the following answer from Mansfield and his associate spirit that has answered others in the same way:

> As near as I can magnetize your letter you want me to tell you where you lived in the city of brotherly love. The exact number I do not now remember. I hav seen John Hughes here, and also Abner Kneeland. Your wife, Eliza.

Mr. Lippincott had known a man in Philadelphia by the name of John Hughes. But notice, 1, That he had not named Abner Kneeland; 2, He had not asked the number of any street; 3, Mr. Lippincott assured me that he had entirely forgotten John Hughes. Whence did Mansfield or that associate ghost obtain a knowledge of that name that the writer of that letter had entirely forgotten? And yet how often we hear of persons victimized by this wonder, boasting of their tests when told of ideas they had forgotten!

6. The Greatest Test of all.—A lady at the West, some distance from Chicago, Mrs. T. M. S., wrote to her mother, proposing these questions: "Where does Uncle S. liv? What are the names of his two children? This from your daughter, T. S.," accidently omitting the initial of her middle name. On sending it to J. V. Mansfield it was duly returned, and with the following correct answer, which demonstrates the theory here advocated. The letter explains itself:

> Mrs. T. M. S., Dear Friend: I answer your letter, and giv you the information you want, as your spirit mother is not here. She is afar on a mission. I am here to assist Mr. Mansfield when necessary. Your uncle livs in S., Iowa, and he has two sons, J. and W. But why did you not giv your middle name in your letter? It is M., is it not?

The above case I hav quoted from a Spiritual paper. It is, indeed, a most wonderful manifestation of clairvoyance, the power by which all the tests are made! And when Mr. Perry writes again, perhaps he will inform us why it is not reasonable to believe that all tests are made in the same way.

RETROSPECTIV.

And thus as to my own record. Sixty years in the field of psychology—the science above all bibles, and to be studied before all revelations from gods and ghosts. And during twenty years of this period I was employed by the Methodist Episcopal church as a revered minister. Thus in a Christian pulpit, dogmatizing and drilling the human mind with false sensational ideas (the leading one of theology is as to how a holy ghost came it over a Jewish maiden). Upon this idea the Christian hope of his escape from a lake of eternal hell-fire is based. And those camp-meeting spasms, those love-feasts, those revival harangs, in drilling human ingnorance and credulity! That was an experience I hav never regretted. The late Theodore Parker once expressed to me some regret that he had never had the opportunity of witnessing the mental and nervous phenomena that characterized the revivals I had got up. In the whole of my life I can now perceive what an immense advantage that twenty years of experience and observation has been to me in Ideology, the study of the human mind.

Wonders I hav witnessed, probably, beyond anything my friend Perry ever saw, and under the auspices of Spiritualism too. Did he ever see one of the mediums (in which he has invested somewhat) who reported herself as having been a second Mary —a "mother in the modern Israel," as she had been overshadowed by a ghost (and with her husband's consent), she having gone through a period of gestation and parturition, having given birth to a young ghost—a spirit-baby? All her symptoms were detailed to me by this modern Mary in person. And for any further information as to this wonder I refer to Mr. A. E. Newton, a well-known Spiritualist and author of a pamphlet entitled "The Ministration of Angels Realized." Nor was this the only case of the kind that came to my knowledge; and for the details of this case I can refer to another well-known medium and author, Mr. John M. Spear. And maybe that both these gentlemen would giv Mr. Perry all the details, as they would increase the marvelous in his nineteenth century wonder. One of these "mothers" assured me that the spirits had prepared her for a spirit-babe by informing her that "it would be a sacred Jesus," and she would become a "mother in the modern Israel" similar to Mary of old, of whom the second person in the godhead was begotten and born.

> And thus hav other mediums been cajoled—
> In the same way flattered as of old,
> Coaxed and "taken in."
> But surely that maid was deceived the most
> That believed it done by a holy ghost
> To atone for all sin.

And hav I not seen and heard enough of these wonders, old and new—enough of the tests and the trances, and the visions and the messages from the lips eternally closed in death? Hav I not heard and seen enough to convince any mind open to criticism as to the wonderful power of false, sensational ideas? Of all the ideas in the whole range of human thought, those the most absurd are always, to human credibility and ignorance, the most sensational. Hence the success of any and all forms of mysticism. When the factors are unknown the ideas are sensational, and the "miraculous cure" follows. In Tremont Temple, Boston, and in Odd Fellows' Hall, Philadelphia, on my public platform, my audiences saw, from night to night, this theory demonstrated. They saw hundreds of people, some of them of the highest respectability, Christians and clergymen, entranced by their own ideas of that state when surgical operations were performed upon them without any consciousness of pain, and when forty men and women simultaneously fell instantly to the floor merely by an idea suggested when they were struck down as suddenly as if they had been shot through the heart. And how many thousands of healthy people hav been instantly killed in the same way? Salvation by faith, as death by faith, for faith, is an equal power either way; the results always shape by the dominant idea. Horses, and one case of a monkey, I hav known to be instantly killed by fright. And consider, too, the power of ideas in the mother's mind that creates, forms, and colors, thus materializing one hundred and twenty smallpox pustules, filled with purulent matter, in her babe when born. She never had smallpox, nor was she ever exposed to it, only by fright.

As to ideas, there are none but human ideas. If all the brains now alive could be combined into one cranium as large as this globe its ideas would be only human. And no human brain, however large, can know or comprehend any personal existence above its own idea of its own selfhood, hence the folly of those mediumists, ancient and modern, who tell us what they know of gods and ghosts "beyond the bonds of time and space." The "wonder manager-in-chief" in this country says, "The eyes of his mind are so wonderfully enlarged and strengthened by clairvoyance that there are no boundaries of time or space that can circumscribe their penetration" (Great Har., vol. iii, page 265).

Now to realize the state of a mind that could make such a claim as this, read the obfuscation of Peter, Acts x, 10–13, and Paul, 2 Cor. xii, 1. No idea can be too absurd for human ignorance and credulity; no ideas of gods or ghosts was ever expressed by human lips that were not evolved from the brains that controled those lips in their utterance. And no scholarly author ever made so great a mistake in ideology as Max Müller did when in his "Essay on Monotheism" he says of Abraham's idea of God that it was not the creation of Abraham's own brain, but it was injected into his mind by a mystical power outside of his own mind, whereas Abraham was entranced when he uttered that idea; and the Bible informs us that his mind was bewildered and obfuscated by "a great human darkness that fell upon him" (Gen. xv, 12). Abraham had no knowledge of psychology, nor had Jesus any such knowledge when he told Peter that he had uttered an idea that was not evolved by his own brains (Matt. xvi, 17). Neither Jesus nor any writer of the Bible knew that man had any mental apparatus for the evolution of ideas, nor do the Spiritualists now know that in India, where there are no mediums nor any faith in spirits, and yet by ideas far greater marvels are done than anything included in the "nineteenth century wonder." The occult forces of ideas hav been known in India for centuries; forces by which the living body is materialized to eyes a thousand miles away; metals are disintegrated, and other marvels in India beyond any wonders in modern Spiritualism. Nor is it true, as Christians, mesmerists, and mediums suppose, that ideas, as such, float about in the atmosphere; or that ideas are transferred merely by volition out of one brain into another as ideas. An idea is a creation in each mind for itself. A relation—a rhythmic polarity—may be established between two minds (as in case of the adepts in India), when, if one or both are clairvoyant, and far apart, thus a knowledge of distant ideas may be obtained. But such conditions are rare, and the knowledge is limited to clairvoyance, which is the rarest of all. It is a function often claimed, but not very often manifested. It is indeed an "occult power."

Long before the mysterious knockings or any purely physical phenomena had been dubbed with the cognomen of "Spiritualism," the writer was engaged in this field of investigation. His experimental discovery of the law of "Selfhood in Self-induction" was announced in Zion's Watchman and in The Magnet, a scientific monthly, edited and published in New York, 1836 to 1843. And he edited and published the first paper ever devoted to Spiritualism. He gave the first lectures upon the "Mysterious Knockings," in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other cities; and his labors in this regard used up more than three thousand dollars of his scanty means—which, however, he has never regretted. Those good people that he succeeded in dogmatizing into Christianity, and also those of a similar temperament, afterward called mediums, constitute a class by themselvs (referred to by Jesus as the few only that are saved), toward which I hav always felt most friendly. Many a medium I hav recovered from a state of insanity, and many of them hav I defended through the press, and otherwise, when justly charged with fraud. It was enough for me to know that they had been in error, in yielding up selfhood to become a medium, and also that they had been not only deceived, but they had also been fraudulently "controled" by false ideas, in giving tests as to the personal identity of invisible non-descripts that sustain no relations whatever to this earth; hence, under an influence that is deceptiv and false, it is from such associations that mediums should themselvs become so.

Since I found my own mind free from all forms of mysticism, I cannot feel annoyed by any persecution, by any ism, of the unknown. Nor is it any wonder to me that the leading papers, both in theology and Spiritualism, manifest the same unwillingness to allow me through their columns to inform their readers as to the reasons why I remain a friend to them and a brother still. LAROY SUNDERLAND.

J. H. Mott.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Knowing that many of your subscribers are Spiritualists, I deem it proper to apprise them as well as others who take an interest in Spiritualism of the character of J. H. Mott, and what reception they would be liable to meet were they to come here to investigate.

I hav known Mr. Mott for five years, and was slow to belive what I know. I am told that before his development as a medium he hardly obtained a comfortable living. But by his mediumship he has become possessed of quite a property, and it might hav been much more but for his dissipated habits. He charges one dollar a seance for each guest, and his circles used often to number from fifteen to twenty. But his patronage is much less now from two principal causes; first, other and better mediums are being developed all over the country; and second, many hav been disgusted with the treatment received at his hand. I hav attended over two hundred of his seances, and hav known him to use strangers who had every appearance of being ladies and gentlemen in a manner that ought to make a savage blush. He sometimes tells them that there will not be room for them, when he has but two or three; at other times he declares that no seance will be held, when he intends to and does hold one. Sometimes he assures them that he will send them notice if he sits, but forfeits his word. Sometimes he begins a seance before the usual hour, and locks out those he expects to come.

Those who read this who hav already visited him, and paid well, need not fear of being refused. Many hav come hundreds of miles and expended fifty or sixty dollars without being able to obtain admittance.

Strangers should approach him in the most obsequious manner, as though they were in the presence of the Great Mogul. It is amusing to see what airs he puts on in a circle of cultivated guests.

I hav come to this conclusion in regard to the twain: Mrs. Mott is after the almighty dollar only, while Harvey's ruling passions are egotism, bigotry, and arrogance. So he lets dollars escape him for the purpose of domineering over others.

But to show the reader that I don't speak behind his back I append the following, which I dropped in the post-office a few weeks ago:

> MR. AND MRS. MOTT: Our best friends are those who tell us of our faults and teach us how to correct them.
> "Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us
> To see oursel's as ithers see us!"

I feel impelled to add to what I said verbally the other day for the purpose, if possible, of benefiting you. I hav myself suffered as the legitimate result of wrong-doing, but was never so low in the moral scale as yourselvs, and the longer you remain there the more intense will your sufferings finally be.

I am performing an unpleasant duty in thus holding before you the reflection of your lives that you may see yourselvs as others see you. Every one has a mission to perform, and performs it. Then why try to influence another? because that may be another's mission. And your mission, Harvey, I conceive to be to convince many by your mediumship of a future life, and, on the other hand, by your dishonesty, egotism, arrogance, stinginess, and hard-heartiness toward even your near relativs, to disgust others and make them avoid such ignoble traits, and better appreciate all noble thoughts and actions. So you are not living in vain; you are performing your mission, but we pity the missionary. No one so steeped in selfishness can enjoy life. I do not think there is a person in Memphis who has a good opinion of you. You are a dead-weight on Spiritualism here. It is up-hill business to defend it, based on your mediumship, here where you are known. Here is a specimen of my success in that direction.

My opponent starts out with the assertion that you are simply a trickster, and, as you hav no moral basis to fall back on, I can dislodge him from his position only by asking him if he thinks you are capable of deceiving any but the veriest dunces. He acknowledges his defeat on that point, but by changing his base I meet my Waterloo. He takes his position on the devil theory of the churches, and declares that if any spirits ever come through Mott they must be devils. I am silenced.

And, between you and me, Harvey, you are a medium for devilish spirits, and Mary, too, for that matter, in the shape of beer and whisky. But good spirits are so glad to commune with us that they use mediums regardless of their impurity of mind or body. And you are so dishonest, and with a body so full of beer, whisky, and tobacco, that spirits are debased therewith Two of my spirit friends, who were paragons of truthfulness when in their own bodies, hav told me several falsehoods at your circles.

Col. Eaton announced himself by independent slate-writing through the mediumship of your sister three days before we heard of it in any other way. He spoke at first of going to your seances, but five days after said: "I do not think so well of Mr. Mott since I entered spirit life." The following he gave through that honest medium Frank T. Ripley: "I hav been in the spirit world two days. I am anxious to say to my friend, Matt Clary, of Kansas City, Mo., that I hav found more than I realized, but I was terribly fooled about that reincarnation business." He refers to the lies to which he was treated at your seance in Leavenworth some two years ago, when he was made to believe that his spirit daughter and Frank Pierce's spirit son were married. It is not to be wondered at that deceitful spirits congregate where you are.

I never wish to attend another of your circles until you turn and lead a better life. To get reliable manifestations we must hav honest mediums.

Mary says you are the best medium in the world! There are scores to whom you are not comparable. Yet were you to conduct yourself properly and stop drinking you would soon be highly esteemed, and your medial powers probably increased.

I don't know which is the champion liar, but think it is "which and t'other" with you. But I am of the opinion that Mary can discount you on penuriousness; for although I had it on good authority some two years ago that you told many of your guests from a distance that I had never paid you but three or four dollars, one woman heard you say that I had never paid anything, when I had paid you twenty-six dollars in cash, and expended several more in time, stationery, and postage on the Pattee raid. I say although you enjoy lying like Beelzebub, still you are not so miserly as your other half, for after I was admitted at reduced rates you assured me sometimes that I was welcome, but I always offered the money to Mary at the close of the seances, which she always took with thanks and a patronizing smile.

If you had told your falsehoods about me only to those acquainted with all three, I would not complain; but those but little acquainted with either may believe you. Your tongue is no slander here where you are known; it is only those that you speak well of (if you ever do of any one) that are in danger. They may well exclaim, "What wicked things hav we done that this vile man should commend us?"

I suppose you will think that I wish to injure you, but the opposit is the fact. I should rejoice on your own account to see you reform, and would proffer the right hand of fellowship. But, Harvey, should you persist in abusing strangers and making a laughing-stock of yourself, and a shame to Spiritualists, I will make one more effort in your behalf.

I subscribe myself your sincere but frank friend,

STEPHEN YOUNG.

I had not intended to make the above public until I found that it was like to do no good. The worst is yet to be told.

Harvey's sister, Mrs. Work, has developed into a good medium for both independent slate-writing and materializations, and both Mr. and Mrs. Mott are doing their utmost to prevent any one attending her seances, and are angry with all who do.

Mott has no children, and possesses quite a property, while his sister has four small children, and her husband is in poor health. The ignoble twain would take the bread out of the mouths of their sister's children.

I believe it would hav a good effect on this hard-hearted couple were they never to receive another guest, and it is working in that direction.

MR. EDITOR: Your Canadian correspondent of St. Catherine's is mistaken in supposing that the Agnostic's evidence is not admitted in court here. By virtue of an act passed at the last session of the Legislature of this province, Agnostics or Freethinkers may giv evidence by affirmation in all civil cases in all courts in this province. We also hav assurance from the Dominion government that a similar act will in due time be passed, enabling Agnostics to likewise giv evidence in all criminal cases throughout the dominion. Other reforms, such as the taxation of church property, the secularization of the public schools, also of the marriage ceremony, we intend to urge as soon as prudent and convenient.

SKOWHEGAN, ME., NOV. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: A lecture formerly delivered by Mr. Hastings, editor of The Christian, was read by one of our ministers last Sunday, and the statement was made that Tom Paine died a miserable drunkard. Is there any truth in the statement? Please answer through the columns of your paper, and oblige

MANY READERS.

[These statements are simply Christian falsehoods, with nothing but the basest of slanders to rest upon. Some evil-disposed Christian told the lie in the first place, and hundreds of evil-disposed Christians hav repeated it since. It has been refuted again and again, and the fact has been proved that nothing of the kind was true; but the Christian tendency to slander and malign is so great that the falsehood is still repeated, and probably will be for a long time to come.—ED. T. S.]

ALLEGHENY, PA., Oct. 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: If any person were to ask me what my religion was I should say that I had no religion but science. This, I presume, is what you would say also. But although we both are alike in that matter, I beg to differ with you on one important point. You are a Spiritualist. Now, I wish to ask where you first got the idea of a spirit. You will find mention of spirits in the Bible, but as you do not believe in the Bible, then where do you get your spirits? Please answer in TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours, A. B. KEMP.

[We do not know very much about spirits. Our friend is referred to what we had to say upon the subject in No. 44, also in the present number.—ED. T. S.]

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., NOV. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Brother Leland's article on "Tadpole Liberalism" is very good. I do not mean any disrespect to the tadpole, of course. A healthy, well-behaved tadpole is a good thing in its place, but when a little bit of a polliwog imagins himself a great big whale and challenges all things, animate and inanimate, to heave to and dip their colors, then the case becomes too utterly ludicrous for anything. Brother Walker's article on "Prohibition" is unanswerable. It will be "answered," however, with the usual amount of gush. Those "Liberals" who believe in a state conscience, a state stomach, a state appetite, and a state gauge; who believe in removing temptation—in taking away a man's power to sin, to slide backwards or forwards, or to slide at all; who put no trust in education, progress, or humanity, but hav unbounded faith in coercion and legislation, such Liberals are also in the polliwog stage of development. It was said against a certain politician that he was a Northern man with Southern principles. The faces of some Liberals turn one way, while their toes turn another, and

> It's hard to tell by the looks of the track
> Whether they're coming or going back.

They are simply trying to propagate Liberal teachings by Christian methods—trying to lay Liberal brick with orthodox mortar, and the two won't work together. If Christianity is true, and Christian propagandism is the correct thing, by all means let us make haste to return to it. But all true Liberals worthy of the name hav no further use for Christianity or the Inquisition, or anything else distinctivly Christian. Liberalism is amply complete in itself—equal to all emergencies. It is not a system patched up by man, but a grand and perfect science; the science of the universe; the science of all sciences. Let us study its principles and apply them consistently, courageously, and with unfaltering faith as to results.

S. R. SHEPHERD.

LINDSAY, CAN., NOV. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much pleased with and congratulate myself on being a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The opportunity of reading several copies was given me by my esteemed Liberal friend, Mr. T. A. Middleton, and I became deeply interested in the paper. I heartily enjoy your system of dealing with the saintly orthodox, penetrating and illustrating their absurd superstitions, showing the falsity and incorrectness of their claims, driving them from the field of argument in fair battle, bringing confusion upon them in their inability to answer rational questions, and terror in showing them the rapidity with which that great fabrication, the Bible, is losing its influence and power. There are people who would cling to that unscientific, obscene old book, the Bible, no matter how clearly proofs were given of its unauthenticity. They will never find any difficulty in securing a pilot, so long as their treasury holds out and their wives and daughters prove sufficiently tractable. The fate of those wise men, the philosophical and intellectual authors of cultured Liberalism, who were tortured upon the rack and exposed to the fires of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S pitiless, sarcastic columns, will be a warning to honest Liberals never to strive to get beyond the confines of common sense. I am happy to say that THE TRUTH SEEKER has caused me to read more, think deeper, and given me more useful information in the last four months than all the orthodox papers combined. We hav no organization in Lindsay, but know each other pretty well, and hav a fraternal and mutual feeling of friendship and unity in the good cause. I wish to procure some of your valuable books, which I see advertised, at an early date. Hoping your reduction in subscription will prove a success, and wishing yourself and interests all properity, I remain

Yours respectfully, E. ORMANDY.

LUNENBURG, MASS., NOV. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read your remarks acknowledging the receipt of Mrs. Heywood's letter informing you of the arrest of her husband and his imprisonment in Boston, and release therefrom through bail of one thousand dollars, and you will take it kindly, I trust, when I say it was decidedly cool, coming, as it does, from a radical regenerator of moral, social, and, I suppose, political ethics; and, what is more, from one so recently out of prison for the like offense. While I know neither you nor Heywood would wrong any one, I do know that Mr. Heywood is the most persistent and logical reformer throughout the length of the land, if I except B. R. Tucker, of Boston. Mr. Heywood is the champion of freedom. He threw himself when a youth, I may say, into the cause of liberty for all men; and since the major contains the minor, I say he dedicated his life, strength, and talents to liberty. And for these thirty years I hav never found him wavering or faltering or fearful of consequences. I know full well his example has been a beacon-light to my path and a stimulant to many efforts of reform.

Mr. Heywood has declared for individual and collectiv liberty, and most nobly and heroically has he stood his ground. I wish I could say as much for hundreds with whom I hav "stricken" hands in hope and faith. The extracts from Whitman were, I understand, the special parts that Comstock chastity complained of, and through Mr. Heywood and Mr. Chainey I hav read Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." You fear Mr. Heywood has been indiscreet; so was Jesus, so was Bruno, so was John Brown, so was Bennett. Was either wrong? John Adams and John Hancock were indiscreet. It was the indiscretion of the above-named and a thousand others that has made us as well off as we are. A man so pronounced as Ezra H. Heywood, throwing life and liberty into the cause of free thought, free speech, and, as the complement of all, a free press, is no wonder to me. I don't know the man that is able to tell just what I ought to read or what would do me good or hurt, and I wish to be left to decide for myself. While I would be unwilling to die without a heart brimful of that love of liberty in defense of which heroic martyrs hav faced the scaffold and stake, the axe and wheel, I would be as unwilling to die and not leave in my library all the books at my command for the selling of which men hav been prosecuted, fined, and imprisoned, thus abridging the liberty of individual rights, short of which no despotism can survive a day.

A. H. WOOD.

[REMARKS.—We entertain the highest respect for the venerable Mr. Wood, and agree with him that Mr. Heywood is a man thoroughly devoted to what he regards as his "principles." There is a slight difference between us as to what are and are not "principles." While we advocate freedom of speech and freedom of the press, still there are bounds of decency which should not be transcended. Mr. Heywood and ourselvs would not draw this line in the same place, and in this we each but simply exercise the rights which inhere in us. Mr. Heywood seems to insist in circulating that which to us seems indelicate, improper, and indecent. We are not in favor of circulating such matter, and merely exercise the right to say so. We cannot think there is any valuable "principle" involved in such circulation, or that any special good can accrue from it.—ED. T. S.]

COLUMBUS, OHIO, NOV. 5, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I hav spent a goodly portion of the past summer in making an excursion to the state of Missouri, including a sojourn of some two months upon my return in the state of Indiana. Being on the wing, I next alighted at LaRue, Marion county, Ohio, the home of my adolescence, and the present home of my nearest relativs. Here an incident occurred which may not be unworthy of record among the annals of persecution for opinion's sake. Knowing that my scholasticism and experience were all-sufficient, the Board of Education, by a unanimous vote of the five who constituted the meeting, elected me superintendent of the public schools. But the Christian hellites determined that a man who had publicly expressed his disbelief in the superstitions of two thousand years ago should not be instrumental in molding the destinies of their children, and that he must be suppressed at all hazards.

They first resorted to a technicality of the law, which provides that each member of the school board shall be duly notified to attend the meeting, which was accordingly declared illegal by the absent member who, it is believed, absented himself for the purpose of raising an objection upon this point, as he had all the opportunities afforded by his position to apprehend their doings. Moreover, a sort of document, or so-called petition, without sense or meaning, was covertly circulated and signed by all the vulgar who could be induced to stain it with their hieroglyphics. It contained only a base and cowardly solicitation to sign this paper "for private reasons."

That the five men who had voted me the position would pay the least regard to such vile and unprincipled methods did not even cross the limits of my dreamland, nor could they, unless utterly destitute of honor and self-respect, repudiate their own doings. But they were actually frightened into the election of another by the vipers abounding in that cesspool of corruption called the church, whose theology, instead of ameliorating the character of those who are so unfortunate as to become the victims of its chicanery, transforms them into such heartless fiends and devils that it is impossible for them to treat a decent man with respect.

Thousands there are who by nature are endowed with all the noblest qualities of humanity, and with whom it would be the highest pleasure to associate, were it not for their Christianity, the vilest delusion that ever cursed the imagination of man. Because people worship the great Jehovah, instead of the great Manitou, robe themselvs in broadcloth instead of bear skins, and ride in steamers instead of dug-outs, is no evidence of progress out of the wilderness of superstition into the broad and cultivated domain of intellectual liberty.

If the church seeks to make Christians out of Infidel school-teachers by persecuting them, she might as well call off her dogs of war. In vain will all her energies be spent in trying to hew them into props for the support of her rotten institution, or to convert them into doctors of divinity whose combined ingenuity they are certain could never resuscitate a defunct superstition.

Were I some half-ass bone-setter who had sought revenge by stabbing a brother-man in the abdomen, were I to combine the professions of tending a stud-horse and preaching for a Methodist congregation, or to become an ex-reverend on account of having inherited an uncontrolable penchant to emulate the example of the Holy Ghost in overshadowing innocent females, I would only need to continue shouting for Jesus to induce all the fools and self-righteous hypocrits to favor me with their patronage.

Fraternally yours, J. J. BURDGE.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., NOV. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Your reply to Red. David R. Breed of the 21st ult. seems to me to answer him fully. I hav favored him with a copy, but as yet get no response. How strange it seems that these presumed learned gentlemen, unless they can establish their claims beyond any question of dispute, can stand up every Sunday and present themselvs as teachers of truth! Is it any wonder the civilized mind begins to regard their pretensions with distrust as dishonest and dishonorable? Mr. Breed's congregation is a large, fashionable society; proud, haughty, but withal great lovers of their church and society. I hav often thought that they would be the last ones to receive into fellowship the humble character of e New Testament if he should present himself in the same character to them now. This very thing is what has driven me to the furthest extreme from the church. My whole nature revolts against it as an institution—not of good, but for the cultivation of pride, haughtiness, and bigotry. In my experience as a business man I hav learned to distrust them more than any other class. Those who hav grown out of the church, as a general rule, are, as a class, noble and generous in their natures, pride themselvs more on their integrity than on piety, and are free and open in their words and deeds. But I started out with another aim in view. I hav long believed that there never was such a real character as the Christ of the New Testament, and regarded the whole pretensions and teachings of the Christian church as a terrible fraud, and that the priests and ministers who advocate it cannot be otherwise than false to their own nature to longer pesist in it, if they hav given the subject a candid investigation, and could not but feel they were either ignorant or knaves—following their calling because it furnished them an easy livelihood. Yet I prefer to hav the more charitable view of them—that they are honest, but hav never thought or investigated outside of their their theological groove, as I find in my contact with them, and Christians generally, they know less about their own religion than do those who do not believe in it. I am quite a traveler, am brought in contact with a great many men, and it is a rare thing to find a business man a believer in Christianity, and when I do he is invariably an ignorant man. Christianity may hav its votaries, but they are very far from being the intelligent, activ, working, enterprising class. You, and Bible critics generally, hav fully established the fact of the unauthenticity of the four gospels—that they are not a historical evidence that such a person as Christ ever lived; but I ask for information and light on this point, for I hav not an answer to it myself. Do not the writings of Paul and the other epistle writers do so? Do they not present more and better evidence of the Christian claims than any other authority? In fact, do they not furnish a basis for the Christian claim of a real Christ? I know the position that Bible critics generally take in regard to them, and in my own mind I hav my views, but they are not entirely satisfactory. You will relieve the minds of hundreds if you can fully say what about Paul and his brother epistle writers, and how far they go toward establishing the Christian claims of a real Christ as a savior of the world. Respectfully yours, B. M. SMITH.

[REPLY.—There is pretty good reason to believe that such a person as Paul existed, and that more than any other person he was the author of Christianity. But there is some uncertainty as to the period when he lived. A learned friend of ours who has investigated the subject deeply is now writing up a series of articles to show that Paul really lived 63 years B.C. The first of these papers will appear in these columns next week. If there was such a person as Jesus it was probably nearly a century earlier than the time usually ascribed to him. The story of Toldoth Jeshu, from the Hebrew, explains this clearly. It is a probable theory that Paul seized upon the story of Jesus, as a fitting basis upon which to build a new religion.—ED. T. S.]

PROHIBITION AGAIN.

BROTHER WALKER: I am not anxious to hav any controversy with you; and the space of THE TRUTH SEEKER is so precious I shall be brief.

I hav an immense individuality and love of freedom, and for forty-five years hav suffered and sacrificed more than words can depict to advocate truth and freedom.

It sits pretty snug on me when you say I am a "pseudo-Liberal" because I defend and sanction prohibition. I think it inconsistent with the principles of Freethought. Jefferson says: "Every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle."

You "want me to deny" or disprove the truth of Mill's postulate. I shall do neither, for I believe it and make an application of it to my side of the question.

Do you think that during my many years' study of nature and man and his relations I hav been so obtuse I hav not discovered the truth of Mill's statement? I believed what he says thirty years ago as firmly as you do now. I want no better postulate for my argument.

"Pursuing good in our own way so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs," etc. Now I make an application of Mill's statement right here, and ask you most sincerely if those who manufacture and sell and get intoxicated by using alcohol in its various forms do not, more or less, in various ways "deprive others of pursuing good in their own way?" When it is obvious to those who read and observe that more than half of the crimes of this country are caused thereby; when taxation is vastly greater thereby; when wives, mothers, and children, are naked, starved, homeless, beaten, bruised, and murdered by thousands all over our land every day, filling it with want, woe, and misery; when thousands of idiots, inbecils, debauchees, drunkards, and murderers, by the laws of heredity, are begotten every day by drunkards, etc., do you say that neither individuals nor society hav any right to interfere, or to try to prohibit this violation of Mill's conditions of freedom? If the results of making, vending, and using alcohol were not to prevent "others pursuing good in their own way," then I should be with Brother Walker.

But you say prohibition does not prohibit? Well, you can say laws againt murder, arson, or rape do not prohibit. What then? Shall we repudiate and annul all law? Has any man-made law ever prohibited crime or been any protection to individuals or society? I think your and my outspoken tongues would hav been prohibited from wagging long ago if the law had not prohibited our orthodox enemies from doing it.

You virtually say "let ever man do as he pleases, whether at his own cost or the cost of others."

I repeat that every person and society has the right to prohibit, if possible, the evil results of human actions and habits.

Yes, there is a "find" in your Demands of Liberalism. They are full of prohibition.

If you are an evolutionist you must see with me that prohibition, and you and I discussing it, are in evolution's program. It, like every other human law, may be a mixture of good and evil, but I believe it will be a greater good to Freethought than evil, just as the "Comstock laws" hav been.

Why are you so much like Hamlet, frightened out of you wits at this prohibition ghost?

Is evolution "in harmony with the principles of Freethought?" If so, then is prohibition, for it is the inevitable result of evolution. Is war "in harmony with the principles of Freethought?" Every phenomena of nature, every human or inhuman event, every man-made law, however repulsiv to individuals, sects, or parties, is necessary as a means of nature's development and change of forms, forces, conditions, and qualities.

Animals in the form of man must be treated as animals. The love and wisdom, forms and forces of nature are not yet, in the order of evolution, dominant and controling. Use them when they are adopted to produce the desired result. "Some things can be coaxed, but a ten-penny nail must be driven."

Nature has many and various ways and means to accomplish her purposes. I would prefer a sober, temperate, industrious orthodox to a lazy, loafing, dissipating, drunken Liberal (?).

Now, my good Brother Walker, keep cool, and see the salvation of prohibition. There is good in it for our cause. As Gov. Robinson, anti-prohibitionist, says, "Let it be tried."

Now, brother, show me up all you please. I shall not reply, although my stock is inexhaustible.

J. H. COOK.

LANSING, MICH., NOV. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is an easy matter for man to become enveloped in the dark bands of religious faith, seeing that his natural proclivities tend to devotion, and he is easily molded by the influences that surround him, whether Catholic, Mohammedan, Buddhist, Methodist, or any other persuasion; and my experience as a minister is that the more ignorant a man is in the mystified tenets which he has espoused, the more tenaciously he is cemented to that dogma, even to the sacrifice of his charity, humanity, and mercy. What is termed religion is merely an obfuscated faith, and the reason thousands of Christian ministers are called smart, or mighty in the scriptures, is because they are gifted in language and equally gifted in ignorance as to the truth and legitimate renderings of Bible phraseology. For instance, in an illustration which I saw in your paper concerning Jacob's blessing to Judah, that the scepter should not depart from Judah "till Shiloh come." Now, the proper rendering of this quotation is, "till he comes to Shiloh." Shiloh was a country, and not a Christ. They reached Shiloh in their journeyings, and there the scepter departed, for they were scattered to the four winds of heaven (see 1 Sam. iv, 4; Psalms lxxviii, 60). In like manner we notice that in Matthew the prophet Jeremiah is referred to as alluding to the Bethlehem massacre, viz., "In Ramah was there a voice heard; Rachel weeping," etc. Now Ramah was in the land of Naptali, where the Ephraimites dwelt, and not in Judea, as was Bethlehem; moreover, Rachel was not the mother of the Judaites, but of Ephraim the son of Joseph, which tribe Jeremiah alluded to as going into captivity with Judah and Israel (see Jer. xxxi, 15). And again, the virgin with child, whose name was to be called Immanuel, spoken of by Isaiah (Isaiah vii, 14; viii, 8), was a sign that Isaiah gave to king Ahaz that he should whip two kings; and Isaiah is proved to be a false witness as well as the writer of Matthew, for the two kings ruined Ahaz and all Israel. according to 2 Chronicles xxviii, 23; besides, it had no reflections upon any coming object later than Ahaz. A sad thought is to realize the ignorance of the clergy who disseminate to their congregations of fanatical zealots what they call the mystery of godliness, when in reality it is nothing more nor less than the stimulus of mythological deception. I hav offered $100 to the Michigan Conference, for the one to receive that will show a word or sentence in the Old Testament that alludes to the Christians' Jesus Christ, and I extend the same offer to the world. Matthew quotes the prophecy of Hosea xi, 1, as relating to Jesus coming out of Egypt after the death of Herod, but treacherously eliminates the first part of the verse, which reads, "When Israel was a child I loved him." In continuation comes the part interpolated in Matthew indirectly, viz., "and called my son out of Egypt." Now turn to Exodus iv, 22, and you will see whom God's son was that came out of Egypt. Does not this characterize the true features of a drunken, pagan, Roman council? And our clergy of Christendom are nursing at the paps of their dissipated concoctions. Not one in a hundred of them knows that Moses was a king in Jeshurun when Israel came to him at Mt. Horeb, despite the reading of the Bible for many years and preaching therefrom, although it stands out so prominently in Deut. xxxiii, 5. And but recently hav they observed the infatuation manifest in the lineage given by Matthew and Luke, making Joseph the father of Jesus, to prove him the root of Jesse and offspring of David, which annuls the virginity of Mary, or neutralizes the lineage, leaving Jesus a nondescript of obscurity.

With these facts staring us in the face, ministers will avow that the Bible harmonizes if a man has brains to understand it, which assertion has so intimidated Infidels that they are afraid to openly attest themselvs skeptic, fearing the grimaces of Christians as bad as their fathers did the Roman sword and fire. If you show to a minister the four different places Jesus ascended up into heaven from, and that no two stories agree, they will brand you as unfit for respectable society, even though they hav been charged with infamy among the elec: sister saints. It is astonishing to see Infidels who hav the eternal truth in their embrace, shrink and fade away before the scepter of fiery-tongued demons, steeped in the accursed stimulants of Bible theology, which is the first and last stage of insanity. Popular sentiment says one is indicativ of truth. This is an argument that the unlearned skeptic cannot resist. Another says if the Bible is not true why hav not those mighty minds who hav for centuries investigated it found it out? I answer because they were too insane in their faith to become susceptible, or concealed their earnest convictions for fear of persecutions, or were branded like Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll, and hundreds before them, bearing the reproachful lies of Christians, such as, he is crazy, or he is a fool, and other invectivs. Others with whom I am acquainted fear lest they lose custom in business affairs. Can it be possible that the Christian scepter is again allowed to sink us all into another dark age for want of fortitude and moral mightiness in Infidels to burst the bands of Christian influences and set the captiv souls at liberty? Let the Infidels throw out their influence and inducements, hav their social circles, their preaching, their picnics, festivals, camp-meetings, etc., and fascinate the mirthful as do the churches, and, as sure as there is a sun that shines, the churches would soon sink into oblivion, where they should hav been hundreds of years ago. Are we a band of cowards? If so, shame forever to eternal truth. If not, then let truth glisten from every eye, backed up by the powers of organization, which can only be done by shutting every avenue to what is called Liberals, and stand firmly upon the rock of Infidelity. Is the name Infidelity repugnant to us when eternal truth is our anchor, sure and safe? Can we not stand for truth what Christian martyrs did for myths and fiction? Can we not fight the battles of adversity, strengthening one another against the infernal pandemoniums of religious coteries? If not, then let us snuff the sponge and squat in nihility, never again to lift our heads or voices where human beings dwell. Let us sound the reville and call to rally. Let us set up a standard, establish synagogs, and let the talented come forth to conflict, for we can prevail when we show forth truth and our undying love to all men, whether of the same faith or not, being filled with meekness, gentility, and courtesy; being wise as serpents and harmless as doves, showing to the world that refinement and equity were not born of priestcraft, but of experience and reason. REV. GEO. R. BENNETT.

"Does Death End All?"

BY UNCLE LUTE.

What ought our lives to be, sweet bard,
If death's the end of all?
Think you Truth's march it would retard,
Or cause the right to fall?

No, "right is might," I hear you say,
"And sin will ruin bring,
Though smirking cowards preach and pray,
And brimstone torches fling."

Who is a coward? It is he
Who dons a saintly smile,
And plods the road to Galilee,
Assessing Heaven each mile;

Who boldly asks with cutting leer,
Stern reason to forestall,
"Why need I pay a penance here.
If death's the end of all?"

No alterations, reason sayeth,
We to our course should giv,
Whether to die is all of death,
Or all of life to liv.

Then turn a deaf ear to their jeers,
And seal the heart to strife,
'Mid sorrows, joys, hopes, loves, and tears,
Choose sense a guide to life.

For which is right, or which is wrong,
What power the truth can tell,
When men of creeds, with prayers and song,
Each other brand for hell?

Unco' Guid Men.

BY ALHAZA.

You'll find mankind an unco' squad,
And mickle will they grieve you.
—Burns.

Livs there a man so mean and base
That loves not freedom's air to breathe.
Whose hand would wield a traitor's sword
To wear a victor's golden wreath?

Shall persecution hunt us down?
Shall we be plaioned, white with fear,
Nor dare to breathe those sacred truths
That are to us than life more dear?

While ignorance and nodding faith
Insult us with their scornful eyes,
And legend vile and precept vain
Corrupt their stinging, fierce replies.

Shall foul religion spread her slime
On all we think and all we do,
While we repeat her senseless creed
To smooth our pathway as we go?

Her fangs are white, her claws are clean,
That once hav dripped with human gore;
But who shall say her work is done?
Her eyes glare fiercely as of yore.

And if her rage is never calm,
Her greedy bosom never full,
Her quiet ways but sheathe the knife
Which time and silence cannot dull.

Then if a driveling, canting squad,
Possess our bright and beauteous land,
While those who teach the bravest truth
Can scarce find pleasant room to stand,

Giv me a cave, where moans the sea,
Where sea-gulls scream, sea-lions roar;
A weary spirit loves the dash
Of waves that wash Pacific's shore.

Curse of the Cross.

BY G. VAUGHAN.

How much astray
From pure religion, they
Who burn faith's transient candles
In the cloudless day!

How much misled,
Who kiss the wounds that bled;
Spurning the living Jesus,'
To bewail the dead!

With grave concern
Thresh the old straw, and spurn
Harvests of new-risen truths
Scientists discern!

With murd'rous zeal
Smite those who light reveal;
And when ye see them triumph,
All the credit steal!

Who for rich fee,
Rehearse one tragedy;
While at your doors men perish
Most miserably.

See what is done!
Vast temples greet the sun,
By homeless millions built for
God, who needeth none.

Behold each day
New scripture! while fools say,
"God speaks no more to us, who Need his voice alway."

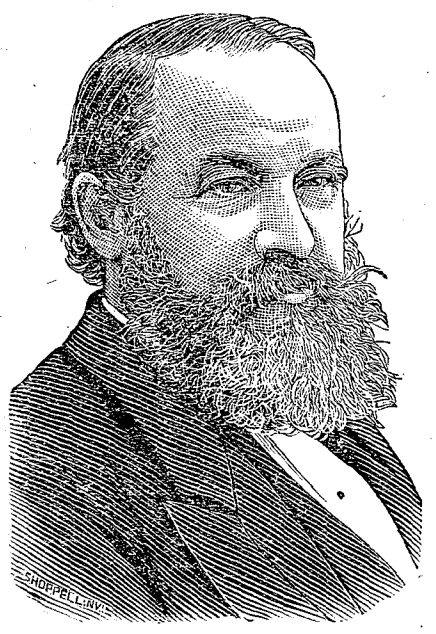
Ah! not for me
Your heartless tyranny,
And creeds that blaspheme nature,
And humanity.

Ye merchandize
Do make of him who cries—
Forth from white lips of famin—
"Lo! I agonize."

Palaces rare,
Titles and domains fair,
Servants hav of him who laid
In a manger bare.

Hypocrits bold!
Your wealth withhold,
And God beseech to succor
The hungry and cold.

Stand ye aside!
Impotent to divide—
With creed or curse—my soul, and
Jesus crucified.



"God-mockers," ye
For lucre bend the knee,
Coining the blood of Jesus
Into luxury.

Men dare despise
Ye, bigots, who devise
For ignorant and starving
Souls grey-bearded lies.

To God ve cry.
Whose image ye pass by.
Squandering on heaven the love
For which millions die.

In vain ye fight
Intelligence; the night
Of crucifix and sword shall
Fade, and truth be light.

Men of the Hour.

D. M. BENNETT.

It may be a question with some whether this subject should be ranked among the "men of the hour," but no good reason appears why he should not. Perhaps no man has been more abused and praised, and none is making greater effort to do what is conceived to be his duty. Besides, we hav the precedent of Shoppell & Co. of this city, who are getting up cuts of those they deem the men of the hour, for they hav added this to their list. We trust the readers of these columns will not object to the appearance of this sketch here.

DeRobigne Mortimer Bennett was born December 23, 1818. He should not hav been born, by rights, till some time in February, 1819, and probably would not hav been had not his mother by an extra exertion brought on premature labor. Thus this unpretentious individual was ushered into this world two months before his time, and on an extremely rough and stormy day, the snow flying and blowing most furiously, so that roads were so blocked that few or none, even of neighbors, could be present at his advent. It is not believed that any angels troubled themselvs to sing to shepherds or unfortunate travelers on that occasion, and the event passed off just the same as though no remarkable affair had taken place. Nature was not reversed; the sun, it is true, was somewhat darkened by the blinding clouds of snow, but rocks were not rent, and the moon did not change to blood.

This humble individual thus born in a cold December storm has been destined in his career through life to see something of storms and tempests, but midst it all he has been able to preserve a tolerable equable state of mind, and it has been the object of his stormy existence to simply perform his duty as he has understood it.

He first saw the light of this world on the shores of Otsego Lake, at Springfield, Otsego county, New York. If it must be called an obscure place it must be admitted that it is a lovely one, for Otsego Lake is a charming body of water, nine miles in length, and three miles in width in the widest places, and surrounded largely by wooded hills and abrupt landscapes. He was the first-born of his mother, who was not yet nineteen at the time of his appearance. Two sisters at three and ten years later constituted the family. He never had a brother.

His parents were poor farmers, and were living upon a rented farm, and they held good to their poverty until the day of their death. This individual has never known anything of affluence, ease, or luxury. Toil and poverty hav been his portion in life. But he has not been dismayed by these, for he regards them as man's natural heritage.

He was a very small specimen of diminutiv humanity when he made his first appearance in this world, weighing but the insignificant amount of four pounds. He however subsequently recovered somewhat from this, for he ultimately was able to raise one hundred and eighty pounds from the floor. He has often felt that he has not had exactly a fair show in this life, for he was not only ushered into this world two months too soon, and on a most unseemly and stormy day, but six months later his young and giddy mother, wishing to make a journey of more than a hundred miles to western Massachusetts, and not wishing to be encumbered by such a troublesome bit of humanity, concluded to wean him and leave him at home; thus the subject of this sketch was deprived of the pleasure of that journey at six months of age, and just think how many caresses of admiring ones he thereby lost! He was left at home with a strange woman to suck away the best he could at a bottle. He has never thought this was exactly the kind of treatment he was entitled to, but he submitted to his fate with the best grace possible, as he has learned to do since on several occasions. But though he thus early became acquainted with the bottle, he has not been partial to it, nor patronized it much since; and he has in late years made such extensiv journeys as to fully compensate for his deprivations in that line in very early life.

His parents failing to make farming profitable, though his father bought a farm in the adjoining town of Middlefield, after a few years of struggle, with the help of the sheriff and a hundred or so of unsympathetic neighbors who flocked in, his father was able to sell out in one day, though at very remunerativ prices, all the effects he had in the world, and this individual is able to remember the assembly that took place at the old home, the crying of the sheriff of the various familiar articles which had made home sacred, of the grief of his mother at seeing them pass into other hands, and of the feeling of sadness that crept over him at seeing them loaded into the various wagons which were hitched about the door, and carried away, never to be seen again. This was a regular old-fashioned vendue sale. Bitterly did his mother weep to see her quilts and bedding, made with her own hands, and the various articles of housekeeping which had been her own, thus taken off at one-quarter prices by strangers, and sad was young Bennett himself to thus see the home and the home gods thus scattered and misapplied.

John Bennett, the father of D. M., was one of the most honest, hard-working, genial, well-intended, and deserving men that ever lived; but he was somewhat deficient in his financial abilities, and though he worked all the day and far into the night he always managed to be behind and to owe more debts than he was able to pay. He was particularly unfortunate. His horses always had the botts, or colic, or something of the kind, from which they invariably died. D. M. can remember that his father lost fifteen horses within the term of a few years.

After being sold out of house and home, the family, when D. M. was about ten years of age, moved into the village of Cooperstown, where the father for a year or two served as laborer in the printing establishment of H. & E. Phinney, but subsequently reverting to teaming, which was his favorit occupation. In this publishing house of H. & E. Phinney young Bennett began the business of life by working as roll-boy or "printer's devil" in the printing part of the establishment. Having thus early become a devil himself he has never since had occasion to be afraid of devils. For his valuable services thus rendered he received the remunerativ sum of $1.50 per week, he boarding at home. But this $1.50 received every Saturday night seemed to him like a pretty large sum of money, and faithfully he took it home and gave it to his mother. Perhaps this small sum was as much as his weight and muscle entitled him to, for he remembers the men in the printing house weighed him with a pair of steelyards, and that he touched the beam at 52 lbs. He was what is understood as a "light-weight," but even at that age he was industrious and an early riser. It was his custom to rise at four o'clock in the morning, walk half a mile to the home of the pressman with whom he worked, pull a string connected with a sleigh-bell in the man's bedroom, and thus wake him to go to work. He has ever since been an early riser, and even now rises at two or three o'clock every morning, finding that the most quiet part of the day for writing and accomplishing work.

Those were comparativly the primitiv days of printing; the cylinder press, the Campbell press, and the Hoe press had not yet been invented. All printing was done on hand-presses, all inking was done by hand with composition rollers, and to apply the ink to stereotype plates, and to wash and put away plates was young Bennett's part of the business. They used to print a great many large Bibles, and hundreds of times he has washed in lye the plates of the quarto Bibles thus printed. But as desirable as that salary of $1.50 per week was esteemed, the time came when it was cut off. After serving a year or two as a roll-boy, some ingenious Yankee got up an apparatus to be applied to presses by which self-rolling could be accomplished, and the roll-boys were dispensed with. Thus was young Bennett deprived of his salary and cut off from longer connection with the printing business, save what he was able to do on the Watch Tower, one of the two weekly papers published in the village.

His parents did not liv harmoniously together. They were not alike in anything. The father was plain, unpretending, humble, self-sacrificing, and hard-working, though always a little slow and always behind; the mother was proud, spirited, showy, and disposed to blame the father for the misfortunes that had befallen the family. The father, though having one of the best dispositions in the world, was sensitiv to reproof, and chafed under a constant application of it. The mother was religious, was very fond of going to church in fine garments, and the son can remember seeing her baptized in a country stream, and thus united with the Methodist church. The father paid no attention to religion, and though a very moral man who wished to do nothing to wrong anyone, cared nothing for going to church or listening to preachers. He was never so unbelieving as the son has become, but he worried little about the forms and ostentations of religions. They were also unlike in their literary attainments. The mother had a fair education, and was fond of reading, could write easily, etc.; the father had had no advantages for education in childhood, his father having died very early, and he scarcely learned to read and write. The son cannot remember ever seeing the father try to read a book or paper. Though the son thinks he has inherited from both father and mother, he deems himself most like the father.

Suffice it to say the perpetual disagreement between the parents resulted in separation, and when the son was not thirteen years of age the home was broken up, and the parents never again lived together. Young Bennett worked in a wool-carding and cloth-dressing establishment until, at the instance of his mother, he left for Massachusetts to liv with the mother's brother in Berkshire county—a physician—and to carry out a promis made ten years before, when the son got large enough the uncle would take him and teach him to be a physician. The uncle, however, when he saw the hopeful nephew, and that he was extremely small and backward, not weighing seventy pounds, deemed him rather a small specimen for medical honors, and decided that the diminutiv youth had better wait three or four years until he had attained more age and avoirdupois before making the study of medicin a real business.

The nephew was taken to an uncle of the father a few miles away to make a visit before returning to New York, and here two Shakers chanced to call for a day or two, and they invited young Bennett to accompany them to their home in New Lebanon, Columbia county, New York, some twenty-five miles away. He readily consented. He found the people friendly and genial, and becoming much attracted to them he decided to unite with them, and in a few months the mother and older sister, (the younger sister having died two years before) joined him.

The Shakers are a peculiar people, condemning intercourse between the sexes, believing the fall of man consisted in improper sinful connection on the part of Adam and Eve, and that the most pure and acceptable life is to follow the example of Jesus in strict celibacy and self-denial. They hold their property in common, lead plain and industrious lives, and though they believe in unnatural and absurd notions, they hav the best practical religion in the country. They lead peaceful lives, they dwell innocently and lovingly together, and their aim is to be honest and upright in all their transactions. Here Bennett lived for thirteen years. Here he passed from boyhood to manhood; and he learned many practical lessons which hav been of use to him through life. Here, too, he found his wife, Mary Wicks, who with his sister accompanied him when he left the society, they marrying a month later, and thus setting out together on the journey of life, which they hav since traveled together. She has been a good helpmeet to him, and has sustained him in the various adversities that hav befallen him, and done what she could to make his burdens light.

Gems of Thought.

Do not lean too much on others. but help thyself. What we ourselvs earn we prize the most and take the best care of. To teach another to be self-supporting is better than to giv alms.—Elmina D. Slenker.

NOT a pastoral song has a pleasanter tune
Than ye speak to my heart, little wildings of June;
Of old ruinous castles ye tell,
Where I thought it delightful your beauties to find,
When the magic of Nature first breathed on my mind,
And your blossoms were part of her spell.
—Campbell's Field Flowers.

THE Christian's idea of religion is something that ought to suppress free thought and inquiry, get possession of the government, control legislation, govern the schools, regulate public libraries, and run the world generally. The Christian believes in schools, if he can teach them; in books, if he can write them; in governments, if he can administer them; in laws, if he can make them; in churches, if he can preach in them; but he is opposed to anybody else having anything to do with politics, literature, education, or religion.—L. K. Washburn's Free Religion.

THERE can be no doubt that the sentiments and morals taught to children and youth hav a great influence in forming character, and in establishing a rule by which to square the conduct of life. It is undeniable that the religious belief of a people has much to do in controling their actions, and in establishing their character and habits. Can it be expected that a nation can ever be honest, moral, and truthful, when they are instructed from infancy that in securing happiness, and in laying up treasure in heaven, morality and good actions count as nothing; that, in fact, they are often a hindrance to happiness. and that, however great an amount of moral and spiritual indebtedness a person may pile up, Jesus stands ready and willing to pay the whole score.—D. M. Bennett (Truth Seeker Tract No. 46).

THE dews seemed to sparkle more brightly on the green leaves; the air to rustle among them with a sweeter music, and the sky itself to look more blue and bright. Such is the influence which the condition of our own thoughts exercises, even over the appearances of external objects. Men who look on nature and their fellow-men, and say that all is dark and gloomy, are in the right; but the somber colors are reflections from their own jaundiced eyes and hearts. The real hues are delicate, and need a clearer vision.—Dickens's Oliver Twist.

IT IS often said that conscience directs man to hate evil and to love good. There is considerable confusion of thought in this idea. Conscience does not enable a man to discern between good and evil—the decision as to the morality or immorality of an action is made by the reason, whether that reason be enlightened or unenlightened. All that conscience does is to urge the man to follow that which the reason declares to be right. When the brain has declared, "Such and such a thing is good," then the conscience says, "Do it." If the reason judge falsely, the conscience will then point to the wrong action as a duty, and thus it has happened that some of the worst actions in the world hav been done at the command of conscience. The most cruel persecutions hav been carried out with perfect conscientiousness, and priests with streaming eyes and bleeding hearts hav burnt heretics to "the greater glory of God." Conscience is not a safe guide—in fact, it is no guide at all; it is not the eye which chooses the path, but the foot which blindly carries us wherever the brain directs.—Mrs. Annie Besant's True Basis of Morality.

CONNECTED with liberty, we may notice the growth of humane sentiment in all classes, the governing power included. When we revert to the horrible punishments to which men were subjected in England, not many generations since, not only for real crimes, but out of mere superstitious antipathies, as the burning of witches, we are apt to feel ashamed of our own ancestors, and to congratulate ourselvs on having our lot cast in a milder age.—Chambers's Encyclopedia; art. "Civilization."

I HAV endeavored to giv you a conception of the direction toward which modern physiology is tending, and I ask you, What is the difference between the conception of life, as the product of a certain disposition of material molecules, and the old notion of an Archæus governing and directing blind matter within each living body, except this—that here, as elsewhere, matter and law hav devoured spirit and spontaneity? And as surely as every future grows out of past and present, so will the physiology of the future gradually extend the realm of matter and law until it is coextensiv with knowledge, with feeling, and with action.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

POPERY can build new chapels; welcome to do so, at all lengths. Popery cannot come back, any more than paganism can—which also still lingers in some countries. . . . . The poor old Popehood will not die away entirely, as Thor has done, for some time yet; nor ought it. We may say the old never dies till this happens, till all the soul of good that was in it have got itself transfused into the practical new. While a good work remains capable of being done by the Romish germ; or, what is inclusiv of all, while a pious life remains capable of being led by it, just so long, if we consider, will this or the other human soul adopt it, go about as a living witness of it. So long it will obtrude itself on the eye of us who reject it, till we in our practice too hav appropriated whatsoever of truth was in it. Then, but also not till then, it will hav no charm for any man.—Carlyle.

IF thou art worn or hard beset
With sorrow, that thou wouldst forget,
If thou wouldst read a lesson that will keep
Thy heart from fainting and thy soul from sleep,
Go to the woods and hills!—No tears
Dim the sweet look that Nature wears.
—Longfellow.

Odds and Ends.

THIS is the latest for wedding invitations: "Come round and see us capture a mother-in-law at 8 o'clock sharp."

MRS. PUDDIFOOT says that she never means to celebrate her golden wedding, because everybody will be guessing how old she is.

A MILWAUKEE school for girls, from which all males are religiously excluded, has in attendance one young lady, who finishes up the litany thusly: "World without men! Ah! men!"

NEW parlor maid: "Here's a letter, ma'am, if you please." New mistress: "Pray, Mary, are you not accustomed to see letters handed on a tray?" "Yes, ma'am. But I didn't know you was."

"FAITH," he wrote home, "America is the friend of the Oirish. Bedad, they think so much of the Oirish beys and gurrls that they name their states by them. There's O'Hier, and O'Regon, and Mrs. O'Re."

"I DON'T ask any man's advice," said the man with the big bump of self-esteem. "I do my own thinking." "Yes," murmured Fogg, "I should think you might, and not be greatly overworked, either."

WHEN he was eating fast and furiously, piling in the food as farmers do hay into the barn on the eve of a thunder-shower in June, the head waiter stepped up, and said: "Beg pardon, sir, but there's no train out to-night." "I know it," said the man, with his mouthful, "and that's why I'm hurrying to catch a good night's sleep!"

A PERSON, visiting Chicago for the first time, met a Westerner of the genuin type in the street near a church. The stranger politely asked whose church that was. He replied, in a tone which none but one who has been in the West can fully understand: "Wal, I reckon that church belongs to the Almighty; but a man by the name of Collyer runs it for him!"

THE stage of a Western theater took fire last week, but a panic and rush for the door was averted by the manager, who, with great presence of mind, slipped to the front and said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, we hav prepared a little surprise for you. An immense kettle of whisky punch is now being heated, and in a few moments waiters will pass through the hall and ditribute it."

After that the audience had to be pulled out one by one.

COLONEL SCRUGGINS entertained the Rev. Dr Coxe, Episcopal minister, at tea the other evening, and the highly interesting conversation drifted into monetary topics and a discussion of the effect of the Egyptian war on traffic. "Pa," said the bright little girl with the bangs, "how much is a dam?" "W-h-a-t?" "How much is a dam? Don't you remember you said last Sunday Mr. Coxe's sermon was worth just about two dams?" "What! what! Ah—oh—ho—ah—dimes, you mean, child, dimes. The sermon, practically followed, would be worth a good many dimes, dimes to every one. What silly ideas children do get." And the colonel concealed a gnawing impulse to shake that youngster out of her frock.—Texan Oddities.

HOFFENSTINE'S BUGLE.

"Mr Hoffenstine," said Herman, as he folded up a pair of pants and placed them on a pile, "if you don't haf any objections I would like to get from de store avay von efening, und go mit de soldiers to de Spanish fort." "Vell, Herman, I dinks you had better keep avay from de soldiers, and stay mit de store, because you know you don't can put any confidence mit de soldiers. I vill tell you why:

"Von day vile I vas in Vicksburg, during de var, a cock-eyed soldier came in my store mit an old bugle in his hand, and he looks around. I asks him vat he vants, und he buys a couple of undershirts, den he tells me to keep his bundle and bugle behind de counter until he comes back. After de cock-eyed soldier vent de store out, some more soldiers came in und valk all around, vile dey look at de goods. 'Shentlemens,' I says, 'do you vant anyding?' 'Ve are shust looking to see vot you haf,' said von of dem, und afder avile anodder says: 'Bill, shust look dere at de bugle, de very ding de Captain told us to get. You know ve don't haf any bugle in de company for dree months. How much you ask for de bugle?' I dells dem dot I can't sell de bugle because it belongs to a man vot shust vent out. 'I vill gif you $50 for it,' said de soldier, pulling his money out. I tells him I don't can sell it because it vasn't mine. 'I vill giv you $100,' he said. My gracious, Herman, I vants to sell de bugle so bad dat I vistles. De soldier dells me vile he vas leaving de store dot if I buy de bugle from de man vot owns it dey vill gif me $125 for it. I dells dem I vill do it. I see a chance, you know, Herman, to make some money by de oberation.

"Ven de cock-eyed soldier comes back he says, 'Git me my bundle and bugle; I got to go to de camp.' I says, 'My frent, don't you vant to sell your bugle?' He dells me no, und I says, 'My little boy Leopold, vot plays in de store, sees de bugle, und he goes all around crying shust as loud as he can because he don't got it. Six times I dakes him in de yard und vips him, und he comes right back and cries for de bugle. It shows you how much trouble a man vill haf mit a family. I vill gif you den dollars for it shust to please little Leopold.' De soldier von't dake it, und at last I offers him $50, und he says. 'Vell, I vill dake fifty because I can't vaste any more time, I haf to go to de camp.' Afder he goes avay I goes to de door und vatches for de soldiers vat vanted de bugle. I sees dem passing along de street, und I says, 'My frents, I haf got de bugle,' und dey say, 'Vell, dam it, vy don't you blow it?' My gr-r-r-cious, Herman, vot you dink? All dem soldiers belong to de same crowd und dey make de trick to swindle me. Levi Cohen, across de street, he finds it out, und every day he gets boys to blow horns in front of my store so as to make me dink how I vas swindled. Her man, I dink you had better stay mit de store."

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. ☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Notes and Clippings.

We understand that church oyster festivals were first introduced by the hard-shell Baptists.

The Moody and Sankey meetings in England hav been interrupted by Mr. Moody's severe illness.

Recently compiled statistics place the death rate from the administration of chloroform at one per thousand.

It costs New York city almost $7,000,000 per year to run her churches. It costs money to pretend to be good.

The Rev. Canon Wilberforce denies that he stated at a meeting that he would not giv his wife brandy though it were to save her life.

Connecticut sends idols to the heathen. The next step in the great forward march of Christian civilization will be canned missionaries for the cannibals.

It is said that a clergyman was once reproached for yawning visibly in the middle of his own sermon, and replied that he could not help it, because it was so dull.

"Are churches practical?" asks the New York Tribune. Well, they seem to be. They contrive to get money out of tight-fisted old curmudgeons who dodge the tax collector.

According to an official return, the quantity of spirits held in bond in Great Britain is now 49,000,000 proof gallons. This is four and a half times more than was thus stored in 1867.

Cremation has established a firm foothold in Italy. At a convention just held in Modena there were representativs of twenty-seven cremation societies established in different Italian cities.

Archbishop Bourget, of Montreal, has within two years paid off a diocesan debt of a million dollars, the rise of real estate largely helping him. He is now building a $4,000,000 cathedral.

A patent has been taken out in Paris by M. Petit for a substance called dynamogene, intended to replace dynamite. Its manufacture and management are stated to involve no danger, and the cost is forty per cent less than gunpowder.

It may hab been de intention at fust fur preachers to hab a disregard ob money, but show me a preacher dat won't climb down offen a sixteen-hand mule ter pick up a nickel, in de road an' I'll split yer a thousand rails for nuthin'.—Arkansaw Traveler.

Barnes, the revivalist, says his mission on earth is twofold, "to glorify God and worry the devil." The trouble with Brother Barnes is that he worries easy church-members and everybody in any way connected with the devil. —New Orleans Picayune.

Only 611 persons (out of 4,000,000) were charged before the Dutch (Holland) criminal courts last year, of whom 72 were women, and only 11 below 16. This either proves great laxity in the police or most exceptional freedom from crime. Child murder is very rare, the more so that public opinion is very indulgent toward lapses of feminin propriety.

How much it does cost to keep up the great delusiv religion of Christianity, and to send its falsehoods to foreign lands! There are now in the United States 110 theological seminaries, representing fifteen Protestant denominations. Of these fifty-two are connected with the American Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance. This alliance has for its object the stirring up of the theological students to Christian activity, but chiefly in the line of leading them to devote themselvs to missionary work in foreign lands. At the recent annual meeting of the alliance which was held in Chicago it was stated that thirteen per cent of the young men now studying for the ministry hav resolved to be foreign missionaries.

A Methodist orator was rather strong in his metaphor. He said: "Rather than undertake to establish a throne, it would be better for a man to go to sea in a stone boat, with iron oars and leaden sails, with the wrath of God for a breeze and hell for the nearest port." One of the peculiarities of the voyage of a man setting out in such a rig would be its exceeding great shortness.

The Detroit Free Press knows a clergyman so eloquent that he can hold a man with the nose-bleed through a sermon lasting forty minutes. A man who will sit with the nose-bleed and listen to a sermon three-quarters of an hour long, ought to be given the freedom of heaven without a very prolonged cross-examination, but he should hav some consideration for the sexton.—Rochester Post-Express.

It seems a mischievous young man changed parrots with a clergyman in Baltimore, taking away the one given to pious talk and substituting one in its place from a sailors' boarding-house, and which could swear and curse like a pirate. The church sisters who assembled at their pastor's house in the evening were exceedingly shocked at the terrible talk of the wicked bird. The clergyman was utterly at a loss to account for the change that had come over polly until it was learned the birds had been changed.

Sabbatarianism was one of the subjects discussed at tho recent Conference of the Scotch Episcopal Church. The Dean of Carlisle observed that there was nothing in the Book of Common Prayer to show that Christians should behave differently on Sunday to any other day in the week, the services being the same as those for week days, only the communion and special lessons being added. The modern British Sunday is only a thing of the last two hundred years so far as its compulsory dullness is concerned. One of England's legacies from her Stuart kings, he said, was the belief which obtains among her people that secular music and amusing reading would be desecrations of Sunday.

One of Elder Jabez Swan's most graphically descriptiv and characteristic sermons was on Jonah and his trip to Tarshish, a portion of which ran as follows: "Now the Lord sent Jonah down to Nineveh to hav protracted meetings, but Jonah had grown unruly and he made up his mind to go down to Tarshish and hav a time—oyster chowder, turkey supper, or something of that sort. So he took passage and 'paid the fare thereof'—paid his fare—had plenty of money, you see—all fixed for a first-class time, and got aboard. Now, then, the Lord sent along such a southeaster that made even the heathen mariners tremble. Then they dumped Mr. Jonah overboard, and a big fish took him into his private apartments, probably especially lit up with whale oil for the occasion, and by and by, at the Lord's bidding, the fish set him ashore; and then the way that gentleman scrambled over the pebbles, brushed the seaweed from his face, and struck a beeline for Nineveh was a caution, and he hasn't been on an excursion since."

The noble marquis of Queensbury attended recently at a representation of Mr. Tennyson's new drama, which is conceded to be the worst play that has been brought out in London for many years. Mr. Tennyson holds up a Freethinker to public odium as the motiv of his play. The marquis promptly denounced the laureate during the first act, and on the fall of the curtain made an impassioned speech to the audience. It made a great sensation, but his grace was put out of the theater. The affair has become the occasion of a widespread discussion in print and out of it. Freethinkers are gathering to his lordship's support. Mr. Tennyson is abused more than he was by the dramatic critics, and they are having it out according to the new Queensbury rules. The marquis says in the daily papers: "I am a secularist and a Freethinker, and, though I repudiate it, a so-called Atheist, and, as president of the British Secular Union, I protest against Mr. Tennyson's abominable caricature of an individual who, I presume, he would hav us believe represents some body of people, which, thanks to the good of humanity, most certainly does not exist among Freethinkers."

A clerical scandal is just now agitating a parish of south London. It would appear that the wife of the curate of a church frequented by a congregation which suburban society delights to call "fashionable" had given great offense to her neighbors by reason of the varying hues of her hair, her pencilled eyebrows, her artificial complexion, and her general dressy style. A deputation of ladies placed the matter before the vicar, who thereupon wrote to the curate, calling on him to resign. The curate happens to be a thoroughly practical man, who had gained considerable worldly wisdom by service in the army before he took orders. Instead of rendering obedience he forwarded the vicar's letter to the bishop, and appealed to his lordship for protection. The bishop has replied by reproving the vicar for heeding envious gossip, and informing him that he is not justified in dismissing his curate for the trivial reasons stated. The congregation is now divided into two camps, and great curiosity is expressed concerning the result of the squabble.

Hell seems to be improving. The New Jerusalem Messenger, which is the organ of Swedenborgianism, is publishing a series of articles on "Hell and Hell Fire." The writer of these is disposed to say a good word for the place of torment. He says that in hell, as elsewhere, there are changes of state, and we need not suppose the internal fires are always raging with equal heat. Sometimes they smoulder, not being quenched, but always likely to break out anew. He also says that hell is by no means a place of unremitting torment. The inmates hav their pleasures, which they are permitted to indulge on condition that they fulfill their appointed tasks, and do no mischief to their companions. These pleasures are of a low and sensual kind, and such as would be disgusting to good spirits and angels. To many persons this picture of hell will be a novelty. It is in striking contrast with that drawn not long ago by a Scotch clergyman, who portrayed a 16-year old girl who had not become a Christian while on earth, and was consequently suffering torments in a red-hot furnace room, standing on a flooring of highly heated iron, with every probability of having to stand there forever and ever.

A Grecian gentleman named Messaros, who has been preaching for a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, provoked the criticisms of some of the brethren in the Presbytery. Having applied to be admitted as a candidate for the ministry, he was told that his literary qualifications were too slender, and that in some other respects, he was not exactly the man that was wanted for a minister. This excited his oriental anger, and in the manner of a nativ Grecian he uttered some words to the brother which were judged unministerial, inasmuch as they hinted at personal vengeance and corporeal castigation. Feeling ran so high thet the matter had to be brought before the Presbytery. Meantime some of the other brethren kindly waited on Mr. Messaros, and told him that, whatever might be the custom in Greece, it was not usual for servants of the Lord in this country to challenge each other to personal combat, or offer to thrash each other with sticks or clubs. When the Presbytery met, Mr. Messaros made ample apologies ror having acted on a misunderstanding of American customs. These apologies were received in the spirit in which they were offered. The Greek continues his candidacy for ordination to the ministry, meanwhile pursuing his studies and preaching on Sundays. He is so eloquent that his pulpit performances hav thrown those of some of the Philadelphia brethren into the shade.

News of the Week.

The yellow fever epidemic in Florida is said to be at an end.

Queen Victoria reviewed the returned Egyptian troops on the 18th.

The authorities of Ottawa, Canada, hav confiscated a lot of Paine's theological works.

The legislature of Canada is to be petitioned to abolish tolls on all the canals of the dominion.

A party of Indian traders were recently massacred, cooked, and eaten by some Indians on the upper Patumayo River in South America.

Inquiries into the affairs of some of the lunatic asylums in the vicinity of New York are developing the fact that a great many sane persons are illegally confined in them.

Dr. Johann Gottfried Kinkel, the German patriot, poet, and writer on art, died at Zorick last week. He was an ardent democrat, and had been in prison for his political opinions.

The Congregational church at Richmond, Mass., a large frame structure, built over one hundred years ago, was burnt on Saturday evening, the 18th, taking fire from a defectiv chimney.

A Sioux Indian chief called Brave Bear was hanged for murder at Yankton, Dak., on the 15th. He had been a notoriously bad Indian, and had made himself a terror to the community for many years.

Attorney-General Russell has rendered an opinion that parsonages, even though they be on the same lot with churches, are liable to be taxed if the parsonages are owned by church trustees or corporations.

Prof. Henry Draper, distinguished as an astronomer, chemist, physiologist, and original investigator in various branches of science, died at his home in this city on the 20th. His death was caused by acute double pleurisy.

Mrs. Melville, wife of Engineer Melville of the illstarred Jeannette arctic expedition, and who was rendered insane with joy at her husband's return, left the insane hospital at Norristown, Pa., on the 17th. She has regained her health entirely.

William H. Ennis, superintendent of a pious charitable house in Brooklyn called the Good Samaritan, recently disappeared with $350 belonging to the institution. He spent part of the money for rum, and was discovered upon Ward's Island in the hospital for inebriates.

The "Passion Play," representing scenes in the life and crucifixion of Christ, is to be brought out in this city on or before Christmas. As the play will be presented under pious auspices, it is not expected that it will be interfered with by the authorities, as was the case when an ordinary worldly manager attempted to put it on the stage.

Mrs. Robert Best, wife of a respectable tradesman in North Diamond street, Allegheny City, Pa., went insane on the 16th inst. on religion. She had been attending the meetings of the Salvation Army, and the morning in question, while attending to business, began to make wild appeals to the unconverted passers by. The counter was piled full of publications of the Salvation Army, which she gave away and sold. Her actions became so boisterous that her husband had her taken to the lock-up. Physicians then examined her, and found her raving in a delirium of fever. She was taken to her home, and doubts are entertained of her recovery. Still the Salvation Army is encouraged to go on in the good work!

Hot springs again abound along the hillsides of this locality. Columns of steam arising from them are to be seen eight or ten miles away. These springs are sometimes inactive for hours; then come little puffs of steam, then jets of hot water which shoot thirty feet high. Sometimes hot, muddy water and sulphuric wash descend the hillside, desolating everything in their course, and escaping through the bogs of the valley. The waters are very hot, and woe to the unlucky wight who approaches too near and on the windward side of these shooting hot springs, as the spray is hot enough to scald. There are over one hundred of these hot, spurting, sulphuric springs in this vicinity. Some claim that these waters come up from the heated interior of the earth, while others insist that the heat is produced by chemical action.

Eight miles further on our eastward journey brings us to Cluro, simply a flag-station in a kind of open country, with strips of meadow land along the river's brink. Near this point is where the powder magazine belonging to the railroad company exploded in 1868, while the road was being constructed through the canyon.

In early times a party of emigrants encamped in this valley, waiting for the waters to subside. Among them was a young woman of spotless character, who fell sick—probably from the effects of the miasma which exuded from the earth—and despite the watchful care of parents and friends, her spirit peacefully left the body and returned no more. Her friends reared a humble head-board to her memory and placed it at the head of her lonely grave. In course of time, as years passed away, and new companies of emigrants and new companies of explorers journeyed this way, the young maiden's story was forgotten. But when the constructors of the railroad came through here the road came very near the maiden's grave, and found the head-board much decayed. Learning the facts relative to her death, a respectful feeling came over them, and they very properly inclosed the grave with a solid wall and erected over it a Christian cross, with the words "The Maiden's Grave," on one side, and her name, Lucinda Duncan, on the other. It is on the south side of the railroad, and is in fair view of the passengers on the train as they pass.

Eleven miles from Cluro brings us to Palisade, a station in the midst of what are called the Palisades, or Twelve-mile Canyon. Here the walls on either side are high, and the scenery of a grand character. Its bleak, bare, brown walls possess a majestic and glowing grandeur. In moving through this canyon we seem to pass between two walls which threaten to close together ere the outlet is reached. The river rolls at our feet in a boiling, roaring current, tossed from side to side by the rocks which pervert its course. The walls in places have crumbled away, and large masses of crushed rock slope down to the river brink. Seams of iron ore and copper-bearing rock break the monotony of color, showing the existence of large deposits of these materials among these brown old mountains. Near Red Cliff the walls rear their battled fronts eight hundred feet above the water. A colony of swallows have taken possession of the rocks, and have built their curious nests upon the face of the same. From their mud palaces they look out upon the passing trains and possibly form their opinions of the passengers thereon. Maggie's Bower is a brown arch on the face of the cliff, about five hundred feet from its base. It has been remarked that it is pretty hard to tell whether it is the right or left bower, but when we had passed it we concluded it was the left.

Palisade is a busy place of two hundred inhabitants, and is the junction of the Eureka and Palisade railroads, and here are located their workshops. They manufacture their own box and flat cars. The amount of freight handled here is said to be enormous, the greater portion of which is for Eureka, an active mining region, ninety miles south. Several passengers on our train also stopped off here to take the train for Eureka, among others two young ladies who had been attending school at Reno, others of the same class having been dropped at other points we had passed.

On the road to Eureka are several stations, among which are Bullion, eight miles; Evans, four miles; Willards, three miles; Hay Ranch, four miles; Box Springs, nine miles; Mineral, nine miles; Deep Wells, five and a half miles; Alpha, seven miles; Pine Station, ten miles; Cedar, four miles; Summit, seven and a half miles; Gardner Pass, six miles; Diamond, nine miles; and finally Eureka, twelve miles. Eureka is an active town of six thousand inhabitants, all being engaged directly or indirectly in the mining business. Besides the usual number of stores and business houses there are two thirty-stamp mills, seven smelting works, sixteen furnaces with a capacity of fifty tons of ore each daily. These extensive works running day and night, of course make a lively business, and account for the quantities of bullion hauled over the road to Palisade.

The Ruby Hill railroad, which is virtually a continuation of the Eureka and Palisade railroad, runs from the station at Eureka around to the different smelting and refining works and mines of the different companies in the vicinity. It is about six miles in length. The most prominent mines are the Eureka Consolidated, the K. K, the Jackson, Hardburg, Matamoras, and Atlas. From Eureka stages run daily to various mining camps farther away. Eureka is, indeed, one of the most active and prosperous mining districts in Nevada.

As we emerge from the Palisades and roll on our eastern course for nine miles, we reach Carlin, a busy little town of six hundred inhabitants. Here are located the railroad shops of the Humboldt division. They consist of a round-house with sixteen stalls, a machine, car, and blacksmith shop. Rich mines of gold, silver, copper, and iron are south of here.

Eleven miles more bring us to Moleen. The meadow lands passed over are broad and green, but soon the ranges of rocky hills narrow in so that the railroad has to pass through a canyon five miles in length. Through this the river runs rapidly, its clear waters sparkling in the sunlight as it speeds along, when several narrow strips of meadow land are to be seen at intervals. The scenery all through the canyon is almost unsurpassed in beauty and boldness. Soon after entering the canyon we pass several isolated towers of conglomerate rock towering to the hight of two hundred feet.

Before entering the canyon we passed through Susan Valley, a strip of good bottom land about twenty miles long by four wide, bordering the east fork of Maggie's Creek. Among the foot hills of the Owyhee range, to the northward, are many beautiful little valleys, well watered by mountain streams, waiting only the advent of the settler to transform them into pleasant homes. Timber is plentiful in the ravines and on the hillsides—sufficient for the wants of a large population. Maggie's Creek empties into the Humboldt from the north. It was named in honor of a beautiful Scotch girl, who, with her parents, stayed here awhile, "recruiting their stock," in the old times before a railroad was constructed over these mountains. The valley through which the stream flows is from three to five miles wide and very fertile. It extends to the base of the mountains seventy miles away, and is covered by stockmen. The stream affords excellent trout-fishing, and game of various kinds abounds on the hills surrounding the valleys.

Eleven miles east of Moleen is Elko, the county-seat of Elko county. The population is twelve hundred. It is an eating station for all trains east and west, and, as a matter of course, is regarded as a place of importance. The town formerly consisted of wood and canvas houses, but these have been replaced by buildings of a more substantial character. The place has improved very much within the last two or three years. The State University is located here, and cost $30,000. The filthy-looking Piute and Shoshone Indians hang almost constantly around the town, and do little else than beg from passengers passing through. Warm medical springs are located near the town, and are much praised for their health-restoring qualities. Rich mining districts lie eighty miles north, near the head waters of the north fork of the Owyhee country. The Tuscarora mines are fifty miles north, and they are also very rich. Stages leave daily for the mining districts. There are also rich mines in the south. Cattle-raising has also sprung up here, and is being pretty extensively conducted. Elko county is said to contain more cattle than any other two counties in the state, and more cattle are shipped here than at any other station on the road. This is a well-watered country, the mountain streams being abundant. Game of all kinds abounds, and the country is called "Hunters' Paradise." Irrigation is necessary to produce good crops.

Eight miles further on is Osino, at the head of Osino canyon, where the valley suddenly ends. At this point the northern range of the mountains sweeps down to the river bank, and then assumes a tortuous course, seeming to double back on itself in a partially bewildering manner. Across the river the high peaks of the opposite chain rise clear and bold from the valley, contrasting strongly with the black, broken masses of shattered mountains, among which we are winding in and out in an endless labyrinth.

Eleven miles more bring us to Piko, a place of not very much consequence. Just before arriving at the station we cross the north fork of the Humboldt on a truss bridge. This river, when it unites with the main stream, is about equal in size. It rises about a hundred miles north, and receives as tributaries many smaller streams. The valley of the North Fork is from five to seven miles wide, and is covered with a rich growth of grass. The land is not extremely well adapted for cultivation, though some kinds of vegetables do well. It is better adopted for stock-growing than anything else.

Three miles further east is Halleck, a small station. Stores are left here for Fort Halleck, a military station on the opposite side of the river.

Thirteen miles more bring us to Deeth, an insignificant station, and eight miles more to Bishop's, a side track. Bishop's valley here unites with the Humboldt. It is about seventy miles long, with an average width of five miles. It is very fertile, being watered by Bishop's Creek, which rises in the Humboldt Mountains, near Humboldt Canyon, about seventy miles to the northeast.

Five miles from here is Tulasco, a small side track, and seven and a half miles further brings us to Wells, where are located the round-house and machine-shops of a division. It is 644 miles from San Francisco, and 1,250 from Omaha, with an elevation of 4,628 feet. This is rather a thriving point, with railroad shops and general signs of improvement. The chief point of attraction in the vicinity is Humboldt Wells, around which emigrants in early times camped to recruit themselves and teams. The Wells are in the midst of a beautiful meadow, or valley, which slopes away until it joins the Humboldt, or main valley. The springs, or wells, are about twenty, and are scattered over the little valley. The one from which the railroad company obtain their water is within two hundred yards of the road, and about the same distance west of the station. A house has been built over it, and the water is raised into the tanks by an engine. These wells make no particular show save that the grass grows more luxuriantly immediately around them. They have been sounded at great depth, but no bottom has been found. The water rises nearly to the surface of the ground, and soaks away into the sandy soil without any appearance of current. The water is slightly brackish. The springs are six or seven feet in diameter. They are thought to be the craters of long extinct volcanoes, but which once threw up enormous quantities of lava, of which the soil of Cedar Pass is largely composed. The face of the whole country bears evidence of mighty changes which have been wrought here. Lava in hard, rough blocks; lava decomposed and powdered; huge blocks of granite and sandstone in the foot-hills, broken, shattered, and thrown around in wild confusion, are some of the indications to be found of the wild times which once existed here. The valley in which the wells are situated is about five miles long by three in width, covered with a luxuriant growth of grass. The change to this from the arid hills around seems like the work of magic. Rich mineral wealth has been discovered in this locality. Proceeding down the valley a few miles the Humboldt Valley is entered; but though it is very fertile, the seasons are too short to perfect the usual crops.

Cedar is a side-track station six miles further on, and three miles more brings us to Moore's, on the summit of Cedar Pass. We have been gradually ascending for over three hundred miles. In general outline this pass resembles a rather rough, broken plateau, bent upward in the middle, forming a natural roadbed from the desert to the Humboldt Valley. It was once covered with scrub-cedar, which was cut off for use by the railroad company and others. About fifteen miles to the north a high, craggy peak marks the point where Thousand Springs Valley bends to the south, and from its divide slopes down to the valley of the Humboldt.

Independence, named from Independence Springs, is six miles further on our way. Here is an abundance of clear, cold water. Independence, Clover, and Ruby valleys lie to the southward. The first two are said to be small and valuless, save for grazing purposes. Seventy or eighty miles south of the Pass is the south fork of the Humboldt, which canyons through the mountain range, running east. The valley is productive, and has an average width of ten miles.

Five and a half miles more bring us to Otego, and six miles further is Pequop, while ten miles further bring us to Toano, until recently the end of the division. Here the railroad company have erected work-shops, and a round house with fourteen stalls. It is in the midst of a successful mining district. The country is considerably broken, but presents an appearance of vegetation.

Loray lies seven miles further on, and nine more bring us to Montello, which has an elevation of 5,000 feet. The country here is rough and uneven.

Tecoma is ten miles east, and in 1874 was the center of considerable mining excitement at the discovery of rich silver and lead mines five miles south in the Toano Mountains. A smelting furnace was erected, and two hundred tons of bullion were produced, worth $36,000. The mines, however, have greatly subsided, and stock raising is now more successful than mining.

Pilot Peak lies thirty-six miles south of this place, and is distinctly seen for fifty miles eastward. It is a lofty pile of rocks, the eastern terminus of the Pilot Mountains, rising 2,500 feet above the barren sands. For about half way from the base to the summit the sides are shelving piles of shattered rock—huge masses crushed to atoms. Above that they rise perpendicularly, the summit looking like some old castle at a distance. To the emigrant in early days this was a welcome landmark, pointing his way to Humboldt wells or Thousand Spring valley, where water and grass for his weary teams awaited him.

Lucin is twelve miles further on, and here water tanks are found, supplied by springs in the hills at the outlet of Thousand Spring Valley, wihch lies to the north, just behind the first base ridge, one of the spurs of the Humboldt ridge, but a few miles distant. The valley is about four miles wide, and not far from sixty miles long, taking in its windings from this point to where it breaks over the divide into Humboldt Valley. It is little better than one continued bog in the center, the brackish water from the numerous springs of the locality standing in pools on the surface. Good pasturage abounds here.

Bovine is eleven miles further on, and is in a barren country, the principal product of which is bunch-grass and sagebrush. Ten miles further on is Terrace, where the railroad company has erected railroad shops. The hills in sight are brown, bare, and uninviting. Some good mines are reported in the vicinity.

Matlin is an unimportant station eleven miles further eastward. It is on the highland, which sweeps out the Red Dome Mountains. The road lies on the northern border of a vast waste, whereon few signs of verdure are to be seen. It is about in the middle of what is called the American Desert, which extends over an area of about sixty square miles. Over this vast extent the eye wanders in vain for a green object. All is desolate in the extreme. The bare beds of alkali, or wastes of gray sand, are all that meets the vision, if a rocky hill, more barren than the plains, is now and then excepted. This basin was probably once a saline lake, possibly a portion of the Great Salt Lake of Utah. The sloping plain sweeps off toward the body of water, and in places bends down until its thirsty sands are laved by the briny flood. There are many evidences in support of the theory that it was once covered by those waters, although much higher than the present level of the lake.

Ombey is ten miles further on, but there is nothing to be said of it, and eleven and a half miles more bring us to Kelton, or Indian Creek, as it is sometimes called. Here are large water-tanks by the roadside, supplied from a spring in the foothills, some miles to the northward. The Red Dome Mountains show scattered spurs to the north, and to the southeast Pilot Knob, or Peak, can be seen lifting its rocky front far above the desert. From this station a daily line of stages leaves for Idaho and Oregon, touching particularly at Boise City, Silver City, and other points. A goodly number of TRUTH SEEKERS are taken up in Idaho, and it would suit me well to spend two or three days up there had I the time at my control.

Seven miles of dreary travel brings us to Seco, where nothing grows but sage-brush, and seven and a half more convey us to Monument. Here the lake breezes from the east sweep by, bearing the heavy saline and alkaline odors peculiar to this locality. Monument Point, a slim, tapering promontory, stretches far out into the lake, covered with luxuriant grass. We are now on the eastern confines of the American Desert. Lake is a side-track station seven miles east.

Nine and a half miles more bring us to Rose, an unimportant station. We are now nearing the point where the Central Pacific road and the Union Pacific meet, and east of here ten miles of track was laid in a single day. As we passed on eastward we saw the signs announcing the ten miles of track thus laid. During the building of the road a great rivalry existed between the two companies—one coming from the east, the other from the west—as to which could lay the most track in a day. This rivalry commenced in 1868, the "Union" laying six miles. Soon after the "Central" laid seven miles, and then the "Union" came up to seven and a half miles. The "Central," not to be outdone, announced that they would lay ten miles in a single day. Mr. Durant, the vice-president of the "Union," offered to bet $10,000 that it could not be done. Consequently on the 29th day of April, 1860, when only fourteen miles of track remained to be laid, to meet the "Union" at Promontory Point, and in the presence of President Stanford and many other prominent men from the east and west, and a committee from the "Union" to note progress, the work commenced. When the car loaded with ralls came to the end of the track the two outer rails were seized with iron nippers, hauled forward of the car and laid on the ties by four men who attended exclusively to this. Over these rails the car was pushed forward, and the process repeated. Behind these men came a gang of men who half drove down the spikes and screwed on the fish-plates. At a short interval behind these came a gang of Chinamen, two deep, on each side of the track, who finished driving in the spikes which had already been partially driven. The inner men had shovels, the outer ones picks. Together they ballasted the track. The average rate of speed at which all these processes were performed was 1 minute and 47½ seconds to every 240 feet of track laid. To lay this distance of road requires 25,800 cross ties, 3,520 iron rails, 55,000 spikes, 7,040 fish-plates, and 14,080 bolts, the whole weighing 4,363,000 pounds. This amount is required for a single track, exclusive of "turn-outs." To bring this material forward and place it in position, over 4,000 men and hundreds of cars were required. The discipline acquired in the four years of the construction of the road enabled the force to begin at the usual time in the morning, calm and unexcited, and march steadily on to "Victory," as the place was named where they stopped for dinner, at 1:30 P.M., they having laid eight miles of track in six hours. To provide eating material for such a force was by no means a light task, but Campbell, of the Union company, was equal to the emergency. The camp and water train was brought up at the proper moment, and the entire force took dinner without unnecessary delay, besides many distinguished guests. After the "nooning" was over, the army was again on the march, and at precisely 7 P.M. ten miles and two hundred feet had been completed. At this juncture the Union or Eastern company expressed their entire satisfaction and returned to their camp, while Campbell sprang upon the engine and ran it over the ten miles of track in forty minutes, thus demonstrating that the work had been well performed.

Promontory is the station where the Eastern and Western divisions met. Here is where the "last spike" was driven, and here the East and West joined hands, on Monday, May 10th, 1869. It is 1,084 miles from Omaha, and 830 miles from San Francisco, and has an elevation of 4,905 feet. It is said the town was formerly lively, but it is now very dull. A large party was here congregated on the completion of the road, having come from all parts of the Union. Some of them were grave, earnest men, who had left their homes to witness the completion of the greatest enterprise of modern times—1,774 miles of continuous railroad over a large share of an extensive continent, and over some of the grandest mountains in the world.

All around was excitement and bustle on that morning; men were hurrying to and fro. On either road stood long lines of cars, the impatient locomotives frequently snorting out their restlessness, as though they understood the eventfulness of the occasion. Arrangements had been made by which the larger cities of the Union should be notified at the moment when the last spike was driven, and the connection between the East and West effected. The last tie was a beautiful piece of California laurel, on which were silver plates suitably inscribed, and the last connecting rails were jointly laid by men from both companies. The last spikes were then presented—one of gold from California, and one of silver from Nevada, and of gold and silver from Arizonia. President Stanford then took the hammer made of solid silver, and to the handle of which were attached the telegraph wires, and with the first tap on the gold spike at 12 M., the news of the event was flashed over the continent. Speeches were made as each spike was driven, and when all was completed, cheer after cheer rent the air from the enthusiastic assemblage.

Then the Jupiter, a locomotive of the Central Pacific, and locomotive No. 116, of the Union Pacific, approached from opposite directions, meeting on the dividing line, where they rubbed their brown noses together and shook hands. Conviviality was then the order of the day. Eatables and drinkables had been supplied in abundance, and they were partaken of as though the multitude were neither total abstinents nor dietists. Jollification expresses the feeling that prevailed.

We have now passed through Nevada and have reached Utah. Even Salt Lake is not far away. For Nevada I must say, while within its borders are some beautiful oases, where vegetation is abundant and cheering, it is, upon the whole, the most cheerless-looking country I have seen, save it was the desert parts of Egypt and Syria.

On resuming our eastern journey, nine miles brings us to Blue Creek, where we cross the creek on a a trestle bridge, then by a tortuous course we wind around the heads of several little valleys, crossing them well against the hillside by heavy fills. Salt Lake is in sight to the southward.

Twelve miles more of travel bring us to Quarry, which is merely a side track; and nearly eight miles more bring us to Corrinne, which is now less populous than it was a few years ago. The people of the place, however, have had sufficient enterprise to bring the waters of the river Malad eleven miles in a canal, and the water is largely used for irrigating purposes, by which thousands of acres of land are made productive, making stock raising and other farming operations prosperous.

In passing on seven miles more we pass over a long trestle bridge, twelve hundred feet in length, and reach Brigham, at the base of the mountain. Seven miles further bring us to Bonneville, and nine miles more to Ogden, one of the prettiest towns in this part of the world.

My friend John A. Jost was expecting me, and met me at the station. He pressed me to stop and make a visit, but I replied by saying I had purposed to go first to Salt Lake City, and that I would call upon my return. In half an hour the train for Salt Lake City, thirty-six miles to the south, had started, and I was traveling over some of the prettiest parts of Utah,

UTAH TERRITORY

Extends from the thirty-seventh to the forty-second parallel of north latitude, and from the one hundred and ninth to the one hundred and fourteenth degree west longitude, containing a superficial area of 65,000 square miles, with a population of 143,907, including whites, Chinese, and Indians. This area includes large tracts of mountain ranges and wild, barren country. At present, most of the lands under cultivation and the meadow lands are around the lakes and in the neighboring mountain villages, and are very productive when irrigated, grains, fruits, and vegetables maturing readily, and yielding large returns, the aridity of the climate precluding the growing of crops by any other means.

Rich veins of gold, silver, coal, and iron, copper, zinc, cinnabar, antimony, and nearly all the metals found in the Great West exist in Utah, and it is thought that had not the councils of Brigham Young prevailed against prospecting for precious metals, Utah might to-day be the very foremost state in the production of mineral wealth. The whole country within her borders would be illuminated with the perpetual fires of the smelting furnaces, and resound with the thundering echoes and re-echoes of the thousands of stamps grinding out the wealth which, since the completion of the Pacific Road, and the consequent influx of "gentiles," has been exported by millions and most effectually demonstrated the fact that Utah, if not the richest, is certainly next to the richest silver mining country in the world.

In addition, brimstone, saltpeter, gypsum, plumbago, and soda have been discovered in large quantities, and some of them are being worked. While fine clay, marble, granite, slate, red and white sandstone, limestone, and kindred formations exist in almost an unlimited extent. Salt can be shoveled up in the crude state on the shores of Salt Lake, and in the southern part of the territory is found by the mountain in a remarkably transparent and pure state.

Iron ore exists in large quantities in Iron, Weber, and Summit counties. Coal abounds in various parts, but the principal mines now worked are at Coalville, in Summit county, and in San Pete. The latter yields a good quality of blacksmiths' coal, and in large quantities. At the present time there are about thirty organized mining districts in the territory, and there are several of them pronounced rich and inexhaustible. Many of them are producing large quantities of ore.

Fish culture has since 1874 been receiving some attention, and a fish farm, with a superintendent thereof, is located a few miles from Salt Lake City. There are quite a number of smelting furnaces in operation in various parts of the territory, and in Salt Lake City. Utah was first settled in 1847. On the 24th of July the advance guard of Mormon emigration, numbering 143 men, entered Salt Lake Valley. Five days later 150 more men arrived under Captain Brown, and on July 31st Salt Lake City was laid out. At that time the country belonged to Mexico, but by the treaty of Guadaloup Hidalgo, in 1848, it was ceded to the United States.

The summers are very warm and dry, and the winters mild and open. The fall of snow is light in the valleys and heavy in the mountains, the melting of which affords ample water for irrigating the foothills and valleys. Vegetables of all kinds grow large and luxuriantly, and are very superior in quality. Timber is not very plentiful, and is usually found in places difficult of access.

VISIT TO SALT LAKE CITY.

Friday, June 23d, was a beautiful day, and I greatly enjoyed the ride to the city of the Latter Day Saints. We passed up the great Salt Lake valley, and were nearly all the time in view of the lake on our right, while a range of mountains—Promontory Mountains—was on our left, leaving but a few miles in width for the fertile valley between. All along on the mountain range is a bench, or what looks like a shelf, some two hundred feet or more higher than the valley, which the water once came up to and which was once the shore of the Great Lake, when it was far larger than now.

We pass through several flourishing stations, as the valley is a most splendid farming country. These are the names of the stations or villages through which we passed:

Kaysville is surrounded by beautiful farms, finely-kept gardens, with water running through the streets. Fruit and shrubbery are in abundance. This is in Davis county, which comprises five towns, which, with one exception, are traversed by the railroad. The county has seven thousand inhabitants, seven flouring-mills, and three saw-mills.

Farmington, in the same county, is five miles further south. This is the county-seat of the county, and here several copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER are taken, and here I know I have warm friends. The village contains several good buildings, several flouring-mills, and is surrounded by teeming farms and fruitful orchards and gardens. These towns were settled by Mormons, but considerable numbers have apostatized and become "gentiles," or "people of the world."

Centerville is four miles from Farmington, and corresponds very well with those towns already described. Wood's Crossings comes next, two miles further on, being the station for the little village of Bountiful on the left. There is said to be no more fertile land in the territory than is here. A considerable strip of the land next to the lake is of no value from the excess of salt which fills the soil.

A little before noon we reached Salt Lake City, or "Zion," as the "Saints" call it. It is indeed a charming place. To one who has been traveling over mountainous and alkali deserts, with little but sagebrush to cheer the eye, this lovely retreat of level, fertile land, the city laid out in wide streets, running at right angles, with a plentiful, clear mountain stream running on each side, and with lovely orchards and gardens looking green and fruitful all over the city, five or six miles square, presents a most lovely sight. He inevitably feels that he has found paradise in reality, and that here he would gladly spend his days. Although the snow is in abundance on the mountains, and is in plain view, the valley is warm, with the air of summer. Everything about the holy city of the Latter Day Saints is about as beautiful as the mind can imagine.

Two or three friends met me at the depot, but there was a slight difficulty in recognizing each other. The hotel, however, was soon reached, when dinner was taken, after which I spent the day in calling upon several friends, prominent among them James Ashman, who is an active agent for THE TRUTH SEEKER and THE TRUTH SEEKER publications. He accompanied me over the city, and we called upon several other friends.

Salt Lake City is some ten or twelve miles from Salt Lake, which is in full view, and as the ground is as level as the lake itself, the distance does not look nearly so far. The town is situated at the foot of a spur of the Wasatch Mountains, the northern limits extending on to the "bench," or level, to which the waters of the lake once reached. I should say the streets are abundantly shaded with large, luxuriant trees, so that the sidewalks are well shielded from the sun. The city has a population of twenty-five thousand, and is divided into twenty-one wards. It contains many fine business blocks, and the principal streets hav a decided city appearance. The portion of the city occupied as residences is laid off in large-sized lots, and so thoroughly screened by shade and fruit trees that the city spreads over a great deal of ground and does not present a very imposing appearance, so far as the dwellings are concerned, though many are very fine. As four railroads terminate here, it may be regarded as quite a railroad center, and, as is well known, is the capital of the territory.

There are hundreds, and possibly thousands, here who once belonged to the Mormon church, but who, losing faith in ecclesiastical claims and the doctrins of revelation and supernaturalism, have, one by one, left the church and became apostates to the old faith. Some of the best business men in the city are of this class. Mr. Ashman is also one of the same class. He was once a devout Mormon, but the time came when he could no longer accept their dogmas. It was a great struggle for many of them to get out of the Mormon church, much the same as other thousands have found it a painful experience to get out of the Methodist, the Presbyterian, the Baptist, and more especially the Catholic church. The retiring member is tabooed; he is called an "apostate;" he is held to be in league with the devil and an enemy to all that is good and of God; he is no longer fellowshiped or recognized as a brother; he is no longer aided in the way of business or work, but every possible obstacle is thrown in his way. But the apostates have now become so numerous that they form quite a society by themselves, and are no longer dependent upon the "Saints" for a livelihood. Many of the anti-Mormons have become Spiritualists and Liberals, some retaining a faith in a future existence, and some not. When one has experienced all the false promises of a supernatural religion, and has become convinced that the promises and doctrines are untruthful, he naturally turns from it with honest discontent and seeks something that is truthful and can be depended upon when the excitement produced by the frenzy of religious teachings has passed away. All the shams about gods and devils ultimately cease to afford food to the thoughtful mind, and the good sense of man instinctively reaches out for that which is real, truthful, natural. He becomes better satisfied with the unerring teachings of nature than with all the dogmas, delusions, and absurdities which supernature falsely teaches. When mankind learn that all supernaturalism is false, that all the sayings of selfish, malicious, and angry gods are false, and that no such gods ever had an existence save in the brains of mistaken human beings; when they learn that all they hear about fiery devils, who delve in fire and sulphur to carry out the behests of the still more cruel gods in bringing suffering upon human beings, is false, it will be better for the people of the world. One of the most saddening reflections to which the human mind is susceptible is the fact that religious dogmas which priests for thousands of years have been promulgating have been the greatest foes to the happiness of the world of anything that has existed. They have all opposed nature; they have all set up systems of religion in conflict with nature, and to this extent they have all been wrong and have loaded mankind down with a weight of wretchedness. In nature there are no gods nor devils, save good and bad men and women, and all which have had a fancied existence have been the inventions of priests and designing people, who have sought to live upon their credulous fellow-beings by exciting their fears and building up a belief which has no real foundation for existence. If all the wrongs which religious creeds have produced in this world were to be written in a series of volumes it would be the most terrible and damnable record which could possibly be penned. It has cost the human race worlds of treasure to keep up these delusions, and the entire sums have been far worse than thrown away.

It is said that the believers in Mormonism in the city are seventy-five per cent of the population, and the unbelievers twenty-five per cent. In the whole territory taken together the believers are reckoned at eighty-three per cent. When on Sunday I saw the thousands of Mormon dupes who turned out to hear the speaking in the Tabernacle, I was inclined to think the believers are as largely in the ascendant as represented. They are held together in various ways. The Mormon co-operative store is open. It is owned by eight hundred Mormon stockholders and is patronized by all the Saints in the vicinity. It is a very extensive establishment, containing goods of all kinds, and enough to fill a dozen good-sized storehouses. It has a cash capital of $750,000.

At the Mormon conference in the fall of 1868, all good Mormon merchants, manufacturers, and dealers who desired the patronage of the Mormon people were directed to place its sign upon their buildings in a conspicuous place, that it might indicate to the people that they were true saints. The description of the sign is as follows: In five lines are these words, "Holiness to the Lord; Zion's Co operative Mercantile Institution." After the first four words in a curved line is the picture of an all-seeing eye, which is supposed to be God's eye which never sleeps. This all-seeing eye has been the cause of much jest among the gentiles, who laugh at it and irreverently call it the "bull's-eye." That term in ancient Egypt would be far from irreverent, for Apis the Bull was one of their greatest gods, and the bull's-eye would to them be the holiest of the holies.

The Mormon people were also religiously instructed and warned not to purchase goods or in any manner deal with those who refused or did not have the sign. The object was doubtless to consolidate their own people, to secure all their trade, and to prevent any of it going elsewhere. The result of this movement was to break up many dealers who were either Gentiles or apostate Mormons, for many were forced to sacrifice their goods and leave the territory for want of patronage. It is said, however, that subsequently the order was not very rigidly enforced. But many of these bull's-eye signs are to be seen upon the buildings of the faithful in the city and through the territory. The Z. C. M. I.—Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Institution—is in a very flourishing condition. I was through the establishment, and could not but be struck with the magnitude of the concern, and the orderly system which controls it. The structure is of brick, 318 feet long, 53 feet in width, three stories and a full cellar in hight. It also has an addition of 25 by 193 feet, used for a warehouse. The entire building cost some $200,000, and the contents three-fourths of a million more. It has branches in various parts of the territory, so that its purchases must necessarily be very heavy, and its re-shipments of an extensive character. The Z. C. M. I. has undoubtedly the largest building in the territory, and its annual sales are $5,000,000. When it is remembered that it is but about thirty-five years since this vast extent of country was inhabited, it must be realized that the progress made is very great. Walker Brothers are apostate Mormons, and they have built up a very extensive business, said to be the largest in the territory. They require five buildings for the five general departments. If they do not transact more business than the Z. C. M. I., they are the only ones in the territory who make the slightest approach to it. In addition to their other enterprises, they have recently erected a beautiful Opera House, which is just now ready for use. I had the pleasure of seeing M. Curtis play "Sam'l of Posen," in the first representation given in the beautiful theater. The Walker brothers are Liberal Spiritualists, and in the front of the Opera House building they have fitted up a fine and commodious room for the Liberal Society of the city to hold their meetings in. I had the pleasure of adding the name of the principal of the firm to the list of THE TRUTH SEEKER patrons, as well as those who take "A Truth Seeker Around the World."

On Saturday, June 24th, my friend and patron, H. B. Mason, with his gay horse and buggy, took me out two miles or so to the warm spring where there is a commodious bathing-house. Here we took a pleasant warm bath in a large tank five feet deep, twenty feet long, and ten in width, with the same for women in an adjoining room. These waters are counted as possessing considerable medical value. Our ride was extended to other warm sulphur springs, when we returned to the city, and I spent the afternoon with esteemed friends, and among others with several who had come in nineteen miles from Farmington expressly to see me. Among these I might mention Walter Walker and wife, Henry Southworth, James Anderson and wife, and others. I could not help feeling flattered by such marks of friendship, and the five or six hours of time passed off very pleasantly. It was on the evening of this day that the play at the Opera House was witnessed, many of my friends accompanying me. Messrs. Walker, Southworth, and Anderson of Farmington were once devoted Mormons, but they have thrown off the shackles that bound them, are now among the steadfast Liberals who read THE TRUTH SEEKER and believe the truths which it disseminates.

The following Sunday was variously passed. For one thing I attended the Mormon tabernacle and listened for over an hour to George Q. Cannon, who has just returned from Washington, where he was sent as a delegate, but was rejected by the House of Representatives on the ground that he is a polygamist, and has more than one wife. A congressman may have as many concubines or kept mistresses as he pleases, and the godly church people will continue to smile upon him as approvingly as though he were a David or a Solomon, but let him be a Mormon and claim that he practices plural marriage because he believes it was commanded by the Jewish God three thousand years ago, the Christian members will frown upon him, and pronounce him a great sinner, unworthy to sit with them in law-making halls.

Cannon is an effective speaker, and his discourse related principally to the injustice which the Christians of the East show to the Saints of the West. He exhibited not a little dissatisfaction at the injustice which had been shown him, not seeing why the conscience of a Mormon should not be as much regarded as that of any other sort of believer.

After he had completed his remarks, President John Taylor, who occupies the chair filled by Brigham Young, spoke for fifteen minutes, and though he is a venerable, fine-looking Englishman, he did not impress me as being a very able man. I was informed that he frequently becomes so excited in his public remarks as to get carried away with anger and to almost lose the power of utterance. Brigham Young, Jr., made quite a prayer, which, in my opinion, did not get half a mile from the earth. He is a full, florid, plethoric man, of about thirty-five years, who cares far more for the good things of this world than the celestial worlds located above the clouds. He looks to be far more of the earth, earthy than of the heaven heavenly.

During the meeting an extensive display was made by pouring the blood of Jesus from silver pitcher to silver pitcher, three or four dozens of them being in sight and passed around in silver tankards for the faithful to sip from. I am not positive that this was really the blood of Christ, though were I a simon-pure Christian I would have to believe it anyway, for that is a point upon which no faithful soul can dare to doubt. I thought it was simply wine in which no change had taken place in becoming the blood of Christ any more than would take place in a keg of lager beer, which, if wine should become scarce, would make just as good Jesus-blood as the wine itself. But though I was a little thirsty that warm afternoon they did not have the courtesy to hand me any of that blood. They had no means of knowing how much I would have "loved my Jesus."

The Tabernacle is a very singular-looking and a very capacious building. It is about the first object one sees on entering the city. It is oblong in shape, having a length of 250 feet and a width of 150 feet. The immense roof is supported by forty-six columns of cut sandstone, which, with the spaces between, used for doors, windows, etc., constitute the wall. From those pillars or walls the roof springs in one unbroken arch, forming the largest self-supporting roof on the continent. It is not only used for church purposes, but for other public meetings. It will seat eight thousand people. The speaker's stand is on an elevation, but not at the extreme end of the building, perhaps one-fourth the length of the building from one end, so that large numbers of the people are seated behind the speaker.

THE TEMPLE,

Which is a much grander edifice, is not yet completed, but work is progressing somewhat steadily upon it. The dimensions of the foundation are 186½ feet by 99 feet. It is not nearly as large as the tabernacle, and what the use was of building it is hard for an unbeliever to understand, except to use up some of the surplus funds which the saints have on hand. It is located on the same extensive block of ground on which stands the tabernacle, and if God is tolerably pleased with the services held in the tabernacle, it would seem the temple might have been dispensed with. It will require several years yet to complete it.

The audience in the tabernacle was a fair-looking one, and would compare favorably with most Christian audiences in the country. That they are dupes, however, to mistaken doctrines one can pretty readily discover. The singing was good, and the large organ came in with sonorous sounds.

I saw the residence where Brigham Young lived and where his dozen and a half of wives lived. The finest residence the wives had was for his favorite wife Amelia. She lived in this by herself. In walking about the city she was pointed out to me. I think she was playing lawn tennis. She is a rather fine looking woman. I think she is now some other man's wife.

I took dinner with my friend Ashman, and at his house gathered a goodly number of friends, with whom I had an excellent visit.

A RECEPTION

Was extended to me in the evening in the Liberal Institute, which was well filled. Mr. E. L. T. Harrison presided and made the opening speech, gracefully and cordially welcoming me to Salt Lake city.

After the chairman's speech I detained the audience for an hour and a half, chiefly giving them incidents I had met with on my travels. The usual congratulations followed the regular speaking, together with pretty liberal subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER and my Round-the-World books.

Many of the friends who were in the night previous from Farmington, after driving home the nineteen miles in a wagon, came back again on the evening train to attend my reception. Such marks of devotion are not often seen in Israel. When I returned to Ogden on Monday morning we rode in company, and took our leave of each other at the Farmington station.

I cannot speak too highly of the friends at Salt Lake City. They were extremely kind to me and made my visit among them very pleasant. There are a pretty large number of Liberalists and Spiritualists here, and I hope they will succeed in effecting such an organization as will make them effective for good in advocating the truths of nature and in opposing the wrongs of priestcraft and supernaturalism.

THE RETURN TO OGDEN

Was a pleasant ride, and when I reached the station I found a number of friends with a carriage to carry me to the hotel. A project was soon organized for a ride through the Ogden Canyon, a few miles north of the city. It is nearly seven miles in length, with grand granite walls rising in places on either side to a hight of 1,500 feet, and in places coming within one hundred and fifty feet of each other. The rushing Ogden River, which dashes through the canyon, and is crossed here and there by bridges, adds much to the beauty of the scenery. We stopped at a canyon hotel, which is not a very extensive establishment, and had a very palatable dinner prepared. The table was set in full view of the towering walls of the canyon — within that very cathedral of nature; and that dinner was eaten surrounded by more of nature's grandeur than most of the dinners it has been our pleasure to partake of. The rest of the ride was most enjoyable. Near the mouth of the canyon we visited a Mormon woolen factory where very serviceable yarns, flannels, and cloths are manufactured. The superintendent kindly gave me a package of yarn to take home with me. Considerable time was spent in looking over the pleasant town.

The city is near the mouth of the canyon, and the town is liberally supplied with water from the river which rushes through it. It is the county-seat of Weber county, and has a population of 6,500. Next to Salt Lake city it is the largest town in the territory. The Mormons have a tabernacle, and other denominations have churches the same as with us. There is the same conflict here as to which has the right road to heaven as in most other places in the world. The Mormons are very sure they have got the surest road, and that following the plural marriage which Abraham, Jacob, and others of the old patriarchs used to follow is one of the necessary means of getting there. They consistently argue that if polygamy was ever right, and was ever authorized by the great infinity, who never changes, it is right now. On the other hand, the other denominations know that the Mormons are wrong, and that heaven can never be reached by the road they are pursuing. It is hardly to be expected that this question will ever be satisfactorily settled.

Ogden puts on city airs with very good grace, and the town is lighted by electric lights. It is surrounded by fertile gardens and orchards, much the same as Salt Lake City. Two daily papers are published, one a Mormon sheet, and the other with gentile proclivities. Of course there is no end to the subjects for differences. I should have remarked that Salt Lake City has four daily papers. The Deseret News is the organ for the saints; the Herald claims to be independent, while the Tribune is almost bitterly anti-Mormon; the Times is perhaps less belligerent. They each publish weeklies, and two or three other weeklies are also published, one of which is conducted by Mormon women, and advocates plural marriage.

Ogden is the junction for three roads, the Union Pacific in the first place, the Utah Central or Salt Lake City Road in the second place, and the Utah & Northern in the third place. A large amount of business is said to be transacted on the Northern road. It is a three-foot narrow gauge and runs into northern Utah, Idaho, and Montana. The traffic over this road must largely increase.

Rich mines of iron, silver, and slate are reported near Ogden. It is surrounded by the elements of wealth, and must be an important place in the future.

THE RECEPTION

Came off in the evening at the Opera House, which was well filled. Mr. James Horrocks presided and made the opening speech, making me welcome and introducing me to the audience.

Mr. John A. Jost read the following welcome:

"Our honored and highly esteemed friend and brother, we bid you welcome.

"Hero opposer of the Christian church in its desecration of the sacred rights of our glorious constitution, we rejoice to meet you.

"We hav followed you from the shore of the Atlantic with the deepest feelings of love and friendship, and with a fond solicitude for your safety and comfort upon your long and arduous journey eastward to this place, and shall continue to follow you with the same feelings till you shall again reach the most sacred spot on earth you left some eleven months ago—home, sweet home.

"We cannot forego the pleasure of meeting you as you pass through our prospering city, and detaining you while we grasp the hand and look upon the countenance of the great and brave man—the hero opponent of religious persecution of the nineteenth century, who braved the degradation of the prison cell, and the horrors of the priestly inquisition of a Christian bigoted priesthood, through their executive, Comstock, the Torquemada of to-day, that the rights of all should be tolerated—the man who braved contumely to advocate the rights of others to differ from him.

"We glory in your courage and disinterested love in advocating the equal rights of every citizen of this fair land, and for your determined effort to preserve the same from the power of religious tyranny that would, if once in possession of that power, again confront the unbeliever with the rack, the fagot, and the fire.

"Our friend and brother, the sincere desires, wishes, and hopes of thousands disenthralled from religious errors hav followed you with an enthusiasm worthy of the cause in which you are engaged.

"We rejoice that you hav been preserved to return to your native land—the country consecrated to liberty—the home of the brave, which should be the land of the free. We are proud to say that none returned entitled to a more hearty welcome or a more honored reception than the brave, noble, and endeared in the heart of every true Liberal, our beloved brother, D. M. Bennett.

"You will please accept this small token of love and esteem as the outpourings of the hearts and souls of the Liberals of Ogden and vicinity, in unison with the Liberal League of Ogden city, at the hands of this committee appointed by them for this labor of love; and may our fondest hopes be realized in your continued success, and in hearing at an early day of your safe arrival home, of the continued love of warm hearts, the shake of ready hands, and the embrace of your faithful wife.

"JOSEPH SEWELL, JAMES HORROCKS,
"JOHN A. JOST, JOHN HORROCKS,
"C. P. LAMBERT, Sec. Com., F. H. MARSH,
"Committee."

I followed in remarks continuing for about an hour and a half. A reporter of the Herald was present and took down the gist of my remarks, which were published on the following morning, but I have not a copy by me to quote from. In brief I will only say that my reception was most cordial. I could not ask for better friends than I found here.

REVIEW OF MORMONISM.

Now as I am about to move on eastward and will soon be away from the dominions of the Mormons, a few reflections on their wonderful career and their leading characteristics may not be out of place. Many systems of religion have risen in the world, but few of them have been attended with more wonderful events than has Mormonism. The prophet Joseph Smith has been called a fraud, and that Book of Mormon which he claimed was inscribed upon plates of gold which he was enabled to read and translate is said to be a novel written by a Methodist minister by the name of Spaulding, which was stolen and made the word of God, the Book of Mormon. Just what the truth is in this matter is not fully known.

In 1830 Smith had six followers, all of his own kin. In 1837 Mormon missionaries went to England; in 1840 to Australia; in 1841 to Palestine; in 1843 to the Pacific Islands; in 1852 to Siam and Ceylon; in 1853 to Gibraltar, Malta, Hindostan, Burmah, China, West Indies, South Africa, and British Guinea; and at the present time in Utah may found inhabitants from every country in Europe. Many of those of South America, and from Hindostan, Burmah, China, Cape Colony, and Navigators' Islands, together with negroes and Indians, all united in one common belief. Certainly Christianity did not have so remarkable a growth in the days of its infancy.

The first organization of the Mormons was in the state of New York. They emigrated to Ohio and there thought to found their New Jerusalem. From there they were again driven out and took up their line of march to Missouri. They had journeyed eight hundred miles in this Christian country, in this American republic, to find a place where they could worship God according to their belief. Their houses were burned, their property destroyed; some were beaten with hickory rods, others were tarred and feathered; many families were massacred; wives and children were driven for shelter to the forests, and without food, raiment, and friends. Missourian prejudice against Free-state settlers, joined to religious animosity, fanned human passions to a white heat, and the Mormons were pursued with almost Indian ferocity. The president, Martin Van Buren, quailing before the vote of Missouri, told the Mormons that he could do nothing for them, though he readily admitted that their cause was just.

Another pilgrimage of four hundred miles brought them to Nauvoo, Ill., where they founded a city, built a temple, and displayed a public spirit worthy of admiration whatever may be thought of their religious claims. Here again they were subjected to continual persecution, and at last were told by state officials that they had better leave, as they could not be protected against the mob, which, with blackened faces, hounded on by a Christian minister, had murdered Joseph Smith and others.

Then that wonderful journey across the plains was undertaken, when material wealth was sacrified for honest convictions. They thought they would go so far into the wilds of the continent that their Christian enemies would never reach them more, and even on this march they were compelled to give to the government, which did nothing to protect them, a battalion of five hundred men for the Mexican war, leaving the women in some cases under the necessity of driving the teams, besides watching over the little ones and preparing the frugal meals upon which they subsisted. The hardships of this long wearisome journey across the plains and the great desert, over the Rocky Mountains and all, can scarcely be overstated. They submitted to sufferings and privations in great number; they sacrificed their property without reserve, and acted as brave and honest men have acted many times before.

Remember, at this time polygamy had not been incorporated into the Mormon creed, and Christians had not that excuse to urge them on in their persecutions and warfare against them. Many of the old men still living in Utah passed through those trying scenes. Brigham Young was baptized in 1832; all these trials and tribulations were part of his life experience. So, too, John Taylor, his successor, the present head of the church. Taylor had stood in Missouri and seen their houses burnt, their property pillaged, their most sacred convictions outraged. He had seen among others martyred to the blind rage of opposition an old Revolutionary soldier, a Mr. McBride, who with feeble frame and tottering steps, unable to run, had cried in vain: "Spare my life. I am a Revolutionary soldier. I fought for liberty. Would you murder me? What is my offense? I believe in God and Revelation." "Take that, you God damned Mormon," was the reply of the Christian Missourian, as with the butt of his gun he dashed out the old man's brains and left him a mangled corpse at his feet as he turned to pursue his work of persecution. Again, at Nauvoo, John Taylor had stood in that jail where, in violation of plighted faith, and himself wounded, he had seen his prophet basely murdered while making the masonic sign of distress, and had heard his dying words, "My Lord and my God."

One of the features of the Mormon church is worthy of mention. Twice every year, April 6th and October 6th the Mormons come from far and near to assemble in semi-annual conference in the great tabernacle which will hold without much crowding 12,000 people, and in which 15,000 can be packed. They pour in with their ox-teams from distant canyons and valleys headed toward Zion, and sometimes a lone old woman with a scant stock of meal and bacon makes a three weeks' journey to get her soul "warmed up" at the conference. These conferences last from four to six days, and they are democratic enough to allow every woman a vote. A male and female humble believer meet there on the common ground of equality. At these conferences every officer in the church, including the president himself, has to be re-elected to whatever position he holds.

Paul Lived 63 Years B. C.

The suspicion that Paul lived a century before the time set forth in the book of Acts first entered our mind in April, 1878, while translating the Toldoth Jeshu story. Finding there a reference to Rabbi Simon Kepha, a disciple of the Jesus who was stoned and hanged about 75 years B.C., and supposing that he might be the Kepha (Cephas) mentioned so often in Paul's epistles, we straightway searched those epistles for some possible clue to dates. We found but one, to wit:

"At Damascus, the commander of the army of Aretas, the king, guarded the city of the Damascenes, to seize me. And from a window, in a basket, they let me down from the wall, and I escaped from his hands."—2 Cor. xi, 32, 33.

We quote from the Peshito or Syriac New Testament, Dr. Murdock's translation. The Greek version has for "commander of the army," ethnarches—translated "governor."

We next turned to Smith's Bible Dictionary, from which we now transcribe the following:

"Aretas.—A common appellation of many of the Arabian kings or chiefs. Two are mentioned in the Bible.

"1. A contemporary of Antiochus Epiphanes (B. C. 170) and Jason (2 Macc., v, 8).

"2. The Aretas alluded to by St. Paul (2 Cor. xi., 32) was father-in-law of Herod Antipas. There is a somewhat difficult chronological question respecting the subordination of Damascus to this Aretas. The city under Augustus and Tiberius was attached to the province of Syria, and we hav Damascene coins of both those emperors, and again of Nero and his successors. But we hav none of Caligula and Claudius [A.D. 37–54], and the following circumstances make it probable [?] that a change in the rulership of Damascus took place after the death of Tiberius. There had been war for some time between Aretas, king of Arabia Nabatæa, whose capital was Petra, and Antipas, on account of the divorce by Antipas of Aretas's daughter, at the instance of Herodias, and also on account of some frontier difficulties. A battle was fought, and the army of Antipas was entirely destroyed (Jos. Ant., xviii, 5 § 1). On this, being a favorite of Tiberius, he sent to Rome for help; and Vitellius, governor of Syria [A.D. 35–39], was commissioned to march against Aretas, and to take him dead or alive. While he was on his march (Ibid. § 3) he heard at Jerusalem of the death of Tiberius (March 16, A.D. 37), abandoned his march, and sent his army into winter quarters, himself remaining at Antioch. By this change of affairs at Rome, a complete reversal took place in the situation of Antipas and his enemy. The former was ere long (A.D. 39) banished to Lyons and his kingdom given to [Herod] Agrippa, his foe (Ant., xviii, 7), who had been living in habits of intimacy with the new emperor (Ant., xviii, 6, § 5). It would be natural that Aretas, who had been grossly injured by Antipas, should by this change of affairs be received into favor, and the more so as Vitellius had an old grudge against Antipas (Ant., xviii, 4, § 5). Now, in the year 38, Caligula made some changes in the east, granting Iturea to Soemus, lesser Armenia and parts of Arabia to Cotys, the territory of Cotys to Rhaemetalces, and to Polemon, son of Polemon, his father's government. These facts, coupled with that of no Damascene coins of Caligula or Claudius existing, make it probable [!] that about this time Damascus, which belonged to the predecessors [?] of Aretas (Ant., xiii, 15, § 2), was granted to him by Caligula [!!] Thus the difficulty would vanish. The other [two] hypotheses—[1] that the ethnarch was only visiting the city (as if he could then hav guarded the walls to prevent escape); [2] that Aretas had seized Damascus on Vitellius giving up the expedition against him (as if a Roman governor of a province would allow one of its chief cities to be taken from him merely because he was in uncertainty about the policy of the new emperor), are very improbable."

This, then, is the naked hypothesis: Vitellius, the Roman governor of Syria, was ordered by Tiberius to take King Aretas dead or alive. The execution of the order was interrupted by the emperor's death. Some changes of governors were made by the new emperor, but not of Vitellius. But Vitellius is said to hav had an old grudge against Antipas, another enemy of Aretas, and might therefore hav favored Aretas. Consequently Caligula may hav displaced Vitellius and put the chief city of Syria under the government of the obnoxious king of Arabia, whose capital was 250 miles distant from Damascus.

The hypothesis is too weak to stand alone, and has nothing at all to support it. Of course there were frequent changes in the governors of provinces; but Vitellius was president of Syria from A.D. 35 to 39, and Petronius from 39 to 42 (Smith's Bib. Dic.); and considering the rarity of ancient coins, it is not at all singular that none should be found for a period of seventeen years minted at Damascus.

But the author of the above article, the late Dean Alford, is mistaken in saying that Damascus formerly belonged to the predecessors of Aretas. Josephus, to whom he refers, does not say so. After describing a battle between Aretas and Antiochus Dionysius, king of Syria, in which Antiochus was slain and his army destroyed, Josephus says:

"After him Aretas reigned over Celesyria, being called to the government by those that held Damascus, by reason of the hatred they bore to Ptolemy Meneus" (Ant., xiii, 15, § 2).

This was prior to 63 B.C. The last Seleucidean king of Syria was probably dethroned, and some time before the taking of Damascus by Pompey, a foreign king, Aretas of Arabia was invited to rule the city. It is not certain that his reign there was more than one or two years. According to Josephus it may hav been many, but other historians take no note of it at all. Josephus mentions one or two other kings of Arabia Petrea named Aretas, one about 7 B.C., and another A.D. 37; but neither of these had any hold of Damascus. It is the annotator who seems to hav misled Dean Alford by a false note on the above passage, saying that "Aretas afterward became a common name to Arabian kings, both at Petra and at Damascus."

But the Dean's hypothesis does not suit the American editor of Smith's Bible Dictionary, which has the following note written by Prof. Hackett, D.D., of the theological institution at Newton, Mass.:

"The view that Aretas seized and held Damascus by force for a short time after the defeat of Herod Antipas, is maintained by Neander, Hemsen, Weiner, Meyer, Guerike, Bleek, and others. It is not easy to believe that the Roman government would so suddenly, of its own accord, confer so important a city on a vassal who had just defeated one of its most faithful allies, and who had been proscribed as an enemy who was to be taken at all hazards, dead or alive."

Here is a serious conflict of authorities. The hypothesis that Aretas seized Damascus by force, wresting it from the Roman governor, Vitellius, though maintained by half a dozen or more leading German theologians, is rejected by the late Dean of Canterbury as "very improbable"; and he cites, in support of his own view, Wiesler and others. On the other hand, the American editor says it is not easy to believe the Dean's hypothesis. Certainly not, any more than the other; there is nothing to support either, and no one would think of upholding either, but for the necessity of accounting for Paul's statement in 2 Cor., xi, 32.

Three or four kings of Arabia named Aretas are mentioned in history, to wit:

1. Aretas noticed above, 170 B.C.

2. Josephus (Ant. xiii, 13, § 3) mentions "Aretas, king of the Arabians, a person then very illustrious." This is the Aretas who was called to reign in Damascus (Ib., 15, § 2). His reign in Arabia was very long. He was contemporary with Alexander Janneus, king of Judea (106—78 B.C.), with Queen Alexandra (78—69 B.C.—called Helena in the Toldoth Jeshu), and with her sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus (69—63 B.C.), contending successors to the throne. Hyrcanus fled to Aretas, who aided him with an army against his brother. Meanwhile Scaurus, the Roman general, came to take Jerusalem, but, being offered money by Aristobulus, he raised the siege and ordered Aretas to depart. Aretas resisted, but was beaten. Soon afterward Pompey conquered all Syria, and coming to the country of Ptolemy Meneus (who was so hated by the Damascenes that they called in Aretas to rule them), he accepted a thousand talents to save Meneus's life (Ant., xiv, 1, 2, 3; War., i, 6).

The government of Syria and Damascus had been very unstable for many years, under the Seleucidæ. Rawlinson, in his "Ancient History," says that for a period of about fourteen years, from 83 to 69 B.C., Tigranes, king of Armenia, was called in by the suffering people to govern Syria; and he adds:

"The Syrian throne seems then to hav fallen to Antiochus Asiaticus, the son of (Antiochus) Eusebes, who held it for four years only (69—65 B.C.), when he was dispossessed by Pompey, and the remnant of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ was reduced to a Roman province, B.C. 65."

But it does not appear that Damascus was actually taken till about 63 B.C., and it was not till 62 B.C. that the first questor of Syria, Pompey's general, Scaurus, began to govern that country (Smith's Bib. Dic.). Therefore, notwithstanding Rawlinson's silence concerning Aretas, there was a period prior to the Roman reduction of Syria when Aretas doubtless did, as Josephus tells us, reign in Damascus.

There are two or three different coins extant of this Aretas, with the inscription: Basileios Aretou Philellenos—"Of King Aretas, lover of the Greeks." And there is another coin commemorating the conquest of Aretas by Scaurus, mentioned above, about 53 B.C. (Ant., xiv, 5; War., i, 8, note; McCl. & Str. Cyc.).

3. The foregoing Aretas, whose surname was Obedas (Ant., xiii, 13, § 5), seems to hav survived till the latter part of the reign of Herod, the Great. He was succeeded by "Eneas, whose name was afterward changed to Aretas" (Ant., xvi, 9, § 4). The latter was contemporary with at least two successiv governors of Syria, namely, Saturnius and Varus (7 B.C. to 5 A.D.—Smith's Bib. Dic.), and seems to hav been a vassal of the Emperor Augustus (War., i, 29, § 3; Ant., xvi, 10, §§ 8 and 9; xvii, 3, § 2; 5, § 2; 10, § 9).

4. Unless the preceding Aretas continued to reign until A.D. 37, or later, there is a fourth Aretas mentioned once by Josephus (Ant., xviii, 5, § 1). But it matters not whether this is the same or another Aretas; he is the king alluded to by Paul, if Paul was living A.D. 38 and the stories about him in Acts are chronologically true. This is the Aretas who, despite the absolute silence of history and against all probability, if not possibility, is supposed—

1. Either to hav seized Damascus A.D. 38, and expelled the Roman governor, Vitellius;

2. Or to hav been appointed by the Emperor Caligula to supersede Vitellius, who had just returned from an expedition whose object was to take Aretas, dead or alive;

3. Or to hav been invited by Vitellius to put a military governor in Damascus, with a garrison, to guard the city and arrest disturbers like Paul.

Whichever support of this three-legged hypothesis you choose to cling to, you are compelled to kick away the other two legs. And then you are met with the silence of history and the inherent improbability, if not impossibility, of the case.

But there is no difficulty at all in regard to our second Aretas—63 B.C.; he answers clearly to the passage in Paul's epistle. This is our strong point. We hav presented the facts and the arguments, pro and con, fully and fairly. We fear no refutation, and shall adduce corroborativ evidence that Paul lived as early as 63 B.C.

ANTICHRIST.

Evolutionists at Dinner.

A dinner was given at Delmonico's on Thursday evening, the 9th inst., to Herbert Spencer, who sailed for England on the following Saturday. The gathering was large and brilliant. The Hon. William M. Evarts presided, and made the address of welcome to Mr. Spencer, who was greeted in the heartiest manner. He responded in a speech in which he dwelt on the American tendency to overwork. Speeches were also made by Henry Ward Beecher, John Fiske, Prof. W. G. Sumner, Prof. O. C. Marsh, and Carl Schurz. Among those present were Prof. Youmans, editor of the Popular Science Monthly, T. B. Wakeman, Courtlandt Palmer, and some two hundred others, many of whom are foremost in the ranks of science, art, literature, and even theology. Mr. Evarts, in his opening speech, said that as no room in the city would hold all the friends and admirers of the distinguished guest, it was necessary that a company should be made up out of the mass, and what so good a method as natural selection? Now, Mr. Spencer, he continued, we are glad to meet you here. We are glad to see you, and we are glad to hav you see us. We are glad to see you, for we recognize in the breadth of your knowledge—such knowledge as is useful to your race—a greater comprehension than any living man has presented to our generation. We are glad to see you, because in our judgment you hav brought to the analysis and distribution of this vast knowledge a more penetrating intelligence and a more thorough insight than any living man has brought, even to the minor topics of his special knowledge. In theology, in psychology, in natural science, in the knowledge of individual man and his exposition, and in the knowledge of the world, in the proper sense of society which makes up the world, the world worth knowing, the world worth speaking of, the world worth planning for, the world worth working for—we acknowledge your labors as surpassing those of any of our kind.

When Mr. Spencer arose to reply he was received with hearty and prolonged applause. He said that he regarded the present occasion as one on which arrears of thanks were due. He would begin with the time, twenty-two years ago, when his highly-valued friend, Prof. Youmans, making efforts to diffuse his (the speaker's) books here, interested the Messrs. Appleton, who had treated him honorably and handsomely. Mr. Spencer said he must return especial thanks for the many attentions and proffered hospitalities met with during his late tour. The cordial wishes for his better health he believed had been in a measure furthered by the wish, since all pleasurable emotion is conduciv to health, and the remembrance of the present event would ever continue to be a source of pleasure exceeded by none of his remembrance. And now that he had thanked them, briefly though sincerely, as representativ Americans, he was going to find fault with them. The average American, said he, works too hard and too long, and, in his eagerness to pursue some future good, almost ignores what good the passing day offers him; and, when the future good is gained, he neglects that while striving for some still remoter good. The consequences were the undermining of the physique. Men were permanently incapacitated and spent long years endeavoring to recuperate. So that, beyond the serious physical mischief caused by overwork, there is the further mischief that it destroys what value there would otherwise be in the leisure part of life. Nor do the evils end here. There is the injury to posterity. Damaged constitutions reappear in children, and entail on them far more of ill than great fortunes yield them of good. When life has been duly rationalized by science, it will be seen that among a man's duties care of the body is imperativ, not only out of regard for personal welfare, but also out of regard for descendants. His constitution will be considered as an entailed estate, which he ought to pass on uninjured, if not improved, to those who follow; and it will be held that millions bequeathed by him will not compensate for feeble health and decreased ability to enjoy life. Once more, there is the injury to fellow-citizens, taking the shape of undue disregard of competitors. I hear that a great trader among you deliberately endeavored to crush out every one whose business competed with his own; and manifestly the man who, making himself a slave to accumulation, absorbs an inordinate share of the trade or profession he is engaged in, makes life harder for all others engaged in it, and excludes from it many who might otherwise gain competencies. Thus, besides the egoistic motiv, there are two altruistic motivs which should deter from this excess in work.

Mr. Spencer's concluding remarks were as follows:

Some twenty years ago a good friend of mine, and a good friend of yours, too, though you never saw him, John Stuart Mill, delivered at St. Andrews an inaugural address on the occasion of his appointment to the lord rectorship. It contained much to be admired, as did all he wrote. There ran through it, however, the tacit assumption that life is for learning and working. I felt for the time that I should hav liked to take up the opposit thesis. I should hav liked to contend that life is not for learning, nor is life for working, but that learning and working are for life. The primary use of knowledge is for such guidance of conduct under all circumstances as shall make living complete. All other uses of knowledge are secondary. It scarcely needs saying that the primary use of work is that of supplying the materials and aids to living completely; and that any other uses of work are secondary. But in men's conceptions the secondary has in great measure usurped the place of the primary. The apostle of culture, as it is commonly conceived, Mr. Matthew Arnold, makes little or no reference to the fact that the first use of knowledge is the right ordering of all actions; and Mr. Carlyle, who is a good exponent of current ideas about work, insists on its virtues for quite other reasons than that it achieves sustentation. We may trace everywhere in human affairs a tendency to transform the means into the end. All see that the miser does this when, making the accumulation of money his sole satisfaction, he forgets that money is of value only to purchase satisfactions. But it is less commonly ssen that the like is true of the work by which the money is accumulated—that industry, too, bodily or mental, is but a means, and that it is as irrational to pursue it to the exclusion of that complete living it subserves as it is for the miser to accumulate money and make no use of it. Hereafter, when this age of activ material progress has yielded mankind its benefits, there will, I think, come a better adjustment of labor and enjoyment. Among reasons for thinking this, there is the reason that the process of evolution throughout the world at large brings an increasing surplus of energies that are not absorbed in fulfilling material needs, and points to a still larger surplus for humanity of the future. And there are other reasons which I must pass over. In brief, I may say that we hav had somewhat too much of the "gospel of work." It is time to preach the gospel of relaxation.

And now I must bid you farewell. When I sail by the Germanic, on Saturday, I shall bear with me pleasant remembrances of my intercourse with many Americans, joined with regrets that my state of health has prevented me from seeing a larger number.

The chairman next introduced Prof. W. G. Sumner, of Yale College, who, in response to a toast in honor of "Sociology," paid a high tribute to the guest and to the science of sociology. He said:

Unquestionably it is to the great philosophy which has now been established by such ample induction in the experimental sciences, and which offers to man such new command of all the relations of life, that we must look for the establishment of the guiding lines in the study of sociology. I can see no boundaries to the scope of the philosophy of evolution. That philosophy is sure to embrace all the interests of man on this earth. It will be one of its crowning triumphs to bring light and order into the social problems which are of universal bearing on all mahkind. Mr. Spencer is breaking the path for us into this domain. We stand eager to follow him into it, and we look upon his work on sociology as a grand step in the history of science. When, therefore, we express our earnest hope that Mr. Spencer may hav strength and health to bring his work to a speedy conclusion, we not only express our personal respect and good will for himself, but also our sympathy with what, I doubt not, is the warmest wish of his own heart, and our appreciation of his great services to true science and to the welfare of mankind.

To the toast, "Evolution: at first a hypothesis, now an established doctrin of the scientific world," Prof. Marsh responded, and as a conclusion to an able speech, said:

All existing life on the earth is now believed to be connected directly with that of the distant past, and one problem to-day is to trace out the lines of descent. Here embryology and paleontology work together, and the results already secured are most important. The genealogies of some of the animals now living hav been made out with a degree of certainty that amounts to a demonstration, and others must rapidly follow.

In this, and in all other departments of natural science, the doctrin of evolution has brought light out of darkness, and marks out the path of future progress. What the law of gravitation is to astronomy, the law of evolution is now to natural science. Evolution is no longer a theory, but a demonstrated truth, accepted by naturalists throughout the world.

The most encouraging feature in natural science, indeed in all science, to-day is the spirit in which the work is carried on. No authority is recognized which forbids the investigation of any question, however profound; and, with that confidence which success justly brings, no question within the domain of science is now believed to be insoluble. Not even the grand problems now before us—the antiquity of the human race, the origin of man, or even the origin of life itself.

Prof. Marsh was followed by the Hon. Carl Schurz, who responded to the toast, "The progress of science tends to international harmony." Speaking of the claim of Mr. Spencer that too great continuity and intensity of work will necessarily destroy our physical constitutiou, Mr. Schurz said he was sorry to see that in this respect Mr. Spencer himself, whose health is very delicate, appears more like an American than an Englishman.

Leaving the discussion of profound scientific and philosophical problems to others who were reckless of their physical well-being, Mr. Schurz recalled the following reminiscence of the war:

Some nineteen years ago, shortly after the battle of Missionary Ridge, I was camped with my command in winter quarters not far from Chattanooga, where we had so little food for our horses that many of them died, and so little salt that we could hardly make our beef and hard-tack palatable, but I found in my effects a copy of Herbert Spencer's "Social Statics," and during those long winter nights in my tent I studied them by the light of a tallow candle, and for that beautiful luxury I shall never cease to be grateful to our distinguished guest. I became convinced that if the Southern people had read and thoroughly digested that excellent work, there would never hav been any war for the dissolution of the Union. I essayed to hammer the fundamental principle of the "Social Statics" into the heads of the soldiers; namely, that "every man is entitled to the freedom of doing what he wills, provided he interfere not with the same freedom of any other man."

After some remarks upon the subject of the toast, the speaker continued:

In the distinguished man who this evening honors us we greet one of the foremost representativs of that great development of thought which has burst the bonds of the closet; we greet in him the great apostle of the doctrin of evolution; we greet him as a hero of thought who has devoted his life to the sublime task of vindicating the right of science as against the intolerant authority of traditional belief.

Great applause greeted the peroration of the eminent speaker.

Mr. Evarts then announced as the next toast this more or less dubious sentiment, "Evolution and Religion: that which perfects humanity cannot destroy religion," to which, as it was a double toast, he said there would be a duet of speakers to respond. The first of these was Prof. John Fiske, of Cambridge. In the course of his remarks he said:

Matthew Arnold once summed up the two main propositions of religion very well when he defined God as "An eternal Power, not ourselvs, that makes for righteousness." This two-fold assertion, that there is eternal power that is not ourselvs, and that this power makes for righteousness, is to be found, either in a rudimentary or in a highly developed state, in all known religions. In such religions as those of the Esquimaux or Zulus this assertion is found in a rudimentary shape on each of its two sides—the speculativ side and the ethical side; in such religions as Buddhism or Judaism it is found in a highly developed shape on both sides. But the main point is that in all religions you find it in some shape or orther. I said, a moment ago, that modern civilized men will agree that this two sided assertion is of far greater importance than any of the superficial points in which religions differ It is really of much more concern to us that there is an eternal power, not ourselvs, that makes for righteousness, than that such a power is onefold or threefold in its metaphysical nature, or that we ought not to play cards on Sunday, or to eat meat on Friday. No one, I believe, will deny so simple and clear a statement as this. But it is not only we modern men, who call ourselvs enlightened, that will agree to this. I doubt not even the narrow-minded bigots of days now happily gone by would hav been made to agree to it if they could hav had some doggedly persistent Socrates to cross-question them. Calvin was willing to burn Servetus for doubting the doctrin of the Trinity, but I do not suppose that even Calvin would hav argued that the belief in God's threefold nature was more fundamental than the belief in his existence and his goodness. The philosophical error with him was that he could not dissociate the less important doctrin from the more important doctrin, and the fate of the latter seemed to him wrapped up with the fate of the former. I cite this merely as a typical example. What men in past times hav really valued in their religion has been the universal twofold assertion that there is a God who is pleased by the sight of the just man and is angry with the wicked every day; and when men hav fought one another, and murdered or calumniated one another for heresy about the Trinity or about eating meat on Friday, it has been because they hav supposed belief in non-essential doctrins to be inseparably connected with belief in the essential doctrin. In spite of all this, however, it is true that in the mind of the uncivilized man the great central truths of religion are so densely overlaid with hundreds of trivial notions respecting dogma and ritual that his perception of the great central truths is obscure. These great central truths, indeed, need to be clothed in a dress of little rites and superstition in order to take hold of his dull and untrained intelligence. But in proportion as men become more civilized and learn to think more accurately, and to take wider views of life, just so do they come to value the essential truths of religion more highly, while they attach less and less importance to superficial details.

The chairman then introduced, as the last speaker Mr. Beecher, who made what was perhaps the most remarkable speech of the evening. He spoke in effect as follows:

The old churches used to hav two ministers; one was considered as a doctor of theology and the other a revivalist and pastor. The doctor has had his say, and now the evangelist will hav his. Paul complained that Alexander the coppersmith did him great harm. Mr. Spencer has done us immense harm. I don't believe that there is a thoughtful minister in the United States that has not been put to a peck of troubles, and a great deal more than that, by the intrusion of his views and comparisons with the old views. I can't for the life of me reconcile his notions with those of St. Augustine. I can't get along with Calvin and Spencer both. Sometimes one of them is uppermost and sometimes the other, and I hav often been disposed to let them fight it out themselvs and not take any hand in the scrape. It is to be borne in mind that when a man is driving a team of horses that are just all that he can manage anyhow, he is not in a state of mind to discuss questions with his wife by his side, who is undertaking to bring up delicate domestic matters. A man that has a woolly-headed deacon watching everything that he does, or a gold-spectacled lawyer—not a fat one, but a long, lean, lank one—he can't afford to talk Spencerism; he has got to take care of himself first. He must therefore expect not to come in like an equinoctial storm; he will come in like a drizzle. He will descend as the dew.

But one thing is certain, Mr. Spencer is coming, whether men want him or not, and coming to stay. Mr. Spencer may hav dyspepsia, but his books hav got no dyspepsia. They like the climate, and they are working their way steadfastly in this country. When Mr. Spencer speaks of our being so industrious he speaks like an insular gentleman. You havn't anything to do in England; you hav but about three hundred miles diameter one way and eight hundred the other. We hav got this whole continent to take care of. We are rather an ambitious people. We hav learned from the astronomers that they are five hours ahead of us every day in England, and we hav to work with all our might to make up those five hours.

Now let me say, with a little more approach to sobriety, I think that the doctrin of evolution, and its relation to the work of Mr. Spencer, which takes in that and a great deal more besines, to speak in plain language, is going to revolutionize theology from one end to the other; it is going to make good walking where we hav had very muddy walking hitherto; it is going to bridge over rivers which we hav had to wade, and it is going to cast light on many dark points in biblical literature. There are many points in which the theology of the past did well enough for the past, but it does not answer reasonable questions, and the moral considerations that are brought to bear upon it in our day I had just as lief hav descended from a monkey if I hav descended far enough. The New Testament idea is that religion is the art of putting men on an anvil and hammering them out into perfect manhood. There is no difference between that tendency in Mr. Spencer's work or Mr. Darwin's, or the galaxy of eminent writers that shine in the East, and ourselvs on that subject. On the other hand, the whole business of religion is not merely to insure a man against fire in the other world, but to create an insurable interest in him.

There is nothing more in the quarrel between science and religion than there is in a quarrel between man and wife. In both cases it might be regarded simply as an "adjustment of differences." All that is true and good in the Bible may easily be adjusted to the facts developed by the careful researches of the students of science. Man is certainly a progressiv animal, and just so far as true science opens the way for him to see just so far will his moral status improve. Our physical being is in constant conflict with our moral being. We are constantly in our moral natures resolving to do things which our physical natures refuse to do, but the physical as well as the moral natures are improving from year to year, which carries out the theory of progressiv development. The business before men is the making of themselvs, while they are making also the world in which they dwell. The doctrin of immortality was not known in the Old Testament day. Here we hav Prof. Park, of Andover, and a great many good and godly men in New England, discussing to-da whether a man who don't believe that everybody that dies impenitent will be damned forever and ever, is fit to preach the gospel. Five thousand years ago there was not a man on the face of the earth that knew there was a future.

In conclusion Mr. Beecher addressed these words to Mr. Spencer:

May he who holds the storms in his hands be gracious to you, sir, and may your voyage across the sea be prosperous and speedy, and may you find on the other side all those conditions of health and of comfort which shall enable you to complete the great work, greater than any other man in this age has attempted; and may you liv to hear from this continent and from that an unbroken testimony to the services which you hav done to humanity; and thus, if you are not outwardly crowned, you will wear an invisible crown on your heart which will carry comfort to death, and I will greet you beyond.

Mr. Beecher's remarks were cheered at their conclusion, most of the gentlemen rising to their feet and waving handkerchiefs and napkins.

When the speaker had taken his seat, Mr. Evarts requested the gentlemen to rise and once more to drink the health of Herbert Spencer. When this was done, Mr. Spencer said: "I am too much overcome by the good wishes expressed this evening to say more."

W. S. Bell's Liberty and Morality.

This is a fresh and readable book. It puts morality on the right basis. It is up to the high-water mark of advanced thought. Mr. Bell is not a bit afraid of liberty, because he has a profound confidence in human nature. He takes no stock in the "Gods." The source of morality is man himself. What is morality? It is not that which honors deity, but that which honors humanity. It is not the happiness of a heavenly being that we are to seek, but the happiness of the inhabitant of this planet. Let man be free, and he will surely in the end seek his happiness, and that will constitute the highest virtue.

Mr. Bell puts these pregnant and grandly revolutionary thoughts in a clear-cut and forcible manner. As he is about to enter the lecture field I hope that all Liberal societies will make an effort for the enjoyment and instruction of his live presentation of to-day's truth. He is entirely out of the fogs of the past, is well read, able, and logical and persuasiv in his method of address. His ringing words for liberty are what the hour demands.

Claiming Too Much.

The following has been received from an old friend and long-time patron of Boston:

BOSTON. NOV. 15, 1882.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: At the convention for the consideration of the anti-death subject, my attention was called to your article entitled "E. H. Heywood Again in Prison," which had escaped my notice before. It somewhat surprised me that, after doing the same that Mr. Heywood has done, and got yourself into prison, i e, defied that accursed law, doubtless to keep the agitation among the people in order that sometime the constitutional power of the government, the people, may rise and annul that law pushed through Congress by that accursed Christian lobbyist on the last day and last hour of the session of 1873. when, as I am informed, two-thirds of its members were drunk—and that when the president signed the bill he was so drunk that he had to be held up to do it—you say, "We hav fears that Mr. Heywood has been indiscreet." I had fears when you defied the government, or the law, but did not express it, and stood by you all the same. You wondered why Mr. Heywood should, under the circumstances, mail such matter. Said you "We could not see what good was to be gained by it." Mr. Heywood might hav said the same of you when you put yourself in the same position and made a martyr of yourself. You say, "There is no reason why any one should thrust his hands into the lion's mouth." Supposing that none of us had brought any opposition to the tyranny of the church fiends, or to the miserable frauds of Comstock and his hell-breeding minions, where would you hav been now? Instead of one year in the penitentiary it might hav been ten, and we should not hav had the privilege of reading your beautiful history of your travels around the world. I do hope that the popularity we hav given you by standing by you will not make you a tyrant instead of the Liberal you once were. There are no men that I hav held in higher esteem than yourself and Mr. Heywood, so I hope that you will not turn against us in the fight for right, as Col. Ingersoll, Underwood, and Abbot hav, and prove yourselvs to be all hypocrits. Am sorry to say that I hav found some of the most professed champions of Liberalism the most bigoted that I hav met, even in the orthodox church.

Now, Mr. Bennett, I hav had my say, and I hope you will giv it a place in the good old TRUTH SEEKER, and oblige one of your most sincere advocates for the right, and I will ever remain

Your sincere friend, N. H. DILLINGHAM, M.D.

REPLY.—With all respect for our venerable friend we will try to set ourselvs right upon this subject. We seem, in giving our views upon the Heywood subject, to hav stirred up a pretty lively hornets' nest. Every one of a certain class, among whom may be reckoned those in favor of social freedom, Freelovers, and promiscuityites, is aggrieved and will hav it that we hav proved false to principle; that we hav "flopped over;" that we hav "turned a summersault;" that we are guilty of cowardly conduct, that we hav falsified the principles of our life, and much more in the same line.

We insist there is no ground for these claims. We hav been false to no principle we hav advocated. We hav not changed position. We hav turned no summersault. We hav not even flopped over. The fact that we sold "Cupid's Yokes" and went to prison for it by no means proves that we are bound to favor the circulation of erotic and indecent matter. We hold that "Cupid's Yokes" is in no sense obscene. It is an essay upon the marriage question. Charles Devens, Judge Grey, and the members of Hayes's Cabinet entertained the same opinion. So thoroughly hav we maintained this that we hav continued to sell the pamphlet, as we are doing to-day. But because of this we positivly deny that we are bound to sustain nastiness or that which we look upon as nastiness. We hav never said a word to show that we were in favor of circulating, in any way, salacious and sensuous reading matter. We are not of the number who think that what a dying world is sighing for is the liberty to circulate indecent literature. There is much which to us seems of far greater consequence to our race. We, however, accord to all our friends the full right to arrive at such conclusions as to them seem most proper. If they think the greatest and grandest liberty human beings can attain to is to be permitted to circulate indecent literature, we will not quarrel with them, but we ask them to grant us similar liberty. If it is just for them to exercise the right to be in favor of such circulation, we certainly hav an equal right to oppose it. We shall, at all events, exercise that right. We trust our very Liberal friends will not deny to us the rights we so freely accord to them. If it is right for them to act upon their convictions, we trust they will see it is right for us to do the same. We hope none will insist that we should not hav the liberty of our convictions, for ours are as dear to us as those of others can be to them.

The argument is used that because we hav selected indecent parts of the Bible and circulated them in a book, therefore Mr. Heywood has a perfect right to make similar selections from Walt Whitman, and that we are bound to sustain him. There seems to us to be no logic in this. We are opposed to the Bible. We regard it as a great engin of superstition and error. We hav made it our business to show up its imperfections, its nastiness, and its indecency. We hav published those parts separately in book form, that it may be seen at a glance the indecency the book contains. So long as millions of copies of the Bible are circulated every year; so long as they are in every house, in every Sunday-school, and in the hands of every man, woman, and child, we claim a perfect right to do this. And we do so to show up the Bible in its true light—to work against it and destroy its influence. We do it, not because of any special fondness we hav for nastiness, but to show where it is most to be found. If we wished to damage Walt Whitman it would seem we would be justified in pursuing a similar course, and any one else has the same right. But we do not wish to injure Whitman, and shall not take that course with regard to him. If there are those who claim the right to do so we will not deny them the right, but we certainly hope they will leave us the privilege to express our views.

It ought to be pretty well understood by this time what our object and mission are. It is to oppose the errors of supernaturalism, the tyranny of priestcraft, and the absurdities of the current system of religion. We honestly believe Christianity to be false, to be the greatest sham in the world, without truth in its history, without loveliness in its doctrins, without benefit to the human race, and without anything to sustain it in the hold it has upon the world. We are in favor of advocating the truths of nature, we are glad to aid in disseminating the teachings of science. We are in favor of extending and enlarging the rights of oppressed men and women. We are in favor, so far as possible, of an even distribution of the wealth of the world. We are opposed to a few holding immense fortunes which they never earned, while millions are suffering for the commonest necessities of life. We are opposed to the oppressions of capital and monopoly. We are in favor of all men acquiring a comfortable competence in life, and opposed to one man seizing and holding that which belongs to millions, and is indispensable for their comfort.

We hope those who are in sympathy with us in these respects will sustain us in our efforts, while we cannot ask those who are not to do so. We shall continue on in the work in which we are engaged. We shall not deny to others the right to circulate erotic literature if they think that is the highest good; but we shall not engage in it ourselvs nor advocate it. We trust we hav now defined our position so fully that we shall not again be called upon to "rise and explain."

The Late Prof. Darwin's Position.

It is encouraging when such papers as the New York Tribune are willing to print anything decidedly damaging to Christianity, so it is simply the truth. The following is from a late letter from a London correspondent of that journal:

> The controversy about Darwin's letter on Revelation appears to be settled by the publication of the original text. This letter first appeared in England in the form of a translation from the German which was itself a translation from the English. By leaving out a full stop the sentence in question could be made to tail on to the next text so as to read, "I do not believe there has ever been any revelation as to a future life." In this qualification some people found comfort. But what Mr. Darwin really wrote was this:
> "Science has nothing to do with Christ, except in so far as the habit of scientific research makes a man cautious in admitting evidence. For myself, I do not believe that there ever has been any revelation. As for a future life, every man must judge for himself between conflicting vague probabilities."
> The date of this letter is June 5, 1879, and it is published in the Academy of November 4th. Then follows an extract from the National Reformer (Mr. Bradlaugh's paper) of October 29th, giving some account of a visit to Darwin last autumn by Dr. Ludwig Buchner and Dr. Aveling. Darwin is reported to hav said:
> "I am with you in thought, but I should prefer the word 'Agnostic' to the word 'Atheist.' . . . I never gave up Christianity until I was forty years of age"—and in reply to a question why he had given up Christianity, "It is not supported by evidence."
> It is possible that some worthy people may presently complain that the author of these hard sayings should be sleeping in Westminster Abbey. But they will complain to no purpose. The Abbey is a church, but it is also a pantheon, and the monopoly of it belongs to no creed or sect.

There is far more importance to the few passages here quoted from the utterances of Mr. Darwin than is observable to the casual reader. For such a man, who for honest investigation and soundness of his conclusions has never had a superior in the world, to say that Christ and science hav no connection, that he did not believe there ever has been any revelation, is just equivalent to taking the ultra ground we do, that Christianity is nothing less than unmitigated fraud and sham.

We hav the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Prof. Ludwig Buchner and Dr. E. B. Aveling, and know them to be the strongest kind of Materialists and Atheists. For him to assure those gentlemen that he was with them in belief, and that he gave up Christianity because it was not supported by evidence, is pregnant with meaning. There can be no mistaking such utterance. The wise philosopher clearly had not a particle of belief in the most absurd system of Christianity. Many of us may feel more firm in knees and steadfast in back when we know that this, the greatest man that ever lived, professed the same views we do. Oh, haste the day when thousands and millions more of human beings may hav the intelligence and integrity to make the same statement. Let eternal truth triumph over error.

Evils of Our Days.

It is probable all days and eras hav had a plenty of evils, and that in many respects we liv in one of the happiest ages the world has known. Science has advanced beyond any previous limits. Intelligence is more diversified over the earth—there are more of the elements of knowledge diffused among the people than was ever the case before since the era of man upon the earth. The human race ought to be happy. The earth produces abundantly, and more than the children of men can eat. Men know how to construct comfortable dwellings to protect themselvs from wintry colds. They know how to manufacture warm garments to protect their bodies from the biting frosts. They hav more avocations to pursue, and possess more facilities than ever for accomplishing what they desire. Yes, with the abundance which the fertil earth produces, and with the numberless avocations that man can pursue, this ought to be indeed the golden and happy age of the world. But, alas, it is not so! Toil, care, hardship, and oppression seems to be the lot of nine-tenths of the inhabitants of the globe. Starvation and the most abject penury is the fate of the great bulk of earth's sons and daughters. Ninety-nine hundredths of the inhabitants of the globe are practically under the heels of the other one-hundredth; and though they toil from twelve to sixteen hours out of the twenty-four, they eke out, as a rule, a most miserable existence.

This is the rule in nearly all the countries of the globe. In countries where the climate and fertility of the soil indicate that men ought to be able to make a good living by toiling six hours per day, in fact, though they put in double that amount of time, they barely secure a pitiful subsistence. The truth is, though it is claimed there is less slavery in the world than ever before, the world is still rife with it, and perhaps the worst slavery of all is the slavery of the many to the few, the slavery of labor to capital.

Let us look over the condition in our own country, which for many reasons should be the most prosperous country upon which the sun shines. Here society is divided into four classes. The first is the very rich, who as a rule hav never earned a dollar of the wealth they possess, and perhaps hav never done an honest day's work in their lives. Some of these in the course of a lifetime hav accumulated a hundred millions of dollars, which would be sufficient to giv two hundred thousand comfortable homes, with the means of securing an honest livelihood.

The second class embraces farmers, traders, manufacturers, and mechanics, who know neither poverty nor riches, who by faithful toil are able to secure the comforts of life.

The third class covers the great army of toilers, who work by the day, week, or month, for as small a sum as their moneyed masters are able to obtain their services for. These generally own but little property, and though they toil faithfully they can only hope to secure a moderate livelihood. If sickness visits them and they are unable to pursue their daily toil, their income at once stops, and deprivation and suffering are consequent.

In the fourth class are the paupers, tramps, criminals, and those who will not work on any consideration, and who would not cause the world any loss, for all the good they do, should they starve to death.

The first class are the robbers and the thieves of the world. They obtain that in unlimited quantities to which they hav no real right and which they hav never earned. The wealth of the world, like the air, the water, and the soil, is the natural heritage of all; and he who grasps and takes to himself an unlimited amount of that which belongs to all is simply a robber and should be treated as a robber.

It is indeed a serious question as to what shall be the remedy for this tendency to the enormous accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few. To such a pass has this accumulation come that it is no uncommon thing for these wholesale robbers to seize ten millions of dollars per year, an income sufficient for ten thousand men. And sometimes by giving the financial machinery an extra turn, a million, or half a million, is made in a few hours.

Is this great wrong to continue, and is there no remedy for it? Shall we all tamely sit with our thumbs in our mouths and let the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, and the Rothschilds thus swing the lash over our heads and make us even fall before the wheels of their golden chariots? So long as the people suffer this outrage to be perpetrated, so long will it continue. If the public will quietly let these robbers still o'erload their safes and treasuries with the wealth which belongs to the people, the conscienceless criminals will continue to seize all they can grasp.

The remedy is to make it undesirable to be the owner of such vast wealth. No one man should own more than one hundred thousand dollars' worth of property, and when more than this is acquired it should be heavily taxed, increasing the rate of taxation with the increase of wealth. The excessivly rich should be excessivly taxed. Capital, and not labor, should be made to sustain the expenses of state and national government. A new system of taxation should be adopted, and it should be so graduated that the more wealth a man has stolen the heavier taxes he should pay. This is but simple justice, and the people of the country should hav the intelligence, the courage, and the firmness to carry it out. The people hav it entirely in their power to effect this if they will only act in concert and are true to themselvs and each other. They are the creators of the law-making power, and it rests wholly with them whether this great reform shall be inaugurated. Let it be hoped that the people of America will hav the intelligence to look this matter squarely in the face, and hav the determination to see that justice is done.

Reduction of Price—New Subscribers.

We must confess up to this time we hav been somewhat disappointed in the zeal our friends manifest in sending in the names of new subscribers—or rather a want of zeal. By reducing the price of the paper to really less than cost, we expected considerable interest would be manifest in sending in the names of new patrons. Every reader of the paper has a direct interest in having the price as low as possible, and if this price is kept low the circulation must be increased. This is almost a self-evident proposition.

We will be glad if every friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER will exert himself to extend its circulation. To encourage this effort, we hav offered what we consider some generous premiums. When a paper is sent out at less than cost, it cannot be expected that much commission can be given. The following premiums are all we feel able to offer. And right here we must say that if the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER is kept at $2.50 per year, the number of patrons must be greatly increased. To secure the premiums offered, we expect a good long list of subscribers' names sent in.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

To all new yearly subscribers we will send the paper to January, 1884, for the price of the next year, viz: $2.50. At this cheap rate, it would seem that many can be induced to subscribe.

And to encourage our present subscribers to make a little effort, we offer the following premiums:

To the one obtaining the most names for a year's subscription, at the above rate, we will present a set of Chambers's Cyclopedia, in 15 vols.; price, $15.

To the one sending in the next largest list, we will present a copy of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary or a set of Dickens's works, as may be preferred. Value of each set, $12; or any other works of the same price.

To the one sending in the next largest number, we will present a copy of Shakspere's Complete Works, bound in morocco and gold, large quarto edition, worth $6; or any other works of the same value.

These are good, substantial premiums, well worth working for. Chambers's Cyclopedia (now called People's Library of Universal Knowledge) was originally published for $30. The Dickens's Works was published originally for $22.50; and this edition of Shakspere is the same sold throughout the country by canvassers for from $10 to $12. They are all books of enduring worth.

This offer will remain open till March next, and should be the means of adding many new friends to what many Liberals are pleased to call the best Liberal paper published. We trust our friends will see that we do not hav send out these premiums for insufficient consideration. Let all good truth seekers exert themselvs to make THE TRUTH SEEKER list grow.

Christian Influences.

A great deal is said about the sweet and ennobling influences of Christianity, and of its wonderful power in elevating men and women from the low plane where birth placed them. But when particular cases are investigated it quite as often turns out that a profession of Christianity makes people not only arrant hypocrits, but also low and vulgar. One of our city dailies states that "it has been said that Gen. Booth, of the Salvation Army, is very much of a gentleman, and that his wife is a highly-cultured lady. The effect of associating with such remarkable enthusiasts as those who compose the army has shown itself in Mrs. Booth's style of writing. In an essay on 'Right-hearted People,' she says: 'I believe devils are sitting in council over us every day. The devil has never had such a stewing since he was cast out of heaven.' This may be forcible, and possibly even true; yet nobody will call it elegant. However, it is quite as refined as anything else in the issue of the War Cry in which it appears. That paper says: 'Hell's mouth is wide open.' 'The Hallelujah lasses beat the tambourine. Anything to beat the devil.'"

A belief in a system of religion that depends upon a malicious devil to carry out the behests of a still more malicious God is well calculated to engender crude and most erroneous notions. The system can assuredly be well spared from the world.

Joseph Cook.

This blatant, slanderous, false, and semi-insane individual, it appears, has once more touched American soil, and for a week has been bloviating in California towns, boasting of the number of his books that hav been sold, and the proof that is thereby afforded to the world of the truth of the Jesus system of religion. But really his noisy monthings contain but little for an intelligent and candid man to listen to. He is nothing else but a villainous, lying blatherskite. His great effort is to show that there is a close connection between Jesus and science. His entire effort is to sustain a falsehood. Jesus knew no more about science than a ten-year-old boy; and every time Joseph Cook attempts to show to the contrary he simply attempts to hold up a lie. Darwin spoke the truth when he said "there is no connection between Christ and science," and one word from him is worth ten thousand from the arrogant, boastful, slanderous, lying, ungentlemanly, swinish Joseph Cook.

Much For Little.

We hav on hand a goodly number of Volumes I. and II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, published in 1874 and 1875, the same securely bound in good paper covers. The first volume is a monthly, and the second a semi-monthly. Volume 1. contains 160 pages, and Volume II. 256 pages.

We are disposed to send these out to friends who wish them at a trifle above the postage. We will send Vol I. for 25 cents, and Vol. II. for 50 cents They contain a large amount of reading matter, and are worth nearly ten times the amount asked for them. They also are worth not a little to show what THE TRUTH SEEKER was in the first and second years of its existence. Let those who wish to secure these volumes not fail to make their wants known.

Christian Misrepresentation

Is one of the most common qualities met with in our time. Misrepresentation, aspersion, and ostracism seem to be as natural to the current system of religion as its own existence. When one acts upon his honest convictions and endeavors to show that the system is false—not what it purports to be—is not of divine origin, he at once becomes the mark for the most pointed animosity, slander, and abuse. If one presumes to show that any great man was an unbeliever in the system, he is at once hunted down, pursued, spitefully used, and all manner of things said of him falsely. All the dogs, little and big, mangy and lousy, will yelp after him and do all they can to cast disgrace upon him.

These reflections are called out by the vile course that has been pursued toward W. H. Herndon, Esq., of Springfield, Ill., formerly law partner of Abraham Lincoln, and who published to the world that Lincoln was an unbeliever in the Christian system, or, in other words, an Infidel, as the term is understood. We hav received the following letter from Mr. Herndon:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Nov. 20, 282.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Inclosed is a card of mine which I hav been compelled in self-defense to publish. I said from 1866 to 1882 that Mr. Lincoln was an Infidel. I said it, wrote it, and published it; and I now repeat it to you. Since those years I think I hav been the best abused little man in America. I am simply a private citizen, and yet the Christian people and press still grind out their libels simply because I told the truth. Please read, and, if you can, will you be so kind as to publish it in your excellent TRUTH SEEKER? If you cannot publish the whole please simmer it down, and giv me a good little editorial, and for which I shall be under a thousand obligations to you.

Your friend, WM. H. HERNDON.

A CARD AND A CORRECTION.

I wish to say a few words to the public and private ear. About the year 1870 I wrote a letter to F. E. Abbot, then of Ohio, touching Mr. Lincoln's religion. In that letter I stated that Mr. Lincoln was an Infidel, sometimes bordering on Atheism, and I now repeat the same. In the year 1873 the Right Rev. James A. Reed, pastor and liar of this city, gave a lecture on Mr. Lincoln's religion, in which he tried to answer some things which I never asserted, except as to Lincoln's Infidelity, which I did assert, and now and here affirm. Mr. Lincoln was an Infidel of the radical type; he never mentioned the name of Jesus, except to scorn and detest the idea of miraculous conception. This lecture of the withered minister will be found in Holland's Review. I answered this lecture in 1874, I think, in this city to a large and intelligent audience—had it printed and sent a copy to Holland, requesting, in polite language that he insert it in his Review, as an answer to the Reed lecture. The request was denied me, as a matter of course. He could help to libel a man with Christian courage, and with Christian cowardice refuse to unlibel him.

Soon thereafter, say from 1874 to 1882, I saw floating around in the newspaper literature such charges as "Herndon is in the lunatic asylum, well chained," "Herndon is a pauper," "Herndon is a drunkard," "Herndon is a vile Infidel and a knave, a liar and a drunkard," and the like. I hav contradicted all these things under my own hand often, except as to my so-called Infidelity, Liberalism, free religious opinions, or what-not. In the month of October, 1882, I saw in and clipped out of the Cherryvale Globe-News of Sept., 1882, a paper published in the state of Kansas, the following rich and racy article. It is as follows:

LINCOLN'S OLD LAW PARTNER A PAUPER.

Bill Herndon is a pauper in Springfield, Ill. He was once worth considerable property. His mind was the most argumentativ of any of the old lawyers in the state, and his memory was extraordinary.

For several years before Lincoln was nominated for the presidency, Herndon was in some respects the most activ member of the firm, preparing the greatest number of cases for trial and making elaborate arguments in their behalf.

It is said that he worked hard with Lincoln in preparing the memorable speeches delivered by the man who afterward became president, during the debates between Lincoln and Douglas in 1858, and in constructing the Cooper Institute address delivered by Lincoln a short time before the war.

Herndon, with all his attainments, was a man who now and then went on a spree, and it was no uncommon thing for him to leave an important lawsuit and spend several days in drinking and carousing. This habit became worse after Lincoln's death, and, like poor Dick Yates, Herndon went down step by step till his old friends and associates point to him as a common drunkard.

There are three distinct charges in the above article. First that I am a pauper; second, that I am a common drunkard and third, that I was a traitor, or false to my clients. Let me answer these charges in their order. First, I am not a pauper, never hav been, and expect never to be. I am working on my own farm, making my own living with my own muscle and brain, a place and a calling that even Christianity with its persecution and malignity can never reach me to do me much harm. I had, it is true, once a considerable property, but lost much of it in the crash and consequent crisis of 1873, caused in part by the contraction of the currency, in part by the decline in the demand for agricultural products which I raised for sale, in part by the inability of the people to buy, etc., and for no other reasons. Second, I never was a common drunkard, as I look at it, and am not now. I am and hav been for years an ardent and enthusiastic temperance man, though opposed to prohibition by law, by any force or other choker. The time has not come for this. It is a fact that I once, years ago, went on a spree; and this I now deeply regret. It however is in the past, and let a good life in the future bury the past. I hav not fallen; I hav risen, and all good men and women will applaud the deed, always excepting a small, little, bitter Christian like the Right Rev. pastor and liar of this city, to whom I can trace some of the above charges. In my case this minister was an eager, itching libeler, and what he said of me is false—nay, a wilful lie. Third, I never was a traitor or untrue to my clients or their interests. I never left them during the progress of a trial or at other times for the causes alleged, drunkenness. I may hav crept—slid—out of a case during the trial because I had no faith in it, leaving Mr. Lincoln, who had faith in it, to run it through. My want of faith in the case would hav been discovered by the jury, and that discovery would hav damaged my client; and to save my client I dodged. This is all there is in it, and let men make the most of it.

Now let me ask a question. Why is all this libeling of me? I am a mere private citizen, hold no office, do not beg the good people to giv me one often. My religious ideas, views, and philosophy are to-day here unpopular. But wait. I will not deny my ideas, views, or philosophy for office or station or the applause of the unthinking multitude. I can, however, answer the above question. It (the libeling) is done because I did assert and affirm by oral language and by print that Mr. Lincoln was an Infidel, sometimes bordering on Atheism, and yet he was among the best, greatest, and noblest of mankind; he was a grand man. Why do not the Christians prove that Mr. Lincoln was an evangelical Christian, and thus prove me a liar? One of my friends, for whom I hav great respect, says that "Mr. Lincoln was a rational Christian because he believed in morality." Why not say Mr. Lincoln was a rational Buddhist, as Buddhism teaches morality? Why not say Lincoln was a rational Mohammedan? By the way, let me say here that I hav a profound respect for an earnest, manly, and sincere Christian or an Atheist, a profound respect for an earnest, manly, and sincere Infidel or Theist, or any other religion, or the men who hold it, when that belief is woven into a great manly character to beautify and greaten the world.

These charges, and I do not know how many more, nor of what kind, hav been scattered broadcast all over the land, and hav gone into every house, hav been read at every fireside, till the good people believe them—believe that I am nearly as mean as a little Christian, and all because I told the truth and stand firm to my convictions.

Respectfully,
Springfield, Ill., Nov. 9, 1882. W. H. HERNDON.

W. S. Bell's "Liberty and Morality."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Like yourself, I listened, at the Watkins Convention last August, with deep interest to a part of Mr. Bell's lecture, which he has since thrown into pamphlet form, entitled "Liberty and Morality."

If the Radicals of this country were an organized army Mr. Bell would be assigned to the artillery, for when he trains his gun on the citadel of superstition you may expect to see the dust and splinters fill the air. In his new pamphlet he proves himself to be a master of the logical method, and is not afraid of results; and I well remember, when hearing him at Watkins, that I felt that his address ought to be printed and circulated far and wide among the people so as to correct the false ideas on the subject of disciplin which hav been engendered by the church.

As Mr. Bell wrote his lecture before the second great uprising of the American people, I can easily see how the storms of October and November, by purifying the political atmosphere, would make him, as well as our late illustrious visitor, Herbert Spencer, feel more hopeful concerning the republic, and corroborate the sentiments of Mr. Bell's lecture.

I understand that Mr. Bell contemplates re-visiting the West on a lecturing tour. If the Radicals of that section of country wish to employ one who finishes the work he undertakes to do in a workmanlike manner, Mr. Bell is the man for them.

Respectfully, A. B. BRADFORD.

Our London Letter

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The church congress at Derby met, talked a great deal, and dissolved, with the blissful satisfaction that they had regenerated mankind and put everything straight for another year. But as on various matters discussed the assembly was not always unanimous, it is highly probable that the Holy Ghost did not descend upon these modern apostles, and no doubt they would hav been surprised, not to say greatly frightened, if cloven tongues as of fire had dropped on them.

The proceedings commenced with a speech on the benefits done to the world by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, which it appears has been in existence 181 years. This society seems chiefly organized for the purpose of creating colonial bishops, who mostly liv in England, as the circles in which they would hav to move in their own dioceses are scarcely congenial to their tender organizations.

It appears that God is president of the society, but as he only givs his name the expenses hav to be met by the believers on earth, and the income has been dropping off somewhat lately, so the faithful had to be stirred up in the usual manner.

Although we are assured by some of the clergy that the "church of Christ" is making rapid headway, and no doubt they wish to believe such is the case, yet others of them are bound to confess that the reverse is the case, if they can judge by the numbers attending churches and chapels. The bishop of Liverpool dolefully admits that "the working classes as a body are conspicuously absent from the public worship of God on Sundays. This state of things is eminently unsatisfactory; it endangers the very existence of the established church of England. We cannot do without the masses. The church, whose adherents are a minority in the land, will not be allowed to retain her endowments and her connection with the state in this age, and without the working classes our church is in a minority at any parliamentary election." You see, he has let the cat out of the bag. It is the endowments and parliamentary influence these humble disciples of the carpenter of Nazareth want. When the church was in the plenitude of its power, which of its members troubled about the masses, except to keep them in total bondage? But now they possess votes and are getting better educated, their value is discovered, and they are expected to be caught by the childish expedient of putting a little salt on their tails. I think the bishops are rather too late in the day to entrap the working man, and these soft words and piteous cries for help in their distress will scarcely compensate for ages of the direst oppression and tyranny.

The church men are not quite so pleased with the Salvation Army as they were. The latter are getting all the plunder, and, what is much more, sticking to it. They do not intend to cry "halves," and it is now discovered that they are not doing the Lord's work as was at first supposed. Instead of converting wicked Infidels they are converting those who are already in the fold. It is a case of wolf eating wolf. At the licensing sessions held a few days back, amongst the other publicans and sinners, appeared "General" Booth, who desired a renewal license for music and dancing at the Eagle Tavern and Grecian Theater just purchased by him, but as he declined to say what he intended doing with the dancing license they only gave him one for selling liquors. No doubt if he and his family serve behind the bar they will draw plenty of custom. He seems to hav made quite a good sum of money by selling tickets of admission to the marriage ceremony of his son, on whom the mantle of the prophet is to descend. I am curious to know what his next sensation will be, for now he has started he must keep this sort of thing up or the concern will fall to pieces sooner than he intends.

A serious accident has just occurred at Hanley, in one of the salvation halls. The flooring gave way, and many of the dupes were injured, some very severely, but I suppose this will be accounted as a blessing in disguise, one of the Lord's mysterious ways with his people, to test their faith. It is bound to be all for the best, somehow or other.

Canon Farrar has published a book recently on the early history of the church, and I should imagin from what little I hav seen of it that it must be rather an ingenious work. The writer has discovered that Nero was the antichrist and the beast spoken of in that zoological treatis known as the Revelation of St. John; the prophetical numbers came out all right, and everything else tallies, so no doubt it is all correct. It is some comfort to know that all the prophecies hav been fulfilled, all the vials poured out, and the trumpets blown, so we shall not hav it to go through, as other ignorant teachers want to make out. I myself am glad it is all over, but it was a great pity it was not all found out before, as it would hav relieved many of much anxiety. As all that disagreeable business is done with, Freethinkers may go on working without any fear of their efforts suddenly coming to an end before their task is completed. J. D.

The New Calendar.

We hav been requested to giv place to the following from the Investigator:

FRIEND SEAVER: Will you kindly allow me a little space in your next issue, because I find that my generosity to Mr. Wakeman concerning my 282 Freethought Calendar is being misconstrued, to my great injury, and is even making an enemy of a prominent New York Liberal, who would be a friend but for my large-heartedness in the matter, for I need not hav even mentioned Mr. Wakeman in connection with it, but shared the honor with him out of pure good will? Therefore I must now declare, for my own protection, that the credit I so freely giv friend Wakeman is wholly from courtesy and not of right, for until I proclaimed it at a public meeting in the Paine Memorial, neither he nor any other Liberal except myself had the slightest knowledge of a 282 Freethought Calendar, and consequently the assertion that it is Mr. Wakeman's Calendar is a mistake of the largest description.

As Brother Wakeman never originated a calendar at all, there cannot very well be "Bruno-Wakeman" Calendar, but there is a Hill-Wakeman or Liberal Calendar, originated, proclaimed, and started on its mission to humanity by myself alone; and in order that I may not hav to suffer wrong again on account of that last of all things for which persons should so suffer, namely, their kindness, I hav made this plain statement of fact, and ask Mr. Wakeman to verify it in your columns, so that I may no more be robbed in this manner.

Very truly yours, GEORGE N. HILL.

Boston, Mass., Nov. 10, 282, Anno Scientia.

P. S.—As I constructed this Calendar largely as a monument to the heroic Giordano Bruno, I hope that sooner or later all Liberals and their societies will embrace in full my idea in starting it, and will giv to science—for love of which Bruno so gallantly suffered death at the stake—the place it so surely deserves both in itself and for his sake as the head of our Freethought Calendar, using the letters A. S. (Anno Scientia, or Year of Science) in dating events since the old year, 1600, and the letters B. S. (Before Science) for those previous to that time, then indeed shall we liv in the "age of reason."

Yours, G. N. H.

[We presume Mr. Wakeman will not object to sharing with Mr. Hill the honor of proposing the new Calendar, and that neither Mr. Wakeman nor Mr. Hill knew that the other had proposed it at the time he proposed it. It only proves that two or more great minds often run in the same groove. The proposition to drop the bloody Era of the Lord and adopt the peaceful Era of Man is certainly a good one, no matter how many made it.—ED. T. S].

Where Shall We Find Liberal Wives?

What are we "Liberal" young men going to do for "Liberal" wives? You are aware there are fewer Liberal young ladies than young men, a least so it seems to me. It is something that causes me no little pain. For instance, I become acquainted with a nice young lady, well informed on most subjects, and who no doubt would make a good wife, and then find she is a firm believer in the Christian religion; what is to be done? As far as I am concerned, individually, I could bear it; but when I think of the darling little children (if so fortunate as to hav children) being taught to believe it, and I not allowed to read to them from THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other such publications, I just back right down, and say I will not marry until I find a "Liberal." H.

The first step toward making Liberal women is to make free women.

Giv woman the ballot—make her in all respects man's equal. Make her a responsible being. Make her feel that what she is depends on what she does, and what she is free to do. Let her mix and mingle with the world's workers, winning name, fame, and money of her own. Let her become self-supporting and self-owning. Let her stand side by side with man in every walk and line of life, and she will become as broad, wise, and cultured as only practical workers can.

It is ignorance that builds all our churches, and while women are tied to the kitchen and nursery, or kept as parlor ornaments and helpless dependents on man's bounty, they will be ignorant and superstitious, and gravitate to the church. Living as woman now does—almost wholly for her affections—sentimental, romantic, and self-sacrificing; yielding, pliant, and docil as a slave; she is a too willing tool in the hands of the priest. The religions are almost entirely "heistic," and it is a beautiful dream of romance for the woman who is so often starved for love to think of "falling into the arms of Jesus," and living and adoring him, and looking up with awe and reverential affection to her father—God. But this is an eminently practical age, and slowly are the chains one by one dropping from our sex, and as fast as the fetters fall do the freed thoughts seek truth and independent fields of action. Be ye not in haste, my Liberal brothers, to form ties that are lifelong. Pause and consider well ere you cement an endless partnership with one who loves her God, her savior, and her church more than she loves you. Be assured if she does, she will sacrifice you and your children to the deities she adores. Better to wait than to ruin all. Even though not a church-member, the girl reared among theologians, and ignorant of science, evolution, and all the great bed-rock philosophies, will be only too apt to be narrow, bigoted, and selfish. If she loves, it will be a selfish, craving love, asking all, and bending all to her own narrow ideas.

If there is no Liberal women in your immediate neighborhoods, it is well to advertise in our TRUTH SEEKER for correspondents of the kind you wish for; and when you hav formed an acquaintance in this way, then by careful personal interviews assure yourself that there is no peculiar idiosyncrasy or habit of any kind that will come between you two to make life unhappy. Trifles, when daily and hourly forced upon us, become mountains of misery.

Yet it is not to be expected any two individuals will ever think alike in all things, or be always willing to pull one way. So each must expect to bear and forbear. Be ye always kind, gentle, and courteous; always respectful, thoughtful, and charitable, one to the other; and then harmony and peace shall be yours. Should the little blind archer happen to shoot his arrows so as to link in true love a Liberal youth to a pious maiden, the twain must agree beforehand on a plan of life, each yielding somewhat, and agreeing to giv in where it will conduce to the mutual happiness of both. Perfect openness, perfect frankness, and pure love will make mountains of differences into mole-hills of indifference. Opposition, persistently and stubbornly indulged in, fosters all manner of evil propensities; but gentle, kind remonstrances and loving forbearance will smooth the pathway, and make pleasant almost all roads of life. Be cautious till the union is formed, then strive to blend, unite, and become equal halves of one perfect whole.

Are you the new person drawn toward me?
To begin with, take warning, I am surely far different from what you suppose.
Do you suppose you will find in me your ideal?
Do you think it so easy to hav me become your lover?
Do you think the friendship of me would become unalloyed satisfaction?
Do you think I am trusty and faithful?
Do you see no further than this facade, this smooth and tolerant manner of me?
Do you suppose yourself advancing on real ground toward a real heroic man?
Hav you no thought, O dreamer, that it may be all magic, illusion?—Whitman.

Words in Brief.

Success to you at the reduced price. But Liberal papers of limited circulation and without advertising patronage cannot be afforded at the rates upon which great metropolitan papers thrive. This fact seems to be unknown to the majority of Liberals.

Why is it that the generality of people call nothing indecent which does not in some way pertain to the sexual nature? Men who go into paroxysms of horror at sight of some of Walt Whitman's plain and robust truth take daily into their families papers burdened with the vilest language, falsehood, defamation, slander, prurient insinuation, the very spawn of political hate and reckless ambition. Political papers which murder good manners, crucify the truth, engender suspicion, destroy confidence in their neighbor's moral rectitude, and degrade and defile everything they handle, are read and handed to their wives and daughters by men who are righteously indignant when the sex organs and functions are nakedly mentioned by a fearless poet. Is nothing indecent but an honest statement concerning the parts and processes by which men and women are brought into the world. Whitman's poems are only indecent to those who hav not yet rid themselvs of the old mawkish idea of the natural, inherent vileness and carnality of sex. Mr. Hiller is a gentleman; I know him to be such, but feelings like those he manfests in his recent letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER will do more to keep alive our present degraded conception of these facts of sex life than all other agencies combined, while Whitman's noble candor will drive out of our hearts and lives the filthy mystery and unhealthful "don't-let-anybody-see" ism which are to-day the most blighting curses of our social life and of the race. Let us be done with monasticism. It has damned our fair world altogether too long now.

Let me say to our Liberal friends in the West and Southwest that Mr. W. S. Bell is soon coming this way on a lecturing tour. Those who hav read his "French Revolution," "Resurrection of Jesus," "New Age," and, last and best of all, "Liberty and Morality," need not to be told that Mr. Bell is a man of profound thought and wide research, a thoroughgoing Liberal, and a worthy representativ of the secular cause. He should be kept busily employed during the entire lecture season. Address him at 18 E. Springfield st., Boston, Mass.

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot understand why Mr. Heywood sold certain poems of Whitman's, for he says that he never has esteemed that gentleman as possessing an impure mind. This is assuming that those poems are obscene in intent or language, which assumption may fairly be questioned. But waving a consideration of this question for the time being, it is sufficient to say that Mr. Heywood had a motiv in advertising and mailing these leaflets—a motiv which Mr. Bennett should hav had no difficulty in discovering, for it was probably the same which induced Mr. Bennett to advertise and sell "Cupid's Yokes" after his arrest at Watkins. What that motiv was Mr. Bennett himself may be best able to say, but I do not doubt it was the one which he averred at the time that he sold the pamphlet—to vindicate his right to sell it, to establish more securely the right of printing and transmission through the mails. The motiv was a good one then for Mr. Bennett; and it is an equally good one now for Mr. Heywood. It was the same which made Mr. B. R. Tucker advertise to send "Leaves of Grass" through the mails or in any other way to whoever might desire to procure that work. If it be objected that the selection of certain poems, and printing and distributing them, apart from the work of which they formed a part, was indiscreet and an act of injustice to the book and its author, I then answer that the same objections apply to the action of Mr. Bennett in selecting certain passages from the Bible and publishing them in a separate volume entitled the "Holy Bible Abridged," afterwards sending this volume by mail and express to all parts of the country to whoever desired to possess it.

I myself think it was not quite an act of justice to Walt Whitman to do as Mr. Heywood has done in this instance, not because there is anything wrong in these interdicted poems—for I do not think there is—but for the reason that people who hav been reared in Christian lands are not generally competent judges of what is pure and true. But this was a matter purely between Mr. Whitman, or his publisher, and Mr. Heywood. It was something with which Comstock, the general and state governments, nor we hav anything to do. It was an outrage, this arrest of E. H. Heywood, and we hav but one duty in the premises, and that is to do all in our power to defend and sustain him.

All indications point to the fact that we hav reached a political crisis. Now, are we, as Liberals, prepared to profit by the general break-up? Can we hope to gain anything substantial from the accession of the Democracy to power? Is that party any more true to the fundamental principles of self-government than is the now prostrate Republican party? I think that, in some respects, it is; certainly it is so as regards the questions of protection and prohibition. But we can look to it for no earnest industrial reform work. E. C. WALKER.

Individual Sovereignty "Run Mad."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Feeling an interest in the discussion of the prohibition question, I wish to add a few words from a woman's standpoint. It is a home question which women ought to and will hav a voice in settling. Were I convinced that prohibition laws would rid this land of the curse of intemperance, with both voice and pen I should labor for the enactment and execution of such laws; not only that, but, pronounced Liberal as I am, were the Christians the only temperance reformers on that basis, I would unite my forces with theirs. As it is, I do not favor nor do I oppose prohibition; I am willing to hav the experiment tested. However, were I entirely satisfied that prohibitory measures were of no avail in checking the rum-ruin that is such a blight upon our civilization, I certainly should not oppose them on the ground that they are an invasion of the inalienable rights of man; and I am surprised that intelligent Liberals take that position. I believe in liberty and the rights of the individual to the uttermost bounds, short of infringement upon the rights of others. The whisky-seller and the whisky-buyer, every time and everywhere, infringe upon the rights of families and of society. Were the man who drinks the poison the only individual affected, I should hold my peace and let him drink unto his death, if he chose; but unfortunately the rum sellers and the rum-drinkers are the cause of untold wretchedness and unmeasured degradation to parents, brothers, sisters, wives, and children; and if they hav not the manhood and decency to refrain from such infringement upon the rights of others, they should, if possible, be prohibited from such wholesale wrecking of happiness and of homes. Not only that, but the sober and industrious portion of the community are taxed to support the inmates of jails and almshouses, who are there because of habits of intemperance, and to support beggars that are made such from the same cause. Are not the rights of individuals and of society infringed upon in being compelled to support the vast hordes that whisky-drinking reduces to abject poverty? Are not their rights infringed upon in being taxed in any way or for anything that whisky is responsible for? What nonsense—more, what rank injustice, to contend for the "inalienable right" of the seller to sell the poison that converts a man into a fiend, and of the drinker to become so debased and besotted as to be a curse to family and to society! Is it right for men to hav the legal or "inalienable" right to starve and freeze their children, and to make beggars and thieves of them? Justice and humanity forbid! Such men should be prohibited from doing wrong and violence, and from causing misery in their homes, just as dangerous lunatics are. They are no more fitted to be a law unto themselvs than the wildest madman that ever raved; and yet our Liberal friends who oppose prohibition on the ground of its being an invasion of man's inalienable rights, freely giv to the hardened rum-seller and to the debauched rum-drinker the right to trample upon the sacred rights of family and of society with the iron heel of despotism the most cruel. That is individual sovereignty with a vengeance, but all on the wrong side. It is plain to the common sense of all that no man has a just right to rob families of that which secures their health, comfort, and happiness; and those who contend that individuals hav the right to sell and to drink whisky, and that they should not be prohibited from doing either, guarantee to them the right to reduce families to starvation, beggary, and degradation. Most assuredly a free government has, or ought to hav, the right to use any compulsory measure that will stamp out such an unmitigated curse as intemperance, because it is self-evident that by so doing the rights and welfare of individuals, of families, and of society will be secured and maintained. The only question that requires solution is, What measures will successfully attain that end? Right generation and right education are, without doubt, the true methods of prevention and cure of all the evils that corrupt our social and moral life. Science, together with an enlarged human sense of justice, will finally grapple and solve the problems which now puzzle philosopher and philanthropist. But just here and now—just at this turn of the wheel of evolution—education alone cannot be made effectiv to uplift all, or to stay the overwhelming tide of intemperance that is bearing millions down to a doom of degradation. We might as well talk to the winds as to attempt to educate the conscienceless whisky-sellers and the habitual whisky-drinkers out of the bondage of their appetites for gain and for drink. Meanwhile the begetting of children goes on in the wretched homes of these inebriates, whose blood and brains are poisoned. By the law of heredity these unwelcome babes are born with the appetites of their drunken fathers, and are destined to follow the same paths downward to destruction. Oh, if it is possible, help the helpless by prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks. Let the government deprive men of their right to do that which degrades and destroys not only themselvs, but, what is infinitly worse, degrades their families. It is a just and saving restriction on individual liberty that prohibits man from bringing degradation to his children and to his fellow-man. The ruin and anarchy that everywhere attend and follow the demon of intemperance are a thousandfold more to be dreaded than any possible "invasion of inalienable rights" that may result from prohibitory measures against the liquor traffic. ELVIRA WHEELOCK.

Janesville, Wis.

"Liberta" Wrestled With.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I noticed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 28th an article headed "Crush the Rum Traffic," by "Liberta," though what that may be I never could find out. It is not to one's advantage to shoot at those under cover. Giv us an open antagonist—one we can see and know, every time. A more inappropriate name than "Liberta" could hardly be found for one who it seems has imbibed, if not the rum, the idea of our Puritan fathers (altering the terms) "coming here and not drinking, and making everybody do the same!" What is the use of being a Liberal if he is to be so illiberal—nay, bigoted? I hav read several "broadsides" from this same source. One writer regrets that Mr. E. C. Walker, so able a man, does not countenance and espouse the prohibition movement. It is too bad; but the fact is that Mr. Walker is opposed to all kinds of tyranny, and is activly at work breaking it down. Perhaps we should hav a law for everything, almost. We should by law be compelled, under penalty of five years in a "Christian institution," to use only Colgate's soap. We should be compelled to use only a certain (by law prescribed) make of clothes, certain food, drink, fuel, furniture; in short, there should be safeguards thrown all around us fallible mortals. What a mighty poor cause it must be that requires the help of law to make people see its justice! I hav talked with Prohibitionists, and am in daily contact with them, but not a solitary argument can I get out of them, except that they want to make the laws, not for themselvs, mind you, but for others. They want to reform somebody else, and never mind their own ginblossomed noses! One of these red-nosed reformers said once in a prayer-meeting that "John Butler took me by the hand and lifted me out of the gutter;" and who do you suppose he thanked for the humane act? Why, God!

Dear Libby, did you ever go back of your blind fanaticism and find the causes that lead men into being drunkards? I am afraid not. But go to some homes (to all outside appearances happy ones); look behind the curtain, and you will see a woman (judging by her dress) and a number of little ones; her gown tattered and dirty, her hair disheveled, and her face and bare arms begrimed with dirt, continually snarling at and abusing the children, who hav the same appearance. The husband comes home from an industrious day's toil, and he is welcomed to his "family" with a frown, and perhaps hard words; and the sights and sounds tear his manhood to pieces. And where does he go? He is driven into a "rum-hole," as you would be pleased to call it. There he meets with no frowning face, no upbraiding, but, if so inclined, comfort and peace. He can sit down without molestation and read before a cheerful fire. This man is perhaps tired of life—but still it is dear to us all—and he begins his career of slow poisoning, which so blunts his feelings as to make him impregnable to his "dear wife's" abuse and the sights around him.

You will say, of course, this is mere twaddle; or, if I call it a real incident, that I lie; and that, perhaps, would be the best refutation you could offer. I infer from your answer to the Christians that all evils are the result of rum, and the picture you draw is indeed beautiful. "Happy families and homes," indeed! and replace "the mighty structures religion has built" with "Liberty, morality [do you mean Christian morality?], intelligence, and temperance." Do you mean by liberty that we should be free to do as you please? You are not willing to let us enjoy what little liberty we hav. How, then, can we talk of liberty? I hav not yet seen in all I hav read from your pen any opposition to vice societies, etc.; and from your latest, I should judge you were Liberty's sworn enemy; and, as you want to prohibit, you can't talk of temperance any more than you can accuse a man of intemperance in eating when he has nothing to eat. What is the use of temperance in drinking when you would "prohibit" all drink? Temperance is very good, and if Prohibitionists would only apply a little of it to their zeal for making people good, by law, it would be still better.

When you suggest "co-operation with Christians" the cause of prohibition must be weak and undeserving. I was never aware that anything that ever came contact in with Christianity could retain enough good to champion.

No, "Liberta;" hav your opinion, and also by tongue and pen promulgate your views, but don't call to your aid laws. But do you for a moment suppose that I would, if I had the power, deprive the Christian of his bread and wine? I simply don't want them to make laws for me as long as I don't interfere with their liberties. I would write and vote against oppression, whether of Christian or pagan! The saddest thing of all is that Liberals, in their desire to do good, saddle upon themselvs, unwittingly, oppression in many forms under a cloak of virtue and morality. Yours for liberty to do right,

G. GUNNESON.

HUMANITY AND THE PROGRESS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW. By Edward W. Searing. Price 25 cents. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

This is a very interesting and instructing essay. The growth of international law is the growth of a true civilization; for it is the expression of the universal relations of man. Man must advance as a social individual; must learn to liv together; and the great problem is to preserve liberty and at the same time build up society. It must be recognized that there is one great life in humanity, and it is through the harmony of this life with the individual effort that the amplest progress is attained.

The object of Grotius was to show the community of sentiment which flows from the natural law of morality. He laid the foundations of conduct not upon metaphysical or theological principles, but upon our common humanity.

International law can only be enforced by moral sanctions. Hence it must be thoroughly committed to personal liberty, and assert its authority by reason alone.

Mr. Searing has given us a thoughtful and scholarly essay on this important subject. He has furnished a very complete historic view of this principle of human brotherhood. He shows that its life comes not from the "will of God" but from the will of man. It has grown in spite of theology. Liberals will derive much profit from reading this compact presentation of law in its noblest aspects, freeing itself from mere brute force and becoming a moral power, acting through the consent of man and not upon his fears. The author shows himself a thorough student and intelligent interpreter of history.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Hacker and Tuttle.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: I've been wondering if some of you might not misunderstand my motiv in pleading for Tuttle while Garwood pleads for Hacker. I only intended to show you that we were in a friendly rivalry, each trying to collect all we could. Now I want every one to help Hacker just as much as if I was not working for Tuttle—to not giv Hacker less, only Tuttle more. We all need to be more liberal to both. Besides my twenty-five cents a month, I've sent each of them a dollar's worth of our publications this week, and hope you will each and all do all you can for both the old couples. ELMINA.

BOONTON, N. J., Nov. 13, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50 from your good old friend, Philip Wootton, in payment for the fourth volume of the Round-the-World books. Mr. Wootton (my father-in-law) is in his seventy-eighth year, and has been confined to his bed and room ten long weeks, but now, I am happy to say, is slowly and gradually improving. He is greatly interested in your welfare, and his one wish is that you may succeed in your grand work, and that you may receive the reward you so richly deserve.

Yours respectfully, N. A. MYERS.

VICTORIA, B. C., Oct. 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5, for which please continue to send me THE TRUTH SEEKER. I intend to continue taking your highly appreciated paper, having been among the first to take it when a resident of Cawker City, Kansas.

I called at your office last winter when on my way home from a visit o England. I was disappointed in not meeting you, but Mr. Fell of our city met you in San Francisco, and he has almost made me acquainted with you. Trusting you are well after your long travel, and your circulation increasing, I remain, Truly yours, WM JENSEN.

LACENTER, MICH., Oct. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Freethinker to the heart's core. I am living in an orthodox nest; hav always been surrounded by its baneful influence; hav passed through many great mental struggles to throw off its shackles, but hav finally—thanks to the teachings of science and philosophy—become perfectly free from its influence. I think as little of it as Ingersoll does. I wish to be known as a Liberal everywhere. May truth and charity reign in our minds till man will no longer persecute for creed's sake. I hav been despised because I would not be led by its teachings and adopt its practices. I believe in Freethinkers exerting their influence in favor of each other. Please circulate my name as a Liberal. OSCAR PARKER.

BRUNSWICK, ME, Nov. 16. 282.

MR. EDITOR: I should hav written immediately on receipt of the last TRUTH SEEKER (for of course we want the other book), but I did hope to get one subscriber, especially since you hav put down the price so low, but it seems impossible among these godly people. for they seem afraid if they look away from that holy Bible for a moment the other fellow will be after them. I hav been trying to get you a subscriber ever since I hav taken the paper. I hav loaned mine, and sent it into the country in hopes to interest people, that they might take it, but thus far hav not been successful, so will wait no longer but inclose a post-office order of $1.50. Meanwhile I shall keep trying for subscribers. With warm regards to all the household, I am. Truly yours,

MRS J. G. COLLINS.

MODESTO, CAL., Oct. 2, A.I., 106.

MR. EDITOR: I heartily agree with you in the grand and noble principles of Liberalism, and shall continue to patronize you by subscribing again for your paper when my time is out. I hope you will meet with abundant success in conquering the enemies of Freethought and universal mental liberty. I fully agree with Dr. J. L. York that you are the chief of all writers of this age or any other. I hav been highly entertained by the perusal of your letters, written while on a tour round the globe. Your letters bear unmistakable evidence of close observation and truthfulness in detail. As a benefactor, you hav reached the highest pinnacles of glory obtainable by man; that is, releasing from bondage and superstition thousands of your fellow-men and women. May you reap a rich reward! Yours for all truth,

C. C. LUTHER.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Nov. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Honor to whom honor is due. Allow me to say that I am a Spiritualist, and, I hope, a Liberalist as well, and seeing the illiberal spirit manifested by some of each class, I was more than pleased with your article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, No. 44, entitled "Materialism versus Spiritualism." You hav thrown more light on that subject than I ever saw before. Giv us more Materialists of the same stamp. Your idea of Spiritualism will do for me. Let me say to you I believe you hav mediumistic power, for no person could perform the mental and physical labor that you did in your round-the-world trip without it. No man has done more or a better work. I admire your justice, humanity, and clear vision. No matter whether you believe in one god, or a whole set of gods, or none at all, you are not far from the kingdom. May you liv long and be happy is the wish of Your friend, L. S. BURDICK.

BENWOOD, W. VA, Nov. 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad you made the trip around the world, and that your letters were so well appreciated by your readers. I see there is a regular little war going on in THE TRUTH SEEKER at present between Materialists and Spiritualists. Let them go. They will not hurt each other much so long as they both prove as little as they hav been doing lately. I incline to a belief in a future existence and an overruling intelligence in nature. There is order and adaptation in nature that cannot be accounted for (so far as I am able to conceive) without admitting an intelligent cause, but I certainly do not know, neither do I know that there is a future existence, but the weight of evidence that has been presented to my mind on the subject favors it. There is one thing I do firmly believe, however, and that is that the wisest and most learned man living (whoever he may be) does not begin to know how much he does not know. CHAS. BURSEE.

NEWPORT, ME., Nov. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is 9 o'clock in the morning, and I hav done four hours of productiv work, all that one ought to do in a day if we had a true state of society. I hav not been sitting in a nicely-furnished office, in an easy-chair, concocting some villainous scheme to get my food without first producing it. No, I am a farmer and a mechanic, and do not liv on another's labor. It is a motto with me that, "He that does not first produce that which he is about to consume has no right to anything to consume; and if he consumes that which he has not first produced he consumes that which is not his, and therefore is a thief."

If the above is true—and it will not be disputed—all who get their living by proxy, such as bankers, brokers, usurers, or money-lenders, lawyers, doctors, rent-takers, speculators, every officer and soldier in the army and navy, besides a host of others too numerous to mention, are all drones in the hive of humanity—all non-producers, and therefore thieves.

Your best friend on this earth,

SEWARD MITCHELL.

NEW YORK, Nov. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: "Man proposes but God disposes," shouts the Herald in its account of the Park Theater fire. In other words, God fired the building.

According to this the Herald's god put the torch to nearly five hundred theaters the last century. Between the years '71 and '78 this God committed arson at the rate of thirteen times yearly.

On Dec. 5, 1876, Jehovah (if the Herald is right) set fire to the Brooklyn Theater. He then stood and looked on.

How his heart must hav bounded with joy when saw nearly three hundred men and women go down to cinders and ashes!

Were the shrieks of women, the groans of men, music in his ears? Is this the way he proves his assertion that "his loving kindness is over all his works?" What more could we expect of a being who once murdered a world?—of a god who gave woman when pure to savages to ravish? When impure ordered her run through with a sword, her children butchered, her home burnt? Ring down the curtain on such a God. Hate, scorn, defiance are all I hav for such a being. To me his heaven is hell, his hell is heaven. WM. W. FOSTER.

POMEROY, W. T., Oct. 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send two dollars to pay subscription for the year. There is much other reading matter under your charge, besides THE TRUTH SEEKER, that I would like to hav, but I must wait with patience till better times. I shall expend more in the glorious cause of Infidelity as soon as I can spare it. I am an Englishman by birth, coming to this country when 17 years of age, with eight other children. We were raised under the rule of Wesley Methodism. I had always lived in terror until I listened to a debate between Universalists and Methodists, when I laid all my foolish and idolatrous beliefs aside, and am now, I hope, safe within the harbor of Infidelity. I feel that your paper is doing an immeasurable amount of good, and I hope your success will be permanent. If every man and woman throughout the length and breadth of the land would take and carefully read THE TRUTH SEEKER, Christianity would soon totter and fall.

Yours forever, HENRY HENDER.

WESTFIELD, N. Y., Nov. 12, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.50 for renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Now, if you please, a few words on the situation. Although over eighty years in my present form, each year has strengthened my conviction long entertained, that the elements represented in heat and cold underlie all existence, and their interchange by expansion and contraction the source of motion and consequent life, and that it is impossible to get back of these elements, and find a law or being that is independent of them; that all forms are combinations of these elements, and the same law of combination that makes higher numbers from lower ones, making higher grades of being by combination, of lower ones and as in numbers so in forms, the reversion of the rule, the reaction balancing the action, the only proof of correctness, and making two sides an absolute necessity to all grades of being. The interchanging relation of these two sides is fully demonstrated in the roots and tops of each and all grades of vegetable life. The top an outgrowth from the roots, the roots derived from a former top, each hid from the other, and still each born of the other, and this interchange an absolute necessity to each and all vegetables, the top positiv and the roots negativ, or, if you please, the spirit and matter of vegetable life. As the animal, with man at the head of animal life, is an outgrowth from the vegetable, why not subject to the same organic laws? Why not the same interchanging relations exist between the visible animal and to us invisible counterpart that exists between the roots and top of the vegetable, or the heat and cold of the elements? or why not the same system of worlds that exist to-day, coexistent with the elements of which they are combinations and subject to the same laws of production and reproduction, as their constituted parts or outgrowths? That positiv and negativ elements are interchanging, no matter what form they exist in, would seem as evident as that night and day are. Hoping this question may be thoroughly canvassed before being consigned to the waste-basket, I remain, Yours truly, J. TINNEY.

CATHLAMET, W. T., Oct. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Your postal card came duly to hand, and contents noted.

What a profound mystry life is, after all! Who amongst us can solve it in its entirety? Take for instance your reminder for the needful, necessary to sustain us in exposing the truth. Something much more pleasant every way arrived at than that antagonistic thereto, and which one would naturally expect to be free as the atmosphere. "Freely hav ye received, freely giv," was the injunction of an ancient reformer. Neither do we read of him, or any that were with him, passing around the ladle before or after they had supplied the multitudes with their savory, or otherwise, tenets. So far from that, discovering their bread-baskets were empty, they set to work and filled them. How they managed will take considerable more faith than I possess to explain, taking into account their own impoverished statement. Yet, from their great grief on finding Alexander the coppersmith had established himself in business in their vicinity, we would be apt to infer "that it is not all gold that glitters." However, my impression is that you hav not yet discovered their business secret, although you contemplate in 1883 a step in that direction. Then who knows but a few years hence will find you not only supplying the mental provender but the physical also, when it is to be sincerely hoped you will hav no occasion to censure any of your disciples on account of their stomachs. But, to be brief, inclosed please find your just dues for another term, and for which should I hav to take in a reef, I mean to continue ad infinitum, for without THE TRUTH SEEKER my declining days, I fear, would become a void. Nothwithstanding your several critical exposures while on your round-the-world tour, I am at length happy in being able to congratulate you on your safe arrival once more amongst us, for the continuance of which may your most ardent desires be fully realized, Comstock, Cook, and their entire gang to the contrary notwithstanding. Yours truly, H. A. ELLIOT.

HOME, Sept. 8, 282.

MR. EDITOR: At last retributiv justice has been meted! I am tardy in expressing to you my gratitude for your rejoinder to the Bundy-Abbot-Underwood abuse of the past. I left home August 18th, just before THE TRUTH SEEKER containing said article came to hand, and since my return my dear mother of 77 years, and a good brother from Cleveland, O., hav been with us; and you can better imagin the receptions, dinners, etc., that hav held carnival than I can detail in the narration. A lull has come, and I embrace the same to tell you of my disgust for the meanness of the trio above mentioned, and to assure you that the same has aided mightily in enthroning you in my esteem and love, for I always find my heart enlisted for those unjustly assailed. The villainy of those conspirators put the blush to villainy itself!

The article you referred to, which appeared in advance sheets of the Chicago Times, as also in the Cleveland dailies—where I was then living—bore such venom in every line, a fair-minded person could not fail to detect the enmity, spleen, hate, and deceit which prompted the same and actuated the writer.

Behold the haste to rush before the public The "agent" or assistant editor of R.-P. Journal could not wait till the weekly issue of that journal, as also of the Boston Index, but the slander was foisted in the dailies of our great Western cities, and when the time came for the tardy weeklies to vomit their spleen and hate thousands of extra copies were sent broadcast over the land. Though I had ceased to take the Religio, and had never been a subscriber for the Index, still both papers were mailed to my address in Cleveland—which could only hav been obtained from your stolen mail-list, or from my letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER. So great was my chagrin on first reading the contemptible falsehood, mingled with venom, feigned innocence, etc., that several times I dashed the unclean, poisoned sheet to the floor, and felt that only Col. Ingersoll's pen was capable of inditing cutting sarcasm suited to the occasion. Determined to know the vile depths of their venom and hate, I took up the leprous sheet, each time spurned, and read it through. The next impulse was to remail it to the publishers, to send the unclean thing back to its source, or to let the fire consume it. Further reflection counseled to save it as a living tablature on the monument of contempt reared to "cussed meanness."

I just paused, took from their "niche" the R.-P. Journal of October 25th, 1879, and the Index of October 30th, 1879, glanced over the salient points marked, and to my mind came "How hav the mighty fallen; they who sit in high places shall be laid low." The inappropriateness of the application is evident; this trio were never mighty nor highly enthroned in position or in the hearts of the people, while he whom they thought and aimed to crush out has won a world-wide fame, is the honored guest of the honored of all lands, and enshrined in the hearts of tens of thousands, and revered and loved by all who knew him best—fulfilling the truism:

And ever the truth come uppermost,
And ever is justice done.

It seems no wonder that the clergy and their followers and supporters would be glad to hav their gods let alone, for as they are enlightened (more or less), the absurdity of a sky-ruler must be apparent and smack wonderfully of the mythology of Jupiter, Osiris, and all the ancient gods. To these 75,000 priests of our country gods mean bread, butter, elegant houses, kid gloves, soft hands, and the combined sympathy and support of the "sisters." How now about the "beastly persistency," "the name of purity and liberty," etc.? The same old truth is taught us, that they who are pure, who love and practice the same, hav no need to blazon their love of the same to the world. As in the fable, the ass's ears are sure to disclose the animal concealed beneath.

We shall be glad if the time ever comes that the gods and god-ideas no longer challenge to battle that unprincipled men shall not publicly assail, through enmity, those born to loftier deeds, nobler resolves, highter attainments—that our workers may uninterruptedly pursue their labor of emancipation, of regeneration by proper generation, of construction rather than destruction. We hav a distaste for dirty work, but while dens of filth pollute the air, let us manfully continue the toil and a free use of disinfectants.

Loving truth and justice most,

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

MR. EDITOR: Not long since I was in a place of business, and a young theological student was praising up the Christian religion—striving, through his ignorance of facts, to make his listeners believe that we were almost dependent upon the Christian religion for every blessing we hav. As his conversation was not directed to me I allowed myself to become an involuntary listener. After he got through I made some inquiry, and found out that the young advocate of Christianity had never been outside of the state he was born in, hence knew very little of anything about what the Christian religion had done for the human family. I politely gave him an invitation to take a trip with me and I would show him just what Christianity had done for humanity.

I first took him to Italy, where Christianity has ruled supreme for over sixteen hundred years (and I might say the cradle of Christianity), and a more degraded set of people cannot be found on earth, composed of beggars, thieves, robbers, vagrants, and paupers. All that Christianity ever did for the Italians was to rob and keep them in ignorance and poverty. Who can deny it? No man, and tell the truth.

I asked him to come with me to Spain, where they never had any other religion but Christianity—where none but the Christian religion was tolerated, read the history of the Spanish Inquisition, and look upon the low, degraded people. Where can you find a more miserable set of people than in Spain, placed there by and through priestcraft—by men who for sixteen hundred years hav been claiming to teach Christianity? Go with me to Portugal, where Christianity is the national religion, and see the low, ignorant people. Go to Russia, where another phase of Christianity is taught, and see the low, brutal outgrowth of its religion. Look at the poverty and ignorance of the people of that great rich country, with their Christian religion. Go to France, and see the blighting effects of Christianity upon the people. Look at the accursed condition of the people under the influence of Jesuitism. Now contemplate the millions of murdered victims, men, women, and children, that were murdered under the Christian system of religion. Go to Germany and see the poverty entailed upon the people, handed down to the present time, all coming through Christianity, as entailed upon them. Go to merry old England and read the history of the millions of murders committed in that island under the garb of Christianity for over a thousand years. Can any man say that Christianity had anything to do in elevating humanity in Europe for over sixteen hundred years? I say no man can say it did and speak the truth.

Now let us come to the Western Continent. Over four hundred years ago the cross of Christ was planted on the soil of America by Columbus, and the Christian religion established here. In after years Cortez erected the Christian standard in Mexico, and under it robbed and murdered the nativs, with a priest by his side making a foothold for Christianity. Look at Mexico to-day after having the Christian religion preached for over four hundred years. a sk, Has it been of any benefit to those people? And answer, No, but a curse. It has robbed them and kept them in ignorance.

Go to Central America, where the Christian religion has been the only religion for nearly four hundred years, and see the poverty, wretchedness, and ignorance of the people. Go anywhere on earth where the Christian religion has prevailed for centuries, and you find the same poverty and ignorance—I mean, of course, where it has held absolute sway.

When Captain Cook first landed upon the shores of the Sandwich Islands the people were honest, pure in mind and body. What are they now, after living one hundred and fifty years under the baneful influence of this Christian religion? They hav dwindled down from three hundred thousand happy people to about seventy-five thousand leprous invalids, brought upon them by loathsome desires carried there by Christians, or by those that believe in the Christian religion. And it is the same cry all over the world. Take our own country, and you find 99 out of every 100 criminals believe in the Christian religion.

"But," says the young student, "what is it that has brought us up to our present civilization?" I can answer it with one word, and challenge a successful contradiction—invention. That is the word to use, not Christianity. Withdraw every article of invention from our homes, and you take the home and all—you take everything that it takes to make a home, and make it refined and pleasant. Could you do that? Do you think that the Christian religion would replace it? I answer, Never, as the past history of the church has been to fight any and every step taken toward the advancement of humanity upon a higher and more intelligent plane of life. Christianity has been a curse to humanity, is to-day a curse, and ever will be a curse, just as long as it holds the human family in ignorance, which is the sole aim of its leaders.

MR. EDITOR: Being somewhat diverted with the able controversy now going on in THE TRUTH SEEKER between Materialists and Spiritualists, over the dying embers of old theology, will you publish this, my critique, on

The trinity of level heads,
According to their sight,
According to development
Of their internal right?

PROFESSING CHRISTIANS.

Their heads are level with their creeds
Derived from ancient lore,
That bore despotic, priestly sway
And dyed the earth with gore!

MATERIALISTS.

Their heads are level for this world,
Enough for them to know;
They liv and die like beasts,
At least they tell us so!

And "Winter" he will hav it so,

Without regard to "fools" who prate
In favor of some higher state
Of happiness supremely grand
Belonging to the summer-land.

SPIRITUALISTS.

Their heads are level for all time.
They scan the works of nature,
And credit giv wherever due
To every living creature,
Believing life is more than breath
Of this mundanus sphere,
And that, indeed, there is no death,
As seems apparent here.
Immortal life, it cannot die;
It livs forever on.
Though obscured from mortal sight
When from the body drawn,
Life's inherent in the soul
As light is in the sun;
They ever dwell together
As being dual one.
My critique, I know, is strong;
Who, I ask, can think it wrong?

When the mind of the immortal soul is in a proper mood to behold the beautiful order of nature displayed in and among the myriads of rolling orbs scattered in endless space, all governed by immutable, mathematical, chemical law everlasting

That darts the lightning from on high
And rolls the thunder through the sky;
It governs all things everywhere,
And needs no priestly finite prayer;
It reigns supreme in the Great I Am,
The mighty God that is no sham.

All things are one thing,
The universal whole;
All things are one thing
With an immortal soul;
All things are one thing
The universes broad;
All things are one thing,
And that thing is God.

Nevertheless the saying is true, "There are lords many and gods many," for everything is a lord or god to everything else beneath its inherent power derived from the great God of all, the universe, whereof and wherein all things liv, move, and hav their being. Respectfully, E. W. ALLEN.

CINCINNATI, OHIO. NOV. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The following is original, and if you will kindly publish the same my sincere thanks are yours. T. WINTER.

Tom Winter's wind is blowing,
And Severance is aghast;
He knows his chaff must now go up
Through Winter's awful blast.

His anti-mundane nonsense
He knows is on the wane,
And if he's wise he will desist
Before he's quite insane.

His cranium must be "little off"
Through anti-natural things,
And that accounts for all his gas
And all the mud he flings.

I pity him with all my heart
And the clique he doth present,
And hope that wisdom will ere long
Make all the crowd repent.

Such folly is an evil thing
And fraughts with bad results;
Its tricks and shams are awful mean
With all its false occults.

The cure for all this foolish lore
Is found in Winter's truth;
Fall into line, mistaken friends,
Then you are safe forsooth.

[We hav also received the appended verse, which we regard as eminently seasonable. It was apparently written with a philanthropic motiv.—ED. T. S.]

TO T. WINTER.

O Thomas Winter, of Ohio, it is on behalf
A tired world that I would speak,
And cautiously suggest that you desist,
Dry up, desiccate, and subside!
Long years thy loud and vaunting horn
Thou hast exalted, and not sold
A clam. Persistently hast thou refused
To be suppressed. Because of thee
The wicked Spiritist hath had no peace
Nor the weary Materialist ere found
Adequate opportunity for repose.
The sacred theory of spooks,
And that this life may be continued in our next,
Thou hast knocked down and jumped upon
Till it is tired and fain would seek
Time to recuperate.

Oh, giv us rest!
The lengthening shadows of a waning year
Apprise us that a snap of cold
May be expected. There will be snow.
And my request is that you hibernate
And giv your older namesake room;
One winter at a time will quite suffice
To furnish all the blowing we require.
Besides, a man that ever wars with spooks
And fools continually with the unknowable
May get tripped up; for he shall sometime meet
The omnipotent boss spook from Spookville,
Who will hereafter make it warm for him;
And in the supplementary life for which we yearn,
T. Winter'll find the climate no less tropical
Because he kept it always wintry here.

Men of the Hour.

D. M. BENNETT.—CONCLUDED.

Bennett and his sister were married on the same occasion, at the house of a cousin in Cooperstown, a Methodist minister tying the two knots. Bennett had not then learned to dispense with the services of a priest, as he has since. Now, were he to be married half a dozen times, he would require no priest to officiate. His sister married G. W. Allen, who also lived at the Shakers and left soon after.

After the marriage, Mr. Allen's brother having met a gentleman from Kentucky who was conducting a nursery there, was induced to think the party would do well to go to Kentucky and join this gentleman in his enterprise. They decided to go to Kentucky, and in two or three days the five ex-Shakers set out on their journey. This was before the days of general railroading, and they traveled by canal, passing over the Erie to Buffalo, then by propeller to Toledo, thence by the Miami canal to Cincinnati, where a steamboat was taken. The destination was Brandenburg, forty miles below Louisville.

The country and surroundings were wholly unlike those of New York. It was in the days of slavery, and all new arrivals from the East were looked upon as Abolitionists and natural enemies. A very few days sufficed to convince the party that they had made a mistake in coming to Brandenburg. There was nothing to do there, and very poor prospects for the future. Bennett and his brother-in-law went up to Louisville to see if business could not be procured, for they were out of money, and winter was coming on apace. They found the world as here presented wholly different from their quiet Shaker home, and it is not strange that a home-sick feeling settled over the party.

Among the occupations which Bennett had followed with the Shakers were: three years at raising and putting up garden seeds in papers, four years at shoemaking, three years in charge of their medical department—raising and gathering medical roots and herbs, making extracts, syrups, and other preparations—and three years at practicing medicin. He did not attend a medical college, nor graduate, but he had a good medical library, from which, and the old physicians of the society, he learned much, and was deemed successful in the eclectic system of practice. His medical experience seemed to qualify him for the drug business, and he obtained a situation in a Louisville wholesale and retail drug establishment, where he remained a year, in the interim making a commercial tour for selling drugs through Kentucky into Tennessee, visiting the Green River country, the Mammoth Cave, Clarksville, etc.

Bennett and his wife commenced housekeeping in a single room, and in the most primitiv manner. They felt the necessity of living within their income, that their condition might improve. At the close of the year, with their savings and some $200 left to Mrs. Bennett by a deceased brother, Bennett was enabled to fit up and start a drug store of his own, which he conducted eight years, meeting with fair success. He bought property, built rather extensivly, engaged in some enterprises it would hav been better to let alone, and lost money. During this period their only child, a daughter, was born, and, though it was a well-developed child, it did not liv. It died as soon as it was born, or before.

In 1855 Bennett was induced to close out his business in Louisville and move to Rochester, N. Y., where his sister and brother-in-law resided. He engaged some four years in the seed business with Briggs & Bro., and more than half of this time traveled through the Western States, collecting and taking orders.

In 1859 he removed to Cincinnati, where he soon purchased a drug store and engaged in the preparation of proprietary medicins, some seven or eight in number, distributing them among farmers and others through the adjoining country. He began with sending out a single wagon, but in two or three years he had fifteen wagons running. At this time the War of the Rebellion broke out, and the revenue stamps which had to be placed on all medicins increased the expenses so enormously that the business was considerably curtailed. Bennett also engaged heavily in the manufacture of sealing-wax, or cement, for fruit-jars and cans, at which a handsome profit was made. For two or three years the entire business paid a profit of $10,000 per year. In six years $35,000 were made.

Perhaps in an evil day Bennett closed out his entire business for cash, at less than its real value, and engaged in other enterprises, but for two years he was particularly unfortunate, losing heavily at everything he attempted. He lost $7,000 in insurance stock, $10,000 in oil and mineral lands in Tennessee, $4,000 in lithography with two other men, $2,000 in a patent bed-spring enterprise, $4,000 in Sonora mining lands, and $5,000 in an ill-advised building enterprise. These sums took wings and disappeared in less than two years, and from a competence for life a condition of absolute poverty was reached. Sadness filled the hearts of Bennett and his wife. He engaged again in putting up an extensiv series of proprietary medicins, but was not successful.

He was induced by a friend to remove to Kansas City, where he started a drug store. but meeting with more indifferent success than he expected he was induced to sell out at considerable sacrifice, and never received but little more than half the amount he sold for.

The next move was perhaps a singular one. A boyhood friend who had been to California and made a goodly sum of money at stock-raising, lived in New York, wished Bennett to join him in the manufacture of brick on Long Island, forty miles from New York. The idea made a favorable impression, as the brick business had been very good. They removed to New York, but Bennett was disappointed to learn that his old friend had lost all his money, and had not a dollar to put into the business. Other arrangements had to be made, other parties were interested who put in capital. Bennett purchased some clay property on the north side of Long Island, three miles east of Northport. Here buildings were erected, a yard opened, and what was more, Bennett invented an apparatus for drying brick by heat as fast as they came from the mill. This required fifty tons of iron to construct. There was a slight defect in the mode of construction. It required changing. A degree of dissatisfaction grew up on the part of the partners. Exactions were made of Bennett which he could not comply with. He concluded to withdraw from the concern, losing his six months' labor and $1,000 he had put in.

He returned to Rochester and engaged again in the service of Briggs & Bro. as commercial traveler. In 1870 he entered into a contract with a firm in Paris, Illinois, to take charge of a drug store in that small city, and here he remained over a year, when, wishing to engage in business for himself, he embarked in the growing and putting up of garden seeds. He had fifty acres in cultivation the first year, and seventy-five acres the second. Unfavorable and very dry seasons curtailed the crops most seriously. Partners had to be taken. The concern was not harmonious. The partners took an arbitrary course, and a dissolution was inevitable. $2,000 and more were lost here.

In the spring of 1873 Bennett was drawn into a newspaper discussion with two clergymen of the place upon the subject of prayer and several Bible points, particularly touching the divine leadership of Moses. The articles on each side were published in the two weekly papers of the place. At length, one more intolerant than the other refused Bennett's articles because of their radicalism. This naturally offended Bennett, that his opponent should be heard, while his replies were refused. This brought the idea to his mind of starting a paper of his own, in which he could speak his convictions. He resolved to do so. But what should be the name of the newspaper? He wrote down some fifty names which suggested themselvs to him, and submitted them to his wife. THE TRUTH SEEKER was selected from all the others as the best name.

The first number of the little eight-page monthly appeared Sept. 1, 1873. Eight or ten thousand copies were sent over the country to such names as could be obtained. Bennett was unacquainted with the Liberals of America, and the Liberals knew not him. It was a matter of much uncertainty whether he would succeed or fail. He waited patiently for the responses to his first number. It was for some time uncertain whether No. 2 would be issued. But one by one the new subscribers came in, and Bennett was encouraged to get out No. 2; and as the subscribers kept on gradually increasing No. 3 was issued. There was no type or presses in Paris to print the paper, and it had to be done in Terra Haute, Indiana, nineteen miles away.

Having closed his business connection in Paris, Bennett felt that it was not the point whence to issue his little sheet. Several cities suggested themselvs to him, New York the most forcibly. He made a trip there to view the lay of the land, and though meeting with no special encouragement from the Liberals of New York, he felt it was the point whence his paper should issue. He returned and issued No, 4 in Paris, while No. 5 was issued in New York, January, 1874, with sixteen pages instead of eight. This was at the beginning of the several years of financial depression, when scores of pretty well established journals went by the board. It was a matter of uncertainty whether THE TRUTH SEEKER would liv; but the number of its patrons gradually increased .The second volume was a semi-monthly of sixteen pages, and continued sixteen months, closing with the year. From that time it became a weekly, containing, for two years, eight pages each issue, and since that sixteen pages, making it the largest Liberal or Freethought publication in the world, containing each week 700 square inches more of reading matter than any other Liberal paper.

This growth grew directly upon the Christian prosecution with which the paper and editor were visited. THE TRUTH SEEKER is an out-spoken opponent of priestcraft, supernaturalism, and all the errors that belong to them. This inevitably brought down upon the paper and its editor the hatred of the Christian church, of its clergy, and of the Young Men's Christian Association. Clergymen from the country when they came to the city to attend their religious anniversaries, and for other purposes, denounced THE TRUTH SEEKER, and said it ought to be crushed out. Many letters talking in a similar way were written to the city. The Young Men's Christian Association took up the question and debated, "How can THE TRUTH SEEKER be suppressed?"

Anthony Comstock undertook the contract. He visited THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and spent two hours in looking over the tracts and pamphlets published by Bennett. He found two upon which he thought an indictment could be held. One was Bennett's "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," the other was a small tract written by A. B. Bradford for the Popular Science Monthly, entitled "How do Marsupials Propagate Their Kind?" These were submitted to Comstock's Star Chamber advisers, and they were deemed sufficient. Bennett was arrested by a deputy United States marshal, accompanied by Comstock, and was taken before a United States commissioner and held in $1,500 bail, which had to be given or Bennett go to jail. The prospect of sending him to the penitentiary at hard labor was regarded as good.

This was in the fall of 1878. About this time Col. R. G. Ingersoll, of Washington, took the case in hand, and with the two little pamphlets went before the United States authorities in Washington, and asked them if it was their purpose to prosecute a matter of that kind. They concluded not, and orders came up from Washington that the case againt Bennett be dismissed.

It of course angered Comstock exceedingly to be thus frustrated, and he almost swore that he would yet hav Bennett in his power. The following year the Freethinkers of New York held an annual meeting at Watkins, N. Y. Bennett attended it, and took with him an assortment of his publications to sell. Next to his table Miss Josephine S. Tilton had a table for selling the pamphlets and photographs of her brother-in-law, E. H. Heywood, whom Comstock had caused to be thrust into prison for selling and mailing a copy of the pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes." These Miss Tilton had on sale. When she was absent for a few minutes, Bennett acted for her and sold from her table whatever was wanted. W. S. Bell, who was assisting Bennett, did the same. But orders had been sent up by Comstock in New York to hav any one arrested who presumed to sell "Cupid's Yokes." The result was Bennett, Bell, and Miss Tilton were arrested, taken before a magistrate, and held to bail. After the meeting dispersed they had to remain several days to await the action of the Grand Jury—which at length found a bill against all, and they were again required to giv bail or go to prison.

Bennett, with his companions, felt that they had been outraged; he felt he had violated no law and committed no crime in selling the pamphlet. He so announced in his paper, and that, firmly believing he possessed a full right to sell the treatis to all who wished it, he would continue to do so. He sold many hundreds. Comstock wrote him a decoy letter and got one of them. For this he was arrested and held to bail in March, 1879. He was tried in the following May before the bigoted and unfair judge, C. L. Benedict—the judge of whom Comstock boasted, at Bennett's trial, that Benedict never failed him, but convicted every case brought before him. The trial was exceedingly unfair. The judge would allow no opinions by competent writers, editors, publishers, linguists, and literary men, who were present, that the work was not obscene. He would allow no comparison to be made with standard works; in fact, he would not allow the little work to be read to the jury in its entirety. His rulings and definitions were of the most arbitrary and unjust character. The jury divided, eleven to one, for fifteen hours, but finally, upon the narrow ruling of the judge, the twelfth juror weakly yielded and united with the others to convict.

An appeal was taken to three judges in banc, but Judge Benedict was one of them, and Judges Blatchford and Choate readily sustained their brother judge, Benedict. The sentence was pronounced on the 5th of June, when Bennett was remanded to Ludlow-street Jail to await the action of the President (R. B. Hayes). Such an appeal was never made for an individual to a President before. Petitions for the release of Bennett were sent over the country and they were signed by over 250,000 persons. So many petitioners never signed for a person before. Beside this, fully twelve thousand private letters were written to the President in Bennett's behalf. The Department of Justice, the members of the Cabinet, including the Attorney General, the President's private secretary, and even the President himself, seemed to be in Bennett's favor, and that he should be released. But Mrs. Hayes, an ardent Methodist, and the bishops and priests of the country were against him. The influence that was brought to bear against him was so great that, though the President had promised a pardon should be made out, he wavered, got weak-kneed, listened to the church and his wife, and declined to pardon. Bennett was taken to the Albany Penitentiary July 28th, 1879, and was at once set at work in the shoe-shop, occupying a cell by himself. Prison life is anything but pleasant. The rules are harsh and rigid, and the associates of the most degraded character.

He worked at shoe-making nearly two months, when, being attacked by vertigo, he was sent to the hospital. Here he had favors he could not hav in the cell, and was not again sent to the shop. He was permitted to write, and in a little over six months he wrote two octavo volumes of 900 pages each—"The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times"—the largest work ever written in prison. The first volume was brought out in THE TRUTH SEEKER office while the author was still in prison.

Two months of the thirteen—the term of his sentence—were taken off for good behavior, so he was released in April.

Mrs. Bennett and a committee of friends from New York met him as he emerged from prison, and accompanied him home. On the 2d of May his friends got up a grand ovation in his honor, and Chickering Hall was packed to its fullest capacity, and thousands unable to get in had to turn away. Excellent speeches were made by eight or ten persons, and probably a more hearty reception was never given.

It was soon proposed that Bennett be sent as a delegate to the International Freethinkers' Congress, to be held in Brussels at the close of August. It was proposed that both he and A. L. Rawson go in company, and funds were sent in to defray a part of the expenses. They embarked on August 4th, 1880. The congress was a decided success. After it was over, Bennett continued his travels up the Rhine, through Switzerland and Italy, to Rome, Naples, and other places. He was absent nearly four months, and wrote home pretty full letters to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which made a volume of 850 pages. The first edition was called "An Infidel Abroad," but the name was subsequently changed to "A Truth Seeker in Europe."

These letters were so well approved that D. C. Coleman, of Modesto, Cal., proposed that Bennett make the tour of the world, write up a book of what he might see, and present a copy to each one who advanced the sum of five dollars. He proposed to advance five dollars, but subsequently made it twenty. The proposition was laid before the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and was well received. Hundreds came forward and subscribed five dollars. When they were called upon to send in the amounts, they flowed in freely. Seven hundred responded. Bennett said it would require two volumes to contain an account of all he would see, and that there should be two volumes.

He embarked on the Ethiopia at New York for Glasgow on July 30, 1881, and was absent a year, not varying fifteen minutes from that length of time. He undoubtedly wrote while thus upon the wing the fullest account of his travels ever written under similar circumstances. The work, "A Truth Seeker Around the World," comprises four volumes of nearly 900 pages each, illustrated. It will probably be many a year before the same is accomplished again. In view of the magnitude of the work thus accomplished, T. B. Wakeman says, "Bennett has discounted the past and the future."

Early in the coming year Bennett proposes to make a partial tour of the United States, delivering illustrated lectures upon the countries he has visited. It can hardly be expected that his Christian opponents will patronize him largely, and there is not perhaps enough of his way of thinking to make the enterprise a success. At all events Bennett hopes to liv a goodly number of years yet, and put in considerable faithful service. He trusts his life and labors may not be a failure.

TRUTH SEEKERS.

The J. R Perry Piano and Organ Company desire to introduce their instruments to all lovers of music, at the lowest cost to purchasers, by selling direct. The Perry Piano contains the latest and most important improvement yet made—a self-sustaining sounding-board and bridge, which will never permit the board to spring, nor allow the tones to become thin and wiry. The Organs contain more patented inventions than any other make. The Mason & Hamlin are the only Organ Company who are using any of them, they having purchased the use of Perry's Flute and Celeste and Reed Board in 1876. We offer to place these Pianos and Organs by the side of any others, no matter what their reputation, and will compete both in price and quality. For full particulars address J. R. PERRY, P. O Box 367, Wilkesbarre, Pa., who will furnish illustrated catalog. 8t47

Gems of Thought.

How beautiful are Herbert Spencer's thoughts upon life, and how different from the theories of those who madly insist on introducing a first cause, a Scandinavian divinity or god, to account for the existence of everything, because, they say, matter cannot originate the soul which is superior to itself! Then the acorn should never become the oak, or the child the man. Nothing can be more ethereal than the labor of insects who secrete, perhaps, the whole substance of the universe. Carbonate of lime is composed of their shells, and the coral rocks of ocean. Is it unreasonable to suppose that the industry of microscopic animals can finally produce a conscious, reflecting soul?—Alhaza.

In all the great events of their lives, the Dyaks, the inhabitants of Borneo, require that human heads shall be procured. When a Dyak wants to marry he must show himself a hero, and the more heads he can obtain the greater the pride and admiration with which he is regarded, not only by his bride, but the whole tribe. When a rajah is dead heads must be secured; for, according to Dyak belief, the victims serve as slaves to the departed rajah in heaven. Whenever a child is born to a rajah (in Long Wai, at least,) heads must be got before it can be named. It is a rule among all the tribes that no youth can regularly wear a mandan, or be married, or associate with the opposit sex till he has been on one or more "head-hunting" expeditions. A mandan is presented to him, probably at his birth, or when he receives a name; but not till he has washed it in the blood of an enemy can he presume to carry it as part of his every-day equipments.—Carl Bach's Head-Hunters of Borneo.

The magic of a name is not sufficient to keep the world in innocence and purity. There is no power in amulets because there is no belief in the devil. That is sacred which is in the soul, not that which we pin on the sleeve. Ornaments are not worn today to keep away witches. A cross on the bosom is not a symbol of the religion of the heart; neither are charms around the neck protections to virtue. The soul must arm itself, and when that is strong in the principles of right no power can prevail against it. It is what we think, not what we wear, that protects us.—L. K. Washburn.

We are not troubling ourselvs about a future life, and do not propose to; but to giv this life, and what will make it better, our undivided attention. If we arrive at the highest degree of perfection here, which we are capable of attaining to, and spend our time in the most profitable and useful manner, we feel sure that if there is a continued existence we shall be in good condition to enter upon it. Our chief motto is, Let us do the best we can in this life here and now, and attend to the other when we reach it and can know more about it.—D. M. Bennett (Truth Seeker Tract No. 135).

The martyr may perish at the stake, but the truth for which he dies may gather new luster from his sacrifice. The patriot may lay his head upon the block and hasten the triumph of the cause for which he suffers. The memory of a great life does not perish with the life itself, but livs in other minds. The ardent and enthusiastic may seem to throw away their lives, but the enduring men continue the fight and enter in and take possession of the ground on which their predecessors sleep. Thus the triumph of a just cause may come late, but when it does come it is due to the men who hav failed as well as to the men who hav eventually succeeded.—Dr. Smiles's Duty.

Oh what a glory doth this world put on
For him who, with a fervent heart, goes forth
Under the bright and glorious sky, and looks
On duties well performed and days well spent!
For him the wind, aye, and the yellow leaves,
Shall hav a voice, and giv him eloquent teachings.
He shall so hear the solemn hymn that Death
Has lifted up for all, that he shall go
To his long resting-place without a tear.
—Longfellow.

What can purify our politics but individual purity—better men to vote for and better men to vote? Is the press going to save America? For the most part it is a partisan tool. The editor does not ask what is true, what is right. He asks what is safe. The press itself needs saving. And the only way to save it is by getting more cultivated and noble gentlemen into editorial chairs. Is the church going to save America? It does not look much like it. The morality of the press is higher. The church has so long insisted that salvation is an un-moral affair that it has lost the power of making moral distinctions. A religious body, as respectable as any that could be convened, indorses practices which the Stock Exchange would not indorse. The morality of the church ought to shame that of the market, but it falls below it. A man may do that as a preacher, and still keep his pulpit for doing which, as a stock-broker, he would lose his seat. Before the church can save America it must itself be saved.—Chadwick's Rise of Man.

To be happy in old age it is necessary that we accustom ourselvs to objects that can accompany the mind all the way through life, and that we take the rest as good in their day. The mere man of pleasure is miserable in old age, and the mere drudge in business is little better. . . . Those who knew Benjamin Franklin will recollect that his mind was ever young, his temper ever serene; Science, that never grows gray, was always his mistress. He was never without an object, for when we cease to hav an object we become like an invalid in an hospital waiting for death.—Paine's Age of Reason.

One man prays thus: How shall I be able to lie with that woman? Another prays thus: How shall I not desire to lie with her? Another prays thus: How shall I be released from this? Another prays, How shall I desire not to be released? Another thus: How shall I not lose my little son? Then thus: How shall I not be afraid to lose him? In fine, turn thy prayers this way and see what comes.—M. A. Antoninus.

Odds and Ends.

An Albany type-setter is training a quartet of flies to put the periods in his "take."

Any kind of cookery in the world, no matter how execrable, is preferable to a family broil.

"Pa, what is a pessimist, and what is an optimist?" "A pessimist, my son, is one who takes the surplus kittens, just after they are born, and chloroforms them. The optimist is one who lets the kittens grow up, to liv a wretched, starving life; to be tortured continually by boys and other thoughtless animals, and to be finally killed with brickbats and left to rot on the streets."

Society life in Des Moines, Iowa: "A young couple in the gallery of the opera house last night were so overcome with the beautiful forms on the stage that they sank into each other's arms with a kiss and a hug. The young man wore an immense wide-brimmed hat, which the young lady worked vigorously as a fan to keep him cool. A rural rooster who saw the performance yelped with envy."

"Father, if mother should sit in a chair and you should want it, you would say, 'Get up dear,' wouldn't you?" "Yes," said I. "But," said the little four-year old, "if I should sit in a chair you wanted, you would say, 'Get down, dear.' Well, what is the difference?" said she; and as if perfectly satisfied that she had given utterance to a poser, she replaced her thumb in her mouth again, and looked sidewise with a roguish smile on her countenance.

Three years ago a seaside summer boarder, while straying along the bed of a stream that had been left partially bare by excessiv drouth, discovered, lying upon the sand, a conchiferous bivalvular mollusk—vulgus, clam—that seemed to be in the last gasp from exhaustion and thirst. Pitying the sore distress of the unhappy bivalve, the stranger took it up and cast it into the deep part of the stream, and went on his way happy in the thought of a kindness done. He speedily forgot the incident. A while ago, however, as he was enjoying again a summer vacation, and sitting near the spot where the event of three years before had taken place, he perceived a clam clambering laboriously over the rocks toward him. Arrived with much exertion at the feet of the amazed observer, the clam opened its shell and disclosed a pearl as large as a hazel-nut. This the gentleman unhesitatingly appropriated, and thereupon the grateful clam, smiling clear around to its back hinge, returned joyfully to the water and disappeared with a gurgle of satisfaction.

EXPERT CRITICISM.

"Good day, gentlemen."

A very nice-looking young man stood in the door-way of the editorial room and gazed in a benign way at the occupants of the apartment.

"Would it be possible for me to sell the Tribune a story?" he exclaimed.

"What kind of a story hav you ground out?" asked the horse reporter.

"The story," said the visitor, "is one in which the triumph of love is depicted, and——"

"It isn't one of those 'and as Ethel stood there in the soft moonlight, her little figure sharply outlined against the western sky, there was a crash in Coastcliff Castle, and the girl knew that her mother had dropped the doughnut jar' kind of stories, is it—because they won't do," said the horse reporter.

"There is nothing at all about doughnuts in this story," replied the visitor, rather haughtily, "but if you like I can read a portion of it."

"All right."

"Where shall I begin?"

"Anywhere," replied the horse reporter. "Suppose you giv us the last sentence of it."

"I should hardly think——"

"Oh, never mind about that. We do all the thinking for young authors that come up here."

The visitor seated himself, and read as follows:

"'For answer Glady's beautiful eyes dropped, but she gave him both her hands, and there, under the heavy fruited trees, the golden bees flying all about them, and the air filled with their dreamy monotone, he drew her upon his breast, and raising her long ringlets to his lips, he kissed them reverently.'"

"That's the last sentence, is it?" asked the horse reporter."

"Yes, sir."

"I should hope it was. It makes me tired to read about such ducks."

"Why, I don't see——," began the author.

"Of course you don't. Probably you were the hero of the novel. Did you ever hear of Thompson's colt?"

The visitor admitted his ignornnce concerning that historical animal.

"Well, Thompson's colt was such an eternal idiot that he swam across the river to get a drink. Now, that fellow in your story is a dead match for him."

"I don't understand——"

"Probably not. It is not to be expected of literary people. But I will tell you; this young fellow in your story is out under an apple-tree holding a girl's hands, isn't he?"

"Yes."

"And, according to the story, he 'raised her long ringlets to his lips, and kissed them reverently.' That right?"

"Certainly."

"Now, what do you think of a young man that would go nibbling around a girl's back hair when she had her face with her? Such stories do not possess the fidelity to nature that should ever characterize the work of genius. No, my genial imbecil; you cannot get the weight of this powerful journal on the side of any such young man as your story depicts. We were once young and up to the apple-tree racket ourselvs."

"Good day," said the author, starting for the door.

"So long," was the response, "Make George act like a white man in your story, and come around again."—Chicago Tribune.

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

Notes and Clippings.

MR. TALMAGE alleges that silence is only music asleep. Just so. And the snoring during a sermon is only the congregation asleep.

A PHILADELPHIA preacher told the women of his congregation that divine truth could not find its way into hearts that were cramped by corsets.

HERBERT SPENCER says Americans don't know how to grumble. He evidently never joined a big congregation going home after a long sermon.—Puck.

A WOMAN has just been chosen superintendent of schools at Barrington, R I. It is the first time the position has ever been occupied by a woman in that state.

"WOMAN has too long been a mere hanger on—a camp follower of the Christian host," said Mrs. Melissa A. Stanley, who favors a wider field of action for her sex in connection with the church.

WE speaks ob de innocence ob youth, an' yit a boy would ruther go to a circus den ter go ter church, an' somehow in considerin' de hypocrisy ob de church an' how much ter be seed at de show, dinged ef I blames him.—Arkansaw Traveler.

A PREACHER, raising his eyes from his desk in the midst of a sermon, was paralyzed with amazement to see his rude boy in the gallery pelting the hearers in the pews below with horse chestnuts. But while the good man was preparing a frown of reproof, the young hopeful cried out: "You tend to your preaching, daddy; I'll keep them awake!"

REVIVALIST BARNES encounters opposition from the clergy in Connecticut. Pastor Tinker of the Methodist church at Norwich calls his doctrins "damnable nonsense," and the "fag ends of Calvinism." With the same ease with which Connecticut Christians can see defects in Revivalist Barnes's belief we can see defects in the entire system. It is all wrong from beginning to end.

IN some parts of Spain where butter is a rare article of merchandise it is sold not by the pound, but by the yard. It is brought from the mountain districts in sheep's intestins, like sausages that are "tied off" with string in lengths as required by the buyer. To travelers butter by the inch seems rather curious bargaining; the product is usually neither palatable nor particularly clean.

ALL stories respecting Sir Garnet Wolseley are interesting just now, says the London Truth It appears that he is fond, like Napoleon, of addressing himself directly to the soldiers under his command. "Now, my man," he said, "if you were told to lighten your kit by half a pound, what should you throw away?" "The 'Soldier's Pocket Companion'" (a pious work by Wolseley himself), answered the man as he respectfully saluted his commander. That soldier's extraordinary good sense should secure his promotion.

SAPHIR was a remarkably ugly Jew, who was deformed in person, who lived several centuries ago in Germany, and who was a marvel of satirical wit. Nobody was ever known to hav got the better of him in repartee. Many of his retorts hav been handed down to the present times. The following was his style of talking back to people: He was traveling in a stage coach in company with two Jesuits, who made allusions to the personal appearance of Saphir, and were disposed to make fun of him generally. He put up with it for some time, but finally he asked: "Who are you two fellows, anyhow?" "We belong to the Society of Jesus." "Which society of Jesus, his first or last?" "What do you mean?" "Well, his first society were donkeys in the manger, and his last were thieves on Mount Calvary. Now I want to know to which of these societies you belong."

A LONG and activ agitation of the question of the Bible in the public schools, in Canada, has culminated in a formal demand upon the Dominion government by those who favor Christian exercises for the pupils. They state their ultimatum as follows: "That the Bible be used not as a reading book, but devotionally, in connection with the prescribed prayer, at the opening of the school each morning, and that both teachers and pupils read together the selection prescribed for each particular school day throughout the year. We do not ask that the Bible be used as a text-book in the public schools. We do not ask that the teachers be required to giv expositions or explanations of the meaning of passages of scriptures."

PROF. SAMUEL H. SCUDDER of Harvard College read a paper on the discovery of a bed of antediluvian cockroaches near Fairplay, Col., last spring, in rocks much older than any which hav before yielded insect remains west of the great plains. The cockroaches numbered eighty, and are of a more modern character than any palæozoic cockroach yet disclosed. They form a group distinct from the living cockroach, and eleven of the seventeen species found might be called Palæoblatteria from the shape of their wings. The discovery of these preadamite cockroaches shows that the beds in which they were found belong to the formation known to geologists as intermediate or triassic. Only four such cockroaches had been found in Europe, Prof. Scudder added, and American science may congratulate itself on the new find.

JOHN A. COBDEN, the Superintendent of public schools at Wakeman, Ohio, became enamored of Miss Welsh, a pretty pupil. Having made up his mind to go away with her, and make his wife and children believe that he was dead, he began by pretending ill health. Then he went on a trip as though to recuperate. He wrote home from Milwaukee that he was about to drown himself, and, leaving his baggage at a hotel, disappeared. His family mourned him as a suicide while he was alive and well at Moore's Hill, Indiana, where he and Miss Welsh had obtained employment as teachers in an academy under false names, and were about to get married. Cobden had been an activ church member at Wakeman, and his pastor went to Milwaukee to recover his body, if possible. There the clergyman noted that several valuable books were missing from the drowned man's effects, and he surmised the truth. Working upon that clue the elopers were traced and caught.

THE St. Paul Dispatch runs on in the following fashion: "There is no superstition in the acceptance of revelation equal to that of the idolaters who dethrone Vishnu and enthrone protoplasm. There is no credulity in the acceptance of revelationn equal to that of those who invite us to accept a limited infinity, a personal impersonality, a human divineness, and like irrationalities of inconsequentialism. There is no bigotry in the acceptance of revelation equal to that fanaticism of heresy which, having beveled the edges and rounded the corners of unwelcome truth, seeks to ostracize all who repudiate its infallibility. There is no blindness in the acceptance of revelation equal to that monstrous egoism which shells itself up in pretentious conceit and refuses audience to those voices from abroad, 'whose echoes roll from soul to soul and grow forever and forever.'" It would be safe to offer a valuable prize to any one who can tell what this fellow is driving at.

A CHRISTIAN father: John Phillips, a well-known citizen of Hudson, Mass., has for some time had the reputation of cruelly treating the members of his family, especially his 16-year-old daughter. On Monday, the 19th ult., the daughter, with the permission of her mother, went to Marlboro' to visit a relativ. As she did not return just at the time specified, the father drove to Marlboro', found his daughter, and started for home. On the way he cut from the roadside a heavy stick. On his arrival home he commanded her to go up stairs and disrobe and await his coming. She did not prepare herself for punishment as he had commanded, so he stripped her to the waist, and, with the stick he had cut on the way home, he beat her until the blood flowed from the cuts. Her screams were heard throughout the neighborhood, and when the facts became known the excitement ran high, and there were threats of lynching. Phillips, hearing of this, hastily left town. He is a leading member of the Baptist church, and the daughter has for some time been a member of the choir there.

EXPERIENCED Sunday-school speakers know the danger of asking questions at random of their juvenil audiences. Novices often blunder into the habit, not knowing its risks. One of these novices, who happened to be a particularly well-dressed young clergyman, tried his hand on a Boston Sunday-school. He began by saying, "Now, my dear children, look at me and tell me where you think I came from." One of the "dear children" held up his little hand and said, "I know, sir." The spruce-looking clergyman benignantly gazed on the young child, and, bestowing ever so sweet a smile on him, said, "Well, my little man, where do you think I came from?" The clerical and benignant smile was changed into an expression of horror when the illiterate youngster blurted out, "From the country, sir." An irreverent guffaw of laughter instantly pervaded the assembly, and the moral atmosphere of the place became such as almost to quench the good man's efforts at Sunday-school oratory. Greatly embarrassed, he struggled on for a little while with his speech, and then floundered to a hasty conclusion.

THIS is the way in which the bishop of Santander, Spain, denounces the newspapers which favor civil and religious liberty in that country: "May Almighty God curse these journals with the perpetual malediction launched against the devil and his angels! May they perish with Nero, Julian the apostate, and Judas the traitor! May the Lord judge them as he judged Dathan and Abiram! May the earth swallow them up alive! Let them be cursed day and night, sleeping and waking, in eating, in drinking, and in playing, when they speak and when they keep silence! May their eyes be blinded, their ears deaf, their tongue dumb! Cursed be every member of their body! Let them be cursed from to-day and forever! May their sepulcher be that of dogs and asses! May famished wolves prey upon their corpses, and may their eternal company be that of the devil and his angels." It is to be remembered that this gentle bishop is the follower of him who uttered the words, "Bless and curse not." As a specimen of murderous hate, bitter malignity, and worse than pagan brutality, this screed of a successor of the apostles is probably unequaled.—Tribune.

ON a difference of opinion as to whether Brother Abijah Green did or did not steal certain hymn books, the Union Baptist church of Philadelphia is saturated with the spirit of disunion and discord. Brother Green is a preacher who was sent into the ministry from the Union church and licensed by its pastor. He went to Atlantic City to preach, and while there some of the books belonging to the congregation he preached to were carried off A committee of investigation was appointed, which reported that Brother Green did not steal these books, but that the persons who claimed the ownership of them carried them away. This report was declared by Brother Green's enemies to be an unwarranted piece of whitewashing, for they said they could prove that Green had stolen the books. The debate ran so high that on Wednesday evening there was something very much like what the world's people would call a free fight. The church was packed with excited members, some of whom were, in the general excitement, pushed into the street. The pastor, the Rev. Mr. Wallace, took a spirited part in the fray, and from the pulpit deliberately announced his intention of killing Brother Abijah Green. Several of the brethren called each other liars and other unpleasant names.

MORE ABOUT MORMONISM.

Of course, Mormons believe in revelation, but Brigham Young never claimed infallibility, nor was it conceded to him. He was regarded as a prophet, though in a lesser degree than Joseph Smith. When the Mormons were expelled from Nauvoo, and Brigham was called to the presidency, he is claimed to have had a "revelation"—one received and acknowledged then and to-day. But never from the day he set foot in Utah to his death did he ever assume to give the church a written revelation of God's will. Had he done so it would doubtless have been received with unlimited confidence, as the faith of his followers was so great in him that they would have accepted as the dictum of heaven any command he might have given.

As to crime among the Mormons, it is well to understand that while Mormons constitute three-fourths of the population of Salt Lake City, and in the county four-fifths, in the city prison there are twenty-nine convicts, and not one of them is a Mormon. The jailer stated that for five years past not one of the inmates of the prison was a Mormon. In the territory eighty-three per cent of the people are Mormons; but still of the fifty-one prisoners in the Utah Penitentiary only five were Mormons. In all the prisons in the territory there are about one hundred and twenty-five prisoners, and of this number not over eleven are Mormons, some of whom were incarcerated for polygamy.

It is stated as a truth that in the twenty counties of the state thirteen are without a dramshop, brewery, gambling-house, or brothel. Out of the two hundred saloons, billiard, bowling-alley, and pool-table keepers, not over a dozen even profess to be Mormons. All the houses of prostitution and other disreputable concerns in the territory are run and patronized by the anti-Mormons or Christians. Ninety-eight per cent of the gamblers of Utah are Christians; ninety-five per cent of the Utah lawyers are gentiles; eighty per cent of all the litigation in the territory is of anti-Mormon origin. Of the two hundred and fifty towns and villages throughout the territory in two hundred of them there is not a prostitute. Of the suicides committed in Utah over ninety per cent are among the gentiles. Of the homicides and infanticides, over eighty per cent are perpetrated by the seventeen per cent of anti-Mormons.

The arrests in Salt Lake city are 1,020 per year, of these 851 are of the Christian portion, which forms one-fourth of the population, while 169 are Mormon, which are three-fourths of the population.

But the great crying sin of Mormonism, from the Christian point of view, is polygamy, a practice which their Bible justifies in the fullest extent. But a great share of this evil is imaginary. It does not exist to the extent that many suppose. There are about 150,000 people in Utah, far more than double the population of Nevada, which is a state, exceeding that of Kansas and Nebraska combined when admitted as states. Let us see if the women of Utah constitute a grand harem.

Massachusetts has a surplus of females of over 64,000—condemned to be old maids, or to swell the ranks of the armies of prostitutes filling the streets of our cities. The census returns show that twenty-two states, or more than half, have a surplus of females; the returns of Utah show that there is and always has been more males than females in that territory. The number of Mormon men having more than one wife amounts to less than ten per cent of the total population. So at the very worst view which may be taken of the vice of this country, it dwarfs into insignificance at the view of one hundred times as many men through all the Christian states who do not lead true lives to their wives, and are again and again guilty of continual adulteries. With all that can be said of the Mormon institution, there cannot be a doubt that the men and women of this country are at least ten times as virtuous—if sexual honesty means virtue—as the Christian men and women who constitute the population of the Eastern states.

POLYGAMY FROM THE WOMAN STANDPOINT.

It is usually supposed that plural marriage is very distasteful to the Mormon women, and that they only submit to it as an act of faith, and simply because their religion imperatively requires it. But from the following quotations from letters of prominent Mormon women it would seem this is not fully so. This first letter is from Mrs. Pratt, a first wife:

I have (as you see in all good consciences founded on the word of God) formed family and kindred ties which are inexpressibly dear to me, and which I can never bring my feelings to consent to dissolve I have a good and virtuous husband whom I love. We have four little children which are naturally and inexpressibly dear to us, and, besides this, my husband has seven other living wives, and one who has departed to a better world. He has in all upward of twenty five children. All these mothers and children are endeared to me by kindred ties, by mutual affection, by acquaintance and association; and the mothers in particular by mutual and long exercises of toil, patience, long suffering, and sisterly kindness. We all hav our imperfections in this life, but I know these are good and worthy women, and that my husband is a good and worthy man—one who keeps the commands of Jesus Christ and presides in his family like an Abraham.

Mrs. Eliza R. Snow Young wrote the following:

I am proud to state that I believe in the principle of plural marriage just as sacredly as I believe in any other institution which God has revealed. I believe it to be necessary for the redemption of the human family from the low state of corruption into which it has sunken. . . . Virtue is the foundation of the prosperity of our nation, and this sacred principle of plural marriage tends to virtue, purity, and holiness.

Mrs. Bethsheba W. Smith wrote the following:

As a loyal citizen of this great republic I enter my protest against this unlawful and unhallowed crusade founded on misrepresentations. As well might that honorable body legislate against baptism by immersion as against plurality of wives. God has revealed those principles and they must be sustained. With our own free consent our husbands take more wives, and when children crown our joy, around our sacred family altars we bow the knee and rejoice in his divine favor as legitimate wives with honorable children. We regard our husbands as men of true virtue and integrity, who take upon themselves the great responsibility in honoring the laws of God, and we bear them up in our faith and secret prayers.

Mrs. Zina D. Young wrote thus:

The principle of our holy religion that is assailed is one that lies deep in my heart. . . . We are proud of the principle because we understand its true worth, and we want our children to practice it, that through us a race of men and women, may grow up possessing sound minds in sound bodies.

Mrs. Hannah T. King wrote:

. . . I felt that its laws coincided with the laws of my nature. My daughters entered into the order in all their youth and beauty, educated, as they had been, in all the refinements of the world, and have ever honored it, and been an honor to it and to the church, whose principles they have left home and all its attractions to obey. . . . I hav now been in the church twenty-eight years, and my path has not been one of roses by any means, but I hav no regrets. I would not return to former things for Queen Victoria's throne and all its appendages.

Mrs. Margaret T. Smoot said this:

I have been a member of the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints for forty-four years, and have lived now nearly seventy years . . . I am the wife of a polygamist; his other wives and his children by those wives are just as much a part of his family as me and mine, I being his first wife; and his other wives are just as lawful and honorable in the sight of God as I am, and his children I consider to be just as lawful and honorable as any children born in wedlock. These are not only my feelings, but I know them to be the feelings of many others who occupy a position like that which I occupy, and I believe them to be the feelings of this whole community.

Thus wrote Dr. Romania B. Pratt:

The days of silence and patient endurance of calumny on the women of the Latter Day Saints concerning the subject of plural marriage are over; and notwithstanding that "neglected calumny soon expires," the great importance of the fact that our children, and our children's children have been born and bred under the teaching and practice of this great principle, and the sacredness of our duty to preserve hallowed and pure in their hearts the altar of love, though subordinate to our higher duty of obedience to God, is an inspiration not to be neglected or unheeded.

Mrs. Phœbe Woodruff said:

It has been upwards of forty years since my first acquaintance with these doctrines, this people, and the prophet Joseph Smith. I knew him to be an honorable, virtuous, and pure man, and his brother Hyrum also. . . . If I am proud of anything in this world, it is that I accepted the principle of plural marriage and remained among the people called "Mormons," and am numbered with them to-day. I can truly say that I am satisfied for one, and I don't guess at it, nor is it because some one has told me, but it is because the spirit of God has borne testimony to me of the truth of this work, and of this truthfulness I am a witness.

Mrs. E. B. Wells said:

Though I cherish no ill-feeling toward those who hav arrayed themselves against this principle of our faith, plural marriage, yet as they oppose it we must meet it, and we intend to meet it with all the energy we possess, and it will be "diamond cut diamond," I assure you.

Phœbe C. Young said:

The cry has ever been the downtrodden women of Utah. . . . They would have the world believe us the most degraded and neglected beings of all God's creation. Now we know this is not so. We enjoy full as much liberty as they do, and a great deal more, with all their boasted civilization. We enjoy all the rights that are accorded to our sex anywhere, which we know as well how to use as any of our compeers in the Eastern cities would. Indeed, we enjoyed more before they kindly introduced so much of their vaunted civilization into our midst. The day has been when one could walk the streets of Salt Lake City at any hour of the day or night, if necessary, without fear of insult, for every man we met would be a brother and a friend.

Mrs. Isabella Horne wrote in this wise:

You say you would like to know how the Mormon women do feel. I will tell you. They all know they are honored wives and mothers, acknowledged in society with their children, and are happy in knowing that their husbands are true to their marriage covenant, whether they have one wife or more. The Lord, seeing the wickedness and corruption on the earth, in his wisdom has revealed the principle of plural marriage to purify society and elevate women from the degradation in which man has placed her. And woe will be unto the man that degrades woman, for she is a gift from God. And I can positively assert that in no place on the earth are chastity and virtue in woman more honored and protected than among people called Mormons.

Emily B. Spencer thus:

Celestial marriage that gives us power over death, that unites in heaven as well as upon earth, and has no dissolution in it, is the present target. Celestial marriage that brings the blessings of the Lord, that is a commandment from heaven, is what they pretend to aim at. Really it is the kingdom of God, the truth from heaven, and the people who obey the commandments of God against whom this hatred exists.

Helen Mar Whitney expressed herself thus:

If the few who believe this principle to be a righteous one can afford to endure it, certainly the stranger ought to leave us to ourselves to work out the "problem." . . . If those who call themselves Christians would come to us with a spirit more in accordance with their profession, if we could not all see alike, we might at least be friends; but the unrighteous and inhuman course taken to root out what they call the "twin relics" only arouses in our hearts a more determined spirit of opposition, and fills every virtuous and sincere Mormon woman with indignation, and we tell them with the same spirit the heroic defenders of liberty at Bunker Hill when they said to the infatuated monarch of England, "We have chosen (religious) war in preference to voluntary slavery," to their false idea and the humbuggeries of acknowledged Mormon-eaters and virtue and life destroyers.

These extracts from letters are not given because I have the least faith in the book about the revealed will of God, or because there is the slightest probability that any god has revealed himself to these people more than to any others. It is an old claim, made by the devotees of various sects and systems of religion, that God has made a special revelation to them, and that they consequently know more about the secret will of the inscrutable being, whom no man has ever seen, than other people; but I have given them to show how intelligent Mormon women feel upon this subject of plural marriage.

A strong writer upon this subject—and withal a gentile—says: "The Mormons shrink from a civilization that introduces the brothel with its advance guard, fills our papers with unmentionable advertisements, and makes of every city a sink of iniquity. A civilization that converts women to prostitution faster than it does to Christian life, fills our ears with clerical scandals and our courts with Christian defaulters; that elevates Restellism into a social institution and leads to a prevalence of fœticide and infanticide which, if its extent were known as only physicians know, might well fill us with horror and dismay."

The Mormon can take the position of accuser, and retort upon the defenders of Christian civilization: In striking down the sacramental obligations with which Catholicity had hedged around the marriage rite, in making it a mere civil contract between a man and a woman for sexual and other purposes, you hav weakened the very foundation of society. The student of social science, seeing the startling increase in divorce statistics, the growing social tolerance given to marital infidelity—the general decadence, in fact, of marriage itself—may be able to comprehend the Mormon feeling of aversion.

The writer quoted from says further: "Mormons have seen a Federal judge and a woman of disreputable character sit side by side on the bench, have found their laws against rum-selling and prostitution inoperative from the protection granted by government officials, and have read in the gentile organ (known to the Mormons as the Daily Obscenist), as well as heard from the lips of Christian clergymen, the startling affirmation that houses of ill-fame and saloons are 'necessary reforming agencies' in the 'emancipation' of Mormon youth. They have seen in a recent Fourth of July celebration the carriage of Gov. Murray followed in the procession by that of a woman of notorious moral profligacy, without protest, and have seen those now wearing the judicial ermine shield immorality and vice."

The same writer, in concluding the subject of plural marriage, uses the following language:

"Polygamy in Utah is the consecration, under religious obligations, of the sexual relations, yet the Edmunds bill assumes that it is identical with bigamy, or the betrayal and desertion of a woman through false pretenses. This bill not only brands men as criminals for following out their convictions, in which woman's consent is prerequisite, but proposes to disfranchise even those who contracted plural marriage before Congress declared it to be a crime.

"But in what does their crime consist? It is time to close indulging in mere assumption, in appeals to passion and religious bigotry. In New York there is no law on the statute books defining fornication as a crime, and all our pulpits are silent. You may, if unmarried, enter into sexual relations with a dozen women, so long as you do not represent them to be wives; call them your harlots, your concubines—anything but wife—and you are guilty of no criminality.

"Would it follow that if the 'miserable fanatic,' the Mormon, could be induced to strike down the sacramental relation in which he holds marriage, if he should cease to give guarantees to both the woman and society to stand by the results of this relation, he would be less open to clerical rebuke? If he adopted the suggestions of the Salt Lake City Tribune, and recognized prostitutes as social missionaries, basing his sexual relations merely on animal passion, following New York rather than biblical precedents, and lived in open and admitted fornication, there would be no law specially drafted to meet his case, the pulpit would be estopped from censure, and Christian society compelled to look elsewhere for its sacrificial goat.

"If polygamy be barbarism, our superior civilization will crush it out. But, right or wrong, be careful how you deny to even a deluded people the right of self government, brand their children bastards, and turn them over for relief to the sense of equity possessed by a board of politicians. We tolerate the Shaker in seeking to prohibit and prevent marriage—certainly necessary to social existence. Let us endeavor to tolerate the men who regulate marriage on a religious belief, and invariably condemn every plural marriage by an apostate as wanting in that consecration which can alone sanctify. A crusade against those who refuse to recognize civil marriage, as the Catholic, is full as legitimate, and would be attempted were their property centralized in a territory.

"We have learned to tolerate the religious heretic—in law at least—but not the social heretic, and the Mormon problem brings before us a test which will try our boasted liberality to the utmost. When we, as a people, go two thousand miles to deny the right of self-government because the letter, not the spirit, of the law permits it; when we deprive citizens of the right of franchise for acts of which those interested do not complain but indorse, and which involve no moral criminality; when we do this to a people upon whose moral character the only blot is in the non-Mormon portion, we strike a blow at the American idea of liberty and toleration that might well arouse Thomas Jefferson from his tomb.

"Whatever we may think of polygamy as a social system, let us be careful how we act, and not fashion a handle for an axe which may one day strike nearer home when wielded by other passions. Are there none of our statesmen who can rise above the level of prejudice and see the danger coercive measures must lead to? If moralists choose to ignore the Golden Rule, a statesman cannot be blind to the peril involved in following a course mapped out by a few political adventurers in Utah. Leave to clergymen the honor of glorying over the possible apostasy of a few thousand Mormons from a faith which has kept them from profligacy and vice, or in their emancipation from moral control, and view the subject in a far broader sense. The Mormons point to the prophecy of Joseph Smith, that the time was not far distant when they alone would be the defenders of the great principle of religious liberty. Shall the fulfilment of this prophecy come through the act of the representatives of a republic founded by Jefferson and his colleagues?

"If the Mormon home is not the childless home of the Eastern capitalist, or the home of the factory operativ, in which the bell of the mill connects with the cradle and weaves human life into the manufactured fabric, it is none the less a home, consecrated by family love and sanctified by religious observances, where the mother's devotion guides the feet of loving children. You know the Golden Rule. Apply it in this case, or tell me why not!"

In this connection it seems proper I should give the following part of a letter from Mrs. Belinda M. Pratt to her sister in New Hamphshire:

But, leaving all scripture history or precedent out of the question, let us come to nature's law. What, then, appears to be the great object of the marriage relation? I answer, the multiplying of our species, the rearing and training of children.

To accomplish this object natural law would dictate that a husband should remain apart from his wife at certain seasons, which in the very constitution of the female are untimely; or, in other words, indulgence should not be merely for pleasures or wanton desires, but mainly for the purpose of procreation.

The morality of nature would teach a mother that during nature's process in the formation and growth of embryo man her heart should be pure, her thoughts and affections chaste, her mind calm, her passions without excitement, while her body should be invigorated with every exercise conducive to health and vigor, but by no means subjected to anything calculated to disturb, irritate, weary, or exhaust any of its functions.

And while a kind husband should nourish, sustain, and comfort the wife of his bosom by every kindness and attention consistent with her situation, and with his most tender affection, still he should refrain from all those untimely associations which are forbidden in the great laws of female nature, which laws we see carried out in almost the entire animal economy, human animals excepted.

Polygamy, then, as practiced under the patriarchal law of God, tends directly to the chastity of women and to sound health and morals in the constitutions of their offspring.

You can read in the law of God, in your Bible, the times and circumstances under which a woman should remain apart from her husband, during which time she is considered unclean; and should her husband come to her bed under such circumstances he would commit a gross sin both against the laws of nature and wise providence of God's law as revealed in his word; in short, he would commit an abomination. He would sin against his own body, against the body of his wife, and against the laws of procreation, in which the health and morals of this offspring are directly concerned.

The polygamic law of God opens to all vigorous, healthy, and virtuous females a door by which they may become honorable wives of virtuous men, and mothers of faithful, virtuous, healthy, and vigorous children.

And here let me ask you, my dear sister, what a female in all New Hampshire would marry a drunkard, a man of hereditary disease, a debauchee, an idler, or a spendthrift; or what woman would become a prostitute, or, on the other hand, live and die single, or without forming those inexpressibly dear relationships of wife and mother, if the Abrahamic covenant, or patriarchal laws of God, were extended over your state and held sacred and honorable by all?

While this part of the subject is still before us let me say that in regard to remaining apart from their wives while in a pregnant state, Mormon husbands are model husbands, and are worthy following by all the husbands of America. When a wife has become in that interesting condition all sexual relations are discontinued, and the embryo child is allowed to mature without the irritations and injuries of continued sexual indulgence. In this regard the Mormons are a long way in advance of all the Christian men of the country. Sexual intemperance is one of the crying evils of our times. Tens of thousands of women are deprived of health and their days shortened in the world directly from this cause. Many cases hav been brought to my direct knowledge where clergymen have not only been the cause of the death of excellent wives from this very cause, but where two and three subsequent wives have been absolutely murdered in the same way. Clergyman are by no means the only ones guilty of this sin. It is far, far too common over the broad expanse of our country. Let every man look to his ways in this respect and not become the murderer of the woman whom law and custom have placed in his power.

It should in justice be stated that Mormon wives possess facilities for divorce equal to those enjoyed by those of any state in the Union. Both the first and subsequent wives can obtain a divorce upon almost any ground if they but so determine, even "incombatibility of temperament" being sufficient to annul the bond.

A case is reported of the wife of one of the first twelve, whose name is cherished with love by the Mormons, and who found her married life a burden, her husband shiftless and depending upon her labors for support. When at last he proposed to add to her cares by another wife, patience ceased to be a virtue, and she "spoke her mind" and sought a divorce. This was an instance where a "scandal" might be brought upon a name endeared to every Mormon, one whose reputation was regarded as bound up in the church itself, and pride alone would render the "priesthood" deaf to her claims. But her prayer was listened to and a divorce granted, and this same wife is to-day as devout a Mormon and as sincere a believer in polygamy as ever.

Whatever these Mormon women may say in favor of plural marriage, I cannot think that the fractional part of a man—say the tenth part—is more acceptable, more agreeable, than to have the man they love wholly to themselves. The close equality in numbers in the births between males and females shows that nature has made no provision for plural marriage. The fact that there are more males in Utah than females is a standing and incontrovertible argument against the Mormon theory. Every man who takes to himself more than one woman deprives some other man or men of that which is their natural right; and this is precisely of the same character as a man taking to himself ten times as much of the soil of the earth as is his share, or aggrandizes to himself ten times as much wealth in any form as belongs to him. There is no question but what monogomy—one man for one woman—is the true system of marriage, regardless of all the claims of polygamy which Abraham, Solomon, Brigham Young, and others may set up, or the system of polyandry, which the Thibetians and other orientals may claim. Many women for one man is wrong, and many men for one woman is equally wrong. One man for one woman is nature's rule, and it is unquestionably conducive to the greatest amount of happiness. That the Mormons have some argument upon their side, especially that drawn from the Jewish scriptures, must be confessed; and it is hard to see why they have not a right to that old acknowledged authority for their guide. It is also hard to see why they have not the right to regulate their own social affairs, and why their Christian enemies in the East should take it upon themselves to lay down a law for them. That the Eastern Christians are any more virtuous, or live any purer lives, or any nearer nature's demands, by no means appears. That Mormons are as faultless as their Christian opponents is made most visible.

From remarks that have been made it may be supposed that great partiality is entertained for Mormons. This is by no means the case; the desire has been to simply be just to them. So far as they found their belief and lives upon the claims of some pretended revelation, they stand on the same level with all other believers in supernaturalism, and are equally deceived with all of them. It has been my desire to show the fact that their great enemies, the Christian denominations, are behind them in many of the proofs of morality and a good life, and that those who claim superior excellence to all others are really more corrupt, more sunken in crime and degradation, than those whom they go so far to oppose and suppress In this case, as in the thousands that have preceded it, Christian procedure is rife with injustice, intolerance, and cruelty.

A word as to Mormon imperfections. Their system of ecclesiasticism is as open to condemnation as all similar institutions which the world has known. The same oppression and surveillance over members are exercised; the same or similar cumbersome and expensive church machinery is made use of; a great number of bishops, apostles, with priests, advisers, and watchmen, are constantly employed, and their services have to be paid for by the governed. The expenses of the Mormon church are heavy. The tithing, or the ten per cent of all produced, is rigorously exacted of every man and woman in the territory belonging to the church of the Latter-Day Saints. The machinery for grinding out this ten per cent of the products of every year is kept in active operation, and only shows how much this bogus religion costs the people. True, one tenth is about what it has cost in all nations and in all times to keep up priestcraft and the flummery of supernaturalism; and whether it is paid cheerfully, or is forced out by the grinding of some ecclesiastical law, when a man has no more than his family and himself require, it feels particularly oppressive to give up one-tenth of it all. But God is inexorable, and so are his priests; they must have their share, though they have not lifted a finger to earn it; yes, they must have their share though any number of men and women may starve for the want of it.

It would require a long time to give an account of the oppression by which the dignataries of the Mormon church are enabled to keep the rank and file in desired submission. This crushing machinery is kept in steady operation, and, as before remarked, it is nothing less than a serious affair for a man who has been a submissive member to throw off the ecclesiastical power and become free in mind and opinion. Those who have passed through this ordeal know best how to estimate the power and oppression of the church. It is about equal to that of the Romish church. There is, after all, but little difference between the different kinds of ecclesiastical religions. They are all oppressive of the rights of the individual; they all have ulterior and selfish designs of their own to carry out, and none of them care a straw for the natural rights of a poor man, and will take from him his last bushel of wheat, and almost the coat from his back, on the claim that the church of God requires it. This has been the rule of priestcraft in all time.

A word about Mormon intolerance. There is no question but what Christians have been very intolerant toward them, have mobbed them on several occasions, destroyed their property, murdered them, and treated them, in short, in the true Christian manner. It cannot be denied, however, that when the Mormons have obtained power they have evinced the same intolerant, persecuting spirit in return. There is no doubt about the existence of the murderous bands called the "Danites," and that they operated at the bidding and behest of the highest authorities in the church. There is no doubt that the Mormons feel the same murderous hatred toward their Christian oppressors that their Christian oppressors feel toward them. This has been the nature of all the phases of supernatural religions which the world has known. With a God vindictive, full of wrath, indignation, judgment, and dire punishment, it has been very easy for his believers and worshipers to be willing to take some of this work off his hands, and to some extent act in his stead. The Mormons have been no exception to the general rule. There is no doubt that the Mountain Meadow massacre was wholly a Mormon movement, and was committed by the high orders of the church; and it was one of the most bloody deeds that has been perpetrated on this continent. They doubtless felt that their natural enemies, the Christians, were crowding in upon them, whose ultimate design it was to drive them from the territory they had chosen, and a spirit of deep hatred was undoubtedly felt toward all new comers of their enemies. What they have felt from the encroachments of their enemies can hardly be realized. The government of the United States, moving at the dictation of the Christian churches, has so crowded upon them as to nearly drive them to desperation, to resolve them to destroy all they had accumulated in Utah, to burn their homes and villages, to leave nothing behind but the smoking ruins, and themselves seek a more congenial home within the territory of Mexico. It is probable this resolution is not yet wholly abandoned, and that if the government is too oppressive and undertakes to regulate their social affairs they may at almost any time do as they have done before, abandon their present peaceful homes and seek others under another government.

There is an irrepressible conflict between Mormons and other Christians, though they believe in the same God and in the same savior, and it is not unlikely that bloody work in Utah may grow out of this bitter antagonism. This spirit of opposition and cross purposes crops out in the efforts for Utah to be admitted as a state, although it has three times the population required by law for a territory to become a state, and over six times as much as some of the states have had which have been admitted. This palpable injustice is simply because the Mormons have a large majority in the territory, and if they are admitted as a state it would be wholly under Mormon control. They would have the power to pass just such laws as they please, and to be as oppressive upon their opponents as suited them. To avert such a state of things as this as long as possible every subterfuge will be resorted to to prevent the territory becoming a state, for so long as it is a territory it will be supplied with officials by the general government, and the Mormons are under their control. But as soon as it becomes a state all this is changed—no more United States officials will be over them, and the Mormons will have everything in their own hands. It is not strange, then, that all the anti-Mormons, whether Christians of other churches or apostates from the Mormon church, are opposed to a state government. They much prefer to endure the evils they now have than to fly to others they know not of, or rather of which they have a pretty clear idea that they will be exclusively those of Mormon rule. The Mormon problem is not yet fully solved, and in the working-out process it is difficult to say what events may occur.

Now, after making a single remark about the productiveness of the soil of Utah, let us proceed on our eastward journey. I have seen a statement that 73½ bushels of wheat on an average have been produced per acre. As a rule, wheat yields 61 bushels per acre and oats 88. The dreary wastes of alkaline plains and sagebrush have given place to luxuriant farms, flourishing gardens, and fruitful forests. But now let us

RESUME THE EASTWARD JOURNEY.

In the morning the train comes in from the West, and in due time we were rolling on our way toward home. The road winds around to the left and follows the base of the mountains, with the river on the right. The country is fertile and dotted with well-tilled farms. Seven and a half miles bring us to Uintah Station. This was the scene of the Morrisite Massacre.

Here five hundred men of Brigham Young's Mormon Legion, and five hundred who volunteered for the occasion, with five pieces of artillery, commanded by Robert T. Burton, attacked the Morrisites, whose offense was that they had presumed to do what Joseph Smith and his fellows did in the infancy of Mormonism. Joseph Morris, an apostate Mormon, had the assurance to set up for a prophet on his own account, and drew around him a goodly number of followers. Almost any man who sets up for a prophet will find a greater or lesser number of willing dupes ready to acknowledge his leadership and divine power. But Bishop Brigham could not for a moment brook that Bishop Joseph Morris should have the right to act as a prophet, and he sent his legions to put him down. General Burton attacked the Morrisites, and after three days' skirmishing, and after over twenty had been killed, the Morrisites surrendered. But the representative of the Latter Day Saints coolly shot Joseph Morris, the would-be prophet, down like a dog.

The followers of Morris consisted of about ninety able-bodied men, mostly unarmed, and over three hundred old men, women, and children. The prisoners were taken to Salt Lake City and condemned, and those who were able to work had their legs ornamented with a ball and chain, and were set at work at picking stone for building the Mormon temple to worship the great God of mercy in. On the 9th of March these unfortunates were all pardoned by the Hon. S. S. Harding, who that spring had been sent out by the United States government to act as governor of the territory.

Devil's Gate is the next station, four and a half miles distant. We have now left the Great Salt Lake valley, and passed through a gorge in the Wasatch Mountains. Whether the devil takes any charge of his gate does not appear, but probably this bit of rough real estate was ceded to him by those who did not own a foot of it, and out of mere good will for the old fellow who has had so much power to do harm, and has exercised the right to so limited a degree. Fifty feet above the seething caldron of waters the roadway passes, and above frowning rocks rear their crests far up toward the black and threatening clouds which hover over the Witches' Caldron. With bated breath one gazes on this wild scene and vainly tries to analyze his feelings, in which awe, wonder, and admiration are blended.

Peterson is the next unimportant station, and something more than nine miles more bring us to Weber, which lies between two Mormon settlements, which together are called Morgan City. The villages are separated by the river which runs through the bottom-land, most of which is under cultivation. The population is about one thousand. The effects of irrigation are to seen here in the good crops produced.

Croydon is the next station seven miles further on. Here the mountains on either side are tall, rugged, and grand. In places they seem almost dovetailed together, and then torn asunder, leaving the rough promontories and rugged chasms as so many obstacles to bar the progress. But here engineering skill has triumphed over all natural obstructions where the road could not be constructed, until it breaks forth into the plains, whence it glides away toward the Great Lake, as though exhausted with its wild journey through the canyon.

Echo City, eight and a half miles from Croydon, is situated at the foot of the bluff, which towers far aloft. It is at the western terminus of Echo Canyon. A little further on is Pulpit Rock, which is an independent tall rock with a kind of capstone. It is said Brigham Young preached a sermon from this rock when he and his band were on their weary journey to Salt Lake City.

Weber River is a stream which rises in the Wasatch Mountains, seventy miles to the south, its waters being supplied by thousands of springs, many tributaries, and the copious, everlasting snows of this mountain range. It empties into the Great Salt Lake just below Ogden, about fifty miles from Echo City. The valley of the Weber from Echo City to its source is very fertile, and thickly settled by Mormons. Coal is found at Coalville and Chalk Creek. Parley Park is a beautiful fertile valley.

Emory is the next station, and from it can be seen the Natural Bridge, a conglomerate formation, spanning a cleft in the wall. It has more than a local reputation, for it gave name to an overland stage station. The canyon here presents many points of attraction. The beauties of Echo Canyon are so many, so majestic, so awe-inspiring in their sublimity, that there is hardly a necessity of repeating their claims. Four miles below Hanging Rock the walls rise in massive majesty. Rain, frost, and time have tended to crumble and destroy the symmetry of the rocks, but in vain. Centuries have come and gone since mighty convulsions shook this locality, the time when Weber and Echo Canyons sprang into existence—"twin children whose birth was heralded by throes such as the earth may never feel again." About six miles below Hanging Rock, up to the topmost hights of the towering cliffs, a thousand feet above the bed of the canyon, can be seen the fortifications erected by the Mormons to defend this pass against the army under Johnson, sent out in 1857 by the general government. The fortifications consist of massive rocks, placed on the verge of the precipice, which were to be toppled over on the heads of the soldiers below. But the plan was never put into operation, and the rocks still remain there for the heads of some other foe.

Seven miles further on is Castle Rock. It derives its name from the long line of sandstone bluffs on the left-hand side of the canyon, and they are worn and torn away until, in the distance, they have the appearance of the old feudal castles, so often spoken of but so seldom seen. For a long distance these rocks line the left-hand bank of the canyon, their massive red sandstone fronts towering from 500 to 1,500 feet above the little valley. In ascending the canyon there is the wildest and grandest scenery imaginable.

A little more than eight miles bring us to Wasoteh, which was once a regular eating station, but a change has been made and the place is now deserted. Eleven miles more bring us to Evanston, which is now the eating station, where the trains stop thirty minutes for meals. Chinese servants wait upon the table and the meals are good. This is the county-seat of Uintah county, and is just half way between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean. The railroad company have put up good buildings here; there are some 1,500 inhabitants, and the town has a flourishing appearance.

Thirteen miles over a wild portion of road bring us to Hilliard, with a population of 400. It is a busy place. A V-flume crosses the track, twenty feet above it, in which immense quantities of lumber, ties, telegraph-poles, cord-wood, etc., are floated down from the pineries of the Uintah Mountains from twenty to thirty miles to the south. Just to the left of the station are located rows of J. C. Cameron's curious-looking beehive kilns for burning charcoal. There are about thirty of them, of two different sizes, some with a capacity for twenty, and some for forty cords of wood. These kilns can each be filled and burned three times a month, and from twenty cords of wood 1,000 bushels of charcoal are produced. This coal is mostly shipped to the smelting furnaces within reaching distance.

Aspen, five miles further on, a side track, consists of lumber piles and a water-tank. The station takes its name from the high mountain to the north called Quaking Asp. The summit of this mountain is covered with snow during most of the year. * The quaking asp, or aspen, is a species of poplar that grows in profusion in the gulches and on the sides of the mountain.

Nine miles more bring us to Piedmont, where a few dozen buildings are in sight. Burning charcoal is the principal business done here, and here are more of those curious white, conical kilns. Leroy is a side track of which much cannot be said. Bridger is five miles further on, and is about as unpretentious as Jim Bridger himself, after whom it was named, who, though, was a noted hunter and trapper on the plains. He was a Virginian by birth, and emigrated in his boyhood days to Missouri, where his parents died. Jim, being then alone in the world, joined a band of trappers who were going to the Rocky Mountains. He had not the slightest education, but when he reached the field of destination he was greatly attracted to the business of trapping, and he became very skilful at it. Beaver was the leading game, and by shrewdly studying their habits he was very successful in making captures, and the profits were large. He ultimately explored a vast amount of this mountain territory, and became familiar with its wonderful variety of wild and grand scenery. He pursued his trapping expeditions as far north as the British Possessions, as far south as Mexico, and as far west as the Pacific Ocean. He became thoroughly acquainted with all the tribes of Indians who occupy that vast expanse of country, and he was a great favorite with them. He learned from them much of what he knew of trapping. He had a great list of stories of wonderful adventures and hairbreadth escapes, with which he entertained the crowds who fondly listened to his recitals. He died in 1875 near Kansas City, Mo., having outlived the sphere of his usefulness, all the wild great West having been explored and opened up to settlement. There are cliffs here five hundred feet in hight, and one pulpit-shaped rock is called "Pluto's Outlook," which he is supposed to have used in making observations. A little further south is his majesty's stone-yard, to which the railroad company several years ago laid a track for the purpose of conveying away the abundance of flat stone which lay around in plentifulness. But a difficulty arose as to the stones. The superstitious masons took up a notion that the stones were bedeviled and would not lie still. They reported that the stones which were laid flat in their places in the after part of the day would be standing up edgewise in the wall in the morning, but after being allowed to remain in quiet they soon peacefully resumed their flat position. But the poor bedeviled masons became so frightened that they could not be induced to continue their work, and they even left the country and have not been heard of from that day to this.

Fort Bridger, ten miles in an easterly direction from the railroad, over the bluffs out of sight, was also named in honor of the celebrated trapper. It was established by A. S. Johnson in 1858.

Ten miles further on comes Carter, eleven miles north of a large sulphur spring, with a calybeate spring near by. Fourteen miles away is a mountain of coal with veins of a total thickness of eighty-seven feet, and traceable for twelve miles.

Ten miles more bring us to Hampton, a side track, and seven miles more Church Buttes, a noted place for moss agates. These beautiful stones are found along the road from Green River to Piedmont. In some places the ground is said to be literally covered with these gems, varying in size from a pea to about five inches in diameter. The outside is a dark gray and a greenish blue in spots. They do not possess very much value.

From here it is twelve miles to Grangers, and nine and a half more to Marston, a station of no importance; and seven and a half miles more bring us to Bryan, a deserted old station. The country around is barren, composed of red sand, and uninviting in the extreme. We continue on an ascending grade five miles more to Peru, and eight more to Green River, an eating station, with railroad shops, and a general air of prosperity. This locality is celebrated for its shales, named by Professor Hayden, the "Green River Shales." The walls of the bluffs rise perpendicularly for hundreds of feet, and are of a grayish-buff color. They are composed of layers, apparently deposits of all thicknesses, from that of a knife blade to that of two feet. At the base the layers are thick and composed of arenaceous clay, with laminated sandstone, mud markings, and other indications of shallow water or mud flats. The color for a hundred feet up is an ashen brown; next are lighter colored layers, alternated with green and fine white sand. Passing up clay and lime predominate, then come layers of boulders, pebbles, and small nodules. There are also seams of very fine black limestone, saturated with petroleum. Near the summit, under the shallow calcareous standstone, there are over fifty feet of shales, containing more or less oily material.

We next pass Wilkins, a small station, and then nine miles more to Rock Springs, named after a saline spring of water which boils up out of the bluffs, looking very clear and nice, but the waters do not taste nearly as well as they look. An artesian well has been sunk at the station 1,145 feet deep. The water flows to the surface at the rate of 960 gallons per hour, and at twenty-six feet above the surface flows at the rate of 571 gallons per hour. The place has 500 inhabitants. Silver and coal mines are near.

Seven miles more to Baxter, and seven more to Salt Wells. Six miles further on is Thayer, while over five additional miles bring us to Point of Rocks. Here an artesian well 1,015 feet deep supplies an abundance of pure water. Extensive coal mines are worked in the vicinity, and a hundred car loads are daily shipped to Wyoming. Five veins of coal are worked in one bluff, respectively, one, three, four, five, and six and a half feet in thickness. On the bluff just above the coal is a stratum of oyster shells six inches in thickness, which Professor Hayden, the geologist, says "is an extinct and undescribed species about the size of our common edible one." The age of these strata of coal, and this stratum of oyster shells, cannot with accuracy be decided, but it unquestionably reaches much farther back than the "beginning" mentioned in Genesis, less than six thousand years ago, when if the mountains all around the earth were not absolutely made from nothing they were brought into shape from a state of chaos. Of one thing I am quite sure, and that is that the person who wrote the book of Genesis did not have the first particle of information as to how long that stratum of oyster shells has existed in this Utah bluff, how it came there, or anything about it. The sandstone bluff, at points along the road, are worn by the action of the elements into curious, fantastic shapes, some of which have been named "Cakes of the Sand," "Hermit's Grotto," "Water-washed Caves of the Fairies," "Sanko's Bower," etc. Prof. Hayden says he has found "preserved in the rocks the greatest abundance of deciduous leaves of the popular, ash, elm, and maple." He also says: "Among the plants found is a specimen of fan-palm, which at the time it grew here displayed a leaf of enormous dimensions, sometimes having a spread of ten or twelve feet. These gigantic palms seem to have formed a conspicuous feature among the trees of these ancient forests." When the climate on these mountain elevations was so mild the palms flourished here it must have been long ages ago, and long before the Jew-Bible writers knew aught of our very aged world.

We pass the insignificant points, Hallville and Black Buttes, over fifteen miles to Bitter Creek, where the railroad company have a round-house and a machine shop for repairs. Let it be understood that we are now still on the ascending grade, and have been most of the time since leaving Ogden. We are gradually approaching the most elevated part of the Rocky Mountains which the road touches.

Ten miles of a broken, rough country separate us from Monell, a side track, and the same distance again to Table Rock, on the outer edge of the desert, which has an elevation of 6,890 feet. Off to the right can be seen a long line of bluffs, rising from fifty to five hundred feet above the surrounding country. They are mainly of red sandstone, which is composed in large part of fresh-water shells, worn, cut, and fluted by the action of the elements. One of these bluffs, which gives its name to the station, is level on the top, which rises about five hundred feet from the road and extends for several miles.

Six and a half miles more to Tipton, a side track, and we push on six miles more to Red Desert. It is a huge basin, its waters having no outlet. Several alkaline lakes are found in it, but nothing lives on its surface. The extreme breadth of the desert is thirty-eight miles. Its soil is very poor. It is composed of decomposed shale and calcareous clays, and is deep red, showing the presence of a form of iron. The southern margin of the basin is mainly sand, which is lifted up by every passing breeze, to fall in drifts and shifting mounds.

Nearly ten miles more bring us to Washakie, named after an old chief of the Shoshone Indians, who had always been friendly with the whites. Here is an artesian well 638 feet deep, which at fifteen feet above the ground flows 800 gallons of water per hour.

Eight miles divide Washakie from Latham, which is unworthy of notice, and seven miles more bring us to Creston. Sagebrush and alkali beds are still the rule, and we are on what is called the "great backbone of the continent." Its elevation is 7,030 feet. Two miles and a half west a sign-board has been erected, bearing the words: "Continental Divide," and marks the summit, 7,100 feet above the sea. This is, indeed, the grandest range of mountains on the continent. Amid what seems the wreck of the mountains one can stand and gaze in the vast distance at the receding lines of hill, valley, and mountain peaks. The cold mountain breeze can be felt on the cheek, but it brings no aroma of life and vegetation with its cooling current. To the north the Seminole Mountains rear their heads, and further on, and more to the westward, are seen the gray peaks of the Sweet Water range, and still further on are the Wind River Mountains, and their summits are robed in snow. Were a spring to throw its waters on the ridges of several of these mountain ranges, which constitute the backbone of the continent, a portion of the water would probably flow west to join the Pacific, while another portion would flow east to join the Atlantic. Still, this is far from being the highest point on the Rocky Mountains on the line of the road. Sherman, some 185 miles east, is the summit touched by the road, and is 1,212 feet higher than this point. Still this is called the Continental Divide.

Fillmore is the next station, but it amounts to little, and the train does not stop. Eight miles further on bring us to Separation, which derives its name from the fact that at this place the various parties of surveyors, who had been together or near each other for the last hundred miles, separated to run different lines to the westward. We are now descending again for the time being. Artesian wells are abundant and prolific.

Solon is a small station of little consequence, but Rawlins, six and a half miles further on, is a thrifty place of 800 inhabitants. The company have erected shops and a round-house, and division repairs are done here. The surrounding country is rough and unsightly. Sagebrush and alkali abound on all sides. It is the county seat of Carbon County, and rich mines are located thirty miles north. In reaching this station is a grand pass, 300 feet wide with the bluffs 200 feet high.

It is seven miles to Greenville, and eight more to Fort Fred. Steele. A fort was established here in June, 1868. Two miles west stood Benton City, now entirely abandoned. Three thousand people lived there in tents, but they are there no more. The population was of the hardest description, being largely thieves and prostitutes. But as the road stretched westward these birds of passage moved on also. The gray sandstone bluffs are in sight for a long time. To the south is a long, high ridge of gray granite called the "Hog Back." It runs parallel with the road for some fifteen miles, terminating in the highlands at Rawlins Springs. It is very narrow at the base, exceeding not half a mile in width, and rising from 1,000 to 3,000 feet high. The ridge is so sharp that cattle cannot be driven across it, and it is even hard for a man to cross it. Where this ridge reaches the river bank, about two and a half miles above the bridge, the walls are perpendicular and 1,500 feet high. On the south side of the ridge is a pretty little valley, through which flows a tributary of the Platte. It furnishes fine grazing, and is in marked contrast with the surrounding country.

Many years ago this green and peaceful valley was the scene of a bloody battle between the Sioux and their inveterate enemies, the Utes. The Sioux were encamped in the valley, and were surprised by the Utes, who stole on them in the gray light of the morning and attacked them furiously. Although thus taken by surprise, the Sioux fought bravely, but were surrounded and overpowered. When trying to escape they attempted to cross the "Hog Back," but every one who raised his head above the crest was picked off instantly. A portion of the band escaped in another direction, leaving their dead comrades on the field. But the Sioux were so badly whipped on that occasion that they have had very little use for the Utes since.

Here we become acquainted with the North Platte River, and see more of it several hundred miles further on. It rises in the mountains of North Park, the waters being supplied by many small tributaries. Along by the banks of this noted river once ran the overland stage route. Good lands are found at intervals along the stream. There is much of interest in connection with this valley.

Six miles further on is Wolcotts, an unimportant station. But here is a grand canyon which shows that in the long ago some serious convulsions of nature took place.

Eight miles away is Edson, but it hardly demands much attention from us. Seven and a half miles more is Dana, while six miles more bring us to Percy, a station named from Percy T. Brown, an engineer, who was killed by the Indians while employed surveying the line. During the construction of the road ties, telegraph poles, wood, and bridge timber from Elk Mountain were brought in here in great abundance. Elk Mountain is a noted landmark, and quite a curiosity in its way. It rises to a great hight, and its summit is covered with snow the year round. It has the appearance of being an isolated peak, though it is in reality the extreme northern spur of the Medicine Bow Mountains. It is, however, surrounded by rolling prairie land, and seems to rise boldly from it, rough, rugged, and alone. On the west side, it is said, the summit is easily reached by a good road made by the lumbermen. The mountain is nearly round, six miles in diameter at the base. Its sides are covered with dense forests of pine, aspen, and hemlock, and, it is somewhat peculiar, this is about the only place where hemlock flourishes along the road. It grows in profusion, with spruce in the gorges near the summit. A fine valley, twenty miles long and fifteen wide, lies to the south.

There is not much to be said of Simpson, Carbon, Niles Junction, and Medicine Bow, the next stations passed, from four to seven miles apart. Aurora was formerly called Como, and a short distance from it is a beautiful little lake named after Lake Como of Italy. It has in it a peculiar variety of fish which have legs. Though they have gills like catfish, they are pretty well provided with legs, giving them such powers of locomotion when out of the water that they waddle off several miles on their morning excursions. Here is also a variety of peculiar fossil shells, which are much sought after by tourists.

We next pass Wilcox to Rock Creek, where is a small eating station. Here the road so winds around among the bluffs that almost all points of compass are pursued. A part of the way we pass through a rough, rolling country, with snow sheds to protect the roads from snow.

We next pass over a stretch of rolling prairie twenty-five miles across, where vast herds of elk, deer, and antelope are found at different seasons of the year, the elk being mostly found in the winter, when the snow drives them from the mountains There is nothing to be said of the small stations Miner's, Harper's, Lookout, Cooper Lake, Hutton's, Wyoming, and Howel's.

Laramie City is the next point reached, of which considerable may be said. It is the enterprising county-seat of Albany county, Wyoming, for we are now in that territory, and has much improved within the past few years. A copious spring of clear, cold water which is brought in a few miles from the east flows through the principal streets. Trees line many of the streets, and the great number of new buildings that have gone up indicate a lively state of prosperity. This was for a long time the terminus of the road, and thousands of loads of freight were hauled by team to various points west. The company have extensive shops here, and among them a rolling-mill.

Laramie is noted as being the first place in America, and even in the world, where a female jury was empanelled. Their first case was that of a western desperado. They did not flinch from duty, but found him guilty, as he really was.

Laramie Plains comprise a belt of fine grazing lands sixty miles long, and twenty-five wide. Beef can be raised and fattened as cheaply as in Texas or any point in the United States. The plains are high and the frost appears early in the fall, but the summer sun cures the grass before the frost comes, so that the cold does not injure it. This was once the great range for buffalo, but they have passed away and cattle have taken their place. Stock-raising is now the great interest pursued here. It is computed that 90,000 head of cattle are in this vicinity within forty miles of Laramie, 85,000 head of sheep, and 3,000 horses and mules, valued at $2,250,000. Fifteen years ago five hundred head could not be found in all this section.

Laramie Plains or Park have an elevation of a little over six thousand feet, and they are surrounded at various distances by the Rocky Mountain peaks, rising 12,000 and 13,000 feet. At these higher altitudes snow is never invisible. Some of these mountains are covered with such dense forests of pine and spruce that the rays of the sun never penetrate to the earth. Here are appropriate haunts for such wild animals as bears, mountain lions, mountain sheep, etc. The Black Hill range is some one hundred and fifty miles northward of the plains. Rich mines have been struck in this vicinity, and it is believed many more are to be discovered.

Red Buttes is the first station eastward, and derives its name from the peculiar formations of sandstone lying between the railroad and the Black Hills. Many of the sandstone bluffs rear their peaks from 500 to 1,000 feet above the plain, and are apparently worn and washed by the elements and old time into fantastic shapes and grotesque figures. Rocks, which at a distance might be taken for castles, rise side by side with the walls of what looks to be an immense fort. Churches and cathedrals also rear their lofty hights, almost shading the lowly cottage by their side. Columns, monuments, and pyramids are curiously blended together, as though some powerful Titan had in a freak removed here the vast edifices of some remarkable city.

We pass Harney to Tie Siding, whose only importance is being the point where the greatest quantity of ties and wood were brought in for the use of the road.

The next station is Sherman, the highest point reached by the road, an elevation of 8,200 feet. It is 549 miles from Omaha, and 1,365 from San Francisco. It is far from being such a dreary-looking place as one would expect from the highest point touched by the road. A plenty of snow-capped mountains are in sight, four and five hundred feet above the surrounding country; but the high, rolling prairie looks green and as though grazing is good here and living quite possible. Snow-sheds are frequently seen, but the winters are said not to be excessively severe, and the snowfall not remarkably great. There is much sport in this vicinity in the way of hunting and fishing. The place was named in honor of General Sherman. On a high point just south of the station a monument is being erected to the memory of Oakes and Oliver Ames.

Buford is a small side-track, but here heavy rock work and snow-sheds mark the road. The country here is wild and rugged. The little valleys are covered with a fine growth of buffalo grass, with now and then a stunted pine. On either hand high masses of granite rear their gray sides, piled one on the other in wild confusion. Up, up, still higher in the background are the rocky, pine-clad peaks of the Black Hills.

Granite Canyon is seven miles further on. At this point are extensive stone quarries, whence was taken the rock for the company's buildings in Cheyenne, also for stone warehouses. Limestone abounds here, and numerous kilns show it is being utilized.

After passing Otto we come to Colorado Junction, six miles west of Cheyenne, the junction for the Colorado Central Branch. The track turns off to the south and crosses prairies and hills on its way to Colorado. The next place worthy of notice is Cheyenne, the capital of Wyoming, and the largest town between Ogden and Omaha. It is equi-distant between Ogden and Omaha, being 516 miles from either point. Its population is 5,000, and its elevation 604 feet. It has many new, fine-looking brick

The Great Deliverance.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: By the way of spicing the mental pabulum, I hav felt it my duty to use and investigate, I hav read some of the letters of Mr. Winter and others, who take an especial delight in airing their opposition to Spiritualism. They are very kind, and doubtless sincere, in trying to destroy this (to them) detestable superstition. There are times when their choice of language is not of the esthetical, cultured order, and which doubtless seems to some of us (the deluded) the least bit illiberal, coming, as it does, from those that are so entirely free from all degrading mental tendencies. Some there be of our school of thought and conviction who take exception to this Wintry method of doing things, whose answers are couched in language that stir up Mr. Winter to gather from his vocabulary of choice epithets words and expressions which, to say the least, are more expressiv than elegant.

In all seriousness, let this war of words go on; let the Winters enjoy their "Winters of discontent" at the folly of those who, in their chaste phraseology, believe in ghosts, etc. The last phase of this ponderous opposition comes in the form of the "declaration of war" by Jamieson in the Lake Pepin Gazette The fight on his part is to last a year, or, in his own words, "through about fifty numbers, in which he will expose the vagaries, absurdities, and inconsistencies of this pestilent superstition." He says, "one thing at a time," therefore he will abstain from everything else until he has killed the spiritual snake, logically. He further says he does not mean to say a word, personally, against any of us who believe these vagaries, absurdities, and inconsistencies, except the criminal portion, for which generosity he has our thanks; but he does mean, as we assail without stint Christianity, to make us take from him the same kind of medicin. He assures us that he is fully competent to perform all he undertakes, as he has an experience of twenty-five years among the Spiritualists and Spiritualism in all its phases. He is careful to let us know at the outset that he has been persecuted by those with whom he labored for a quarter of a century, and he cannot conceive how, as Liberals, they can be so unjust to one (him) whose clear visions discovered, after over twenty year's investigation, that they and he had been the veriest simpletons to believe such vagaries, inconsistencies, and absurdities; and that instead of persecuting they do not hail him as their great deliverer. Of course, this is all clean work on his part; and though to us it looks the least bit sensational, as well as uncomplimentary to his opponents, to call us fools to begin with, his undoubted honesty, ability, and impassioned desire for our welfare sufficiently sugar-coat the pills he will make us swallow.

Parties will differ, and my experience of Spiritualists and Spiritualism differs widely from Mr. Jamieson's. I hav an experience of over thirty years, hav had very strong evidence of its truthfulness in our own home, and nothing short of the edition of the Lake Pepin Gazette has been able to shake my convictions in this (so far) to me, positiv evidence of continued conscious individual life after I pass out of my earthly body. Of course, I defer to him, as he spent his whole time in talking to, with, and for (in the main) this deluded class. He feasted with them, traveled with them, slept at their homes, heard and saw this strange people in all their whims, moods, and peculiarities; and at last, after two decades and more had mingled their histories with past times and seasons, discovered the pestilent superstition that enshrouded them. Marvelous discovery! One so far-reaching in its mental and moral salvation that we are assured the long-looked for "coming man" is here.

Though I think Mr. Jamieson a little mistaken regarding his supposed persecution, as I know nothing of that particular element in our ranks worth the mention, it is true that there is, to some extent, a lack of enthusiasm on our part to run wild over any and every change of a mental nature that takes possession of those who assume to be our teachers and leaders; and there is a growing tendency on our part to think and believe that most of those who spend the greater part of their lives in pure talk-work, and seldom soil their hands or test the endurance of their muscles in manual labor, are less practical than those who do, and really, on general principles, not the best material for human and Liberal leadership.

It is said that "all rules hav their exceptions," and therefore we wish it understood that Mr. Jamieson is the exception to this growing tendency. According to my simple conception, twenty years seems a long time to use in making the discovery of the tissue of vagaries, absurdities, and inconsistencies which the pestilent superstition includes, in order to be fully equipped for its demolition Even with my shallow comprehension, a few months were sufficient to expose the abominations of orthodoxy, the wickedness of chattel slavery, the weakness, as well as folly, to doubt the safety of investigating any and all subjects that directly or remotely relate to the well-being of our race, and the comfort and well-being of the lower orders that contribute to our health and pleasure. We, the common people, desire most earnestly, however, the aid of all influences that will add to our mental freedom and material prosperity; and therefore if Mr. Jamieson, or any one else whose life-work is purely of the mental order, can add to our sum of human happiness a clearer perception of the use and meaning of life in the here and now, he and they shall hav our best wishes for their contributions.

It is a source of genuin mirth to me to witness the persistency and anxiety of the school of Mr. Winter and our dear sister Elmina to rescue the Spiritualists from their delusion and make us more useful in the actual duties of this mundane life. They seem entirely to overlook how much they parade their own superiority by constantly telling us that we, unlike them, ignore or forget a part of our present duty by thinking too much about the duties and pleasures of a future existence. Is it not barely possible that we do our duty in the present as well as they? And is it not also probable that our opinions giv to existence a greater importance from the fact of believing that this is the rudimentary stage, and that the only way to lay its foundations deep and strong, symmetrical and beautiful, is to carry out all the details of honesty, equity, courage, and love in the every-day relations of life?

While they work so energetically in our behalf, we trust their endurance will not be weakened by an over amount of sorrow and commiseration at our condition, for we are unconscious of our sufferings.

The charge that we believe in the supernatural I hold to be downright dishonesty, unworthy the utterance of any person who takes exception to much we do believe. There would be some show of moral and mental decency in these continued iterations against us did we, more than the ultra-Material school, shirk our duty in occupying the front ranks of radical reform. I affirm positivly, to my own personal knowledge, that those who sustain the Liberal League are largely made up of Spiritualists, or those partially inclined that way. The same is true of the supporters of The Truth Seeker; and be they superstitious or not, they are generous, brave, and industrious.

No one will hail with greater delight than myself the displacement of any error, however long or dearly cherished, by placing in its stead the better position of advanced truth; and as agitation is essential for the purpose, we bid it welcome, even though it is clothed at times in a very uncouth and forbidding garb.

We hope that all Mr. Jamieson writes on this subject will be well read, pondered, and digested by those who take his paper and hav the time. I can do neither, as my time is too limited to use in that way, for the simple reason that my duty compels me to choose carefully how the hours left for mental improvement are occupied.

I will be honest with Mr. Jamieson by telling him that I hav read a good many of his reported debates, and though, as a whole, they were smart and logical, yet as they were on (to me) the old threadbare story of the Bible, I was not able to see that they did much to advance human progress. I think that what Herbert Spencer says in his small work on "Education" outweighs the whole. I know many others think differently, and their opinions I respect. I hav none but friendly feeling to Mr. Jamieson, and should he come our way he would be made welcome at our home, and should he lecture, I would spare the time to hear him.

To my Spiritualistic friends I would say, those of you who hav the time, taste, and means to read the Lake Pepin Gazette, do so and report; boil down his heavy artillery shots of logic; giv us the exact truth of his scientific warfare. If he is capable of breaking up those glacial formations of superstition, and can hurl them from their beds in the mountain of faith, conviction, and prejudice, giv him the opportunity, and let those of us of this generation that remain to see the result of his herculean efforts, as well as the generations that follow, hail him as the great deliverer—the world's noble benefactor. We earnestly hope that truth, and truth alone, will be the gainer; and whether it comes through scientific logic, egotistic speculation, or plodding, patient groping in the dark for it, when found it is bright and precious, and those who fail to appreciate its value are the losers.

To my conception, Spiritualism, Materialism, or any other, or no ism, are an aid or hindrance just in their proportion to stimulate or make us indifferent to mental, moral, and material progress. To some minds one or the other is best adapted, and there is yet a small per cent that even orthodoxy will do the most good. While there they are activ in some fair missionary work, whereas, when convinced that orthodoxy is false, and any Liberal forms of ideas better, giv up all effort to help others and won't go a cent on their convictions. I don't think there is any continued life for this class of lazy Liberalists Their germ of moral consciousness will die with dry-rot, and no principle in nature can resuscitate it.

However wise we are, or may be, in our present conceits, science will yet demonstrate that "there are more things in nature than is dreamt of in our philosophy." Will Mr. Jamieson please make a note of this, so that in his mighty warfare he may discover and uncap them, to the consternation and dismay of those subject to the vagaries, absurdities, and inconsistencies of the pestilent superstition?

Liberal League Notes from Mrs. Lake.

A chain of unforeseen circumstances has again brought me to Milwaukee, the most beautiful city of the West. It is, in many respects, a paradise as compared with Chicago. But there is one thing of which Chicago has especial reason to be proud, and that is its large and flourishing League. I learn that the hall will not contain the numbers who assemble. But alas for Milwaukee! An evil influence seems to operate against its Leagues. The first died, I believe, of conservatism; the last bids fair to die of too much respectability. You remember, Truth Seeker readers, that it started vigorously and promisingly at the time of Mr. Bennett's reception here; but it has been, unfortunately, officered entirely by men who seem to hav constituted themselvs lay-members, committee, officers, and all combined, managing the affairs of the concern with sublime indifference to the views or wishes of any one else. They hay vigorously and doggedly opposed the equality of women in the organization, and, I understand, as occasion offered, one of these so-called officers has taken it upon himself to question the morals of members, and of a proposed woman speaker. In short, this League seems to be a Man's Rights League, run on the cast-iron, simon-pure, consensus-of-the competent basis of morality.

But it is perhaps as well to hav these questions arise now as at any future time. Sooner or later it must be settled whether the National Liberal League is a moral police force or not. There has been a lively skirmish between Mr. Underwood and Messrs. Wakeman, Bennett, and Leland on this same question. It is about time that others were taking a hand in the matter and endeavoring to arrive at some conclusion.

I hold, with many others, that the National Liberal League is organized for the purpose of secularizing the government; that it welcomes whoever will assist in this work, whether he be religious or anti-religious, conservativ or Socialist, monogomist, varietist, or Shaker. It matters not what the views or the life of an individual are—whether he believe in wine-drinking or in total abstinence; whether he believe in free land, free love, and free money or not. The supreme question is, and the only question is, Will you work for the secularization of the government?

The chief reason, in my opinion, for the decay of Leagues lies in the fact that when they are organized it is not with the thorough understanding that the moral character of every member is something with which the League has nothing whatever to do; and, further, that no question which pertains to the welfare of the human race is to be denied expression on its platform. A Liberal League whose primary and specific object is the secularization of the government is also an educator, or it ceases its activity as a society. It can find but little to hold it together unless its members unite in an earnest purpose to put before the community a variety of ideas for mental development and moral stimulation. Land, labor, and marriage reform, prohibition and anti-prohibition (all functions of government, and things which interest the individual), must find a welcome from the members of a Liberal League.

I think the Chicago League owes its life and popularity to the fact that during the last year the subjects presented on its platform hav been almost everything from God to Nihilism; from voice culture to heredity. And the only question in regard to hearer or speaker has been, Can he speak or can he listen?

No organization composed of such heterogeneous elements as are attracted to a Liberal League can ever expect to be permanent which does not build upon a basis as broad as the sovereignty of the individual.

It is true that there are organizations, like some of the Spiritual associations, which keep up their interest and their work, while limiting the expressions of their speakers and requiring virtually a test of membership. But these hav some sort of a creed or government which a truly Liberal organization cannot formulate. And, if there is one thing more than another that I desire to be instrumental in establishing and perpetuating, it is associations of people which will consider no subject which can be discussed by man too sacred, and no question relativ to the welfare of the human race irrelevant to its work. As Freethinkers, we are interested not only in the form of government under which we liv, but in industry, art, and literature. This is why we read and discuss the poems of Whitman. We do not all come to the same conclusions in regard to them. To some they are immodest and impure, many of them. To others they are revelations only of nature, and by them all nature is regarded as worshipful. Whatever my individual opinion may be of "Leaves of Grass," I should consider myself a bigot if I found myself unwilling to listen to Mr. Chainey's views and interpretation of the poet. And if any of the delegates of the St. Louis Congress felt oppressed that he was invited to express himself upon this subject, it appears to me that his or her Liberalism was chiefly confined to anti-Christianity. We must learn to listen to views other than those we entertain, as peradventure we may thereby learn something.

I hav at times been not a little amused, in my lecturing experience, with the bigotry of some members of the Liberal League. I hav in mind now a prominent and influential member of an excellent League for which I spoke for several months. This gentleman was a warm admirer of my anti-Christian work, and had subscribed generously to the lecturing fund. In making my engagement I had stipulated, as I always do, that I should speak upon any subject which I chose. During the course, and being deeply interested in the condition of unhappy Ireland, I gave a lecture on the Irish land question. A large and intelligent audience listened with evidence of approval to the sentiment; but my good friend, happening by the accident of birth to be an Englishman, and not having outgrown national prejudices, was greatly offended at the lecture and refused longer to sustain the course. At another time, the president of the League, who was a Materialist, absented himself from a lecture upon Spiritualism, because he "did not believe in it." I mention these circumstances to illustrate what I consider the illiberality of professed Liberals.

I hav said that we are interested in art as well as government. I yesterday witnessed the efforts of ex-Rev. George C. Miln to interpret Shakspere's great character of Hamlet. I understand there was an old gentleman in the audience who came eighty miles for the same purpose. He was certainly repaid. Mr. Miln is a fine actor, notwithstanding the fact that the Dramatic News insinuates that he cannot be because he has "denied his creator." He has an excellent voice, a good presence, an expressiv countenance, and a most clear and intelligent meaning of the author whom he interprets. He has ease, grace, and spirit. He must certainly succeed, and we shall all be glad to hav him do so, because we respect and appreciate a man who will not fill a pulpit as a hypocrit.

It would be well if the nerve to announce convictions could be imparted to the multitude of people who, while thinking differently from the majority, yet apparently coincide with them. We should be truth tellers and truth actors, as well as truth seekers. MRS. H. S. LAKE.

California Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Now that the political dust has settled and the tide of human passion, which has for some months past swept like a hurricane over our state, has abated, we are met full in the face by the fact that Republicanism is literally "scooped" in this state. Beer bosses and bolters are responsible for the defeat, as local causes. The Republican platform went just far enough to alarm the German voters on the question of temperance, while it failed to giv satisfaction to the Prohibitionists. It antagonized the liquor element, and yet lost the support of the teetotalers. Thus, between the two fires on one side and lukewarmness on the other, our entire state ticket was defeated.

The course taken by the Germans in this state seems to be confirmed by similar action in the East; hence, we may set it down as a fact that this element of Republican strength—the German vote—will not stand in with any party who threaten to interfere with their individual liberty in the matter of beer and Sunday enjoyments.

A second cause of complaint with voters has been the imperious conduct of the party bosses, who cracked their whip in vain this year to drive voters into the traces.

All over the country the same spirit of revolt has shown itself in uprisings against these dictatorships, and the rebuke to these upstart whip-masters has been complete and, we hope, final.

Thousands of honest Republicans in this state concluded to let the ship sink, in order to drown the rats, bosses, and thieves which swarmed her deck, and thus make her seaworthy for the storm of '84.

Invested power tends to corruption and needs watching and changing hands, and the most effectiv way to correct a corrupt party is to defeat it.

Now let Republicanism take a back seat and browse for the next two years on the pale buds of defeat, and in the mean time learn that the voters of the party need to be consulted, and that bosses should be servants, not masters of the people.

But, while it is true that local causes hav conspired to bring defeat in this state to the Republican party, there is a wide-spread cause operating in every state of this Union.

When Conkling bought New York and Garfield refused to pay the price which made him President, and thereby lost his life, it became apparent to thinking Republicans everywhere that the methods of party warfare are corrupt, and it is only a question of time when the destruction of our republic will come, as the result of a perverted use of political power. And that blow which killed Garfield has fallen like clods on the coffin of Republicanism throughout the land. Bosses and bossism hav by their corrupt practices perverted the power of the people to base uses and personal ends, and the only salvation for our people lies in a speedy return to clean methods and right principles.

To this general cause may be attributed the coldness and inharmony in the Republican party, producing a stampede from her ranks—an infection which has spread like a sheep-rot over the entire land, and like the sheep-rot needs to be dipped in a baptism of correct principles.

I see by the papers that R. G. Ingersoll, in an interview, has set forth the causes of defeat as being corruption in the party which has bred up an army of half-breeds, or half-hearted Republicans, who by their split tickets burst the party wide open, and that Sherman is the available man to unite the factions in '84. Not so. I hope the leaders of our party will be wise, and not tamper longer with false expedients to mislead the people.

We don't want any more old has-beens or military men with only a war record to commend them to the suffrages of the people. Giv us a civilian and statesman, whose record will place him in sympathy with the laboring classes of our country.

The rapid centralizing of wealth, and especially by the transportation companies of the country by unfair discriminations against the producers of the country, has brought anti-monopoly to the front as a living political issue. And if the Republican party is wise she will not bring out any old moss-covered soldier, but a living man, whose heart is in sympathy with the toiling masses—the only producers of wealth and the true supporters of national life and prosperity.

The canvass through which we hav just passed, involving as it did the Sunday law and temperance question, developed some facts which will be a lesson to the wise, if not to the Sunday law fanatics and temperance cranks which abound in this state.

The Sunday law and temperance questions should never be coupled with partisan politics, but should be made separate issues before the people; and the forcing of these issues upon our party by the League of Freedom, or liquor-selling element of this state, was the local cause which broke our back. Prohibition cannot be sustained in this wine-producing country, which is developing so much wealth in the culture of the grape; and that doctrin of force which temperance cranks adhere to is doing no good, but much harm, by creating antagonism and bad blood to no good purpose.

This absolute prohibition of all stimulants cannot prevail in this state; the average man will hav a tipple of some sort. But if the friends of temperance would make war upon distilled liquors, and leave the wine, beer, and cider out of the question, I think they could succeed in such prohibition in this state.

Now, Brother Bennett, in conclusion, let me say you don't know how gratified I was to see your beaming countenance at the head of quite an elaborate sketch of your career as a prominent American Freethinker in the San Francisco Post, the fairest, cleanest, and best paper in San Francisco, and I hope to liv to see the day when the Chronicle, and other papers here which attempted to cast odium upon you and the people who sustained you, will be dead and damned, as they richly deserve to be. Cultured Freethought is a fine thing; but a common honesty which leads us to a proper appreciation of the men and women who stand in the front against the enemies of mental freedom, toiling night and day to break the yoke of slavery and lift the clouds of superstition, is a better thing.

What the people want to-day is a sincere, frank expression of the truth in good, wholesome English, and not a hair-splitting wordiness which swamps its ideas of truth.

I see that you hav reduced the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER to $2.50, and I truly hope you may realize an increased subscription list to sustain you in keeping up, as I think it the best Freethought paper in the world; and I for one will do what I can to that end. Prohibition, the Jesuit.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 7, 1882, is a letter from D. O. Irwin, in favor of prohibition. He appears to think that "it is within the province of a free government to prohibit the right of the citizen to drink a glass" of wine. The citizen has rights that no government, free or otherwise, has any right to meddle with. It is the right of the citizen to wear what color of clothes he pleases, eat whatever he pleases, to drink whatever he pleases, and to believe whatever appears to him true. The right of any government is denied to dictate to the citizen what he must eat or drink, or the color and fashion of his coat, or to interfere with his belief. If a government can dictate what a man must drink, that is telling him what must enter his stomach, and the next will be what must enter his head, and the cut and shape of his hat. A citizen who conscientiously believes that a glass of wine will do him good is to hav his conscience outraged because some one else drank until he became a sot. This sot, in company with other sots, makes a society of repressed reprobates, and then they want to tyrannize over the conscience of sober men and cry for prohibition.

The argument of prohibition is the stronghold of the Jesuit; he prohibits your belief, he denies your right to differ from the church, and the prohibitionist denies your right to differ from the views of the reformed sots.

The reformed sot and his admirers say that drink is the cause of all the misery which is seen to accompany the drinking of alcohol. This is not the logical truth. The cause of all the misery is the love for the drink, the passion for the fuddle. Remove the love for the drink, do away with the passion for the stimulant, then the evil will cease. If the prohibitionists cannot prohibit the love for drink they cannot stop the sot.

The prohibitionist says drink is poison. The vegetarian says flesh (meat) is death, and more destructiv to society than drink. The anti-tobacconist says tobacco is insanity. The anti-vaccinationist says vaccine is filth, and its compulsion a crime. The Freethinker says the Bible is worse than alcohol. What a merry society it would be where each one of these parties could procure prohibition for his favorit hobby! Let us look at the anti-vaccinationist. He is not allowed to protect his own child. The doctor must be the guardian of the child by an act of a "free government," and this is what the prohibitionist wants to protect sober men from becoming sots. Then make a law that shall destroy the love for drink. The anti-vaccinationist asks only to be left to cure his own child. Then let the prohibitionist act likewise—win his cause by fair argument, not by coercion. Prohibition teaches too much. Like the case of the Freethinker, the Bible is more destructiv to human progress than alcohol. Alcohol is bad; the Bible is worse. Prohibit alcohol says the sot admirer. Prohibit the Bible says the Freethinker. Prohibit alcohol and we are rid of the rumseller. Prohibit the Bible and we are rid of the priest. I am a Freethinker, and I say let the Bible stand. It will fall before the march of intellect. I am a sober man, and I say let alcohol stand. Its use will die out as the sensational doctrins die out. Excitement will die under the force of reason and experiment. Never put your hand on your neighbor's throat. It is a bad argument, for he has the same right to your throat. If you hav got a hobby ride it, and let your neighbors ride theirs. Do not ask for a law to stop them, or they may turn the tables on you and ask for a law to break your hobby.

JACK STRAW.

THE Massachusetts Democrats, in convention assembled, on the 19th day of September, 1882, adopted a declaration of principles set forth in separate articles of which the second was in these words: "Equal rights, equal powers, equal burdens, equal privileges, and equal protection by law under the government for every citizen of the republic, without limitation of race or sex or property qualification, whether it be by a tax on property or a poll tax on persons." If these words mean anything they constitute a pledge on the part of the Democrats of Massachuetts to do all in their power to giv women the right to vote. This is a plank of the platform by means of which Major-Gen. Benjamin F. Butler has ascended to the highest place in the glorious old Commonwealth, and alone of all men in the United States has become entitled to be addressed as "Your Excellency." Every woman will rejoice at Butler's success. It means a recognition of those rights which hav been vindicated by so eminent a philosopher as John Stuart Mill, and which no husband should be afraid to see conferred upon his wife. The women of Massachusetts might well adorn with garlands the pathway along which the soldier, statesman, and lawyer will go to Cambridge on commencement day to take the high seat among the august dignitaries of Harvard University. —Sun.

buildings, and has considerably the appearance of a young city. Churches and schoolhouses abound, with banks, two daily papers, good hotels, and all the paraphernalia of modern civilization. But little land appears to be cultivated around the city, and, with the exceptions of a few gardens, the country is principally occupied in grazing.

The early history of Cheyenne is a hard one. On the fourth day of July, 1867, there was one house in the place; but the growth was rapid, for in the spring of 1869 there were six thousand inhabitants. A plenty of roughs, thieves, gambling hells, prostitutes, and most disreputable places disgraced the town. The dance-houses and wild orgies which prevailed here every night were of a most fearful character, and murders and assassinations were of frequent occurrence. This lasted until quiet business men, getting tired of such conduct, organized a vigilance committee and brought the vile offenders to summary justice. Several of the most noted offenders were found swinging at the end of a rope, and ultimately it was discovered to be a rather unhealthy place for evil-doers Many took the hint and reformed their ways, and others had the good sense to leave town and go on with the railroad in its western march. Cheyenne is now as orderly a place as any of its size.

As we are now pretty well over the mountains, and as I propose to take a run of a few days into Colorado, it seems a suitable place to bring this letter to a close. Yours sincerely, D M. B.

Mr. Heywood's Preliminary Examination.

On the morning of November 24th the telegraph brought us the intelligence that Mr. Heywood had had his preliminary examination before Commissioner Hallet, in Boston, on the day previous, and had been held for regular trial. Elizur Wright was present, and offered himself as bondsman for Mr. Heywood; but this Mr. Heywood declined, deciding if he could not be held on his own recognizance, or on his word of honor, he preferred to go to prison. Accordingly he was locked up in jail. His decision was very different from what ours would hav been under the same circumstances. We would be in favor of keeping out of prison just as long as possible, and would gladly hav availed ourselvs of Mr. Wright's bail.

It seems Mr. Heywood was examined on "Cupid's Yokes" and the quotations from Whitman, but was held only on the charge of advertising and selling a syringe for the prevention of conception. This specification, or charge, is such a positiv violation of the law that there seems no chance for Mr. Heywood's escape. He must hav been convinced of the risk he was taking upon himself to act so directly in face of the law, and cannot be disappointed at the verdict that is very sure to be rendered.

There is no question but what the law is a most unrighteous one. The prevention of conception is a legitimate right which every married pair can inquire into and practice whenever they choose to do so. If parents hav not the right to take some measures to govern the size of their families, what in the world hav they the right to take into consideration? It would seem that so long as they hav to feed and clothe their offspring, they also hav some right to decide how numerous that offspring shall be. It makes considerable difference whether a poor, delicate woman shall bear four children, or fourteen, and the question of feeding, clothing, and educating them is one of vital importance to the father. Parents hav no just right to bring more children into the world than they are able to take proper care of. There is no destiny, no overruling power, that decides how many children each family shall hav, and it is quite within the province of parents to take this matter into their own hands.

There are many modes of preventing conception, but the most effectual that we hav ever heard of is for the sexes to not come together. If, then, prevention is wicked and unlawful, this is the most wicked of all, and if Comstock's law is right, every person or persons guilty of the outrage should be sent to state prison during life.

This Comstock law, making it a state prison crime to sell or use anything for the prevention of conception, is an exceedingly great outrage, and shows the vast danger of having the enactment of our laws depend in any way upon a meddlesome, unprincipled, ecclesiastical society. The time will unquestionably come, whether it is in our day or not, when this law will no longer be on the statute books of our country, and when fathers and mothers can exercise the right of determining what the size of their families shall be. When a citizen from a given state takes it upon himself to go skulking, sneaking around into other states, like a thief, seeking some one he may entrap and cast into prison, it is time for reform.

It is to be supposed the designing, malicious, and unprincipled Comstock is now filled with Christian happiness. He has succeeded in wresting Mr. Heywood from his family, and has him in prison. That is the kind of thing that givs this characteristic Christian more joy than anything else in the world. We do not pray very much, but we do hope the time will come when this officious, evil-minded person will hav less power in this country than he has had for the last eight or ten years. In the changes which politics promis us, let us hope that Comstockism is not always to rule this land.

It must remain a question whether Mr. Heywood's mode of opposing this Comstock law is the most effectiv one. It would be very desirable for some party of weight and influence to oppose it on the merits of it, and to show up its great injustice; but in the absence of that, whether Mr. Heywood's making a martyr of himself, and lying a year or two in prison for violating it, is going to tend to the death of the law, each person has the right to decide for himself

This much is not difficult to see: E. H. Heywood is now occupying the position of an uncondemned culprit, at the foot of our great Department of Justice. He is regarded as a man who has trampled upon the great laws of our land. At the other extreme of this great Department of Justice sits in regal splendor Attorney-General Benjamin H. Brewster. The daily papers bring us glowing accounts of the richness and grandeur which he has drawn around him, in the way of ebony chairs and lounges, covered with the finest morocco, with a center-table that cost $250, and the lace cover of which cost $100. The carpet cost $1 200, and to walk upon it is enough to cause one to imagin himself to be treading upon down. The rug alone cost $150. But the curtains are more extravagant than all; they are made of the finest silk plush, rich and dazzling in texture, lined and interlined with fine Turkish satin, with cardinal cords and tassels. There are four windows in his office, and as the curtain for each window cost $300, the entire set cost $1,200. The complete outfit of his office cost $10,000.

Here sits in state our attorney-general, who has it in his power, as with the wave of his hand, to cause the charges against Mr. Heywood to be laid aside and he set at liberty. But, surrounded as he is by such luxury, it is scarcely to be expected that he will hav one thought for poor Heywood, who is pining away in a cheerless prison. The difference, however, between the two persons at the two extremes of our Department of Justice cannot be lost sight of.

Since writing the foregoing we hav received a card from Mr. Heywood, dated at Princeton, Mass., from which we infer he is not in prison.

The Infamous Liar and Slanderer.

Joseph Cook is roaring like a bull over the land, retailing more lies and slanders than any other man in the country, and his credulous hearers swallow it down as though it were gospel truth. He is approaching the East, and we get fuller reports of his false mouthings. He took it upon himself to abuse us and lie about us in Asia, and in our letters from that part of the world we showed up his falsehoods; and now since he is repeating the same lies here at home he requires a little more of our attention. The following paragraph is from a report of his speech in Chicago:

> Mr. Cook went on to tell how he exposed the record of D M. Bennett, the New York Infidel editor, while lecturing in Bombay, and how Bennett came to his lecture with a horsewhip which he did not use. He said that contemporaneously with the appearance of Bennett in Bombay there were distributed advertisments of obscene literature. Only south of the Tweed could the Atheist Bradlaugh get a hearing, and if Infidelity dared to be as frank in England and the United States as it was in France everybody would see what it meant. French Atheism declared that the beginning of wisdom was the hatred of God, and the logical implication of Atheism was the deification of the body and of the gratification of passion. Female seminaries in the United States dared not publish catalogs of their pupils for fear the ghouls of Infidelity would use the post-office to carry pollution into the minds of innocent girls. Mr. Cook said he was responsible for every word he uttered, and then went on to say that Atheism and Materialism gravitated naturally to Freelove. Shake apart the husks and the viper would fall out. Ingersoll had done nothing but rehearse Thomas Paine's arguments and was not even abreast of the times in the Infidel camp. The speaker could not believe that he was sincere in his attacks on Christianity, and believed that it would be ridiculous to attempt to answer such frivolous talk. Ingersoll was in a muddle, and had begun to doubt his own doubts Atheism was a creed infinitly ridiculous, and ninety-eight out of a hundred of the most prominent thinkers of the day were believers in a personal God and friendly to Christianity. Thomas Paine had become the scorn of learned Infidels; and there was not a complete edition of Theodore Parker's works in all New England.

1. Here are ten distinct, blatant, and out-and-out falsehoods in this short extract, besides some insinuations meaner than falsehoods. The first, about our carrying a concealed horsewhip to a lecture of Joseph Cook's in Bombay; there is not a particle of truth in the charge. When we attended his lecture, we did so as quietly and properly as any person in the audience, and had with us no horsewhip or weapon of any kind. Besides repeating this lie in Asia and Australia, he is now retailing it here, and what is still worse, he is inducing his wife to repeat the same lie. By one report we see she is said to hav made the same false statement. It is quite enough for him to tell this foolish lie, and he ought not to ask her to demean herself by repeating it.

2. The next lie is meaner and more malicious. He says contemporaneously with our appearance in Bombay were distributed advertisments of obscene literature. This has not a shade of truth. We had no advertisments or circulars of any kind in Bombay, or at any other point on our journey—certainly nothing of an indecent character. If Joseph Cook will produce a single advertisment having the slightest connection with us, and of an obscene character, we will giv him a thousand dollars.

3. His wide jump to Bradlaugh shows the rambling character of the man. Bradlaugh has good audiences north of the Tweed, but it is possible the Presbyterians of Scotland militate against his views. Bradlaugh has large audiences wherever he speaks.

4. The lying insinuation about Infidelity in England and the United States, not daring to be frank, need not be dwelt upon. The liar sticks out in every utterance.

5. We are not able to say very much as to the declaration of principles on the part of French Infidels, but hav no doubt Cook lies egregiously. We do not believe they declare that the logical implication of Atheism is "a deification of the body and the gratification of passion." They unquestionably believe nature infinitly superior to the dogmas of supernaturalism, and so teach.

6. The next lie is the basest and meanest of all, and that is that "female seminaries in the United States dare not publish catalogs of their pupils for fear that the ghouls of Infidelity would use the post-office to carry pollution into the minds of innocent girls." No insinuation or lie could be baser and more despicable than this. Slander and defamation could not go deeper. Joseph Cook is challenged to produce one Infidel in the United States who has used the mails to pollute the school-girls of any seminary. The base liar says he is responsible for what he says. Possibly his responsibility may be tested.

7. The next lie is that Atheism and Materialism gravitate toward Freelove. There is no truth in this. Atheists liv as upright lives as any people in the world. Not a half of one per cent are Freelovers—a far smaller proportion than in the Christian church, and especially among the clergy.

8. The charge that Paine was insincere is a most false one. A more sincere man never wrote.

9. The assertion that Thomas "Paine has become the scorn of learned Infidels" is false in the extreme. Every well-informed Infidel reveres the honesty and vigor of Paine, and his writings hav never had so wide a reading as within the past few years.

10. The lie, "Ingersoll is in a muddle," is on a par with the rest. No man was ever clearer than he, or had the ability to impress his views more upon the minds of others.

Cook seems to take up a bundle of lies and throw them around among his audience as though they were as good as truth. Such is the falsity of the system he advocates that lies seem to answer his purpose better than the truth. Had he common decency, had he the instincts of a gentleman, were he something more than a crude, ecclesiastical hog, it might be worth while to discuss with him the utter falsity of the system he upholds; but he is unworthy any decent man's attention.

Perhaps a little charity should be exercised toward him on account of the unsound state of his mind. An insane asylum was his home, and had he been retained there longer there would hav been less injustice in it than in several cases which hav recently been brought to light.

If, however, the alleged cause of his insanity is true, it lessens the charity that might be exercised. If self-abuse was the cause, but slight sympathy is due him. If he will learn to make some approaches to truth in his public statements, it will be more commendable on his part as a professed public teacher.

Woodruff, of Michigan, and other good speakers are invited to be present. Fred H Pierce (now located at Berlin, Wis.), who at the last meeting is said to hav given some of the finest tests ever offered in this place, will also be present. Prof. C. P. Longley's music, so well liked by Spiritualists, will be used by the choir through the convention. It is expected that steps will be taken to organize a state society.

The Transit of Venus.

This astronomical phenomenon, which will take place on the 6th inst., will be the fifth transit of Venus recorded in the annals of history. The preceding four took place in the years 1639, 1761, 1769, and 1874. Kepler predicted that a transit would occur in 1631, but it passed unobserved; and it is said that owing to the inaccuracy of his tables he failed to detect the transit that would take place in 1639. This, too, would also hav passed, like its predecessor, unobserved had it not been for the enthusiasm and independent enterprise of a young Englishman, Jeremiah Horrocks by name, the curate of a church in the north of England. Though only eighteen years of age, he had mastered all known astronomical problems. He discovered that the Rudolphine Table, published by Kepler, indicated a near approach of a transit of Venus. The desire to witness the wonderful sight induced him to study by day and night the tables of Kepler. He discovered an inaccuracy in the calculations, worked out a table for himself, and predicted a transit for November 24, 1639. With his intimate friend, William Crabtree, to whom he had divulged his secret, he patiently waited for the advent of the time that should verify his prediction. The 24th of November fell upon Sunday. His astronomical observations clashed with his clerical duties, but he was brave enough to stand at his post. He believed his duty to science to be higher than all others, and the world has indorsed that belief.

The young astronomer sat in a darkened room, with the image of the sun reflected through a small telescope upon a white screen, over which the planet Venus must pass if his predictions were correct. His patient labor was rewarded. On his return from service, which he attended only to secure his release, he discovered the tiny black speck that marked the passage of Venus across his disk. Thus by the neglect of the functions of the priest for those of the scientist he won the honor of being the observer of the first transit ever seen by the human eye.

The untimely death of Horrocks at the age of 22 robbed the world of one who, had he lived, might hav been the greatest of astronomers.

Transits of Venus were for a time looked upon only as astronomical curiosities, until, in 1677, Halley, while observing a transit of Mercury, discovered their scientific value as a means of determining the sun's distance from the earth.

On the 6th of the present month the great events of the inferior conjunction and transit of Venus take place. Such is the importance attached to the phenomena, says the Scientific American, that the planetary interest of the month culminates around the fairest and brightest of the solar brotherhood. Few are the persons of ordinary intelligence who will not do as much toward the celebration of the rare event as, with the simple aid of a piece of smoked glass, to follow the course of the planet across the sun's disk at some time during the passage.

The transit will commence over the whole United States at nearly the same minute of absolute time, although owing to errors in the table of Venus the prediction for the time of beginning may vary a minute. The principal phases are as follows, in Washington mean time:

First contact	8 h. 55 m. A.M.
First internal contact	9 h. 16 m. A.M.
Second internal contact	2 h. 38 m. P.M.
Last contact	3 h. P.M.

Observers must ascertain the longitude of their places of observation from Washington [which can readily be done by the aid of an ordinary map], and the local time will easily be found, remembering that every degree of longitude makes a difference of four minutes in time. If the place be east of Washington the time will be later; if it be west the time will be earlier. Thus the transit will commence in New York twelve minutes later than at Washington (at 9 h. 7 m. A.M.), in Boston and all New England, twenty-four minutes later (at 9 h. 19 m. A.M.), in Cincinnati, twenty-nine minutes earlier (8 h. 26 m. A.M.), and so on.

It is to scientific observers that the transit has the deepest significance as one method of determining the sun's distance with more reliable accuracy. Never in the history of the world were such preparations made for the observation of a scientific event. The governments of the most enlightened nations hav furnished the means, the best astronomers direct the expeditions, and the whole world watches the result. Stations dot the western hemisphere and a portion of the eastern, where Russian, German, French, Italian, British, and American observers vie with each other in attempts to solve the vexed problem. The money appropriations will reach millions, the scientific observers will be numbered by thousands, and the labor and painstaking employed cannot be computed in numbers. Unless the whole sky is curtained with clouds on the eventful day there will be good fortune for some of the transit observers.

The True Origin of the New Calendar.

MY DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Our friend, Mr. G. N. Hill, of Boston, is laboring under the painful but false impression that he has been "robbed" of some credit or honor due to him in regard to the new Calendar, 282. He throws out letters, cards, and "open" letters to me in the Liberal press with reckless prodigality. In your note to one of his efforts in your paper of November 25th, you say that you presume (1) that "neither Mr. Wakeman nor Mr. Hill knew that the other had proposed it at the time he proposed it."

(2) In his card Mr. Hill persists in saying that he "originated" this Calendar and is being "robbed" of it.*

(3) Also he says that his claim thereto is "making an enemy of a prominent New York Liberal."

Mr. Hill's illusions on this subject may mislead you and others, and should come to an end at once, inasmuch as he is making aspersions upon others as "robbers."

The truth is that this new-era Calendar was originated and proposed by me in my lectures on the "Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels." These lectures, after being delivered off and on for four or more years, are now being published by instalments in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will be finished there as soon as Mr. Bennett's travels giv them space.

The first lecture was published in 1881, and in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 22d and 29th your readers will find this new Calendar fully "originated." No one has ever pretended that it ever originated elsewhere or at any other time than in my lecture in your TRUTH SEEKER.†

When I visited Paine Hall at the Celebration of Paine's Birthday (January 29, 1882), Mr. Hill came to me and said that he had read this proposal of mine in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and wished the Paine Hall Liberals to adopt it, and that he would offer a resolution on the subject. I warmly seconded his proposal, and he wished me to advocate it in a few remarks, which I did, and suggested that it lie over for more mature consideration, as it was a matter of importance not to be inconsiderately adopted, and this course was taken by the meeting. It was also suggested by him that the resolution should be put in a better shape, and that Mr. Hill should write a letter to me, and I reply more at length, so as to bring out more fully the merits of the new idea. This correspondence Mr. Hill was to get published in the Investigator.

That plan was carried out. I amended Mr. Hill's Resolution, and struck out complimentary allusions to myself (strangely in contrast with his present pretensions), and rewrote, at his request, the letter he wrote to me, except the personal references, and then wrote the reply to it, setting up the whole subject. This correspondence, including the reconstructed resolution, Mr. Hill tried to get the Investigator to publish from February to April, but without success. In March, finding that he could not succeed, I took it to Mr. Eugene Macdonald, in the absence of his much traveling chief, Mr. Bennett, the actual editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He looked it over and said at once that it was a good thing and should be printed. And it was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 1, 282 (1882). Thus, again, but for your paper this babe would never hav had its cry heard! Then it went into the League Man, and it has never been printed elsewhere. Thus the whole thing was originated, proposed, and published. Mr. Hill has never been able to get anything printed on the subject, nor to get the Paine Hall people to adopt the resolution; nor has he, to my knowledge, contributed one single new or valuable idea or motiv towards its adoption.

On the contrary, this has been done by others. Mr. Macdonald followed up its publication by an extremely able and learned editorial, which had great influence in its favor. Mr. Byron Adonis, editor of the Jewish Times, at San Francisco, followed suit in many able and enthusiastic letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and in all the other papers he could reach, and he reached many. He has sent it to Italy, and all over Europe, and his League, No. 190, was the first to adopt it. He first called it the Bruno-Wakeman Calendar, against my protest that no name of any living person should be connected with it. So successful were these co-laborers that the National Liberal League Congress at St. Louis gladly and unanimously adopted it. The resolutions brought forward by Mr. George Chainey on that occasion are the best short statement on the subject ever made. Mr. Hill did not attend the Congress and had nothing to do with its adoption there. The name "Era of Man" was there selected after full consideration, and so the matter was fully and properly launched before the Liberal world on Sunday, Oct. 1, 282, at 12 M.

Shortly thereafter Mr. Courtlandt Palmer went down to Boston and gave a lecture for Mr. Chainey on the "Era of Man," which was received with great favor, and has been published in This World. In it he innocently spoke of and advocated the "Bruno-Wakeman Calendar," as Mr. Adonis had named it.

Thereupon up springs Mr. Hill and says that he is the "author" of this new era, and that Mr. Palmer is trying to rob him, and is becoming his "enemy;" and now you seem to believe that we two originated it "unbeknownst" to each other at the same time! This is simply ridiculous, as the facts above stated show. It originated solely with me, and as I hav stated. Of the persons above named, moreover, there is scarcely one who has not done more for the new-calendar idea than Mr. Hill. Mr. Macdonald and Mr. Adonis hav certainly done much more than he. His volunteering to offer a resolution on the subject at a Paine Hall meeting was a matter for which he received full credit in my reply to the letter written for him, with his "permission," as he now says. But his credit would hav been greater if he had entirely written the resolution himself, and had secured its adoption and the publication of matter effectivly advocating it, and if he had borne himself more modestly in regard to it afterward.

Mr. Palmer and all the Liberals I know of are Mr. Hill's friends, and will continue so to be, probably, if he does not disgust them by charges of "robbery" of what belongs to others as much, or more, than to himself.

Let me conclude with two reflections:

1. The time to claim credit about this matter will be after the new era is generally adopted. To that end let all Liberals join hearts and hands. There is plenty of room for what honor and credit there can be to be won in that field yet. The use of 282 is the best and easiest means of Liberal propaganda as yet known. Learn what it implies, and you will learn the greatest lesson of this age.

2. The claim of any great honor or credit for ideas of this kind belongs to the theological or metaphysical frame of mind, for that allows of revelations and intuitions exclusivly to farvored Christs or Pantarchs, who are the divinely-chosen conduits of knowledge and grace. But in the Liberal world we are all equally "the heirs of time," and our ideas are mostly our "inheritance." During ten years of Liberal work I hav scattered much "originality," as it is commonly called, but I hav never claimed anything. I hav only been too glad to see the seed coming up in the minds of others, as in the case of this New Era Calendar. I should hav let Mr. Hill run off with this whole thing, if he had not made it an injustice to, or an aspersion upon, others, and then called upon me publicly to confirm his claims. So I put the truth on record in THE TRUTH SEEKER, where the new era first appeared.

As ever yours, T. B. WAKEMAN.

New York, Nov. 23, E.M. 282.

*FRIEND WAKEMAN: I find that the so-called letter of mine which you wrote and published—with my permission—in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 1, 1882, is making me trouble, and so I hereby disown it and withdraw all permission to any person to again publish it or its parts as purporting to come from me.

I am going to publish some card calendars for 283 soon, and am intending to print upon them your—or rather Dr Draper's—words upon Bruno and science in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 15, 1881, that caused me to invent and originate this Freethought Calendar, as well as the resolution, etc., with which I started this movement for the reformation of the civilized world's dating.

Very truly yours, GEORGE N. HILL.

Boston, Mass., Nov. 19, Anno Scienta, 282.

† Yet back of all these horrors lay that fundamental illusion and mistake in astronomy—that the world was a revolving "universe" with an outside. When Bruno would lecture and publish upon the "Stability of the Heavens" and the "Infinity of Worlds," the church had no alternativ but to crush him or die. She knew that the crisis in her history had come.

Dr. John W. Draper, in his "Conflict between Religion [theology] and Science," has proposed that some day the scientific world should unite in placing the statue of Bruno beneath the dome of St. Peters, reconstructed to man. That this should be done may not hereafter appear to be more strange than that the Parliament of Italy hav a statue of Bruno in the Eternal City.

But would it not be a surer and a nobler monument than any "enduring bronze" could ever be to date the calendar of the New Era of Science and Man from the year 1600 as its year one? Thus the martyr's death would consecrate the birth of the new order and life of man in his new heaven and earth. Comte had proposed that this new era should run from 1789, the date or the French Revolution, as the greatest social and political event of our modern revolutions and progress. Many other dates of great events hav been suggested. Americans are partial to their own national birth year, 1776, as the beginning of a new political order, and the antithet of 776 B.C., the first recorded Olympiad, and so the first certain date of European civilization. Still back of all these modern revolutions and steps of progress, as the cause of them all, stand the great world-opening discoveries of 1600, and with them nothing reaches us more striking than the voice and blood of Bruno proclaiming the infinity of worlds and the stability of the heavens. (T. B. Wakeman: TRUTH SEEKER, Oct., 29, 1881.)

Death of a Dear Friend.

CROSSWICKS, N. J, Nov. 24, 1882.

FRIEND BENNETT: I write to inform thee our dear sister, Caroline S. Ellis, died very suddenly of apoplexy on the 8th day of this month. She had been an invalid for a long time, having a complication of diseases, but her death was very unexpected. Some months ago she requested me to write and tell thee of her death when she was gone.

Very respectfully, MAGGIE B. ELLIS.

We regret to hear of the death of this valued friend, as the world needs more instead of fewer of such people.

Communications.

A Brief Synopsis of the World's Commercial Progress, as Relating to the Exchange and Distribution of Wealth.

We are informed by the best scientific authority that man in the early ages of his history was an infant in intellect, and but little above the race of animals called anthropoid apes. He was then a cannibal. His prominent characteristics were ignorance, indolence, and cruelty. His medium of exchange was a club, and his methods of commerce were plunder and slaughter. When driven by hunger, with nó other resources at hand, hostil tribes would fall upon and mutually slay the more helpless among their adversaries, and appropriate their victims as food. This was the primitiv mode of trade.

But as man advanced in intelligence his resources multiplied, and as his wants were more easily supplied the fierceness of his cruelty abated.

For his carnivorous food the flesh of animals sufficed, and by a simple form of barter the exchange of commodities was carried on between the chiefs of alien tribes.

At this stage of man's history, and far beyond it, the common or working people were either slaves, serfs, or vassals. At the second stage of progress, called barbarism, man had farther outgrown his grosser forms of cruelty, though still possessed of a refined selfishness which disposed him to take pleasure only in the welfare and prosperity of special favorits, leaving all others to take care of themselvs or perish. Hence he conducted his exchanges upon the supposed value of wealth, and not upon its cost, his object being to get the largest possible amount of the goods of others for the smallest amount of his own. But as this depended upon superior skill in depreciating goods sought, and appreciating those possessed, the intellectually strong in this contest would be victorious, while the weak would be either reduced to slavery or destroyed.

This mode of exchange might be regarded as an organized system of robbery, for it was established by treaty between alien and foreign tribes, yet it was in accordance with the nature of man in his barbarous state; and as barbarians they preferred to take their chances to plunder or be plundered in trade, rather than as savages to take the risk of being hunted down and slaughtered in the chase.

At this age of the world all governments were monarchies; but to-day we as a nation enjoy the blessings of a free and independent republic, instituted by and for the people. And if there is one glory above another of which Americans may be justly proud, it is the undeniable right which our form of government confers upon all of its citizens to express in a respectable manner, and to publish, their opinions on all subjects which are calculated to promote the welfare of their fellow-men.

Hence the people of this nation hav manifested their right to question the wisdom of continuing the cruel oppression which they hav inflicted upon themselvs by the further use of an adopted form of currency, invented by ancient barbarians, and applicable only to the crude necessities of a comparativly depraved and ignorant race. So universal has this thought become that in the midst of us a new political party has been formed upon this issue; and although its leaders may be commended for their untiring efforts to establish a system of currency that shall be adapted to the necessities of our free republican form af government, in place of the present system we hav inherited from ancient barbarous monarchies, and which was adapted only to an age of tyrants and slaves; yet, while our zealous friends are attempting to correct the misleading errors of their opponents in regard to this question, they still maintain confusing errors of their own, which the results of this inquiry will show as we proceed to answer the following questions, viz.: How did the valuable currency properly called money, and the valueless currency called tokens, originate? What was the difference between them? and, What was the different uses for which they were designed?

A tribe is a family presided over by a patriarch or chief, and within such a family the proper conditions for carrying on trade and commerce between its members, either by simple barter or by the use of money, cannot exist; but only between chiefs or their agents of alien or foreign nations or tribes.

Wealth, being a social product, is therefore created only through the toil and industry of the working members of the household or tribe, each one and all of whom had years of labor expended upon themselvs by others before they were able to co-operate with their fellows; hence the wealth of a family, tribe, or nation, before its just and proper distribution or apportionment, is absolutely common wealth, which in the earlier phases of barbarous society was distributed by the chiefs or their agents among the members of the families or tribes in accordance with their supposed merits or necessities. But as they advanced in intelligence, experience taught them that the distribution of commodities could be better and more easily performed by the use of tokens made of inexpensiv material, and distributed among the people to indicate the amount already due them for their labor or service, so when goods were desired they could be obtained by the handing in of tokens at the public storehouse, as we obtain our baggage by presenting our checks at the railroad station.

This mode of dispensing commodities is not commerce in any proper sense. It is not buying and selling. It is not barter. It is simply distributing the wealth of the tribe or nation among the individual members who had co-operated in creating it.

Tokens then were a convenient device by which the common wealth of a tribe or nation was distributed for private use among citizens who had previously purchased it by their joint labors, while money was an ingenious invention by which merchandise was exchanged between foreigners who were not joint owners; but both parties were independent owners as well before as after the exchange or sale.

For ages before the invention of money, trade throughout the world had been carried on by simple barter; but as tribes and peoples multiplied, the time arrived when simple barter could no longer answer the demands of commerce. Then it was that many of the sovereigns of the earth called together an international council and sent thereto as delegates some of their most intelligent merchants to devise a scheme that should supersede the old system of barter.

Although this assembly represented many languages, yet it was composed of men who were familiar with the idioms of commerce as they existed at that time. Written languages were then in their infancy, and were understood by few except scribes, a number of whom were employed on this occasion. After a parley of many days these deliberations terminated in a compact or treaty which was afterward ratified by the proper authorities, and thereby became international law, the prominent features of which are presented in the following translation:

1. That the old system of simple barter be supplemented and finally superseded by a more convenient system of complex barter.

2. To accomplish this end, let gold and silver be chosen as possessing, in a superior degree, these three desirable qualifications, viz, condensed value, durability, and portable convenience. These metals, after being brought to a uniform standard of fineness and into pieces of convenient size, shape, and weight, will be especially fitted for the twofold office of pledge and payment; and, when offered at any foreign mart where goods are exposed for sale or exchange, shall be received at sight from all and by all who are parties to this compact in exchange for any and all other forms of wealth.

3. Any tribe or nation which is bound by this treaty, and which may not possess gold or silver in sufficient quantities for use as legal pledges, may issue a provisional or temporary medium of exchange in the form of beeves, sheep, slaves, or any other staple commodity, until the more permanent pledges of gold and silver shall be universally distributed.

4. No tribe or nation acting under this treaty shall be allowed to issue legal pledges of more than one kind of commodity, for the reason that any commodity used for such pledges will be enhanced in value at least twofold, and therefore whoever shall issue two or more kinds will take undue advantage of others who keep within legal bounds and issue but one. The nation issuing gold may not issue silver; and any nation issuing a legal tender in the form of slaves may not in the form of beeves; but after their legal issue they become the common medium of exchange for all. Such use, however, will debar no one of their option from appropriating them as commodities, the gold and silver for ornaments or utensils, the beeves for food, and the slaves for service.

[That slaves were money among the ancient Hebrews is stated in Exodus xxii, 21.]

5. Although the necessities connected with the change from simple to complex barter require in its inception that several different commodities be used as legal medium of exchange, yet we believe that the system will continue to advance in perfection until the various materials at first used shall diminish to a single unit.

Thus much for the translation; now let us inquire for the origin of the word Money. Mr. James Parton says, "It is a curious thing that the origin of the word is still uncertain;" and that "Webster's derivation is improbable."

Other conjectures hav also been given, to which I will add one more if it is not already included. The only legitimate use of money originally was to facilitate the exchange of commodities between people of alien of foreign nations; money itself being also a commodity, and could be used as such at the option of the parties receiving it. The legitimate use of tokens, whether of base metal or paper, was to distribute commodities among the citizens of a nation.

Gold and silver currency, when used within a nation among citizens, can, in justice and equity, fulfil only the requirements of simple tokens, in which case they are not money in any proper sense of the word, but simply coin, and, when honestly used, serve only to distribute wealth among citizens, and for that purpose are neither better nor worse than the coin of base metal, which forms part of our fractional currency, and not so valuable for use within the nation among citizens as a paper currency.

Paper money is a misnomer, the brethren of the Greenback fraternity to the contrary notwithstanding. Paper notes issued by the government upon a basis of justice and equity for use within the nation and called money would, indeed, be a desirable currency, but with a misleading name. It is this wrong use of words which has occasioned the confusion of thought and speech which exists to-day on the subject of currency.

As to the derivation of the name originally given, which we hav translated money, I believe it came from this fact: In searching for a mode of exchange which should supersede simple barter, a plan was found and adopted which it was believed would ultimate finally in the selection of some one commodity that would be received in exchange for any and all other commodities, and therefore the name one, or mono, euphonized money, was applied to currency of value.

To show how far the anticipations of the inventors of money hav been realized, it may be noticed that when we reckon the nations who use money by the number of their inhabitants, we find that 877,000,000 use only silver, that 180,000,000 use only gold, and that 132,000,000 use silver and gold.

Thus it will be seen that nearly three-fourths of the inhabitants of the world who use coin use only that of silver, and one-eighth use only gold, leaving but one-eighth who use a binary currency of gold and silver, but who, being continually unsatisfied therewith, are found in council trying to devise some plan by which they may be enabled either to effect a better adjustment of their present system of biney, or, with the rest of the world, to adopt and establish the more simple system of money.

Recapitulation.—Geology furnishes evidence that man was developed from non-human primates that existed more than 240,000 years ago (John Fiske, Atlantic Monthly, May, 1882). In the early stages of his development his wants were few and simple, and, like all other animals, he was governed by his instincts. His intellect was in its infancy, and his moral sense in embryo. As his abilities increased, the belligerency became manifest, and as hordes men made war upon one another, while as cannibals they devoured the victims who fell by their hands. Time and experience improved their character to a degree that inclined them to labor for the production of wealth and to barter for its exchange.

As man advanced toward civilization he invented money with which to trade with alien tribes, and also invented tokens by which to distribute supplies of food and raiment among the members of his own tribe.

These two distinct and separate systems of currency, which were well adapted to the necessities of our barbarous forefathers, hav been handed down to us, and we hav adopted them as our own. As a nation it has been our great misfortune to hav allowed a crude institution of the dark ages to overlap and extinguish the normal light which would otherwise hav resulted from our present advanced intellectual and moral development; and so we find ourselvs utterly confounded and bewildered in regard to the just and proper method of creating, distributing, and exchanging our wealth.

This is the problem before the nation that demands a solution to-day.

Liberty and Morality.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you allow me space in your valuable paper to say a word in favor of W. S. Bell's speech delivered at the New York State Freethinker's Convention at Watkins, Aug. 26, 1882?

"Liberty and Morality" is a neatly covered pamphlet of thirty-six pages, and throughout its entirety displays the literary acumen for which its author is distinguished.

The gist of the book, plainly discoverable by the reader, is that true liberty is but individual sovereignty minus infringement upon the rights of others; and pure morality is: Do thyself and others no harm.

But the author's most happy hits are under "Christian Morality," a few of which are here appended: "No hateful parent can teach his child to love him, nor will a mountain of commandments warm his child's heart into love. The masses lay off, to some extent, their religion when they lay off their Sunday clothes." "Here (the atonement) the moral government of society rests upon a fabulous tradition, which is supposed to hav had its origin some six thousand years ago." "It (prayer) is an effort to persuade God to do better than he otherwise would."

In criticising the Sermon on the Mount he says: "'Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow' is a sentiment which no intelligent person accepts." Again: "It may seem a sweeping assertion to say that all distinctly Christian doctrins are immoral." "More than this, the people were immoral who invented them, and what is still more fundamental, the God they worshiped was immoral. It was he who ordained evil. What for? To show his mercy. He created the universe for his own glory." "But he has signally failed in glory. In fact, we find he has failed in all he has ever undertaken. He created Adam and Eve, but they proved an utter failure, drowned the world; turned himself into his own son, and died to save the world; but here, again, he has signally failed. His own people are now deserting him by denying the story about creation; they hav dared to close the doors of hell in the face of heaven."

ELLA E. GIBSON.

The Remarkable Experiences of Mr. Perry.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I wish to say a few words by way of defining my position, and at the same time of answering those friends who hav written me postal cards in reference to the matters under discussion in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

To start with, I may say, I hav no faith in any of the thousands of gods manufactured by frail humanity in all past times and set up to take the place of Nature or to govern and control her. The only god that can exist must be a never-ceasing presence, immanent in all things, ever acting, as well in a molecule of matter as in a world; not an organization like unto man, yet ever acting, evolving and developing all that is or ever will be, from the lowest creature in feeling up to the most highly gifted being; a universal principle of life, which is equal to the production of the highest through gradation from the lowest; in which there is no death, but constant and everlasting change, and of which life we are all parts.

If this proposition is granted, then I affirm that as we are a part of nature now, we must hav been a part eternally, and will in some form remain so. Countless millions of ages of duration were consumed before the substance of which we are composed took the germ form; then it became by due course of nature dualized by combining with the ovum, and this developed into a human form, we inheriting from our progenitors all the mental, moral, and physical qualities we each are in possession of.

The foregoing is predicated on the assumption of science, that no matter can be destroyed, and that it is utterly impossible to change something into nothing, as well as to make something from nothing. It will be seen that I stand upon the broad platform of a material, substantial something, and hav no faith in nothing. In fact, "nothing" does not exist; if it did, it were something. There is no place anywhere in nature where nothing exists. If one particular substance we may be in search of at any place is not there, we are sure to find something else.

It follows, then, that as an organized human being we had no existence until born into this life, but just so surely as we were so organized and brought into existence will we continue to exist in some form. The substance that composes our bodies will change and waste away, become food for worms and vegetation; but what becomes of the nerve force that we hav been accumulating during a long life? What becomes of this fine material substance which we hav been engaged in extracting from food, and by which we hav builded up the inner mental and moral man? The whole question centers at this point: Does all the highest and finest and best which nature has developed up to this time cease to exist when the material body decomposes?

Now, aside from satisfactory proofs to the contrary, which I hav in abundance, I assert that nature points to a continuation of this life-force—this intelligent development. It is utterly absurd to suppose that nothing passes away from a body at death. There is no real death; only change. What, then, has changed? I answer, substantially the whole man has gone out, taking with him all the nervous body which he held within the old body. The dead body will not move when touched, simply because the man has left it. The eye may still throw an image on the retina, but the inner man is not there to see it. The tympanum, if not specially injured, may still vibrate to the shock of sounds, but they will not be heard, as the former resident has changed his abode. Ah! you say, this proves my Materialistic doctrin. The organization is destroyed, and so the mind is dead also.

This is just the point where your theory fails. I deny that the organization is destroyed, and to prove it, I attach a magnetic battery to the body, and by passing currents to and through various parts, behold how readily it responds! The man that was dead sits up; he moves his limbs, chatters, rolls his eyes, and points the finger of contempt at you. But, alas! when I disconnect the wire, the man drops as lifeless as a stone.

It will be seen that the manner of controling a human body from within must be analogous to the use of the magnetic experiment alluded to. The mind has the power to will or desire a motion to take place, and, accordingly, a nervous force is put into use, which does it. Now, the force which does an action and the real actor must be distinct. To say that will is the immediate force is an error. The will sets the acting force in motion, just as the man with a battery may cause a magnetic force to raise the arm or finger of a dead man. The only difference in the case is that the man using the battery is on the outside, while in life the man is himself on the inside of the body, and by an effort of his will sets the molecules of his spiritual body into motion to produce the desired result. The real man and his spirit, force, and body, having left the natural body, he must exist on the outside of it; and as the man and his spirit substance are inseparable, they remain so, subject only to new environments. And thus nature has labored not in vain.

If organization were the cause of life instead of the reverse—that is, life the organizing force—then, while a greater portion of the same was intact, as in the case of those persons taken from the gallows, there should be no reason why, under favorable circumstances, they should not be restored, but not a single case is thus far recorded. When the pineal gland is exploded, which seems to be the essential portion of the body, the motiv power of organic life departs never to return to that body.

Having shown that, from a material standpoint, Nature points to a future life, it behooves every man of good sense to add such evidences as may be within his reach to confirm those indications, or to upset them and show what becomes of this life-force and substance that leave the human body at its dissolution, and not pretend that we hav investigated and understand the whole realm of Nature and her laws. And it is just as much the duty of the Materialist to substantiate his assumptions and affirmations, as it is the Spiritualist's to support his. There is no technical difference, as each affirms, and therefore each is in duty bound to state his facts, on immortal life or any life of whatever duration. Our friends M. O Waggoner, Wettstein, and Winter are decidedly in error if they think that intelligent Spiritualists build their hopes of a future life on an "unsubstantial nothing." The Spiritualist is a substantialist; he believes in a body, and it is not made out of a chunk of nothing either.

My friend, T. Winter, has given me lots of good advice in his reply, "Mistaken Perry"; but not an argument of any kind to disprove what I wrote. He intimates that I am "beating around the bush" and trying to make things white that are black, and says "it is unworthy of any man who lays claim to sound sense and honest purposes." I am sorry to find Mr. Winter so organized as to suspect my honesty, or any one's honesty, as we hav nothing to gain by such a course. He says also: "I hav long discovered that the speculativ portion of mankind on the supernatural axiom are pretty much torn up, all the time, on this anti-mundane theory." Let me say, once for all, that Spiritualists hav no faith in any supernatural axiom, or anti-mundane theory, as nothing can be supernatural, and I am surely not torn up on any such nonsense. My faith, founded upon my investigations and knowledge, has made me perfectly contented, and my only concern is to induce others to arrive at a similar peaceful condition by a study of truth as it is in Spiritualism and Mother Nature, and in order to that end I will relate an interesting case for Brother Winter to study on and afterwards explain:

I had a sincere friend who during the late Rebellion went into the army, and having contracted dysentery came home to die—but, as he thought, to get well, for he made strenuous efforts to do so. He came daily to my place of business to exercise himself by sawing and planing, in hopes of gaining strength, but daily he was wasting away. Finding this to be the case, I told him one day that should anything serious occur he should send for me and I would come to his aid. Not long after this he failed to put in an appearance, and I was sent for. He was so far gone that he could not get out of bed, and, being a Spiritualist from a thorough investigation, he was very resigned and prepared to listen to anything I had to say on the subject of death. I said: "Daniel, I fear you are close to the gateway of life. You hav been dying for months, and will soon begin to liv in earnest." "Yes," he said, "I cannot understand this change that is coming over me, unless it means death." I then conversed freely and rationally with him during the day, and lifted him out of and into his bed when necessary, as his body was so wasted away that it weighed little more than that of a child; but his mind—oh, that was as clear and perfect and calm as the most resigned faith and sound philosophy could make it. I never heard him so absolutely himself as on that day, although he could not hold his head off the pillow. He said: "Wife, please get me the picture of George Washington and hang it on the wall behind the bed. When the final moment comes I want to cast a last glance upon that noble face."

Among other things I said, "Now, Daniel, when you are fairly settled in that new home, and if Spiritualism is true, as we believe, I want you to make a strong effort to communicate with me in any way that you can make yourself understood." He promised to do so. About five o'clock I went to my home, he having gone into a stupor or drowsy condition and utterly helpless, and I returned again in the evening. When I approached his bed he seemed suddenly to revive, and he threw back the cover as if with some strength, extending his hand to giv me a good-bye. I took his hand and said, "Good-bye, Daniel." He then turned to Mrs. Perry, shook hands, then to his wife and children, giving them good bye, and finally turned his eyes upon the picture on the wall, and so passed away in about one minute, a perfectly whole man to all appearance, fully conscious of his condition, although he at this time could not utter a word.

After he was prepared, the bed upon which he died was thrown upon the floor, and one of his children attempted to sleep upon it. But just as she would get into a doze she would be pushed out upon the floor. She said she felt hands push her off, and after several attempts she could not be induced to try it again. This was related to me by his wife, who had no faith in Spiritualism, and she was curious to know what it meant. The child, of course, had never heard of it. Perhaps Mr. T. Winter can explain it by calling it imagination.

Several years after this I went to Boston, and, having inquired for a good test medium, I called upon Mrs. Hardy, whom I had never before seen. She told me many things that had occurred upon the trip to Boston, and related a conversation I had with a gentleman upon the subject of Spiritualism, and, among other things, said, "There is a dear friend of yours here, a soldier, who promised to communicate to you, but he cannot yet as fully as he would like. He wants me to say to you that he loves you as well as his own brother." And this was precisely the sentence which I had used in expressing my affection for him, when his father called on me at the time of his funeral. He said he had often been in my shop and made the shavings fly, called me by my full name, and seemed to be generally acquainted with all my affairs. Yet I had not breathed my name to Mrs. Hardy, nor given her any clue whatever to what she told me. He also mentioned the town in which this occurred. Now, to say that Mrs. Hardy did all this by clairvoyance, that she could get into my mind so thoroughly and see incidents that I had long before forgotten (for she described my grandmother and told me her name and things which occurred more than forty years before that visit), is to say that a clairvoyant can read and describe for you things that never were in your mind or her own. She did not see him in my mind, but said he was standing by my chair. How did I, unconsciously to myself, project an exact full-size spiritual picture of my soldier friend, grandmother, and aunt, as well as several other persons, so that Mrs. Hardy could see and describe them, with a history of the relations of each with myself, names, dates, etc.? It is utterly impossible and unreasonable to believe so, and nothing but an opposition to reason and sound sense would require one to discard such testimony. It is better evidence than is required in transacting nine-tenths of all the business done amongst mankind, but of course my friend Winter cannot entertain such facts, as he has faith only in dirt. All the splendid achievements of the intellect of man end in dirt, and the older the world gets and the more advancement is made in knowledge and progress, the sublimer will be the dirt which nature is constantly laboring to make. The mental, moral, and spiritual culture will never enable man to get away from this grand and final dirt heap. That seems to be the result of all the works of grand old nature, and this must be the reason that we are so apt to be slinging dirt at each other, sometimes, instead of sound arguments and good common sense.

When a man dies we know that his body is here with us; but that other something which was the life and soul of it is not here. Now, as neither the one nor the other can be utterly destroyed, it is fair to infer that it must still exist. We never did see the mind while in the body, so that we are no worse off now than before; and if we can recognize its characteristics in some other mode of manifestation we might reasonably infer that it still exists; but here comes our philosopher, LaRoy Sunderland, and settles the whole business with his "Ideology." Mrs. Hardy was insane; she was affected by the "sporadic rap;" and I was insane. This must be the true explanation, because he has studied it from the start, and has had several of these insane persons in his own family, who were thus affected. Oh, folly, that one so wise should resort to an explanation so inadequate and so threadbare as the clairvoyant and insanity dodge at this late day! But this same Mrs. Hardy sometime thereafter was developed into the production of paraffine molds of hands, feet, etc., claimed to be the hands, etc., of spirits. They claimed to materialize a hand, coat it with warm paraffine, dip it into cold water, and then remove the spirit hand and let the mold float upon the water. To prove this fully, a wire box was constructed so that it would be utterly impossible to place any such mold through its meshes, and the warm paraffine was then placed in this box and locked by a committee. In the course of half an hour the spirits rapped out the signal that the work was done, and on removing the cover of the box it was found that a perfect mold of a human hand, or spirit's hand, was floating in the bucket of cold water.

The explanations we hav for these remarkable things is the "sporadic rap," insanity, jugglery, ideology, and, I might add, "tomfoolery." In olden times such things would hav been called "miracles;" but a miracle never was and never can be performed. There must be a rationale to the performance of every act, no matter how mysterious or by whom performed. The greatest wonder is to see how our modern investigators of fact run into fancy.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the three volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" all right, and am well pleased with them. Inclosed find $4.75; apply $2.50 to renewal of THE TRUTH SEEKER up to January 1, 1884, $1.50 for Vol. IV., 50 cents for postage, and 25 cents for the pamphlet "Crimes of Preachers." FORT WAYNE, IND., Nov. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I was handed a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER by a friend. As you advertise to send it three months for 50 cents, you will find that amount inclosed. Prof. Fisher, in the last number of the North American Review, admits the "decline of clerical authority," and assigns as a reason the "general diffusion of knowledge." I think he is right. and that THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the channels through which the knowledge is being diffused.

Yours for the right, F. M. CHAPMAN.

WEST AMBOY, N. Y., Nov, 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $13—$1.50 for Vol. IV. of the Round-the-World books, and the rest to be applied as directed.

I was born May 4, 1815, and until February, 1831, in consequence of my superstitious education I was a believer in gods, ghosts, devils, witches, hobgoblins, and spooks, but at that time at a great religious revival in Verona, N. Y., I was converted from the darkness of superstition to the light of Freethought, and ever since I hav been known as an activ soldier in the army destined eventually to emancipate the world from the tyranny of priestcraft.

Fraternally yours, P. W. LEETE.

CONCORD, KY., Nov. 20, 282.

MR. EDITOR: We thank you much for presenting your worthy self among the "men of the hour." Judging from your appearance now we would not hav supposed you to be so diminutiv when a boy of thirteen, and would say your brains at this time would preponderate against your whole avoirdupois at that age. We regret to see the bitter flings directed against you, but make much allowance for the acute sensibilities of misfortune. We sometimes fear Liberalism will suffer disintegration from the difficulties befalling it, thus making a splendid triumph for Christianity, but hope deliberate reflection may yet restore that harmony which will make the success of our darling cause assured. Anxious that all may yet be well, I remain as ever,

Truly yours, VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

BOSTON, MASS., Nov. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Language fails me to express or to fix a value upon my regards for you and your dear old TRUTH SEEKER, and I hav until now delayed expressing my congratulation for your safe return from your round-the-world voyage. I now acknowledge the receipt of the third volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," for which I hav already sent $5, and now inclose $2 more for the fourth volume and to help pay the postage on the same. As I am to hav the whole story of the voyage round the world in the fourth volume, I shall be glad when it is got through THE TRUTH SEEKER, so as to make more room for correspondents. Ideas often appear in the paper on the various topics of mundane and spirit-life that I would like to reply to.

Life is an eternal principle which never begins nor ends, but is only an elongation of what we doctors hav studied long and hard to learn how to prolong, to save life, and not a soul of us yet has found out what life is, or from whence it comes or whither it goes, and still claim to be the guardians of health and life. Ever your Liberal and true friend,

N. H. DILLINGHAM.

MAUSTON, WIS., Nov. 13, 282.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 11th received last night. I see the third volume has been mailed to the subscribers, and the fourth is in preparation. I intend to send you an extra dollar to help you pay postage on the books. At present I am troubled with that bad complaint called the "shorts," and if you dare trust me with one dollar's worth of your "Answers to Christian Questions" I will send you two dollars the first opportunity—I will, honor bright. I hav just one dollar, and I intend to send that to old Brother Jeremiah Hacker, and then you will be the only man in the world that I owe a dollar to that I know of.

"Antichrist," W. H. Burr, "Tee Cee Lee," and yourself are giving that under dog a dreadful thrashing, but no worse than I would hav done had I been able. In my last letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER I said I had buried a wife and seven children in Marengo, Illinois, instead of a wife and three children. I passed my three score and ten on the 30th of October last. I intend to liv as long as I can see anybody else alive. For nearly forty years I hav lived without a drop of "gospel lollypop," as Rev. R. Taylor calls it, for I hav no doubts nor fears of any rewards and punishments after death, for I hav reasoned long upon that subject—ever since I first read Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," in the year 1844. But I hav tried to liv at peace with all mankind and pay my just debts; and if that won't do for that boy that was born in a cave and in a manger (two places of birth and no earthly father), both him and his blind followers may guess at the rest.

In its proper place I forgot to tell you your "Answers to Christian Questions' is just as I wished you would do—print them in book form, as I was going to take notes from them. You are more than a match for the whole seventy-five thousand blatherskites.

Yours truly, WM. HOLGATE.

ITHACA, N. Y., Nov. 14, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Your three Round-the-World books hav been received and highly appreciated. I herewith send $1.50 for the fourth volume, which completes your eastern history.

While writing, I wish to say a few words which are of importance to me. and which may be to those who are organized like myself, if such can be found. When speaking upon the words hinted at, I apply myself to this world, the kingdom of man, the Freethought people. I care not by what means nature has produced what is called the New Testament. It has a resurrection, and is mentally true. Man (this world) is formed materially through the letter, and Spiritualism, his helpmeet, is off from the same piece—bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh—and by whom material man has now a kingdom, and a kingdom necessarily implies a king to rule. But the inquiry is, What is the manner of the platform from which he rules? He has only the breath of animal life in him, which he, by heredity or otherwise, obtained from his ancestors, the sectarians, and thus being made of dust he has not become a living soul, for as yet he subsists on faith and hope. Faith is said to be the substance of things hoped for. Faith is often found (like that of Guiteau) without a well-grounded hope. There is a serpentine, beguiling spirit in animal man (in some more than others) that can believe without evidence. This kind of faith is braced up by ungrounded, selfish hope, and hope begets deceptiv knowledge, and places itself upon the foundation of marvelousness and sublimity, and thus the man without a soul places himself on the foundation of deceptiv knowledge, and this kind of knowledge is always puffed up and never edifying. But what is the other kind of knowledge? It is not obtained through the animal senses. It is the female or mental knowledge of nature, law. She is inexpressibly beautiful, and is well defined in what is called Solomon's Song. She obtains from the higher organs of compassion, and will not submit to the mysterious knowledge of selfishness, but to charity which equalizes all things, and all upon a level. Man in his animal capacity is not to be despised, but is to be brought up through the female of nature to a higher standard of being.

Yours truly, ZENOS KENT.

LONG LAKE, MINN., Nov. 13, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5, and apply as follows: $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $2 for the fourth volume of your "Pilgrimage." The first two volumes came duly to hand, and are highly appreciated. My subscription to your paper is paid up to January, but I make it a rule to pay before the time expires. I wish all your subscribers would do so, thus saving you extra trouble. I send money to pay postage too. I am glad you allow all sides a hearing in your paper. All who ake THE TRUTH SEEKER hereabouts are Spiritualists.

Mr. Otto Wettstein's criticism of Mrs. Hedden's statement, in your paper of September 14th, that "a universal spirit existing as a part of nature is as rational to conceive of as to conceive of force," is, in my opinion, rational and correct. Mr. Wettstein writes like a philosopher and scholar, but he has a great deal to learn yet. The positiv Mr. Winter is so well satisfied with himself that he is not likely to learn any more. He "knows" that death ends all, and in his particular case, judging by what he has written, I am willing to concede that he is probably right. There is nothing spiritual about the man—nothing, I fear, worth saving into another state of existence. I think Materialists, as a rule, show as much bigotry in defending their peculiar views as Christians do, at least all with whom I am acquainted do. Many hav gone from the extreme of Christian fanaticism to the extreme of intolerant skepticism. Thus do mankind vibrate like the pendulum from one extreme to the other, but only the truth is found between the two extremes.

Your review entitled "Materialism versus Spiritualism," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 4th, was like everything else you write—good and true; and allow me to say here that no intelligent Spiritualist believes in the supernatural. 'Tis time that word and the word "miracle" were obsolete. Some one has said, "We are just looking into the vestibule of the great temple of knowledge." What do we know of the cause of attraction, repulsion, or gravitation? We know that where matter is there is force, but but why we know not. How can finite man measure the infinit? We can hav no appreciation of a boundless space or the beginningless and endless lapse of time. We know that things invisible are the most powerful, as atmosphere, steam, and electricity; and as the chemist can change the hardest substance, even the diamond, to a gaseous, invisible condition, it is fair to presume that all matter our earth contains was once invisible, at least to such vision as ours. What do we know of the possibilities of matter in its most attenuated form, reaching out to the infinit? It is said that man is an epitome of the universe, and, if so, does he not absorb with the other elements of his being—say in the fœtal condition—a portion of spirit from that inexhaustible fountain which some call God? If I may trust the wisdom of my senses, I know that I hav a continued life; and from whence could I draw my immortality save from that source? To those that believe that "death ends all" the world must appear a failure—nay, a grievous fault on the part of nature, because we hav infinitly more of sorrow and suffering than of happiness and pleasure. For my own part, I look on this world as the school-house, merely, where we get the rudiments of an education, which must go on and on forever. With best respects to Mrs. Bennett, yourself, and Mr. Macdonald, I am, as ever, Yours, WM. ARCHIBALD.

ELKHART, IND., Nov. 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: About three weeks ago I crossed over the state line between Michigan and Indiana, upon an invitation to visit Dr. Hatch and his family, and to enjoy the hospitality of their house for a season. Dr. Hatch is a close reader and has a retentiv memory, and he weighs the religious and the political institutions of the country in the balance of an impartial and observing mind, and my sojourn in Elkhar and with the Hatch family has been both interesting and mutually profitable.

During my stay in Elkhart I hav taken half a hundred new subscriptions for the stanch old TRUTH SEEKER, and the list will show at least an average of the intelligence of this enterprising city. The names are from all classes, except the ministers. I hav taken subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER in some places among the ministers, but none among this class yet in Elkhart. The lawyers, the physicians, the mechanics, and the laboring classes are all well represented in the catalog of names. These fifty names hav mostly been taken on the three months' trial list, and it is hoped that the paper will be understood and appreciated in its true and impartial character, as an able and faithful advocate and exponent of free speech and impartial inquiry after the highest truth in all departments of human interests. To my own mind, there is no paper published in the English language, or in any other form of speech, which bears a bolder front or a stronger array of talent in reducing the first principles and the original intentions of our honored ancestors and venerated forefathers to an actual, practical reality, as expressed in the Constitution of the United States, more clearly than THE TRUTH SEEKER. Hence it may be regarded as a kind of white flag in time of peace, under which the multitude may rally to defend themselvs from the common enemy of all mankind—ignorance and superstition—and to confer and council together in regard to the best methods of reforming and elevating the race. Let the hearts be fully enlisted and warmed into an activ and earnest practical life among all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and there are brains enough to perform wonders toward the redemption of mankind from the hydra-headed monstrosities in church and state which hav combined to curse the human family in all the ages past. It is to be hoped that the American people, at least the more liberal among them, will rally to the support of each and every peaceful flag which floats to the breezes in behalf of true liberty, and unrestricted freedom of speech and of the press.

I expect to go from Elkhart to Battle Creek, Marshall, and Kalamazoo, Mich., and will aim to reduce my travels to order and method, so as to re-visit each place regularly once in three months, until as large a list of regular and permanent subscribers are obtained in each place as can be enlisted.

The Liberals in Elkhart hav assured me that if fifty subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER can be enlisted and maintained in the place, they will hav a Liberal League established here with all the social and intellectual advantages which such an organization would introduce and bring into actual operation. We will all work on, and abide in hopeful expectation for the best results.

Yours truly, C. S. ROWLEY.

BETHESDA SPRINGS, ARK., Nov. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Were I to disclose to you my experience from a "state of nature to a state of grace," and back to nature as a returning prodigal to a loving mother, you would doubtless feel some surprise. I was educated for, and for several years devoted myself to, the ministry. Well, that isn't so much a matter of surprise—to many; but I fell at last, and this is, or will be, matter of surprise to my Christian friends. I do not think I was ever egotistic in my views—only a "little out," for want of a true light to guide me. You will understand my position.

For some years past my mind has been taking a rational turn, only lacking the full sway of untrammeled reason to lead me straight on and out of the dark paths of mysticism. Not very long since, I chanced to drop in at the "Unitary Home," on Rich Mountain, not far from this place, where I found a small band of very peculiar people living together under a common bond as a common brotherhood. A few of the numerous "queer" mottoes which adorned their humble quarters—humble, for there is no ostentation—will serve to explain a part of my experience:

"To the pure all things are pure."—Bible.

"Be equal to your superiors and superior to your equals."—Anonymous.

"Be prudently courteous, cautiously familiar."—Home Maxim.

"Where there's a will there's a way."—Old Maxim.

"Do unto others," etc.—Bible.

"The love of the perfect man is a universal love."—Confucius.

But the most "shocking" of all was:

"The power of the priesthood is the people's pusillanimity."—Home Maxim.

Could this be true? Here were a quiet, orderly, contented, and apparently happy people, practically exemplifying in their every-day walk principles which the clergy everywhere preach as derogatory to the highest interests of humanity. Are they right? Who are right?

In their library I found the customary Shakspere, Byron, etc., together with elaborate physiological works, anatomical charts, etc.; and also Foote's works, Spencer's, Tyndall's, Huxley's, and other lectures, and a copy of the family Bible. Of journalistic literature I found the Agnostic, the Age, Liberty, Man, Woman's Herald of Industry, the Word, and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

After perusing their own publications, which I was somewhat surprised to find founded on Bible testimony, though they deny a personal God, the immaculate conception, vicarious atonement, etc., I instituted a brief examination of the periodicals above alluded to. Suffice it to say that in these I found facts never before disclosed to my mind—facts as irrefutable as are the laws of nature. What should I do? As an honest, free man, what could I do? I saw but one course open before me, i.e., to lay aside prejudice, be true to myself in the inward consciousness of a latent truth within, on which Nature lays the true developing hand to lead us up and out of darkness into the "revealed" light of scientific progress; and henceforth I am one for humanity's sake. God will take care of himself.

On my return home I will make up and send a remittance for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other publications. Fraternally, EX-REVEREND.

COBDEN, ILL., Nov. 20, 282.

MR. EDITOR: A short time since I had occasion to visit Parrish, a little village in the southeastern part of Franklin county, Illinois, for the purpose of perfecting the organization of a Liberal League there. I was very much surprised to find a Liberal town quietly growing up right in the center of Egypt. It is a duplicate of Walser's town of Liberal, Mo., without a god-house or saloon, and scarcely any Christians in the town. And I hav it from the authority of the only Christian lady I met with there, that Parrish is the most orderly and pleasant town to liv in in that part of the state. This is a good deal for a Christian lady to say of a town almost entirely composed of Infidels. And what is the most pleasant as well as most surprising thing to me is that the Liberals of Parrish and vicinity are almost all young men, who hav become Liberals from being raised in the Sunday-schools in the surrounding country, and observing the shams and hypocrisies of Christianity. But I think THE TRUTH SEEKER, of which there are several copies taken there, has had a good deal to do with the development of educated Liberalism in this Liberal Eden.

Dr. F. P. Reagin, president of the Parrish Liberal League, is the only druggist and practicing physician. L. M. and J. L. Jones, two young men who commenced here only a few years ago with a capital of three or four hundred dollars, are the leading merchants of the town. The Joneses commenced in Parrish about three years ago with a small stock of goods. By their square dealing and business integrity they hav in a short space of time become one of the leading business houses in Franklin county, doing an aggregate trade of between forty and sixty thousand dollars a year. They keep a full supply of merchandise, such as dry goods, clothing, boots and shoes, crockery, tin, and hardware, furniture, and agricultural implements. And notwithstanding, as they told me, some of their orthodox customers told them, when they first opened business, that if they did not giv up their Infidelity they could not succeed, yet they hav been more prosperous than any firm I hav met with in this part of the state. L M. and J. L. Jones, although young men, hav often held debates with the orthodox clergy, coming out victorious in the contest. To-day they stand among the most influential business men in the county in which they liv. I mention this as an example, and I hav met with a number of such examples in my travels, yet I am sorry to hav to say that I am continually meeting with Liberals who are in business who are the worst kind of moral cowards. They dare not stand up for the truth for fear that it will hurt their trade or business. They allow a false theology to put a bit in their mouths and bridle their tongues, and make them bow and scrape to priestcraft and priestly superstition. I enter many stores, offices, and other places of business where, when I tell the proprietors that I am an Infidel missionary, and that I carry an assortment of Liberal literature and photographs of Freethinkers to sell, they will express both surprise and pleasure that anyone dare to do such a work, but they will take me into some private room or back office, and with closed doors and bated preath, as it were, look over my stock, and if they make any purchases of me they will caution me not to tell anybody of it. They will not, or rather dare not, subscribe for any Liberal paper, for fear somebody will find out they are taking it. To our shame and regret these are facts in regard to over one-half of the professing Freethinkers of this country, and I often say to them, Shame on such Liberalism. I would rather die than lead such a life of moral cowardice. And, in the language of Patrick Henry, "Giv me liberty or giv me death!" To me mental bondage would be more unendurable than physical bondage.

Until further notice my address will be Duquoin, Ill. F. F. FOLLET.

LEAVES OF GRASS.

You shall not look through my eyes either, nor take things from me;
You shall listen to both sides and filter them from yourself.

Thus says Walt Whitman, and thus say I. My defenses for speaking in favor of "Leaves of Grass," after all the obloquy hurled at it by the superficial reader, the thoughtless reader, and the prejudiced reader, are taken from all sides; and as friends read and ponder upon them, I hope they will filter from themselvs a judgment as kind, as tender, as thoughtful, as tolerant, and as charitable as would Whitman himself bestow upon the pet children of their own brains—children born out of their best and holiest aspirations, and heirs to their grandest, purest, and most sublime hopes. Hear him, O ye who plead for free thought and free speech, and mark how he echoes your most daringly bold venture toward the new life of universal self-hood:

I say discuss all and expose all. I am for every topic openly.
I say there can be no salvation for these states without innovators;
Without free tongues, and ears willing to hear the tongues.
And I announce, as a glory of these states, that they respectfully listen to propositions, reforms, fresh views, and doctrins from successions of men and women.
Each with its own growth.
With one man or woman (no matter which one), I even pick out the lowest.
With him or her, I now illustrate the whole law.
I say that every right in politics or what not shall be eligible to that one man or woman on the same terms as any.

Now turn from these utterances to the most seemingly obscene portions of the book. What do you find? Only that the brave thinker "discusses all and exposes all"—

If anything is sacred the human body is sacred,
And the glory and sweet of a man is the token of manhood untainted,
And in man or women a clear, strong, firm-fibered body is more beautiful than the most beautiful face.

And therefore Whitman, out of the purity of his own cleanliness, fears not to talk boldly and bravely of all portions of the body, and giv grand and beautiful advice as to how to generate a race that shall "grow to be mates to the mothers" who are worthy to bear them. I do not wonder that those who hav never studied the hygiene of the whole body and the laws of heredity are somewhat shocked at the plain talk of friend Walt. He not only believes in "open doors," but exclaims:

Unscrew the locks from the doors!
Unscrew the doors from their jambs!

Now friend Hiller will remember that it has never been the pure in heart who hav discovered obscenity in things that in themselvs are "whiter than snow." He should carefully read Whitman once more, and he will see that instead of "constantly talking about prostitutes," no poet that ever lived brings together in one small volume of less than 400 pages such a variety and diversity of topics. Take the following lines for instance, and see how vast an immensity the mind must travel to grasp each successiv mention of place or thing; and where in the midst of it does friend Hiller find the "prostitutes?"

See! steamers steaming through my poems!
See, in my poems immigrants continually coming and landing;
See, in arriere, the wigwam, the trail, the hunter's hut, the flatboat, the maize-leaf, the claim, the rude fence, and the backwoods village;
See, on the one side, the Western Sea, and on the other the Eastern Sea, how they advance and retreat upon my poems, as upon their own shores.

See, pastures and forests in my poems—see, animals wild and tame—see, beyond the Kanzas, countless herds of buffalo, feeding on short curly grass;
See, in my poems, cities, solid, vast, inland, with paved streets, with iron and stone edifices, ceaseless vehicles, and commerce;
See, the many-cylindered steam printing-press—see, the electric telegraph, stretching across the continent, from the Western Sea to Manhattan.

Now, lest I weary our readers with too long an article, I will giv a few clippings concerning Whitman an his "Leaves,"

Well begotten and raised by a perfect mother.

Whitman, now 63, "passed through that period of neglect long since, which has crowned with its silence every minstrel yet that has ever come to strike, in some new and unaccustomed method, chords with which all the world is familiar. He has about passed through that period when it is a toss-up whether the flames of martyrdom shall light up his gray hairs or the aureole of the few immortals settle on his head." Recently asked to explain the "Prostitute" piece, page 299, he said: "It is nothing but the beautiful little idyl of the New Testament." Slowly extending his half-palsied arm he repeated in deep voice and eloquent manner the following:

"But Jesus stooped down and with his finger wrote on the ground, as though he heard them not. So when they continued asking him he lifted up himself and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. And again he stooped down and wrote on the ground, . . . and Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst. When Jesus had lifted up himself and saw none but the woman, he said unto her: Woman, where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more."

After a long pause, Whitman resumed: "But to the color-blind green looks like dirty white. What are the meadows to such, and the boundless foliage of the summer lying all out of doors? The idea of exclusion comes from the far East, barbaric with its eunuchs and its harem. Truth, like the seed sown, must mainly fall upon the rocks. Some few understand it. Women, most of all, see and appreciate it. The babes that are to grow up will breathe it in." There was another long pause, and he added, referring to the Osgoods, "But they weakened"—that was the harshest word he had for them or any one else. He says: "Those who speak ill of me and my book are quite right, from their point of view; from my point of view, I am not half as good as I should be."

Boswell asked Dr. Johnson if a certain picture of a nude woman was indecent. "No, sir," replied the doctor; "but your question is." A Christian lady found fault with a statue by Miss Lewis because it was unclothed; she replied, "Madam, your mind is nastier than my statue."

The Rev. Mr. Chadwick, an eminent Unitarian clergyman, has lately said that it contains not a line which is not pure and high in its intention. The Rev. Mr. Morrow, of the Methodist Episcopal church, has gallantly defended it, affirming that it is robust and viril, but not obscene. The Rev. W. J. Fox, that brilliant English divine, the pure theist and idealist, the valiant and cultured soldier of democracy in England, threw over it the shield of his manly eulogy, saying that it afforded "a clearer conception of what manly modesty really is than anything we hav in all conversational forms of words, deed, or act so far known of;" saying also that "it will in time become a pregnant text-book, from which quotations as sterling as the minted gold will be taken and applied to every form of the outer and the inner life." The illustrious German poet, Freiligrath, the most distinguished of all the modern German poets, devoted to it four masterly articles in successiv numbers of the Augsbury Gazette, praising it without stint or qualification, and hailing it as the day-spring of a new and nobler order of poetry. Ruskin has recently eulogized it, declaring that "it carries straight and keen as rifle-balls against our deadliest sins." Thoreau ranked it with the mighty oriental poems, and pronounced it the supreme expression of American democracy, and its author the greatest democrat the world has ever seen. Emerson literally exhausted panegryic upon it in his letter of 1855, incidentally calling it "the most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom America has yet contributed." "Defended by clergymen, extolled by poets, lauded by scholars and men of letters throughout the civilized world, accepted by the best readers, it may well be guarded in the mails by the postmaster-general."

Now, friends, I hav pleaded my plea, and hope and trust you will "filter from yourselvs a just and generous judgment for a poet," of whom Elizur Wright says: "Let us not be ashamed of ourslvs, or our cause. The God-fanatics will tire at length of biting files—such for example as good old Walt Whitman has presented to their teeth."

And who has been bold and true?
For I would be the boldest and truest being of the universe!
And who benevolent? for I would show more benevolence than all the rest!—Leaves of Grass.

I am a Liberal in every sense of the word, and indorse Walt Whitman. ELMINA.

Thanksgiving.

BY GEORGE E. MACDONALD.

When as returns the appointed day
That's set apart for human kind
To leave each thought of toil behind,
And render thanks, and feast and pray;

It stands a thoughtful man in hand
To turn a retrospectiv eye
Upon the past, and ponder why
Thanksgiving reigns throughout the land.

If more than usual, in the main,
We hav been blest in house or store,
Let's trace each blessing's source before
We thank the author for the gain.

Be ever grateful for the deeds
Of those who, in their several ways,
Hav done their part to merit praise
By ministering to our various needs.

Let's thank ourselvs that we possess
Sufficient usefulness to gain
The little lucre we obtain
As pay for our industriousness.

Let's thank the toilers of the earth—
Long may their health and strength abide,
The coughing printer, hollow-eyed,
Be given wealth and broader girth!

Let's thank the tiller of the field
Who grows that which we daily eat.
His days be long, his life be sweet,
His crops return abundant yield!

Let's thank the brave, devoted men,
Who in the face of scorn and hate
Their lives and labors consecrate
To liberty of voice and pen.

Let's thank the heroes of the past,
Those of to-day, and those to come;
The least shall benefit us some,
And help ensue from all at last.

If any good from source unknown
Has come to us the passing year,
Make haste to thank the giver here
For seeds of kindness he hath sown.

Thus far our gratitude extends;
While unto others we accord
Unquestioned right to thank the Lord,
Our voice shall bless our earthly friends.

A Lecture by Col. Ingersoll

DELIVERED IN INDIANAPOLIS, IND., NOV. 11, 282.

Nothing can be more certain than that we do not hav control over our own thought. The brain thinks in spite of us. Everything we see, or hear, or touch, or feel affects the brain, and affects it in spite of us; and everything we see and hear causes thought, in spite of us; and no one, owing to his constitution, can be responsible for his thought any more than he is responsible for the beating of his heart. The blood pursues its old accustomed rounds without consulting us. The lungs fill with air without our will. And so the brain thinks You cannot help it; you cannot stop it—no matter how much you may wish. You hav no control. You can satisfy yourself of this by just thinking for one moment. What are you going to think to-morrow? You do not know. You cannot tell. Why? Because you hav not the control of your brain, and you are no more responsible for what your brain thinks than you are, as I said before, for the beating of your heart.

This being true, no human being can be held responsible for his thought. Yet for a thousand years thought has been taught to be a crime, and thousands and millions hav threatened us with certain fire if we giv forth the production of that brain. Each brain is a field in which nature sows the seed and thought is the crop. It cannot be a crime to gather it or tell it, which simply means the right to sell the product of our brain for the product of other men's brains. Most brains, at least some, are rather poor fields, and the orthodox the worst of all. That is a field producing mostly sorrel and millet, while there are other fields which, like the tropic world, are filled with growth, and where you behold the vine and the palm, royal children of the sun. I then stand up simply for absolute freedom of thought. I do not believe if there be a god that it will be or can be pleasing to him to see one of his children afraid to express what he thinks; and if I were God I would never cease making men until I had made one grand enough to tell his honest opinion.

There has been a struggle between believers in the natural and the supernatural—those gentlemen who are going to a reward in another world, and those who propose to make life worth living now. In times past the priest had been appealed to for everything. [A description was given in everyday language of the process, and affected the audience most comically.]

The speaker's opinion of priestcraft was given in these words: "No clergyman in the world can get one drop of rain out of the sky; no clergyman in the civilized world can save one human life. They hav tried it." They say we don't expect a direct answer; it is a reflection we are after. That is like a man trying to lift himself by his boot-straps—he gets nothing but good exercise. With a doubt on the existence of a mirthful missionary he said: "Missionaries viewed with mirth the prayer of the heathen to his idol, but the stone god delayed the frost precisely the same as ours does." Next there came a sarcastic reference to the claim of the ministry that God selects his exhorters. Statesmen, poets, philosophers, heroes, scientists, and inventors come by chance, but when God wants an exhorter he selects. They tell me also it is wicked to attack the Christian religion. I refer not to the Christianity of the New Testament, but to the Christianity of the orthodox church; and when I refer to the clergy I refer to the clergy of the orthodox church. There was a time when men of genius were in the pulpit, and were orthodox, but the time is past. When we find such a man occupying the orthodox pulpit he is touched with heresy. Next came a recipe for a minister: "There is a young man not strong enough to be wicked. Instantly it is suggested he would make an excellent minister." There are great and glorious openings for men of genius; the pulpit has to put up with the leavings, ravelings, the selvage. These preachers say, "How can any man be wicked enough to attack our religion, and take from the world the solace of orthodox Christianity. What is that solace?" Here the speaker's voice was scorn concreted. "If the Christian religion be true the grandest, greatest, and noblest of the earth are now in hell, and the narrowest and meanest are in heaven." Of the first he mentioned in impassioned eulogy Humboldt, Laplace, Beethoven, Robert Burns, who in four lines giv all the philosophy of life:

To make a happy fireside clime
For weans and wife
Is the true pathos and sublime
Of human life.

Continuing to quote, he pronounced the names of Charles Dickens, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Charles Darwin, a child of nature, who knew more about his mother than any other child she ever had. "What is philosophy but to account for the phenomena by which we are surrounded—to find the hidden word which unites everything? Charles Darwin has done more than all the priests from Melchisedec to the last exhorter. Shakspere was there too; Harriet Martineau was among the rest. All these are in hell. This is solace. These are tidings of great joy. Who are in heaven? Could there be much heaven without the great mentioned—the great men who hav endeavored to make the world grander—Voltaire, Diderot, Hume, Bruno, and such men as Thomas Paine?" said Ingersoll, pointing to the Rogers statue of the great American Freethinker, which adorned the stairs. "If Christianity is true, that man who spent his life in breaking chains is now wearing the chains of God; that man who would break down the prison walls of hypocrisy everywhere is now in the prison of the most merciful Christ. It won't do. I can hardly tell you my contempt for that doctrin, and, if it be true, I make my choice today. I prefer hell." The applause which greeted the speaker showed that his journey into trackless brimstone would not be a lonely one.

Turning to the other side, he said: "Let us see who are in heaven. John Calvin, John Knox, Jonathan Edwards, Cotton Mather, builders of dungeons, tearers of human flesh, inventors of instruments of torture; men who hav obstructed the march of the human race; men who hav kept the sword of war and cruelty wet with blood for thousands of years, they are in heaven."

Following quick upon this picture of celestial tenantry, he asked: "How can any one be wicked enough to uphold orthodox religion? They say God will never forgiv you?" With the dangers and cruelties in this world he did not wonder that God could forgiv men, but asked himself, How can man forgiv God? He humorously said some of these ministers, perhaps a dozen, had spoken of him and raised a storm of laughter and applause. Some had made it their business to say extremely unpleasant things, among them the Rev. Talmage, of Brooklyn, N. Y., a man of not much imagination, but of most excellent judgment. One charge made against him (the speaker), viz, that he was a blasphemer, he refuted by saying that the conditional could not endanger the conditionless. Accepting his accuser's theory of God, he might harm his fellow-man. It was a thousand times more important that he should love his fellow-man. Better to love wife and children than to help Jesus Christ; he is dead; they are alive. "The holiest temple erected beneath the skies is the home; the holiest altar by the fireside. The best church is the family. Blasphemy is a geographical question. In Jerusalem it was blasphemy to say Christ was God; here it is blasphemy to say that he is not. In Constantinople it is blasphemy to say that Mohammed is not the proper god; here it is to do so. You cannot tell whether you are uttering blasphemy or not until you look at the map."

Next it was charged that he had scoffed at the sacred scriptures. Rag-pulp was taken, printed on, and bound in leather, and then they had something holy. Catholics hav a man for a pope; Protestants a book. The Catholics hav the best of it, for if they elect an idict he will not liv forever. It is impossible for us to get rid of the barbarisms in our book. Catholics will not let the common people read the Bible. That is right. If it is necessary to believe it in order to get to heaven, no man should run the risk of reading it. Let a man not read, but simply believe it, and when he goes to judgment, say, "Yes, I never read it."

He spoke of the Sunday-school stories of the miraculous use of the scriptures, and told a parody in which a man, after having neglected his family worship and come to starvation, took down the dust-covered Bible and found a ten-dollar bill in it. He spent it for food for his family, and was about to enjoy gastronomic happiness when a constable stepped in and arrested him for passing counterfeit money.

The biblical story of creation then came in for satirical treatment. The Talmagian theor that God made the world out of his omnipotence was laughed at, and the divine was advised not to attempt to explain anything, because if he succeeded in explaining the miracle was gone, and if he failed he himself was gone. One after another Talmagian theory of the creation was dispatched amidst laughter. "At one time," said the speakor, "if you wanted to know anything you asked the minister; now you ask him if you don't."

The flood was the next thing for comment. Talmage said it was only a partial flood. Why not stand true to his guns and say omniscience drowned this atom? How did the animals get into the ark? Some angels carried them there. The lecturer here scored a point with the audience by interjecting, "I do not believe that is the way the Democrats got to the polls last Tuesday." Instead of the flood to wipe out the wicked, the speaker thought God should hav drowned the snakes.

The triflings with the sun and its motion a divine had attempted to explain by theories of reflection and refraction, while he had better attend more to reflection and let refraction alone.

Talmage said Jonah was not in the whale's belly, though if he were, we could imagin him escaping the dangerous effects of the gastric juice by walking rapidly up and down. Talmage said Jonah was in the whale's mouth The speaker could understand, from looking at a photograph of Dr. Talmage, why the mouth suggested itself. Jonah, then, did not take cabin passage, but went into the forecastle. The speaker could imagin him seated on a back tooth, wiping the sweat and gastric juice from his brow, and looking out of the side for the land. Nineveh, when it heard Jonah's message, immediately went into sackcloth and ashes. What would they say if Jonah came to Chicago to-day with such a story? No man with the slightest claim to intelligence could believe such a story as that. He denounced the Bible because it upheld slavery and polygamy. He reflected upon the acts of Abraham, David, and Solomon. Talmage said yet God pursued them with his wrath. David, says the scriptures, was a man after God's own heart; he died full of days, riches, and honor. Solomon was promised a son who should be preserved as a king over Israel forever. Abraham lived to be 105, and was promised to be the father of a great race. Was that being pursued by the wrath of God?

Regarding the miracles, he asked, Why did they not affect the people who witnessed them? and significantly said in reply, Because they were there, meaning thereby that the miracles never really occurred. God works gradually, it was said. He illustrated this by a supposititious experiment in weaning the cannibal from the error of his ways, saying at first we would not tell him that it was wrong to eat missionary, but to eat him raw. When we had induced him to cook his missionary, we would first add a little mutton, but not enough to excite suspicion; then day by day we would put in a little more mutton and a little less missionary, until, in what the Bible calls the fulness of time, we would hav all mutton and no missionary. That's God's way. Next he was charged with disgracing his parents by the expression of his opinions. He was afraid, if that was the case, foundlings only could enjoy religious liberty. He said the Bible had only words of humiliation for woman. It spoke of her only as a slave and serf of man. Talmage quoted Esther, Ruth, Hannah, Abigail, and Dorcas. The lecturer put their stories into commonplace comparison with others. Alluding to the last named, he said she was raised from the dead and was never heard of again. In a comical strain he deplored the opportunity which had been lost of questioning such an interesting person as one who had been dead, and expressed his surprise that at the next demise no one should hav remarked upon the fact that the corpse had had two funerals. How little women are thought of was shown by the fact that the New Testament records only three sentences which Christ addressed to his mother. Christ, risen from the sepulcher, had for Mary only the chilling words, Woman, touch me not.

The women of the Bible were then compared to the beautiful feminines created by the genius of Shakspere. St. Paul was spoken of as treating women harshly, and cautioning Timothy not to admit a widow into the church under three-score years old. St. Paul liked nunneries and monasteries because he thought the world was going to end right there. Another charge of blasphemy was that he had spoken disparagingly of Queen Victoria. He had always admitted that her reputation was good in the neighborhood in which she resides. All he said was that Queen Victoria wears the garments of power given to her by blind fortune, while George Eliot is wrapped in glory woven in the loom of her own genius. Mr. Ingersoll bitterly took up the next point. He said: "This priest, in order to get even with me, digs open the grave of George Eliot and endeavors to stain her unresisting dust. He calls her an adulteress, the foulest word in all languages of man. He does it because she hated the Presbyterian creed; because she lived without faith, and died without fear; she grandly bore the taunts and slanders of the Christian world. George Eliot carried tenderly in her heart the faults and frailties of her race. I know that in the court of her conscience she stood acquitted, pure and sinless as a star. George Eliot joined the choir invisible whose music gladdens all the world. Her wonderous lines will reach hundreds of hearts after every sermon of every priest who sought to stain her name shall pass utterly from human lips. I cannot dismiss this better than in the words of Lærtes over Ophelia's grave:

"Leave her i' the earth,
And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
May violets spring. I tell thee, churlish priest,
A ministering angel shall this woman be,
When thou liest howling

"I hav no words to express my loathing and hatred for any man who will stain a noble woman's name."

Then figures were quoted to show the power of the sacred scriptures. Talmage says, "We will submit this Christian religion to popular suffrage." That was once done, and the reply was, "crucify him," an infamous result, showing that you cannot depend upon the vote of barbarians. I am told that there are 300,000,000 of Christians. What of that? There are more Buddhists. He admitted Russia with its eighty million people, was Christian, Spain, Portugal, and Italy; which were only now alive by the resurrection efforts of Garibaldi, Mazzini, and Carlos, all these were Christian countries. He denied the United States was one. A gentleman the other night reminded him of Delaware. In reply he told the story of a man 110 years old who called himself 50 because he never counted sixty years he had lived in Delaware, and piously hoped God never would. The Christian countries of the world had a debt of $2 500,000 000 representing expenditures for war. Christianity has persecuted the Jews and had driven them away from all other possessions into money and precious stones, so that with a sort of poetic justice they had become the controlers of the money of the world. It did him good to see kings and emperors going to them, hat in hand, to get them to cash their bills. To-day we are laying the foundation of further persecution by teaching our children to believe that the Jews crucified God. They crucified a good man, as every nation had done. Coming back to the Presbyterian belief, he said: "Mr. Talmage would contemplate a little child basking in its mother's smile and say 'You will be damned,' and be quite cheerful about it. If the Presbyterian creed is true, all the soldiers who fought in the Revolutionary war and were not Christians are in hell, all who fought in 1812 to keep our flag floating on the sea; all who fought later to keep our flag floating in the heavens; and all who suffered in prisons of Andersonville and Libby, who were not Christians, are now in the prisions of God, and where the famins of Andersonville and Libby are regarded with joy. This is tidings of great joy. Dives, who said from hell, 'Send Lazarus, that my brothers come not here,' had more sympathy than he who refused him a drop of water." Yet this is orthodox religion, and he was told that it was wicked to speak about it. He hated the Bible for upholding ten things. This decalog of crime was slavery, religion, persecution, extermination, the idea of a world filled with riches and evil opportuuities, the idea of a god who presides over all these things, the idea of one man good from nature, the idea of one man bad from nature, and lastly, and worst, the subversion of justice.

Dropping into his customary abuse of an unfortunate god who had been praised all the morning and must hav taken the change badly, he said the infinit had no right to make a failure. He had no right to make an investment which did not pay a dividend. The lecturer would say: "Let religion go, it is of no use. 'What,' says one, 'shall we swear witnesses on if we throw aside the Biole?' Don't swear them on anything. I am opposed to all swearing; it has the tendency to make the evidence of a rascal as good as the honest man's. I want to see witnesses tell their story under pain of perjury, and juries capable of telling the true from false. A man must depend upon himself. I know nothing about any other world. I am satisfied that there is no world of eternal pain. If there is a world of joys, so much the better. I will never put out the faintest star of human hope that ever twinkled in human night. There was a time that I was not, now I am; and it is just as probable that I should liv again as it was that I should liv before I did. Let religion go. What will be left? Men will be here; women will be here; history will be open; the walls of the world will be adorned with art, the niches with sculpture. Music with its voice, that will be here, and all of love and joy. There will be homes here, and a fireside, as there will be common hope without a common fear. Love will be here, love the first dream of immortality. Love is the morning and the evening star, which shines on the child, which sheds a radiance upon the tomb. Love is the mother of melody, for music is its voice. Love is the enchanter and magician which makes royal kings and queens out of men and women of clay. Love is the perfume of that wondrous flower, the heart. Without that sacred passion, without that divine swoon, we are less than beasts, and with its earth is heaven and we are gods."

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted we won't ask you to continue withus any longer. 2m53

A TALMAGIAN CATECHISM.

Stenographically reported by I. NEWTON BAKER.

Price, $2.00. Paper Edition from same plates, $1.00.

Those who wish to hav Col. Ingersoll's latest lectures on "Talmagian Theology," will find them here, in full, together with many other points necessarily excluded by the limits of a lecture. "The Talmagian Catechism" puts in the form of direct question, the plainest and profoundest inquiries of modern doubt, and answers them according to Talmage and orthodox Christianity. Humanity and the Progress of International Law.

An address delivered

BY EDWARD SEARING

Of the New York Bar before the Society of Humanity

An illustration from history that intellectual and moral growth is measured by the decay of theology.

The president of the League says: "It shows how International Law became one of the corner-stones of the 'Era of Man.' I wish every Liberal and every patriot would read it. T. B. WAKEMAN."

Elmina says: "It is truly an excellent work, and I hav been much interested in it. Hav gained many new ideas from it, and thank thee for writing it. It embodies a wide field of gleanings, and presents its theory in such a strong and vivid light that to read is to believe and appreciate. We need just such books as this to keep us from being selfish and self-absorbed. I feel that I am better for having read it and I trust that through its teachings many many more may be led and guided into truths leading to the happiness of the whole human race. We are indeed only one of the great mass of mankind, and our hearts should pulse in unison with all other hearts, and one good law bind all to nature in true morality and a noble life.

"Thine gratefully, ELMINA D. SLENKER."

SPECIAL OFFER TO TRUTH SEEKERS.

The J. R. Perry Piano and Organ Company desire to introduce their instruments to all lovers of music, at the lowest cost to purchasers, by selling direct. The Perry Piano contains the latest and most important improvement yet made—a self-sustaining sounding-board and bridge, which will never permit the board to spring, nor allow the tones to become thin and wiry. The Organs contain more patented inventions than any other make. The Mason & Hamlin are the only Organ Company who are using any of them, they having purchased the use of Perry's Flute and Celeste and Reed Board in 1876. We offer to place these Pianos and Organs by the side of any other, no matter what their reputation, and will compete both in price and quality. For full particulars address J. R. PERRY, P. DEITY ANALYZED AND THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attacks the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L. Hutchison.

FOR GIRLS.

A

SPECIAL PHYSIOLOGY,

OR,

Supplement to the Study of General Physiology.

ILLUSTRATED.

BY MRS. E. R. SHEPHERD.

12mo, EXTRA CLOTH. PRICE $1.00.

We hav here a work, the need of which has long been felt by all intelligent women, and especially by mothers and teachers, conveying to girls that special knowledge so important to them, but which, for proper reasons, must be omitted altogether from the general and school physiologies. Written in a careful and entirely unobjectionable manner, it is so plain and practical as to be easily understood, and its perusal is sure to leave an impression of the importance of the subject on the minds of the readers. It discusses the physiology of woman; the proper relation of dress to comfort and health; the age of puberty; menstruation; some of the diseases of women, their causes and prevention; something about marriage and motherhood, and many other topics of importance.

The special attention of mothers and teachers is called to this book, with the hope that they will read it, and convey to their daughters or girls in their charge the information given; or, better still, after reading, place it in the hands of the girls for whom it was written. Gems of Thought.

TO-DAY is all we are certain of. To-day well lived makes to-morrow happy, if to-morrow comes. A life of good works makes a sunny old age. To look back on a clear record and a beautiful past gives to age sweet memories of rich blessings. May these treasures come to us all as the crown of a blissful experience.—Elmina D Slenker.

YOUR country is visited with famin or pestilence and you supplicate your God for relief. Your only child lies sick of a dangerous fever; and as a matter of course you are frequent in prayer. You are diligent, indeed, in giving her all the external help you can; but your chief trust is avowedly in God. You entreat him that he will arrest the malady and spare her precious life. What can be more irrational than this? Would you pray, then, for a long day in December? Would you pray that in June the sun shall set at six o'clock? Yet surely the laws of fever are no less absolutely fixed than those of sunset; and were the case otherwise, no science of medicin could by possibility hav been called into existence. The only differeuce between the two cases is that the laws of sunset hav been thoroughly mastered; whereas our knowledge as to the laws of fever, though very considerable, is as yet but partial and incomplete.—Dr. Ward's Science, Prayer, Free-will, and Miracles.

IT is a small thing for one man to say to another, "Thou art the Christ;" but, when it is declared that this man is almighty God, that his words are infallible, and that only by believing this are we good and worthy of honor, it is an insult to truth and every instinct of our souls; and every man who has one spark of nature's fire left burning in his heart should proclaim the declaration a lie, an outrage upon humanity, and a reproach to the name of God. It is a sad sight to see men and women clinging, in this age of progress and truth, to a human idol, kneeling before a God that is no larger than their own forms, forsaking their own manhood and womanhood, and depending upon his assumed merit to stand in the place of their own moral worth.—L K. Washburn's Free Religion.

FAITH in the immorlality of the soul is, indeed, a sign of reverence for human nature if it be reverently held. But this faith can be held in such a way as to do equal irreverence to God and man. The faith in immorlality, as popularly held in Christendom, is open to this charge. What irreverence is done to God by the assertion that he will press home the agonies of an everlasting hell—I care not whether the hell be physical or moral—on the great majority of human beings for anything that they hav done or failed to do in this present life! Why, if a man should liv to be a hundred years old, and should pack his days with every sort of crime, he could not justly be subjected to eternal misery.—Chadwick's Higher Reverence.

THERE is a virtue in passiv endurance which is often greater than the glory of success. It bears, it suffers, and still it hopes. It meets difficulties with a smile, and strives to stand erect beneath the heaviest burdens. Suffering, patiently and enduringly borne, is one of the noblest attributes of man. There is something so noble in the quality as to lift it up into the highest region of heroism. It was a saying of Milton, "Who best can suffer, best can do."—Dr. Smiles's Duty.

No endurance is in vain:
The reward is in the doing,
And the rapture of pursuing
Is the prize the vanquished gain.
—Longfellow.

A MAN'S greatness lies not in wealth and station, as the vulgar believe, nor yet in his intellectual capacity, which is often associated with the meanest moral character, the most abject servility to those in high places, and arrogance to the poor and lowly; but a man's true greatness lies in the consciousness of an honest purpose in life, founded on a just estimate of himself and everything else, on frequent self-examination and a steady obedience to the rule which he knows to be right, without troubling himself as the emperor [M. A. Antoninus] says he should not, about what others may think or say. or whether they do or do not that which he thinks and says and does.—George Long.

I, TOO, believe in organization. But organization cannot make men. Bad men are no better for being organized. They are worse. Like rotten fruit, they rot the faster when they come together into close proximity. For organizations to be efficient, you must hav intelligent and honorable and unselfish men and women to organize.—Chadwick's Rise of Man.

CHRISTIANITY, becoming identified, by means of creeds, with so many dark doctrins, is looked on by many men as a subject for theologians to quarrel about, but too thorny or perplexed for common minds, while it is spurned by many men as an insult on human reason, as a triumph of fanaticism over common sense.—Dr. Channing.

WITH respect to mystery, everything that we behold is, in one sense, a mystery to us. Our own existence is a mystery; the whole vegetable world is a mystery. We cannot account how it is that an acorn, when put into the ground, is made to develop itself and become an oak. We know not how it is that the seed we sow unfolds and multiplies itself and returns to us such an abundant interest for so small a capital.—Paine's Age of Reason.

FLOWER in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies;—
Hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower—but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.
—Tennyson.

HEAR my words, O ye wise men; and giv ear unto me, ye that hav knowledge. For the ear trieth words, as the mouth tasteth meat. Let us choose to us judgment; let us know among ourselvs what is good.—Job xxxiv, 2-4.

Odds and Ends.

IT was Artemus Ward who said there were two things in this world nobody was ever prepared for—twins.

A BALTIMORE belle has married a policeman His beat was in front of her house for over a year and she noticed that he never snored.

WHAT is the difference between an Indian and an agriculturist? The one carries a bow an arrow, while the other carries a hoe and barrow.

"AMATEUR GARDENER" wants to know the easiest way to make a hot-house. Leave a box of matches where the baby can play with them.

"JOHN, did Mrs. Green get the medicin I ordered?" said a doctor to his hired man. "I guess so, for I saw crape on the door this morning."

A CORRESPONDENT wants to know "how we pronounce 'Ras-el-tin?'" We don't pronounce it at all; we only write it. Do you suppose we read the papers to the subscribers?

MR MIDDLEDRIB came down at 4:15 to take the express East, and learned that his train had pulled out just a quarter of an hour prior to his arrival. The traveler turned away sadly, "Not lost," he said, "but gone by four."

THE ruling passion strong in death: "John," feebly moaned a society lady, who was about shuffling off this mortal coil; "John, if the newspapers say anything about my debut into another world, just send me a dozen marked copies."

POLO is a game played by thin-legged young men who smoke cigarets. They ride sawed-off horses and try to knock a wooden ball across a lot. Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, and several other men whose memories are held in high esteem never played polo.—Detroit Free Press.

HE WISHED A PASS.

"Is the superintendent in?" asked a weezen-faced specimen of humanity as he entered the office of a railroad company. "He is," replied the clerk; "do you wish to see him?" "Well, not particularly. Perhaps you will do as well." "What can I do for you?" "I want an annual pass over your most excellent road." "What claim hav you upon this company for a free pass?" "Why, I'm an editor." "Of what paper?" "Of the—that is—I mean I'm a writer." "Of railroad literature?" "No, sir, not that exactly; but I used to address wrappers for an almanac publisher, and I thought that—"

When he was picked up by the porter and laid on top of an ash barrel there wasn't enough left of him to entitle him even to a trip pass.—Drake's Travelers' Magazine.

HOW TO KISS.

Cream and peaches once a week,
Kiss your girl on the right-hand cheek;
Apples green and apples dried,
Kiss her on the other side.
—Ashland Review.

That evinces wretched taste;
Take your girl about the waist,
Lift her to her pink toe tips,
And print it squarely on her lips.
—Frankfort Yeoman.

Seize the maiden in your arms,
Blushing with her tempting charms:
And it would, we think, be snugger;
Oft to kiss and tightly hug her.
—Paris Citizen.

Take your girl in warm embrace,
Heart to heart, and face to face,
Eye to eye, and nose to nose,
Flippity flop, and away it goes.
—Fleminasburg Democrat.

What's the use of all this rhyme;
Take your girl at any time,
Squeeze her till the blushes come,
Shut our eyes and—yum-yum-yum!
—Evansville Courier.

If you would do the act en regle,
The maiden to your knee inveigle;
Press your lips to hers with unction,
And osculate without compunction.
—Truth Seeker Bard.

A POPULAR OLD STORY.

There lived once a plantier,
With a son, his only love;
To whom upon his birthday,
A bran new ax he guv.

The planter had a garding,
All filled with appel-trees,
Which for the city market
He was trying for to reeze.

The boy he takes the hatchiet,
Quite jolly and jocund;
And going to the appel-trees
He chops them to the grund.

The father called his serviants
And ranged them in a row;
"Who has chopped down my appel-trees
And killed them root and bow?"

The servants stand amazied,
All drawn up in a line;
Then comes a running up to him
His young and youthful sine.

"I cannot tell a lie, pa-pa,"
The youthful boy begun,
"'Twas I that chopped the appel-trees;
'Twas I, your little son."

Now who, then, was this fathier,
And who was his filial kin?
It was the noble Bushrod,
And young G. Washingtin.

MORAL.

Then whoso takes a hatchiet
And appel-trees chops down,
If he live long enough will be
A great and pious mown.

Positive proof of this has appeared in all the leading Newspapers by Testimony of many of our most Prominent and Wealthy Citizens, who, having been Cured by the

After all other Treatment had failed, were pleased to assist the Inventor in giving confidence to the Suffering Invalids of America by allowing him to use their well-known and respected Names as Reference; and it is now admitted by many most highly accomplished Scientists and Physicians that the Success and Cures attending the introduction of "Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing has been unprecedented in the history of Electrical Therapeutics, In the face of such Positive Proof as given by us no person can doubt the value of this Invention in all cases.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

EXTERNAL APPLICATION,

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. ☞ Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

IN the opinion of the Christian Guardian the sexton is responsible for about one-half of the sleeping done in church, and the minister for very nearly the other half.

NOTHING annoys the manager of a church festival more than to hav one visitor say in a rather loud tone to another: "HAV they ever tried plating war ships with this sort of sandwiches?"

Zion's Herald declares that no man should attempt to preach if he has "sincere doubts about the reliableness of the Bible." And it might be added that no man with sincere doubts about the reliableness of the Bible will attempt to preach unless he is a hypocrit.

AT a recent Salvation Army meeting at Poole, in Dorsetshire, it was announced that a tea meeting would be held the following week. A printed circular gave the day and hour of the meeting, and concluded:

Salvation is free.
But not the tea.

PASTOR DALRYMPLE of the Methodist church at Somers, Conn., is endangering his income by opposition to social kissing. His salary is raised in part by entertainments in which kiss games are a feature; but he has taken a firm stand against such diversion, thus cutting off an important source of revenue.

IT may not be generally known how the game of ten pins, commonly called bowling, and by the Germans kegel bahn, got its present name. Thirty years ago it was called nine pins. The legislature passed a law forbidding its being played on Sunday. The name was then changed to ten pins by adding an extra pin to the game, and the law was not heard of afterward.

"I HATE to see a woman with rings in her ears," exclaimed the good deacon; "they ain't natural. If it was intended for woman to wear them she would hav been born with holes in her ears. The first woman didn't wear ear-rings, I'll be bound." "No," remarked the quiet little man in the corner, "nor nothing else." The discussion was brought to an abrupt close, and the house adjourned without delay.

A CERTAIN church in Michigan has been struck by lightning a dozen times, and now, whenever the preacher shows signs of getting long-winded, and passing from his "seventhly" to his "eighthly," the organist slily imitates the sound of approaching thunder on the pedals. The result is that the preacher finishes his sermon and starts the doxology in an amazingly short time. The congregation has increased the salary of that organist.

A CONSIGNMENT of fifty women will be despatched in a few days from Bordeaux to Numea at the expense of the French government and on the distinct understanding that on reaching their destination they must contract marriage with those convicts whom the local authorities wish to reward for good behavior by conferring wives upon them. It should be explained that these women hav not been pressed into the service. Although old offenders, they are going to Numea of their own free will to settle down as respectable convicts' wives. How the matchmaking will be carried on is at present unexplained.

A PERTHSHIRE minister, more skilful as an angler than popular as a preacher, was once giving advice to a parishioner on the benefits of early rising, and mentioned as an instance that he had, a few mornings before, composed a sermon and killed a salmon before breakfast. "In fact, sir," said he with self-satisfaction, "it is a fact on which I plume myself greatly." "Aweel, sir," was the pointed reply, "I wud much rather hae had yer saumon than yer sermon."

THE Rev. W. T. Cheney, of Rome, Ga., the son of a prominent Baptist clergyman, in a card published in the Christian Index, Atlanta, Ga., has announced to the public his disbelief in the fundamental doctrins of Christianty, and has severed his connection with the church. He is represented as being a young man of brilliant talent. He will no doubt ally himself with the Liberal element of the country. We will publish his card soon.

A GENTLEMAN who has recently been passing a few months in Russia, and who had the opportunity of conversing with many Nihilists tells the London Truth that all that they at present demand is to be allowed publicly—and subject to punishment if their allegations can be disproved—to call attention in the press to the peculations of employees and of the imperial household. If this be permitted, the emperor might liv in perfect safety: if not, it is probable that he will be killed. The potentate hardly dares leave his bedroom.

TENNYSON'S new play at the Globe Theater, London, has been withdrawn. It was a failure, as it deserved to be. One of the principal characters was intended to be a modern Infidel, but the character was outrageously misrepresented. Instead of a Freethinker Tennyson had created a sort of renegade Christian, who quoted scripture in justification of his misdeeds. The play was denounced during the first act by the Marquis of Queensberry, president of the British Secular Union. The piece is said to hav received a temporary benefit from the excitement thus caused, but it fell flat again, and by request of the author it was removed from the boards.

THE Salvation Army in Bombay has fallen into more trouble. The soldiers and other braves persisted in marching through the street after they had been told by the local authorities that they must not do so. Their ground of justification was that processions of heathen for idolatrous purposes were freely allowed by the government, and that, therefore, they ought to be allowed similar favors. The consequence of their persistence is that they hav all been arrested and put in prison. This givs them notoriety, but not of a very pleasant kind. Their preaching in Bombay has not been attended with much success. The prejudices entertained against them by the local authorities are shared by the citizens of Bombay.

AN Austin man who made a prolonged trip through Mexico givs us some interesting details of his trip. He says that when he was in the city of Mexico he was shown through some of the old buildings, convents, and jails that were erected by the Spaniards. In the wall of one of these ancient buildings he noticed a small opening, and he naturally inquired of his Mexican guide what it meant. He was told that it was one of the buildings in which criminals were walled up alive. "What was the use of that hole in the wall?" "Well, Senor, as long as the prisoner lived his food was handed in to him on a plate, and he handed the empty plate back; but when he handed the plate back with the food on it untouched, then the jailer knew the prisoner was dead already, and didn't giv him any more."

W. D. HOYT, son of Rev. T. S. Hoyt, D.D., of Cincinnati, editor of the Western Christian Advocate, shot H. B. Bailey, a telegraph operator, in Lawrence, Kansas, on Sunday, Nov. 26th, and is in jail awaiting trial. Bailey was unarmed and quietly sitting at his instrument chatting with his wife, when Hoyt, a Leavensworth operator, entered and demanded an apology for insulting words used in a quarrel they had over the wires four days before. Bailey said he would apologize if Hoyt would. This not suiting the immaculate son of a D.D., he drew a revolver and shot Bailey through the lungs. The Christian "scheme" don't pan out very well in the rearing of the young. Hoyt used to sing in Sabbath-school: "Yes, Jesus pays it all—all the debt I owe," etc.; that is, be ever so bad all your lives—repent at death, and Jesus pays the bill. What can be more demoralizing?

A CAIRO newspaper says: "The Bedouins were greatly puzzled by the garb of the Highlanders, who they came to the conclusion were not soldiers, but the wives of the soldiers. Distance, of course, encouraged this delusion, as bare legs were obviously more discernible than the men's faces, covered, as they were, with veils. The Bedouins noticed that the soldiers' women camped by themselvs, and they resolved to go down and spoil the Infidel soldiers of their wives; and a body of them actually went, with a result which must hav added to the wonderment of both, for the British harem turned out with rifle and bayonet, and very speedily thirty or forty of the amorous Bedouins bit the dust. After this episode the soldiers' wives were not again attacked by Arab sheiks who wanted to replenish their harems with English moonfaces."

THE Rev. J. D. Shaw, who has been pastor of the Methodist church at Waco for the past four years, surrendered his credentials to the church at Colburn on the 2d inst. The scene is said to be one that will long be remembered by all who were present. The cause of this course was that he could not conscientiously indorse some of the dogmas that hav long been held in great reverence by the church. The main points were: 1. The inspiration of the scripture. 2. The divinity of Jesus Christ. 3. Vicarious atonement. 4. The punishment of the wicked. Rather than renounce his belief on these points he surrendered his credentials to the church to which he then belonged. That Rev. Mr. Shaw was one of the ablest ministers in the church to which he belonged there can be no doubt, and that his withdrawal from the same will retard the interest and usefulness of the same must be admitted. Yet no one will doubt that his act was caused from an honest conviction on his part that he was preaching a dogma that he did not believe, consequently it was his right and duty as an honest man to cease to preach a doctrin he did not believe. —Hubbard City (Tex.) Herald.

MINISTERIAL piety: Some time ago Mr. Hoff, an engineer on the Morris and Essex division of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western Railroad, who livs in Hackettstown, began to feel annoyance at the Rev. A. C. Higgins's frequent visits to his house. The minister, a Methodist, had editorial charge of the Hackettstown Herald, which he was conducting as a temperance paper, with such moderate success that to make a living he preached as well. He is a man of middle age. Mr. Hoff bade the minister cease his visits, but they were continued, and later the husband found that the clergyman had written to Mrs. Hoff, addressing her affectionately, and urging her to quit home and liv with him. Mr. Hoff told his friends that he intended to leave his wife, and accordingly it was arranged that her brother-in-law should take her to Belvidere, and while she was gone last Monday he began moving out his furniture. He was urged to desist until his wife came home at night, when she should meet the Rev. Mr. Higgins, who was preaching at Clinton, but was to return in the evening. The meeting was had where the Rev. Mr. Higgins was about to hold Bible class. He acknowledged that he wrote the letter, and had called against the wishes of the husband. Mr. Hoff then told the clergyman he would giv him three days to get out of Hackettstown. The next day the clergyman went away, leaving a son and his wife, who is an estimable lady, and has the sympathy of the townsfolk.

Over the Mountains.—Continued.

A FEW DAYS IN COLORADO.

DENVER, July 3, 1882.

DEAR FRIENDS: I have had a very agreeable time in this grand rocky state for the past five or six days, and the remaining portion of my duty is to try and give you some account of the same, for I assure you no part of my journey around the world has been finer or grander than through this portion of the American continent.

Colorado, considering its age as a state, or the time when settlements were first made within its boundaries, it is decidedly a remarkable state. She is the youngest in the sisterhood of American states, but to-day she possesses advantages equal to many of the others, while in many respects she stands forth pre-eminently to the others, and even to the whole world.

1. It is claimed for Colorado that she has the largest coal vein in the world.
2. That she possesses the largest number of developed ore-producing mines.
3. The greatest number of mine locations.
4. The greatest number of medicinal and mineral springs.
5. The largest and deepest canyons in the world.
6. The grandest canyon and mountain scenery.
7. The largest substantial city of its age in the world (Denver).
8. The most healthful climate.
9. The highest mountain ranges, peaks, and parks in the Union, and the source of the greatest number of large rivers.
10. The finest, most abundant, and greatest variety of game, feathered and haired, as well as the most numerous streams stocked with the finest trout.
11. The most abundant water-power, mill-sites, and dam-sites.
12. The biggest little railroad in the world.

Let me go back to the day I entered this remarkable young state and give you a brief account of what I saw.

It was three in the afternoon of June 28th that we took train from Cheyenne for the south to this beautiful city. This road, though within constant view of the towering snow-capped mountains to the west, runs through a level, pleasant country all the one hundred and six miles which separate Denver from Cheyenne. Ten miles from Cheyenne is Divide, the boundary line between Wyoming and Colorado. It is ten miles to Caro, and nineteen more to Pierce. These points require no special notice, as they are insignificant. The country on either side is principally used for grazing, and but little advance has been made in general agriculture. Our road lies in the valley of the South Platte, which is a river of large size, and serves an excellent purpose for irrigating the country through which it flows.

Fifteen miles more brought us to Greeley, a charming place. It is the county-seat of Weld county. It was laid out in May, 1870, by the Greeley Colony, under the auspices of Horace Greeley, the founder of the New York Tribune. The Colony controls about one hundred thousand acres of as fine land as is in the state. The town is situated on the Cache a la Pandre River, four miles above its junction with the South Platte. Extensive canals and irrigating ditches have been constructed, and the water from the stream named furnishes an ample supply. The town has a population of thirteen thousand, with good business blocks, banks, elevators, hotels, schools, etc. Two weekly newspapers are published.

When the Colony was first started it was treeless, save next the river. The town was laid out in broad streets, young cottonwood trees planted on each side, and a stream of water caused to run near their roots. The tree is a thrifty one, and now Greeley is abundantly shaded, giving it a beautifully cool appearance in summer. A noted feature of the town is the absence of all intoxicating drinks for sale. The physicians can prescribe alcoholic stimulants, and that is the only way they can be obtained.

In passing on to Denver we pass Evans, Julesburgh, Plattsville, Fort Lupton, Brighton, and Jersey, but I will not detain you with a description of them.

It was seven in the evening when we reached Denver, sitting like a queen in a beautiful plain. It is at once seen that the accounts of this flourishing city have not been exaggerated. It is the county, seat of Arapahoe county, as well as the capital of the state. To show what the growth of the place has been, I will state that in 1870 the population was 4,759; in 1880 it had increased to 35,718; now from 50,000 to 60,000 are claimed, and there is no city in the world increasing in wealth in more rapid proportion. New business blocks are being erected with great celerity. Many of the public buildings would be a credit to any city. Its Opera House is pronounced one of the finest in the Union.

I discovered on the following morning that several friends whom I hoped to see were absent from the city, but I found several friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, among them Mr. J. G. Jenkins, many years a patron. I formed the acquaintance of Mr. Edward Pisco, a liberal and intelligent Hebrew, who as member of the legislature did all he could against the Sunday law and in favor of other Liberal measures. He is an enterprising and progressive man. I was pleased to add his name and that of a friend to THE TRUTH SEEKER list, and to the list of subscribers to a "Truth Seeker Around the World." I was also gratified to make the acquaintance of E. A. Napier, a printer employed by the Tribune. He has just become acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and subscribed to "A Truth Seeker Around the World." I received a goodly number of letters here sent to the care of M. M. Pomeroy, editor of the Great West, but whom I was sorry to find absent from his post.

Friends, this is all I am able to give you this time. These letters are written out from notes taken on my journey, and as my health is not at present such as to admit of close application to work, I will draw this brief instalment to a close, hoping to resume the narrative when the conditions are more favorable, which, I trust, will be at a no distant day.

Yours hopefully, D. M. B.

Some of Herbert Spencer's Impressions.

Discussing the conditions and causes of the immense developments of material civilization, which he has observed in this country, developments of which his previous studies had given him no adequate idea, Mr. Herbert Spencer properly givs a prominent place to the inventivness which has been "so wisely fostered." "Among us in England," he said, "there are many foolish people who, while thinking that a man who toils with his hands has an equitable claim to the product, and, if he has special skill, may rightly hav the advantage of it, also hold that if a man toils with his brain, perhaps for years, and, uniting genius with perseverance, evolves some valuable invention, the public may rightly claim the benefit. The Americans hav been more far-seeing. The enormous museum of patents which I saw at Washington is significant of the attention paid to inventors' claims; and the nation profits immensely from having, in this direction (though not in all others), recognized property in mental products. Beyond question, in respect of mechanical appliances, the Americans are ahead of all nations."

Touching the probable issue of the gigantic social, political, and racial problems in process of evolution in the United States, Mr. Spencer said:

"No one can form anything more than vague and general conclusions respecting your future. The factors are too numerous, too vast, too far beyond measure in their quantities and intensities. The world has never before seen social phenomena at all comparable with those presented in the United States. A society spreading over enormous tracts, while still preserving its political continuity, is a new thing. This progressiv incorporation of vast bodies of immigrants of various bloods has never occurred on such a scale before. Large empires composed of different people hav, in previous cases, been formed by conquest and annexation. Then your immense plexus of railways and telegraphs tends to consolidate this vast aggregate of states in a way that no such aggregate has ever before been consolidated. And there are many minor co operating causes unlike those hitherto known. No one can say how it is all going to work out. That there will come hereafter troubles of various kinds, and very grave ones, seems highly probable; but all nations hav had, and will hav, their troubles. Already you hav triumphed over one great trouble, and may reasonably hope to triumph over others. It may, I think, be reasonably held that both because of its size and the heterogeneity of its components, the American nation will be a long time in evolving its ultimate form, but that its ultimate form will be high. One great result is, I think, tolerably clear. From biological truths it is to be inferred that the eventual mixture of the allied varieties of the Aryan race forming the population will produce a more powerful type of man than has hitherto existed, and a type of man more plastic, more adaptable, more capable of undergoing the modifications needful for complete social life. I think that whatever difficulties they hav to surmount, and whatever tribula tions they may hav to pass through, the Americans may reasonably look forward to a time when they will hav produced a civilization grander than any the world has known."

IN Fayette county, Pa., there is a minister so regardless of Christian propriety that he performed the marriage ceremony for a boy and a girl, the boy being 15 years of age and the girl one year his junior. From the fact that the wedding took place on the roadside it would seem to hav been a runaway match. It is unfortunate that there is no law to punish a minister who will perform such a marriage service as that. In the absence of such a law, the most convenient way of punishing him is to hold him up to public execration as unworthy to be a teacher and adviser of the people.—Sun.

Mastodon Skeleton Found.

From the Kentuckian.

While making a cut for the extension of the Kentucky Central Railroad on Joseph Mitcher's farm, Thomas M. Farrow, section foreman, and his gang of hands unearthed the skeleton of a gigantic prehistoric animal, supposed to be a mastodon, but its immense size is larger than the remains even of that huge animal of which we ever heard of being found. At any rate the animal belongs to a species long extinct, and entirely unknown to the postdiluvian world. Mr. Farrow, when he discovered the skeleton, had the earth removed from above it carefully as possible, and made the following measurements, which he has kindly furnished us:

Length of animal, 40 feet.
Hight, 23 feet 8 inches.
Length of head, 15 feet 4 inches.
Across the knee, 18½ inches.
One bone 10¼ inches in diameter, and another 8 inches in diameter.
Leg from shoulder blade to ankle, 14 feet 7 inches.
End at ankle bone, 7 inches in diameter.
Knee socket, 2 feet 1½ inches around.
Shoulder blade, 3 feet 5 inches wide.
Jaw-bone, 15 inches in diameter.
Bone from ankle to knee, 3 feet 8 inches in length.
One tooth 3 inches wide and 5½ inches long, and three teeth 13 inches long.

The skeleton position was on a ledge of rock, embedded in a mass of tough, blue clay, above which was a stratum of yellow clay, covered by about two feet of soil, the whole forming a thickness of some seven feet. The manner in which the teeth are worn indicates the monster to hav been of a herbivorous species, and it is not unlikely, from the position in which the bones were found, that the animal got bogged in the bed of tough mud, fell down in its struggles to free itself, and being too unwieldy to arise perished there. A blast hole charged with a keg and a half of powder had been sunk near the skeleton, which was greatly shattered by the force of the explosion; otherwise Mr. Farrow could hav had it taken out more perfectly. Some of the bones are in good state of preservation, but the major portion of them crumbled upon exposure to the air or the slightest touch. About four feet of one of the tusks has been taken out which measured 15 inches in diameter where it joined the head. The fragments of the remains of this huge animal will afford an interesting study for the scientist, and it is Mr. Farrow's intention to donate some of them to the university in Virginia, of which state he is a nativ.

Pliocene Man in Nevada.

The frequent occurrence, says the Scientific American, of wrought stone implements with remains of extinct animals in the gold gravels of California and elsewhere on the Pacific coast has satisfied all who hav critically studied the evidence so afforded that the advent of man in those parts must hav been before the close of the latest division of the Tertiary Period. There is, therefore, nothing startling in the discovery of footprints, apparently of men wearing sandals, in Pliocene sandstone in Nevada; yet we may be sure that the deductions of the California scientists who hav investigated the matter will not be suffered to go unchallenged.

The scene of the discovery is a quarry in the yard of the Nevada State Prison, near Carson. The prison is situated in a valley three miles from the base of the Sierras, the site having been chosen on account of a ridge of sandstone there, in the quarrying of which the labor of convicts could be utilized. The prison was established about twenty years ago. In the process of quarrying from fifteen to thirty feet of rock has been removed from a space of an acre and three-quarters. The layers of sandstone alternate with seams of clay, and at the level of the tracks the rock appears to be the consolidated mud of an ancient lake or pond which had been afterward buried under many feet of sand deposits.

As described by Dr. H. W. Harkness, who was sent by the California Academy of Sciences to study and report upon these supposed traces of ancient man—perhaps the earliest hunting party on record—there are six separate series of tracks of men with sandals or other foot-gear, with from eight to seventeen footprints in each series, besides numerous other tracks of birds and animals, including the mammoth, deer, wolves, and possibly a horse.

The first series of sandal tracks seems to hav been made in a layer of mud perhaps two inches deep. It consists of twelve tracks, to which four were subsequently added by tunneling into the rock, about fifteen feet of rock overlying the continuation of this ancient trail. In his report to the Academy Dr. Harkness says:

In each instance the mud had been raised by the pressure of the foot into a ridge which entirely surrounded it. This mud is only partially solidified, and is still flaxy and easily broken on exposure. Each of the imprints furnishes us with evidence, as we believe, that the feet of the one making the tracks were protected by sandals. In no single impression, perhaps, do we find conclusiv evidence of this fact; but when we study them as a whole we find that that which is wanting in one is furnished by others which follow. In nearly all the toe portion of the sandal is well shown, it being as smooth as the work of a mason for the distance of two or three inches. Backward from the toe we generally find the impression of the outer portion of the sandal. When studied as a whole we can determin with a good deal of exactness the actual length and breadth of the sandal, which we find to be nineteen inches in length, eight inches at the ball of the foot, while the heel is six inches in breadth. In its outline the impression follows clearly the shape of the human foot. From the great toe outward there is a really graceful curve, which draws in toward the heel; while from the great toe inward the line is drawn toward the instep and thence in an outward curve to the heel. In one series this curve is deeper, showing a slightly different form of sandal. The average length of the stride is two feet three inches. The distance between the feet or the straddle is eighteen inches. In all these tracks the toes are turned well outward.

Near the series of tracks described are eight other tracks, which are attributed to the mammoth. The foot is twenty-one inches in diameter, only the general outline being preserved; also many tracks of wading birds, not differing materially from those of modern herons and the like.

Several quite distinct tracks of deer are also to be seen. Others, again, were found which, in size and length of stride, much resembled those of a wolf. At one point these tracks may be traced for a distance of twenty feet, where they also are lost in the ledge. There are also a few poorly defined imprints of what Dr. Harkness believes to be a horse. Near the western limit were clear indications of animals having wallowed and lain in the soft mud.

Touching the great size of the tracks attributed to man, Dr. Harkness supposes that the feet were protected by sandals of wood. It may be that footgear of exceptional size was used in hunting on soft and muddy grounds. The stride is that of a man of average hight, and the straddling gait a natural one in walking over soft and slippery places.

It is proper to add that Professor Le Conte, of the California University, is not entirely satisfied that the supposed sandal tracks are human footprints. Their great size staggers him, though the peculiar outline of the human foot is distinct. Since Dr. Harkness and Professor Le Conte were at the prison Warden Garrard has developed three more series of footprints, apparently made by men.

One series of more than a dozen prints was uncovered by means of a stream of water turned on the floor of the quarry next to the ledge where the rocks are about thirty feet high. These tracks lead into the cliff, and appear to hav been made by a man who was dragging a heavy load after him through the mud. The tracks are all turned sidewise, as they would be under such conditions.

Ever the Same.

Ever the same is the song of the Prohibitionists—the one dolorous chant, the never-ending, monotonous refrain—the evils of intemperance. And this while no one denies that King Alcohol is a remorseless tyrant, and while none are more earnest and constant in their endeavors to limit the sovereignty of his sway than are thousands of the most uncompromising anti-prohibitionists.

The issue, Messrs. Prohibitionists, is not whether intoxication is an evil—we all admit that—but as to methods and means necessary and fit to diminish it. We base our opposition to the use of your cure-all specific upon the broad ground that it is diametrically opposed to the self-sovereignty of men and women, and that it kills more than it cures. But you close your ears to the calm words of the scientist and open them to the wild rhodomontade of the fanatical revivalist; you shut your eyes to the plainest facts, the most obvious object-lessons of history, and gaze in delighted wonder upon the gymnastic gyrations of some political spouter who no more comprehends the causes of intemperance than did our four-footed ancestors the revolution of the earth upon its axis.

In this country all men are supposed to believe in the right of self government, in the principles of republicanism, using the word in its generic sense, and yet we behold the sad spectacle of hundreds of thousands of good men and women who, in a certain dazed, uncertain way, believe in liberty as an end, ruthlessly trampling under foot every guarantee of liberty; prating of freedom, and yet utterly regardless of the liberty of others. They all seem to think there is a short cut to the Elysian gardens of the better beyond, and that that path leads through the halls of legislation. They cannot understand that men are virtuous only as they are free; that the use of stimulants is as old as the race and will cease only by degrees, through the spread of intelligence and the improvement of material conditions, and that the attempt to force people to act as we think they ought serves only to confirm them in their present course by irritating their combativness and arousing their self-respect to an assertion of their own mastership as against the vicious, though well-meant, meddlesomeness of the law doctors.

Now here comes George Gage with another batch of the stock arguments of his school of thinkers. I hav only the kindest feelings for Mr. Gage, and it is not his fault that he has neither new nor strong arguments to present. He givs us the best that prohibition has to offer. Mr. Gage speaks as though only drunkards' rights were considered by me, that the issue was between total abstainers and confirmed sots. This is another very common blunder of the Prohibitionists. Not one man in five thousand becomes a confirmed drunkard. But a vast majority of these five thousand men drink more or less. I wish that they did not. I also wish that they did not use tobacco; but they do use both, and neither Mr. Gage nor myself hav any right to compel them to desist from such use. Not one glass in a million drank produces a crime, and the drinker's liability to become a criminal is the last argument the Prohibitionist seizes when driven into a corner. To assert, as do all who clamor for a sumptuary law, that to the use of intoxicants is to be attributed a majority of the crimes committed, is to say that which is incapable of proof. I hav no desire to belittle the belief in the evil effects following the use of alcoholic liquors, but when such wild statements are made we lose sight of the other crime-breeders, and spend all our moral strength in an utterly futil attempt to destroy one; futil because we cannot eradicate a habit by an act of the legislature or an edict of a court.

Mr. Gage seems to believe in the efficacy of alcohol as a medicin. Now, I do not; I believe that that which injures a healtby human being can but hav a deleterious effect upon a system weakened by disease. But I hav no right to attempt to force Mr. Gage to accept my view of the matter. But Mr. Gage should remember that thousands of other men believe that alcohol is good in health as well as in sickness. Is our friend going to try to force them to accept his view and yet claim for himself immunity? He says not, but we should bear in mind that while he has a right to willingly giv up that which he deems good, he has no right to force others to a like sacrifice.

It is true that the effects of the use of alcohol do not end in injury done to him who uses it, whether as a beverage or for medicinal purposes, but extend sometimes to many others. But the same is true of everything consumed or otherwise used by man, many of which are very injurious in their effects. But the remedy for these evils lies not in the direction of a further limitation of liberty, but rather in the opposit direction. Through larger liberty shall come wider and more useful knowledge, greater dignity and self-respect, and bettered conditions of industrial and social life. And then when men hav more for which to liv they will not so rashly throw away grand possibilities as well as present joys for the momentary exhilaration of the goblet.

Because one man under the influence of liquor kills another, thus entailing suffering upon the innocent and expense upon society, is no reason why we should deny to all men the right to sell, buy, or drink alcoholic beverages any more than the fact that another man through an unrestrained indulgence of the faculty of acquisitivness murderously assaults a traveler is an excuse for denying other men the exercise of the right to acquire property. Or because Smith, in a passion of jealousy, slays his neighbor, would you then debar all from a legitimate exercise of the love impulse? Read the daily papers and you will see that to a perversion of the faculties or emotions of love and acquisitivness are to be attributed fully as many crimes of violence as can justly be laid at the door of alcoholic intemperance. But in each class of cases all we can do is to restrain the actual offenders, and exert every energy to eliminate, through education and absorbent processes, the diseases of excessiv avarice, jealousy, and intemperance. On every hand the innocent suffer through the acts of the guilty, but the destruction of liberty and consequent individual responsibility is the worst possible attempted remedy.

As Brother Cook informs us that he shall not further reply to my articles, I need not take much space to notice his last letter. Mr. Cook thinks "it inconsistent with the principles of Freethought" that I should say that Prohibitionists are "pseudo-Liberals." But yet he deems it in perfect harmony therewith that the majority should force its views of temperance upon the minority. It seems to me that a "difference of opinion" developing such wide differences in action does amount to a "difference of principle" sufficient to justify the application of the term of which complaint is made. The idea of a man complaining of being called a "pseudo-Liberal" because of his advocacy of prohibition, declaring that the application of such a name is inconsistent with the principles of Freethought; and then cooly assuming that he has not stepped from the Freethought platform when he proposes to compel others to do as he thinks they ought! It is a spectacle for all the gods at once!

As to Mill's postulate, no such inference as Mr. Cook draws is deducible from it. Individuals committing overt acts are amenable to the limiting clause of the statesman, but none others are. It is a complete begging of the question to assume that because Brown under the stimulus of whisky commits a crime therefore other men shall be deprived of their natural right to purchase and partake of such beverages as they see fit. Nothing could be more absurd than this.

Mr. Cook, like all other apostles of the gospel of force, is determined to confound actual crimes, such as murder, arson, and rape, with intemperance and other vices. This fact evidences that they are so far utterly unable to sense the real question at issue. How often must the distinction be made clear? How many more times must it be stated that while I hav no moral or civil right to steal from, maltreat, or kill my neighbor, I hav a civil right to sell him a plug of tobacco, a glass of beer or whisky, a pound of pork, a corset for his wife, or any other injurious article? My moral right to do so will depend upon my moral sense, which is the child of education. The distinction between moral right and civil rights cannot be kept too clearly in view. For instance, I hav a civil right to sit up so late every night as to impair my health. Neither Mr. Cook nor the state has any right to say to me that I shall retire at such or such an hour. But hav I a moral right so to do? In other words, is it best for myself and just to others that I should thus undermine my strength? I answer, "No;" but who is to decide at what time I shall seek rest, myself, John Smith, or a thousand John Smiths, known as the state?

Evolution is a fact in nature. To it we must submit whether we like it or not. Prohibition is an outside restraint applied by fellow-prisoners of fate, preventing us from growing into full-statured manhood and womanhood. To it we will not submit. The new integration bears within it the germ of a grander individuality than the world has yet known. Every open page of the book of evolution shows us that the individual grows greater and freer for each step taken, making society stronger through his liberty as it was weak through his slavery. No society is strong or virtuous whose members are the serfs of gods above or kings below, of kings having one head or a million heads, of congresses or legislatures.

I copy from the Chicago Alliance the following diagnosis of the case of many Prohibitionists, taken from a recent work by Mr. Lionel S. Beale:

> Doctors are often accused of teaching and encouraging people to tipple, because in certain morbid conditions they hav found it necessary to prescribe stimulating doses of alcohol. For one person, however, recommended to take alcohol by us, how many thousands who hav never consulted a doctor in their lives take it on other grounds—take it because they like it or because they see others take it, or because they like the sensation it produces? Many will admit that they began when they suffered from a "sinking condition," or from nausea, or uneasiness about the stomach; and after having been troubled from time to time discovered that the unpleasant feeling was invariably relieved if they swallowed a little brandy. The little brandy gradually increases in amount. Nausea and other unpleasant sensations, instead of occurring once or twice in the day, occurred a great many times, and the victim will tell you that he was, after a time, obliged to resort to the remedy in order to do his work. Of those who allow themselvs to act thus not a few become slaves to alcohol, and then a more deplorable phase is soon reached. They are no longer able to abstain—all self-command is lost, and the unfortunate people are no longer able to control themselvs in any way, while few will submit to be influenced and controled by others.

So much for the growth of the habit. Now for the reaction in some natures. Professor Beale continues:

> This state may last for a time, and then a new and very remarkable phenomenon is occasionally developed. The intemperate individual abstains entirely, and hates alcohol even more than he loved it before. He despises himself—is overwhelmed with remorse. In a little time he givs up the role of sinner and accepts that of saint—and saint of the most despotic and uncompromising kind. For a long time he was quite unable to govern himself, and now he is determined to govern others, and in a very decided manner. He expresses virtuous indignation against all who take or sell or produce alcohol, and thinks it very hard that he is not able to punish every one who prefers wine to water, and who dares even to look at a stimulant. We hav the curious spectacle of a very small minority who, by their own confession, for some time could not keep themselvs within the bounds of reason, now seeking to impose their arbitrary veto upon the very large majority, who hav never had the slightest difficulty in either taking a little, much, or abstaining altogether, as seemed to be the best for their organisms at the time. With as much reason might power be given to convalescent lunatics to put all the sane people in straight waistcoats or shut them up in padded rooms.

That last paragraph hits the nail squarely on the head, and I commend the logic of the extract to the prayerful consideration of the Prohibitionists. Certainly they should be praying men, such earnest believers are they in a fiat morality.

"The Marriage Bells Are Ringing."

From the American Art Journal.

Mr. Henry J. Thomas, the rising young journalist, was recently married to Miss A. May Hartley, an estimable and accomplished lady of Philadelphia, and is the subject of our congratulations. Mr. Thomas is a writer of originality, a thinker, and reflector, and is destined to win both name and fame in metropolitan journalism, which is in need of more men of his stamp.

We quote the foregoing, first by way of news, and second for the purpose of indorsing its sentiments. Mr. Thomas was formerly employed in THE TRUTH SEEKER office as proof reader, and is now connected with the Sewing-Machine Journal in the capacity of editor. We wish him joy.

DURING the Egyptian war a column of leaded telegraphic mess ges cost the London newspapers from $1,000 to $1,250. Seven shillings and two pence (about $1.80) per word was the rate charged.

The Influence of Food on Civilization.

From the North American Review.

From time immemorial the contrast has been recognized between races which obtain their food by utilizing the forces of nature, and those which depend for their subsistence on skill in availing themselvs of irregular and casual chances. Those who liv by agriculture on the one hand, and those on the other who liv by hunting, fishing, and so forth, hav become so diverse in their nature that a sentiment even of hostility has arisen between the two classes as between races differing in characteristics other than those which seem directly dependent on alimentation. The reason is not far to seek. That a part of the observed difference in this case (this comparativly rough illustration of the influence of food on human progress) depends on the nature of the food used and the manner of life of those using it, may be admitted. But the most important part of the difference between races which depend on agriculture and pasture, and those which liv by hunting and fishing, arises from differences in which, of necessity, they view nature. To one set of men all the circumstances are such as to suggest the absence of law and order in the workings of nature. They obtain their food precariously; at one time they may hav more than they want, at another they may be in danger of starving; they can recognize no law governing the order of events on which their lives depend—or, which is the same thing, the means by which they liv. On the other hand, those who depend on agriculture and pasture find early that there are laws on which their well-being depends; that by the recognition of such laws, and obedience to them when recognized, nature may be made the servant of man, not a mere chance benefactress. They learn that their fortunes lie in great part in their own hands. Observation and experiment are not only suggested by the very nature of agricultural and pastoral operations—these are themselvs experiments, and experiments only to be made successfully by observant and laborious workers. There must of necessity arise a marked difference in the turn of mind, and in the tone of character, of races thus patiently and observantly obeying, and at the same time guiding nature, and the disposition of men trusting to the chances and caprices of the huntsman's or the fisher's life.

As every nation that has ever become civilized has passed beyond the condition in which men depend on hunting or fishing for subsistence, it is unnecessary to dwell further on effects which in point of fact hav not been considered in comparing different kinds and degrees of civilization. They show us, however, at the outset, how important must be the influence of food, and of the manner of obtaining food, on the fortunes of a race, when we see that whether a people will become civilized or not depends thus on the question whether they advance or not to the state in which men no longer depend on an irregular and capricious supply of food, but on regular processes, partly the result of their own acts, partly the steady work of nature.

In considering the influence of food on civilization it has been customary, until of late, to start from Liebig's chemical division of food into two classes—the heat-producing and the tissue-forming—a division first pointed out in reality by Magendie. It was held that the temperature of the body is maintained by substances which contain no nitrogen, or little, while the wear and tear of the body is repaired by food in which there is an abundance of nitrogen. Liebig maintained that animals cannot possibly form their tissues out of anything but the proteids originally generated by plants. He was not aware that the foods which had been commonly regarded as essentially heat-producing are tissue-foods too. What was essentially right in his doctrin was that animal tissues cannot be formed out of saccharin compounds, as starch and sugar, unless these hav been changed into fat. He also was right in regarding the use of far the greater portion of carbonaceous food as that of fuel for the animal fires—that is, that it served to maintain the animal heat. He assumed, says Dr. Carpenter, "that the only purpose served by the oxidation" (or, as it were, "burning" of the food within the body, by combination with oxygen taken in through the lungs), "was the production of heat; affirming that all the mechanical force exerted by the animal body is the product of the transformation of living muscular fiber into dead—the vital force which was expended by the living tissue being expended in the shape of motion. The oxidation of the dead material he regarded as only a consequence of its loss of power to resist chemical agencies, and as a means of its removal—serving at the same time as an additional source of heat. And rightly judging that this chemical metamorphosis should show itself by the increased excretion of urea in the urin (the kidneys furnishing the channel through which most of the nitrogenous waste is carried out of the body), he appealed, in support of his doctrin, to what he supposed to be the fact of such increase, and its proportion to the amount of work done."

It has been assumed that where either the supply of heat-giving food is abundant, or owing to the nature of the climate, less food of the heat-giving kind is necessary, the population will increase more rapidly, wages be low, and the condition of the laboring classes will be depressed. It is, however, rather, the nature of the food employed, and the way in which it is obtained, that are in question, than any difference in the heat-producing capacity of the food, or the requirements of the inhabitants. For wherever work has to be done, there the food which had been thought useful only for its heat-sustaining qualities must be used to support and repair the muscular energies. The rice which had been thought sufficient barely to sustain life by sustaining heat, in parts of India is found to sustain the working energies also. The Bengalee laborers, for instance, on our Indian railways, work exceedingly well for their size, though they liv almost entirely on rice, with a little ghee (butter), or occasionally a small bit of fish. The low wages and the superabundance of population in India, are not then in reality dependent, as Buckle supposed, on non-nitrogenous food per se, but rather on the use of a cereal of great cheapness and abundance, yielding to the laborer a return of from fifty to ninety per cent. In Egypt, again, where dates take the place of the rice of India, and dhourra peas, beans, lentils, and other cheap articles of diet are in use, we find similar results, early and rapid progress, a still more rapid growth of population, exceedingly low wages, and a wide and ever widening disparity among different classes. Whatever discrepancies, as Buckle remarks, may exist between the accounts given by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus respecting the condition of ancient Egypt, both agreed respecting the rapid increase of the people and the servil condition into which they early fell. "Indeed," as he justly adds, "the mere appearance of those large and costly buildings, which are still standing, is a proof of the state of the nation that erected them. To raise structures so stupendous, and yet so useless, there must hav been tyranny on the part of the rulers and slavery on the part of the people. No wealth, however great, no expenditure, however lavish, could meet the expense which would hav been incurred, if they had been the work of free men, who received for their labor a fair and honest reward." Where food is very readily obtained in sufficient quantity to supply the wants of the working-classes, there not only are wages low, but population increases with undue rapidity, and, as an inevitable result, the powerful and wealthy squander the lives of the people with recklessness incredible in countries where the balance is better held between supply and demand. Thus only can we understand how, in any nation not absolutely subdued by an invading force, there should hav been such a reckless expenditure of life as occurred in ancient Egypt, where the old Red Sea canal cost, we are told, the lives of a hundred and twenty thousand Egyptians, whilst thrice that number—the entire population of such a city as Chicago or St. Louis—were employed for twenty years to build the great pyramid of Cheops.

In one race and in one only, in modern times, outside of Asia, Africa, and South America (that is, belonging to those nations of Europe and America which we associate with the progress of modern civilization), hav we had an opportunity of witnessing the effects of the use of a very cheap national food—the Irish. It has been remarked of the potato, that, until the appearance of the potato disease, it was cheaper than any equally wholesome and nutritious article of food. Adam Smith states in his "Wealth of Nations," Book I., chapter xi., that land sown with potatoes will support three times as many persons as if sown with wheat; but McCulloch is probably nearer the mark in saying it will support twice as many. As a natural result, in a country where people are thus (or rather were thus) cheaply fed, wages are lower, and the natural increase of the population will be greater than where the national food is dearer. Until the potato disease appeared, the population of Ireland was increasing at the rate of three per cent per annum; the increase in England during the past year, counting all who hav emigrated, was barely half this. It is to this rapid increase of population in Ireland in past times that the difference in the distribution of riches in Ireland and in England has been mainly due. The labor market in Ireland was overstocked. The people were thus compelled to work for such low wages as to be debarred, as Buckle remarks, "not only from the comforts, but from the common decencies of civilized life." This evil condition, he adds, was the natural result of that cheap and abundant food which encouraged the people to so rapid an increase that the labor market was constantly gorged.

In the New World we must revert to ancient times for evidence respecting this important law. In the United States and Canada, as will presently be shown, the operation of the law is at present masked by other causes. It is, indeed, only where the law has had time to operate, almost without check, on a population occupying a large but little changing area, that its full effects can be recognized. In some of the older nations of the American continent this appears to hav happened in such sort as to giv at least as much prominence to the effects due to the law as among Asiatic and African races Materials still exist by which we can form an opinion respecting the condition of ancient Peru and Mexico, the only countries in America where the law affecting the relation of cheap food on civilization could be expected to operate. In these regions the warmth of the climate, by rendering life (mere living) easier, both as respects food and raiment, helps to encourage that which is in fact the real cause of the mischievous consequences we hav described (for cheap food and easy living are not in themselvs evils)—the too rapid growth of a population occupying an unchanging area, however large. So far as mere natural fertility and productivness of soil were concerned Brazil, in South America, and the southern and eastern parts of the United States, in North America, were far in advance of Peru and Mexico; but the fertility and productivness of those regions were in excess of what man in past ages could effectivly deal with. Nature there was overwhelmingly prolific. As Buckle remarks, "when the productiv powers of nature are carried beyond a certain point, the imperfect knowledge of uncivilized man is unable to cope with them or in any way turn them to his own advantage." Civilization would, therefore, never begin in regions where nature is so full of life that we seem to feel, to hear, to see her growth. Only where the powers of nature, though activ, are such as man, in the beginning of his attempts at civilization, can deal with and control, do we find that ancient civilizations began; there, only, would the wealth of nature help man to gather together the materials for that progress which we call civilization.

In Mexico and Peru, a substance even cheaper and more prolific than rice or dates or potatoes has been and is still one of the most important articles of food. Ixtlilxochitl, the Mexican historian, by his passing references to maize or Indian corn, shows that before the Spaniards arrived in Mexico it was in general use. If we can believe all that has been said of the growth of maize in Mexico proper, the yield must hav always been far greater than that of any other cereal the world over. Thus, whereas in California the average yield is, I believe, about eightyfold, it is said to be three or four hundred fold, and, under favorable conditions, even twice as great, in Mexico, Humboldt says, "The fecundity of Ilaolli, or Mexican maize, is beyond all we can imagin in Europe. The plant, favored by intense heat and great humidity, attains a hight of from two to three meters (say seven to ten feet)." He adds that in the fine plains extending from San Juan del Rio to Queretaro a yield of eight hundred fold is sometimes obtained (Nouvelle Espagne, vol. ii, p. 374). The banana, however, both in Mexico and Peru, afforded an even cheaper and more abundant source of food. "I doubt," says Humboldt, "whether there exists another plant on the earth which in a small tract of land will produce so great a quantity of nourishing food." The produce of the banana exceeds that of wheat one hundred and thirty-three times, that of potatoes forty four times. This, of course, does not indicate the life-supporting powers of bananas, wheat, and potatoes. The produce of the three are related thus:

Bananas : potatoes : wheat :: 133 : 3 : 1.

But equal quantities of bananas, potatoes, and wheat hav unequal nutritiv powers, and when due account is taken of the difference we find that equal tracts of land sown (in suitable latitudes and soils) with bananas, potatoes, and wheat hav life-supporting powers proportioned thus:

Bananas : potatoes : wheat :: 25 : 2 : 1.

We might expect to find, then, that in ancient Mexico and Peru the effects we hav been led to attribute to great cheapness and abundance of food, with resulting diminished struggle for mere existence, and consequent over-productivness of the human race, would be found in even more marked degree than in Asia and Egypt. We might expect that wages would be exceedingly low and the laboring population reduced to a very degraded condition, while the upper class (for in these cases there are seldom lower and upper classes, but simply an upper class and a lower one) wealthy, luxurious, and despotic.

Yet, even with the anticipations which we might be led to form from what we hav already seen of the effects of over-population, we could hardly conceive that a people would hav been so utterly degraded as the Peruvians and the Mexicans of the lower class seem to hav been. On the one hand, we find a class possessing practically unlimited wealth, which they expended, or rather wasted, with incredible prodigality and ostentation. On the other we find a class absolutely without possessions, yet, by a strange irony of fate, the sole tax-payers. "The members of the royal house," says Prescott in his history of Peru (vol. i., p. 56), "the great nobles, even the public functionaries, and the numerous body of the priesthood, were all exempt from taxation; the whole duty of defraying the expenses of the government belonged to the people." It was the same in Mexico. "The inferior folk," says Larenaudière in his "Mexique," "who possessed no property and had no commerce, paid their respectiv shares of the taxes in work of different kinds; by them the crown-lands were tilled, public works were carried on, and the various houses belonging to the emperor were built and furnished."

So utterly sunk were the Peruvians and Mexicans below the level which in our time is regarded as the lowest to which man can be degraded, that they had not even so much of independence as all but the worst slave-owners allowed their negro slaves in former times. "They had nothing," says Prescott, "that deserved to be called property. They could follow no craft, engage in no labor, no amusement, but such as was specially provided by law. They could not change their residence or their dress without a license from the government. They could not even exercise the freedom which is conceded to the most abject in other countries—that of selecting their own wives." In Mexico a similar state of things prevailed; the lower class in Mexico being, if possible, even more degraded than the corresponding class in Peru.

It seems, then, at a first view, as if this broad, general lesson were taught—that where nature is most prolific and productiv, in manageable degree, there will be on the one hand the earliest civilization, and on the other the greatest degradation of the greater number. In the process of evolution, by which nations are first formed, then developed, then destroyed, abundance and cheapness of food seem to be all-important factors, at first creativ, then destructiv—destructiv, because the condition to which nations tend, when over-populated, is one encouraging destructiv action from without, and causing dissolution by processes taking place within, even without external attacks. This condition is in fine one of unstable equilibrium. We recognize it in decaying nations; we recognize the opposit in nations which are growing and thriving. . . . . .

In dealing with this question, by the way, Darwin has referred to the increase of the population of the United States, as if it illustrated the possible natural increase of civilized populations under favorable conditions. At least he has compared it with the rate of natural increase which Euler showed to be possible, six per cent per annum, nothing like which has ever been known, even during a single year. Of course the increase of the population of North America is quite outside all arguments relating to the natural increase possible in the human race. I do not know that in any part of the United States, even under the most favorable conditions, a natural increase of more than three per cent per annum has ever been observed, or, indeed, that it has been possible anywhere to distinguish the natural increase from that which has arisen only from immigration or the shifting of population from one spot to another. Still there can be little doubt that even such an increase as has been observed in the United States, by which the population doubles in about twenty-five years, might occur naturally under favorable conditions. At this rate the present population of the United States, say, roughly, fifty millions, would cover the habitable part of North America, say seven million square miles, so thickly that four men would hav to stand on each square yard of surface, in little more than five hundred (more exactly in five hundred and seventeen) years. In six hundred and seventeen years a surface sixteen times as great would be covered as densely, or one hundred and twelve million square miles, which is much more than the entire land surface of the globe. In less than six hundred and forty years the whole surface of the terraqueous globe would be covered, four men to the square yard, from the present population of the United States alone, at the supposed rate of increase. But apart from such an unusual rate of increase as this, if we take any such rate as one and a half per cent per annum, which is about the rate of natural increase in old and settled countries like England, it would take but one thousand one hundred and eighty-eight years, a mere nothing in the history of the world, to thus crowd the earth's surface, land and water, with the descendants of a present population of fifty millions. It is hardly necessary to say that in a much shorter time, at this perfectly normal rate of increase, the world would be utterly uninhabitable.

We perceive, then, what an important factor that must be of which Darwin has remarked that it is the primary or fundamental check to the continued increase of man, the difficulty of gaining subsistence and of living in comfort. We cannot wonder that the whole character of past civilizations, in the Old World and in the New, should hav been affected by this potent cause, that where the difficulty of gaining subsistence has been unduly small, other activ means of destroying superabundant population should hav come into existence to replace that one which should be the primary force working to that end. In a country like the United States, where subsistence is easy, but where, also, there is plenty of room, we see very rapid growth and development. We may believe that, as Darwin says, if the means of subsistence were doubled in England (or, which would come to much the same thing, if people in England would be content with or could liv in comfort on the cheap articles of food used in Asia and Africa), the population in England would be quickly doubled, and for a while the process of development in a nation undoubtedly gains by those causes which encourage an increase of population. But just as the development of the natural body is part of the progress toward death, and eventually leads to death, so that increase of population by which a nation's first steps to power are determined, becomes, unless checked by the increasing difficulty of securing the means of living, part of the progress toward the nation's dissolution, and toward the surcease of its civilization.

If we consider what are the conditions as to the nature of food used and required, and the abundance of the supply, most favorable to the progress of a nation, we encounter at the outset this difficulty that the favorable conditions of one stage of a nation's history become unfavorable conditions in another. There can be no question, for instance, that the abundance and cheapness of food (of all, at any rate, which is essential for food) in the United States, are at present among the factors which encourage the development of the nation; the chief reason being that America is still in the stage when labor can command good terms. It is unlikely, also, that, for many generations, America can suffer from over-population resulting from undue ease in the conditions under which the bulk of the people obtain sustenance. Yet that danger lurks in the background for America as it has for other nations. Or rather, we can recognize, and in no very remote future, a time when the means of subsistence will no longer be so much in excess of the actual wants of the people as they are at present—when, therefore, the increase of population will no longer be so rapid, and the tendency to cheap labor, which would otherwise hav arisen, will be checked by a hardening of the conditions under which the struggle for life has been carried on. We may recognize in several European nations the action of this safety-valve against unduly rapid development. In England, especially, this has been the case. The conditions under which the bulk of the people in England subsist hav never become and are never likely to become unduly easy. The natural increase of the English people is nevertheless too rapid, and it is only the outlet found in emigration which has saved England in great degree, as it has saved other European nations, in greater or less degree, from the miseries and degradations which arise from an overcrowded population. Where a similar outlet may be found for an excess of population, when that danger is threatened in America, does not yet appear. It may be that safeguards of other kinds may come into action before that danger supervenes. If man differs from the lower animals in this, that, with advancing civilization, an ever-increasing proportion of the race see the folly and wickedness of fighting, that more and more stringent and scientific (therefore more and more successful) measures are used for the prevention of pestilence and disease, and so forth, he differs also from the lower animals in having his passions not as instincts only (though they are that with him, with as all other animals), but under the control of reason. On the one hand, human reason has diminished, and is still further diminishing the action of those causes which correct the unduly rapid growth of population; on the other hand, human reason possesses (though hitherto it has not in the aggregate very fully used, or even absolutely recognized the full right to use) the power of preventing such unduly rapid growth. We may well hope that before the time comes when excessiv population, for which no remedy can be found in emigration, threatens the great world-nation of the future, men will widely and clearly hav recognized the duty of regulating, either by legal or individual restraints, the responsibilities of parentage. Many who differ from Mr. J. S. Mill, in considering that our present notions of liberty in this respect are "misplaced," in so far as they "prevent legal obligations from being imposed in this matter," must agree with him in recognizing moral obligations. As he well remarks, "the fact itself of causing the existence of a human being is one of the most responsible actions in the range of human life. To undertake this responsibility—to bestow a life which may be either a curse or a blessing—unless the being on whom it is to be bestowed will hav at least the ordinary chances of a desirable existence, is a crime against that being; and in a country either over-peopled or threatened with being so, to produce children beyond a very small number, with the effect of reducing the reward of labor by their competition, is a very serious offense against all who liv by the remuneration of their labor." I cannot myself agree with Mill in what he adds, that "the laws which, in many countries on the continent, forbid marriage unless the parties can show that they hav the means of supporting a family, do not exceed the legitimate powers of the state." I think they go far beyond any desirable interference on the part of the state with individual freedom of action, and that a people which would be the better for such interference, so far as material advantages are concerned, must be so degraded that the sooner they pass away, or are absorbed by worthier races, the better for the world. I definitly and earnestly reject his doctrin that, "whether such laws be expedient or not, they are not objectionable as violations of liberty." It appears to me that if laws of that kind were permissible at all, the state might far more reasonably "forbid marriage unless the parties can show that," according to recognized laws of heredity, their offspring are reasonably likely to be strong, able, and worthy members of the body politic. But the vice of Mill's reasoning here, as in much of his writing on such matters, is the assumption that the state can advantageously undertake the duties which belong especially to individuals—the persons who would hav to supervise such matters being unlikely, on the average, to take greater care in the matter than those over whose conduct they would be appointed to watch. In a nation where a majority "cared for none of these things," the state could do nothing with advantage or without mischievous violations of liberty; where, on the other hand, the majority took as just a view on this subject as on more familiar moral obligations, state interference would be unnecessary.

Apart from the influence of moral restraints such as these, we should be compelled, by the evidence alike of antiquity and of our own age, to teach a doctrin precisely the reverse of that advanced by writers who measure progress by the rate of increase of population. "There is one mode," says Prof. Greg, in his "Enigmas of Life," "in which the amount of human existence sustainable on a given area, and, therefore, throughout the chief portion of the habitable globe, may be almost indefinitly increased—i. e., by a substitution of vegetable for animal food. A given acreage of wheat will feed at least ten times as many men as the same acreage employed in growing mutton. It is usually calculated that the consumption of wheat by an adult is about one quarter per annum, and we know that good land produces four quarters. Let us even assume that a man living on grain would require two quarters a year; still, one acre would support two men. But a man living on meat would require three pounds a day, and it is considered a liberal calculation if an acre spent in grazing sheep and cattle yields in mutton or beef more than fifty pounds on an average—the best farmer in Norfolk having averaged ninety pounds; but a great majority of farmers in Great Britain only reach twenty pounds. On these data it would require twenty-two acres of pasture land to sustain one adult person living on meat. It is obvious that, in view of the adoption of vegetable diet, there lies the indication of a vast possible increase in the population sustainable on a given area."

Here, the question whether increase in the density of population (equally well sustained by food) is an unmixed good is not considered. Life may be more cheaply supported by such a change as Mr. Greg suggests; but if the life so supported is found to be cheaper—that is, more cheaply valued—more life may mean more misery. "Man does not liv by bread alone," is true doctrin here. If the extra lives are looked on only for what they may be worth to the capitalist, or as so much food for the man of oppression, or to be consumed in war, it is worse than useless thus thoughtfully to provide for their mere existence. We hav seen that in every case known, cheap food and resulting increase of population hav meant such diversities in the social strata as must result, earlier or later, in destruction by misplacements and upheavals within, or by inroads from without. If there be aught in modern civilization to save nations which become exposed to the same conditions and the same dangers as of old, it should be easy to point out where such safeguards lie. It would not be difficult to show, however, that just so far as modern nations approach, either in whole or in part, the conditions under which older nations perished, they show the signs of decrepitude and decay, which, unless checked, signify approaching dissolution. What does emigration mean but this? We look on complacently at this evidence of over-population and resulting destructiv tendencies; but, as Dr. B. W. Richardson well remarks, "It is the fittest for work and for earning who leave our shores; the unfittest for work, the luxurious and the least powerful, remain. Thus the drain on the first processes of national permanent prosperity is that which is opened by emigration—is that which is exhausting the heart of the commonwealth." And he offers as a remedy the cheapening of food, as if the best part of our general population left the shores of Britain solely because food is dear. They leave, not because food is dear, but because labor is cheap; and the cheaper the food the worse the evil will become, for labor will become cheaper too. When emigration becomes no longer possible, when this safety-valve is closed—it will be within a period very short, indeed, compared with the periods by which men measure history—the consequences observed among the nations of old may affect—on a wider scale—the civilization

Science vs. Superstition.

By the consent of the editor, I will present to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a few thoughts upon the hostil relations which science and superstition hav hitherto borne to each other; and in the consideration of my subject I shall venture to lend a broader definition to the word "superstition" than Noah Webster allows.

I would not in the present case hav it confined merely to the subject of religious opinion, but would make it include all of the obstructions which ignorance and intolerance hav thrown across the track of scientific research.

As far back as when man first learned the art of recording passing events, either upon soft bark or tables of stone, we find two classes mentally arrayed against each other; the one class clinging tenaciously to what they believe to be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; the other class conceiving that all truth, in its relation to man, is only fragmentary, and that a larger acquaintance with the laws which govern the universe of matter and mind is not only consistent with the most exalted religion, but, more than this, is one of its divine behests.

Since a complete knowledge of the relations which man bears to the physical or material universe was not born with him, but comes only through earnest inquiry and persistent research, it is not strange that the pages of history hav been defaced with the records of war for opinion's sake, and the fair face of nature so often been bedewed with humanity's blood, while the savage instincts of uncultured man exercised so large an influence over the mental world.

Superstition was comparativly harmless so long as it contented itself with simply cherishing absurd opinions and beliefs which had no foundation in fact, but it became dangerous and reprehensible in proportion as it became aggressiv, by assuming to dictate to others what they should believe, or attempting to enforce conviction by violent means.

Science is a brilliant "chandelier" in the past as well as the present age. It is continually bringing the focus of its rays to bear upon the dark corners of human understanding, bringing to the light many of the hidden forces in nature which had hitherto inspired only superstition and awe.

Science declares that there is nothing in all the vast universe too sacred to be questioned, criticised, analyzed, and, if possible, fully understood. It is the good architect who lays his broad underpinning in solid stone, leaving no weak spot by which the vast temple of knowledge may be in the future undermined.

The earnest disciple of science says: "Giv me the truth, at whatever cost to myself, even though to possess it be to shatter to atoms my most cherished opinions. Let me drink from the pure fount of nature, that my soul may be nourished by the sweet bread of life; for to learn much of nature is to know more of Go(ɔ)d."

In this spirit some of the most heroic and reverent souls that ever blessed the earth hav struggled and climbed, going over, around, and through the ten thousand obstructions which fiendish prejudice and furious ignorance hav thrown in the pathway of scientific investigation.

The very word superstition ever reminds us of those old heroes, long since departed—Socrates, Servetus, and that brave Bohemian Freethinker, John Huss, besides a host of others who, instead of bartering away the priceless jewel of intellectual freedom, chose rather to yield up sweet life upon the altar of liberty of thought and speech.

Thus has it ever been, in hundreds—yea, thousands—of instances, that the sacrifice of a noble life was the price demanded for some new discovery in nature, which, when understood, proved to be a blessing to mankind, from center to circumference and from pole to pole.

In ages past whomsoever ventured to strike a match—so to speak—within the old citadel of ignorance and superstition, lighting up the dark fortress even for a moment, found he had but furnished the fagots for his own cremation.

Thus, from age to age, hav some of the noblest souls of earth—humanity's saviors—been persecuted and crucified for the grave offense of seeking earnestly for wisdom, and striving to acquire that knowledge which in its application would augment the sum of human happiness. Let us rejoice that every age has furnished some great, heroic souls, whose intelligent convictions the fear of neither incarceration, mutilation, nor death could smother, nor the united voice of a multitude bribe to silence; for to them we owe unfailing gratitude for the advantages of civilization and culture which we enjoy to-day.

Ignorant conservatism coupled with superstition has little faith in the innate goodness of man; therefore it hails with hope and confidence any new invention which will facilitate the prosecution of warfare. It has faith in the wisdom and utility of standing armies. It believes in building prisons, and in keeping the gallows in good repair; in converting the mineral substances of earth into bullets and bombshells, in levying taxes upon the people to defray the expense of hunting, capturing, confining, trying, and executing the morally decrepit sons and daughters of earth who are called criminals.

Science keeps steadily at work striving to discover and remove the causes of evil by dissecting human character, studying human necessity in all directions, and its legitimate claims; striving to search out the most intricate roots from whence all evil actions spring. Science seeks to supersede those laws founded upon ignorant authority by infusing into our social life a more tender regard for humanity everywhere. It enlarges the avenues to intelligence and self-support; it builds colleges, educates teachers, erects almshouses, opens up the forbidden paths to knowledge, looks tenderly after the interests of the unfortunate and down-trodden, carries the sunshine of sympathy, love, and hope to those in prison, and in various ways and through intelligent means strives to promote human welfare, and to steadily and surely attune the discordant elements of human society into a condition of ultimate harmony, usefulness, and peace.

It has ever been the province of superstition to condemn without evidence, to execute without a just tribunal, to believe extravagant improbabilities, and to make war upon certainties. Science is ever the world's attorney, who examins the case before the impartial jury of reason, and renders a verdict in accordance with the facts.

Superstition says: "Don't try to entertain me with any of your new-fangled ideas; I hate your modern fanaticism. Don't attempt to upholster my intellectual furniture; it is the exact pattern I admire, and was bequeathed to me by my remote ancestors, and is all the more sacred for being old; furthermore, your oft-repeated innovations upon my intellectual and moral estate are an unwarrantable transgression. Your ideas are profane and revolutionary in their tendency, and you deserve to be prosecuted, punished, and socially ostracized for your vain heresies."

Science steps into the line of mechanical discovery and invents instruments for calculating the magnitude of the planets and their respectiv distances from each other. Indeed, science has revolutionized the commercial, agricultural, and mechanical business of the world. The telephone and speaking phonograph are among the youngest and most interesting children of modern science.

Again, science converts steam into a power that is many times stronger than the combined efforts of all the domestic animals in the world's employ.

It has deposited in the bed of the Atlantic a line of intelligent commerce, which pulsates from day to day with its freight of thought, bringing the two continents, Europe and America, into the most neighborly and familiar intercourse; and just here I venture to predict that at no very distant day telegraphy will be taught in our common schools.

Aerial navigation, thus far impracticable, is nevertheless no longer utterly impossible. Science, through the art of photography, preserves for us the shadows of our loved ones that we may be comforted in their absence, with the privilege of tracing every lineament of feature, and enjoy even the expression which a passing thought may hav lent to the face.

Through the discoveries of phrenology and anthropology, science finds man to be the exact product of all the forces and conditions which existed anterior to his birth; hence his accountability is found to be limited, rendering him unavoidably and eternally more or less subservient to conditions and circumstances over which he can exercise little or no control.

Here science makes a compromise between what is usually denominated positiv good and positiv evil, placing knowledge where persecution hitherto reigned supreme.

Some thirty or more years ago science declared, through the medium of a periodical published in New York city by the Fowler Brothers, that the moral character and intellectual status of the succeeding generations need not be a matter of great uncertainty. This stroke of information, however, did not jostle the world much; only the "few" and "far between" could comphehend and appropriate the new light! After a lapse of nearly thirty years a man, distinguished for his nativ genius, thrilling eloquence, psycological power over an audience, as well as his ecclesiastical subterfuges—Henry Ward Beecher—opened his mouth in a recent discourse, and proclaimed his confidence in this same great truth, when lo! the whole civilized world was at once electrified by his wonderful announcement. This is still another proof that mankind, as a rule, are reluctant to accept any new truth unless it be heralded by ecclesiastical or political pomp and magnificence, forgetting that in all the past the most useful discoveries and grandest truths hav, in a majority of instances, been born through humble instrumentalities. There ever has been and ever must be a standing hostility between the frontal brain, which reasons, and the back brain, which settles backward like a donkey in the harness, and is governed alone by impulse. The middle top-head is the judge and jury, the standing referee, the mediator; and just in proportion as this is prominent will the person be uniform and consistent in character, and less in need of correction at the hands of either religion or law.

As civilization advances, and the grosser elements in human society become exalted and refined through higher conditions of living, may we not reasonably hope that the generations who are to be our successors may find that scientific knowledge has borne at last its legitimate fruits, which are these: That war has been superseded by peace; that reason is the standing tribunal instead of arms; that munitions of war hav been converted into instruments of husbandry; that swords hav been beat into plowshares and pruning-hooks; prisons hav been changed to homes for the friendless, and austere officers been supplanted by gentle and scientific teachers; and the timbers for the gallows hav been sawed into fuel to warm the shivering children who hav been imprisoned for stealing coal; and lastly, and greater than all these, a time when there shall be a great wedding in the land, where every child of humanity may come with their wedding gifts? And this is when Science shall take Religion by the hand, and by the authority vested in God and nature, declare that they two were made for each other, can liv apart no longer, but are one henceforth and forever!

A Letter from Ceylon.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: By a kind dispensation of the gods your parcel of anti Christian tracts and pamphlets reached me at Baddegama—the nest of the missionaries of the Southern Province—on the very day when I was to lecture there, and was threatened with a disputation by them. As usual, they did not come to time, and so I gave my large audience the plain talk about Christianity which they needed and the missionaries ought to hav heard.

Your selections were judicious and valuable, and I will editorially notice them.

I am greatly pleased with your Palestine letters, of which I hav read every word. I shall recommend them to our Asiatic friends. I will always notice any good things you may choose to send me. If I had a copy of that little pamphlet on the crimes of the clergy I would hav it translated and printed here and in India. I am selling the Sinhalese edition of your Colombo lecture at all these villages, along with the "Buddhist Catechism." I think we may distribute three thousand copies in time. I am having a Sinhalese version of the "Bible Contradictions" prepared.

It may surprise you to hear that I hav taken to healing the sick by imposition of hands. I am perfectly run down by paralytics and palsied people, and hav cured twenty-three in one day. At Galle, on the 3d inst., one hundred patients applied, and the news of my cures having spread like wildfire through the island, patients waylay me at every village I come to on my present tour.

The origin of the affair was this: When I got to Colombo from Bombay I heard that the Catholics had started a "holy well" near Kelanie, after the Lourdes pattern, and that some ignorant Buddhists had become perverts. I told the high priest, jokingly, that he would hav to start an opposition well; and as he could not do that, being a Buddhist, not a Catholic priest, I finally determined to show the Buddhists that desperate cases could be cured in the name of Buddha as well as in that of Jesus. My *gooroo (whose portrait you saw at Bombay) had no objections, so I began with a patient who had been paralyzed nine years in one arm and leg, and had run the gauntlet of the English and nativ doctors without relief. I gave him no medicin, but simply applying my knowledge of mesmerism and occultism, cured the man in a half hour. Since then he has walked twenty-four miles in one day. The news spread, of course, like wildfire in a prairie, and since then I hav had far more than five men could do thrust upon me. I need hardly say I take no fee or presents of any kind; in fact, I giv alms to very poor and deserving patients. My cures are really as wonderful in some cases as that of good Dr. Newton, the Zonan Jacob, and other noted psycopathists. Among other things, I hav restored speech to a man whose tongue was paralyzed, and cured another in two minutes of a paralyzed arm and leg. I suppose that now I shall be forced to do the same thing all through India, if my gooroo don't stop me, which is possible, as it is a heavy drain upon the vital force of a man of fifty. The amusing feature of the case is that the padrés show much tribulation at the unmasking of an unsuspected theosophical battery.

I return to Bombay the latter part of this month, so you need not send me the paper here until next season. If you can spare the extra copy send it to Bombay, as we may hav to cut for quotes.

*A spiritual teacher or guide among the Hindoos.

Our Sinhalese education fund grows apace. I hav got Rs. 6,000 ($3,000) subscribed thus far this season. For poor people like these this is very good.

With respects to Mrs. Bennett,

Respectfully yours, H. S. OLCOTT.

The Bright Side Again.

DEAR MRS. SLENKER: I do not see any difference between your endless chain of cause and effect and what I termed a "ceaseless rush of blind forces;" as your endless chain has no intelligence connected with it, it amounts to the same thing. I admit that "matter is governed and controled by its own laws," but does this fact prove that we shall "be blown out as a lamp is extinguished?" I know that the grand argument of the Materialist is that intelligence is the result of organization, therefore disorganization will destroy intelligence; but I cannot stop now to discuss that point, but wish to confine myself to what you hav stated concerning the "bright side" of this question.

You ask, "Is it no stimulus to heroism, inspiration, and courage to feel that each good deed done, each good word spoken, will add to the world's happiness all along the coming future of its inhabitants?" I think the amount of inspiration which we can feel in contemplating the "future of the world's inhabitants" depends entirely upon our opinion as to what kind of creatures the world's inhabitants are. If we view mankind as only a higher race of animals, existing for a brief space of time, and then vanishing forever, of what account is man more than the beasts or the insects? Why should we trouble ourselvs about the good or ill of such ephemeral creatures? It will all be over so soon with each individual that it is of little moment, comparativly, whether his condition is bettered or not. I do not say it is of no moment, for I would not willingly giv pain to an insect; but my enthusiasm in any enterprise for the good of humanity will be greatly abated when I am convinced that man is a phantom and life without a meaning.

You say that "the poetic sentiment can revel as gloriously in dreams of beauty, love, and progress, to be realized here on earth," etc. What! revel in a beauty that is meaningless—in a love that is soon to be crucified—in the progress of a race of emmets? Take the dignity of immortality from man, take the deific spirit from nature, and all the glories of the universe, but, mock our yearning souls, man becomes a pigmy, and life a cruel farce.

In our League we once discussed the question, "Is life worth living?" Every Materialist said, "No." Every believer in a hereafter said, "Yes." The Materialistic Solomon declared that "all is vanity," and "man hath no pre-eminence above the beasts." A soulless universe, a soulless human race, a brief existence, and then eternal night—all this is a meager, mournful theory, belittling man in his own estimation, and paralyzing all the springs of noble action.

Yours truly, MRS. E. HEDDON.

Stalwart Liberals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your contributor "Tee Cee Lee" does no more than justice to the "stalwart Liberals" whom he enumerates. But he seems strangely to hav forgotten, or not to hav known, that there is such a state as Michigan, and that, in proportion to its size (and it is one of Uncle Samuel's "big boys"—only the seventh in the family of thirty-eight), it contains as many, and as stalwart, Liberals as any other state affords. We count J. H. Burnham as the peer of any; and there is M. Babcock, whose incisiv works are translated into the language of heathen lands to counteract the work of the missionaries. Our townsman, U. K. Booth, now in Colorado, is known to thousands through the masterly address which he gave in this city a couple of years ago. These hav a national reputation. I could giv the names of a thousand or two more in the state, equally pronounced, if less known. Mr. Burnham goes to Pittsburg soon for a seven weeks' engagement.

Some orthodox chickens hav lately come home to roost in the orthodox walls of the University of Michigan. That institution is state supported, but, like everything else, it is usurped by the devotees of superstition. Its officers claim that it is a Christian institution in this, as they claim, "Christian" state (both false). Some years ago I made a protest before the state legislature against this Christian claim and practice in a state institution as violating plain constitutional provisions, which made me plenty of enemies, if no friends.

But now the old Nick is to pay there sure enough. Dr. Frothingham, a professor in the medical department, and whose hat covers a large portion of the brains of the institution, is a Liberal. He is accused of having spoken respectfully of Thomas Paine and Col. Ingersoll in some of his lectures, and (not having a wholesome fear of orthodox bigotry before his eyes) of having also spoken as freely of ministers as of other men, and, worse than all, of having spoken doubtingly or irreverently of superstition in the light of science. This has terribly stirred the ire of one Morgan, a California preacher, who apparently couldn't liv by his trade at home, and is studying medicin at the expense of the people of Michigan for the purpose of bettering his condition. He has made complaint against Prof. Frothingham, and the subject is now undergoing official investigation. For consistency's sake, if the professor is found guilty of heresy he should be burnt. But the rational commentary is that we hav as good a right to insist that a little sense be taught in a state institution as superstition has to demand that it be taught. If Dr. Frothingham has struck the shell of superstition that envelopes the institution with the hammer of science, let us hope that he will add blow upon blow until the shell cracks and the sunlight of reason breaks in and dissipates the mists and fogs of bigotry that hav been bred there. John Peck's Infidel Philosophy.

An honest God will never damn an honest man on account of an honest belief.

If God is everywhere, he must be in hell. If hell is a place of torment, must he not feel uncomfortable? If the saved are admitted into the presence of God, are they not in hell, too? Apropos, they always raised hell on earth.

If God had foreknowledge, and created the devil, and the devil is the author of sin, and the reward of sin is eternal torment, do not those who go to hell carry out the design of the Almighty?

If the eating of the apple tainted the whole human family, and God drowned the world on account of sin, did he not know that the taint would reach down through Noah and produce another crop as wicked as the first? And would it not hav been a stroke of policy to let Noah go for fish-bait and breed from a new stock entirely?

A portion of the animals of the earth are the natural food for another portion. When the animals were let out of the ark, what was there to hinder the hawks from pouncing upon the "dunghills," the wolves from devouring the sheep, the lions and panthers from killing the deer, the rabbits, etc.?

If God could cause the dead to come forth from their graves, could he not invent some other way to kill men without drowning them? By this method he killed innocent animals, which had not sinned along with man who had sinned. Why should he wish to kill the innocent kids and lambs, the doves and nightingales, and save the voracious sharks, the devil-fish, and hell-benders?

If Christ died to save sinners, and ninety-nine out of every hundred go to hell, was not his death ninety-nine-hundredths of a failure?

If a knowledge of the scriptures is necessary to salvation, and God is all-powerful—and thousands die every year who never heard of them—if he has not adapted means to ends, is he not alone responsible?

If King David, with his score of fancy women, was a man after God's own heart, should not Brigham Young be regarded as a patron saint?

If God sanctioned all the bloody wars we read of in the Bible, will he be likely to send a delegate to the peace congress?

If we cannot feel guilty because Benedict Arnold attempted to betray his country, or because Booth assassinated President Lincoln, or because Guiteau killed Garfield, or because a thousand other bad acts hav been committed, over which we had no control, how can we feel guilty because a woman ate an apple six thousand years ago? We cannot feel guilty for what we cannot help. If God will punish us for what we cannot help, he is incompetent to fill the office of a country justice.

If it is just to hold the whole human family for the bad act of one woman, would it not be equally just to giv the vilest wretch on earth credit for all the good which has been accomplished by the great and good of all ages?

If it is right to teach a child to be good, is it not the hight of absurdity to instill into the mind of that child the idea of original sin, which precludes the idea of being good?

If there is sufficient efficacy in the blood of Christ to snatch a man from the gallows right into the king-row of the heavenly checker-board, will it be likely ever to fail on a decent man?

The Christian believes the Bible to be of divine origin, given by a perfect being—that those who implicitly follow its teachings must be perfect, therefore not susceptible of improvement. The tendency of such belief is forever to hold man at a standstill; and history proves that the Christian has never taken one step forward, only as he has been urged by outside (and generally Infidel) forces.

If God commanded men to be stoned to death for picking up sticks on the Sabbath, and little children to be torn to pieces by wild animals for saying naughty words to an old man, he would not do for a law-maker of the nineteenth century, and I wouldn't vote for him. If God ever suspended the laws of nature in order that a miracle might be performed, what assurance can we hav that the law of gravitation may not cease at any time? Or how could we know that the sun will rise to-morrow morning?

No matter what a man's daily walk and conduct may be; though he may be a drunkard, a gambler, and bruiser; though he may hav robbed the widow and the fatherless; though he may hav the blood of the murdered upon his skirts; though his seduced victims may die in despair; though he may bear the ear-mark of adultery and disease; though a court may decide that he is too vile to liv upon the face of the earth, yet if he only believe in Jesus Christ, and is flush with faith, he can enter the gates of the holy city without being cross-questioned, and hav the full freedom of the celestial city tendered to him.

Though a man may hav spent his whole life in trying to make the world better; though his blessings may hav reached far and wide among mankind; though, like Watts and Fulton and Morse, he may hav made discoveries of incalculable value to the human family, if he does not believe in Jesus Christ, and has no faith to believe that the merits of an individual who died many centuries ago can be of any possible advantage to him, he must be cast into hell without a trial by his peers, and even denied the poor privilege of pettifogging his own case.

If Moses told the truth when he said that Jacob saw God face to face, didn't John tell a lie when he said "no man hath seen God at any time?"

If any human being can deserve hell, it is one who can rejoice while his friends are writhing in eternal torment.

If a man teach his children that the stories as related of Samson, Jonah, Noah, Elijah, Lot, and his wife, Balaam's ass, etc., are the word of God, and that the disbelief of them will incur his wrath, might they not justly infer that the greater the absurdity the more sacredly they are bound to believe, and that the favor of God follows the belief of the biggest lie?

God told our first parents that if they partook of the forbidden fruit they should surely die. They partook of the forbidden fruit and did not die. Which was the more truthful, God or the devil? "You pay your money and take your choice."

The great wrong which has been done throughout Christendom by teaching the young that there is a way by which they can escape the consequences of crime and wrong-doing, can never be computed. The doctrin that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin may hav enabled some deluded mortals to die in hopes of an imaginary heaven; but it has made a hell on earth. A criminal act leaves a fearful scar upon the individual committing it and upon society, and all the blood of ten thousand saviors cannot wash it out. Better a thousand times to teach that every wrong act has an unavoidable penalty here and now, and that there is no escape from its consequences; that a little self-restraint in regard to the commission of crime is worth a world of blood and repentance. Let this lesson be properly impressed upon the minds of the young, and it will be worth more to the people of earth than ten thousand heavens filled with blood-washed criminals.

If it took six days for God to create the heavens and the earth, how much time could he hav saved if the raw material could hav been furnished ready to his hand and a good convenient place to work in, so that he wouldn't hav been compelled to lose any time on account of bad weather?

About the overshadowing business I hav always had a serious doubt. That there was a shadow in some way connected with the operation is reasonable, for if a child was begotten there was somebody around near enough human to project a shadow, "and don't you forget it." He who thinks a child can be begotten by a shadow without somebody to cast the shadow is only a shadow of a thinker.

If the Christian religion has the softening, refining, and humanizing influence over the human family which is claimed for it, is it not about time that the coarser and more brutal crimes were banished from the earth? If after a two-thousand-years' trial the people are no better off than when it found them, is it not about time to run down the curtain and put out the footlights and save expense?

Christianity, instead of making men wise and good, keeps them in ignorance and makes them very dishonest. It makes them pretend to believe what they do not believe. It makes them pretend to feel innocent when they are guilty, and many times they feel guilty when they are really innocent. It makes them lie for the church and for the priesthood. When left untrammeled its tendency is toward barbarism.

The precepts of forbearance, meekness, and charity, scattered here and there through the Bible, are like the spots on the leopard—though not displeasing to the eye, yet they do not neutralize the ferocity of the beast.

of the future. Room for more may be found by the cheapening of food—that is, by the use of cheaper food—and amiable enthusiasts may find here and thus a remedy for the threatened evils. They can at least show that at present even the most populous countries in the Old World are not over-peopled; for, undoubtedly, with due care, and with choice of the cheapest forms of food, twice as many per square mile might exist even in Belgium than at present. But those who consider the dignity of man, as well as his mere numbers on the globe—those who study the evidence afforded by the wide, though unconscious, experiments made by nations in past ages—will entertain a different idea as to the way in which the great life problem should be viewed. Mere increase of population—even though all be supported in health and vigor—is not all that the human race has to look forward to; it may be doubted whether it is worth hoping for in itself, under any conditions; but, assuredly, if along with such increase there should come, as of old, the degradation of the many under the tyranny and oppression of the few, the change which enthusiasts regard so hopefully is one most devoutly to be deprecated.

DEATH OF D. M. BENNETT.

D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, died at his home, 27 Clinton Place, on the morning of Wednesday, the 6th, aged 64. His death will be a shock to the readers of his paper, as it was to his numerous friends in this city. He had been in sufficient health to attend to the duties of his office up to Friday, the 1st inst. For a week previous to that time he had been suffering somewhat from malaria, but on the morning of the day in question he was obliged to take to his bed. His disease was gastritis, coupled with an affection of the heart. Hope was entertained of his recovery up to Monday night, when he sank into the unconscious condition in which he died. A strong constitution, which had never been abused, kept until morning its hold on life, which seemed reluctant to leave one who had so blessed it with usefulness. Words can only bear the tidings of his death; they cannot contain the sorrow of his stricken friends.

The funeral will be held at the German Masonic Temple, No. 220 East 15th street, this city, on Sunday morning at half past ten. T. B. Wakeman will deliver the funeral address. All the friends of the deceased are invited to be present.

Reviving Puritanism.

Pushed by a lot of religious zealots, the great state of New York has gone backward from fifty to one hundred years in the last few days. On the first day of this month the New Penal Code went into effect, and among its provisions are these relating to the observance of the alleged Christian sabbath:

Servil Labor.—All manner of servil labor on the first day of the week is prohibited excepting in works of necessity or charity.

Public Sports—All shooting, hunting, fishing, playing, horse-racing, gaming, or other public sports, exercises, pastimes, or shows upon the first day of the week, and all noise disturbing the peace of the day, are prohibited.

Trades, Manufactures, and Mechanical Employments—All trades, manufactures, and mechanical employments upon the first day of the week are prohibited.

Public Traffic—All manner of public selling or offering or exposing for sale publicly of any commodities upon the first day of the week is prohibited, except that meats, milk, and fish may be sold at any time before 9 o'clock in the morning, and except that food may be sold to be eaten on the premises where sold, and drugs, medicins, and surgical appliances may be sold at any time of the day.

[Violation of these laws is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of from $1 to $10, or imprisonment for not more than five days. Goods exposed for sale are forfeited to the poor funds. Persons who uniformly observe another holy day than Sunday may work on Sunday if they disturb no observers of Sunday. Theatrical and similar performances are forbidden under penalty of $500 fine and forfeiture of license.]

Ridiculous as the above provisions are when applied even to small towns, they become not only absurd but personally oppressiv when enforced in a large city, where most people hav but the one day for their recreation. The population of this city work, on an average, ten hours for six days in the week, and Sunday is the only time they can obtain to indulge in that relaxation without which life becomes an endless treadmill of work. The laws were passed very quietly, and great was the surprise when it was found that our police officials were contemplating enforcing them. All these laws had been on the statute books for years, but nobody ever paid any attention to them, except Crosby's society of fanatics, who occasionally endeavored to revive them. But now they are revived and applied to all the small tradesmen, while the corporations with money are allowed to do precisely as they hav been doing for years. The bootblack on the corner who tried to make a few pennies was summarily consigned to a cell, while the preacher in the pulpit, earning his hundred or more dollars, was allowed to go on, and protected by the same legal machinery that arrested the bootblack. Grocery stores, meat shops, barber shops, and all useful and necessary businesses were stopped, and whoever failed to supply themselvs on Saturday night, found their supplies cut off by the interference of ecclesiastical bigots, who, while preaching for pay themselvs, would not let honester men hav a chance to provide food for their families. And, not content with getting the old laws revived and trusting to the police to enforce them, they incorporated another religious society under the name of "Sunday Closing League," and had spies out all day reporting violations of their iniquitous laws.

The constitutionality of the law will undoubtedly soon be tested, several large firms having given notice that they should violate it for that purpose. The Corporation Counsel has already given a very liberal construction to it as to what are works of necessity. A New York court, Mr. Andrews says, held that taking a sick child to Staten Island for recreation was a work of necessity, and would not hold that a pleasure excursion of overworked laborers thither was otherwise. The words "tending lock on a canal" were held to imply necessary work. A statute of 1871 legalized contracts for advertisments published on Sundays. The Court of Appeals had held before that date that printing, selling, and distributing newspapers on Sunday was illegal, and that the proprietor of a newspaper could not recover for advertisments in the Sunday edition. The code, Mr. Andrews remarks, contains no new law. Some of the old laws that it re-enacts—like those in regard to driving on Sunday—hav long been practically a dead letter here. The question how far they shall now be revived and enforced must depend largely upon the decisions of the courts as to their meaning, and upon the support given to the police and prosecuting officers by judges, juries, and public opinion.

It is very safe to say that public opinion will not sustain the ecclesiastics in their new inquisition. The prohibitions are so distasteful and contrary to the general sentiment of the community that they hav long been disregarded in practice, and the statutes which contain them had become obsolete to all intents and purposes, especially in our larger cities. So long, says the Sun, as no attempt was made by the authorities to enforce the objectionable provisions of these antiquated Sunday laws the people were content to let them alone; and if anything at all was to be done with them they should hav been repealed, and the observance of Sunday in a decorous and suitable manner should hav been left to the good taste and discretion of the public.

Instead of adopting this course, however, the authors of the Penal Code saw fit to retain all the old and severe enactments which hav lately attracted so much attention, and the result has been an agitation in regard to the Sunday laws much greater than could possibly hav been brought about in any other way.

It is useless to deny that the re-enactment of these harsh laws has given them a fresh and additional sanction which renders them more oppressiv than they were before. The legislature has taken them up and passed them over again, and by so doing has approved, in substance, the principle upon which they are based. This is, that the religious observance of the first day of the week ought to be enforced by law. As though not satisfied with the manner of observing Sunday, which had become customary in the community, and which was certainly satisfactory to a majority of the people, the lawmakers restored and renewed, so far as they could, a lot of obsolete rules and regulations, which hav no reason in themselvs, and which the public do not want, and will not long tolerate.

To show that this view is correct, and that these obsolete laws hav gained fresh vigor by reason of their introduction into the new Penal Code, it is only necessary to refer to their effect upon the magistrates charged with the duty of enforcing them. Really, every police justice in this city was under just as much obligation to enforce the laws against Sabbath-breaking on the last Sunday in November as he was on the first Sunday in December. But he did not think so. A law fifty years old did not seem so mandatory as a statute passed this year. Nor was this effect unnatural. To the judicial mind, as to the people generally, the re-enactment of these provisions at this time has seemed like a declaration by the legislature that laws which had come to be deemed obsolete should be deemed obsolete no longer.

"Every provision in the new Penal Code ought immediately to be repealed which tends in any degree to make the observance of Sunday stricter than it was before, or to interfere with the liberty of persons to do what they like on that day, so long as their acts are otherwise lawful and are not productiv of unseemly disturbance.

"Any attempt strictly to enforce these provisions of the code, according to their letter, has a direct tendency to make the people dishonest. 'All manner of servil labor on the first day of the week is prohibited, excepting in works of necessity or charity,' says the code. Now, there is probably not a clergyman in New York, certainly not one who receives a large salary, who does not violate this provision every Sunday in the year, by procuring or allowing acts to be done for himself or his family, by domestic servants or others, which really amount to servil labor and nothing else. And so it is all through the community. The most religious, as well as those who are not religious at all, will disregard this law. People cannot be compelled to observe it; and the right thing to do with every statute of this sort is to repeal it.

"For a proper and becoming observance of Sunday or any other religious holiday, we should be content to rely upon the sentiments of the people, and not resort to the compulsion of the law."

That is sound doctrin, and if the clergy who wish to stop others from doing what they do would only giv heed to it, they would save themselvs from another set back. The nineteenth century is not the one in which ministers can control the personal walks of the people. That was done one hundred years ago, but citizens no longer hav the superstitious reverence for "the cloth" that they had then, and the result will be that the church will hav less influence than ever. Viewed in that light, this digging up of old laws will hav a good effect. They cannot touch the newspapers, and these will in time so enlighten the people that when the next ecclesiastical craze strikes the city they will sit down very hard upon the bigots.

This "Sunday Closing League" is the same kind of a society as Comstock's, and is fully as dangerous to the liberties of the people. If it can say now that none shall buy groceries or get shaved on Sunday, it will soon want to force everyone to attend some church, and we shall see people who absent themselvs fined and imprisoned as they were last Sunday for driving through the streets. It is very dangerous to clothe ecclesiastics with power, and this last move is well calculated to alarm honest men who love liberty and personal freedom.

Book Notices.

MORAL EDUCATION, ITS LAWS AND METHODS. Governments, churches, and colleges for many thousand years hav striven in vain to conquer crime, disease, and misery. A new method must therefore be adopted. If that method can be found in this volume, does it not indicate a better futnre for humanity? By Joseph Rodes Buchanan, M.D., author of many other works. Published by the author at $1.50.

We cannot hope to do full justice to this volume of 400 pages, but we are fully satisfied that it contains very much of importance to our time in the world. In his note to the reader the learned author speaks in this wise:

For more than a third of a century the doctrins illustrated in this volume hav been cherished by the author when there were few to sympathize with him. To-day there are thousands by whom many of these ideas are cherished, who are ready to welcome their expression, and whose enthusiastic approbation justifies the hope that these great truths may ere long pervade the educational system of the English-speaking race, and extend their beneficent power not only among European races, but among the oriental nations, who are rousing from the torpor of ages.

The author shows the defects in the systems of education in the past, and marks the superiority of the new system. It is pronounced extremely interesting by those who hav seen it, and is indorsed by the professor's wide circle of professional acquaintances.

The new method proposes an entire revolution in education to make it five times as efficient and comprehensiv as at present—not by enlarging the course of study, but by substituting general development for mere schooling.

Dr. Buchanan claims that mere intellectual and literary education, such as we hav had heretofore, does not improve the physical constitution, does not giv men practical ability and skill in useful vocations, by which they can earn a living, and does not make good citizens by elevating the moral character. But as these objects are really more important than literary education, he contends that they should receive as much attention as the literary studies at present pursued, and that instead of interfering with intellectual education this broad culture will really greatly improve it.

1. There should be regular physiological culture to make a robust constitution, so that the health could be greatly improved by the education.

2. There should be hygienic and medical instruction for both sexes sufficient to qualify them to maintain their health and escape the majority of diseases which are known to be preventable.

3. There should be practical industrial education, so as to make each pupil a thorough and skilful master of one or more vocations by which he or she is to be supported through life. Experience shows that such training does not hinder or retard the study of literature and science, but that boys trained in work make better progress in their books, and in the formation of an honest, manly character.

4. The moral nature should be so cultivated as to eradicate all crimes and vices, and build up an honorable, benevolent, high-toned character. This duty has heretofore been neglected by the school and left to the church, but the church has made a total failure, as the statistics quoted by Prof. Buchanan show that, while colleges and churches hav been extending, crime and misery hav been increasing, for the last fifty years, in all civilized nations. The influence of mere intellectual education, without the moral and practical elements, has impaired both the physical constitution and the moral character.

Moral education united with the industrial (which is the backbone of moral culture) is shown in this work to be capable of revolutionizing society and bringing it up to a splendid condition by many examples of its success. This idea is presented very forcibly in a lecture given by Dr. Buchanan recently at Boston, introductory to the establishment of a new pantological university, based on these principles of which he offers to send a copy to any one who asks for it. The new university is to begin by opening the medical department this winter at Boston. Dr. Buchanan's address is 205 East Thirty-sixth street, New York, and he invites Liberal physicians and students to correspond with him.

Exit Preacher: Enter Actor.

From the American Art Journal.

George C. Miln is one of the marked men of the day. It took pluck to go from the pulpit to the stage, or rather to mount from the valley of shallow blame in which he found himself after leaving the pulpit; as it required pluck to speak honestly the opinions which led the Chicago Unitarians to urge him to step down and out.

That such opinions made his presence absurd in a ministry calling itself Christian is unquestionable; but the candor that made the avowal was most honorable. Mr. Miln's error was in supposing a Liberal congregation would sustain his heresies. The particular utterances which led to his upsetting are in two paragraphs of a sermon on "The Church; its Future." One paragraph relates to the personality of God, and is as follws:

> The individual will be permitted to cherish belief in a personal deity, but he will not be compelled to do so in order to hold his place in the church of the future. . . . The belief in a personal deity . . . "is susceptible of sensible demonstration." It is an inference satisfactory to one man, but unsatisfactory to his neighbor. . . . Many will adhere to the idea of a great world-soul as the energizing cause of the phenomenal universe. Others will say, as some now say, that if there be a personal God, so-called, he discovers a most amazing indifference to the incessant agony with which this world of ours fairly writhes. But neither the one speculation nor the other will be insisted upon as a basis of agreement.

It is a little amusing to find Mr. Miln condemned by Liberals for so mildly hinting his doubts of the divine personality, for Unitarian preachers are often found fault with by comparativly conservativ congregations for affirming that God is a personal being of intelligence and will. "Hot ice and wondrous seething snow." The same wind blows both north and south.

The other paragraph touches immortality.

> It will not be regarded as a belief essential to membership in the church of the future. . . . I am no stranger to the coffin and the grave. I hav stood in many homes of darkness. . . . If I could believe there were a future life, how gladly would I let loose my imagination to picture its possible glories! . . . But I cannot afford to deceive you, and so I say that, however beautiful the dream may be, the chance of its fulfilment seems to me remote and improbable.
> Science declares at least that for every thought which disturbs the brain there is a corresponding molecular change, showing the dependence of thought on matter. Even the boldest defenders of orthodoxy do not attempt to demonstrate the separability of mind and body; and the question of questions for us to decide is, if brain is the organ of mind—nay, if mind depends for its activity on brain-action—how will thought go on—how will brain-activity continue—when the brain, weary of its ceaseless toil, is laid at last to rest? "The undiscovered country, from whose bourne no traveler returns," still piques our curiosity, still defies our analysis, and still "puzzles our will." So I say of this, as of other speculativ beliefs, that they will not be insisted upon as a basis of agreement in the future.

This, too, is amusing. It is a common experience to hear doubts of immortality among Liberal church folks. But let not the clerical doubter imagin that such skepticism will be tolerated in his pulpit utterances.

"Do ye really mean it?" asked a stolid deacon of his pastor.

"Why, certainly," replied the minister; "didn't you hear me say so in the pulpit?"

"Well, yes, I heard ye say so, but I didn't suppose ye really meant it."

Strange to say, congregations want things said in the church which they avowedly disbelieve. I can well credit Mr. Miln's statement that members of his congregation fully agreed in private with their preacher's opinions, yet in public took the other side.

"What Bob Ingersoll says is true," said an intelligent young man, "but he ought not to be allowed to say it."

What I admired in Mr. Miln's pulpit course was his absolute frankness. The pulpits are full of preachers who by no means believe what they are supposed to believe. They may not speak with conscious dishonesty, but they use words with private meanings of which their hearers are ignorant.

In their parlors they express doubts and disbelief of common doctrins, but this does not crop out in their sermons.

"We know nothing about these matters," said a very activ pastor, speaking of God and the future life, yet he always preaches and prays as if he knew the whole story. Many affirm tacitly what a popular young minister said to a cluster of his brethren, "I suppose it is well understood that we all hav an esoteric gospel and an exoteric gospel—the esoteric which we believe in our studies, the exoteric that we preach to the people."

No Infidelity can be as bad as hypocrisy.

Before me lies a pamphlet containing a few lectures by Mr. Miln, from which the above extracts are taken.

His English is clear and strong. His statements are condensed. You can see in his sermons his love of the drama and Shakspere. It is not, therefore, surprising that he should take to the stage as to his nativ heath. His face, which he kindly sends me, is a fine one, though he has written against it "a horrible picture." In the Alliance, the weekly he now edits, there are breaths of untrammeled air. It used to be a religious weekly alone. Now it is wider in its range, much to the discomfort of some of its old subscribers, one of whom sends his paper back regularly, but does not send his address so that it can be stopped. The Alliance does not giv its own criticism upon Miln's acting, but quotes from various critics. As sailors dislike commanders who hav crept in through the cabin windows instead of emerging from the forecastle, so actors distrust a player who soars at once to the belt of stars. Mr. Miln has not served his technical apprenticeship, but he will thus escape many absurd traditions which a player absorbs almost unconsciously—as a coat, hanging in the ante-room of a lodge, becomes permeated with the fragrance of Eleusinian mysteries—to wit, the tyler's pipe.

On the whole Mr. Miln has won a hopeful criticism. His Hamlet is praised, if not his Iago, and at thirty a man has manhood before him. His handwriting shows the bold, free character of the man.

This he writes me:

> I hav been profoundly misunderstood by the populace and outrageously misrepresented as to my views and purposes. . . . Having reached the end of the theological road, I quietly stepped from a sphere which was no longer congenial.

He adds that he shall hardly visit Boston or New York without a different company, and the critics deplore his disadvantageous surroundings and support. Mr. Miln has met with no such failure as greeted—with gibes and a skedaddle—the efforts, in Boston not long ago, of a Rev. Doctor who essayed Othello. Indeed, Mr. Miln met with no failure, and every lover of dramatic art should wish him godspeed in his lofty aim, which is not only for himself, but for his comrades in his new profession. If women like Mary Anderson and Margaret Mather can vault at once into the queenly saddle, why may not a man begin with Hamlet and Richelieu?

> 'Tis said by Horace, to whose name be glory,
> There always is room in the upper story.

Mr. Miln is a Londoner by birth. He has the blood of three nations in his veins. One grandfather, and editor of the Times, was a French Huguenot; an ancestor was burnt at the stake in Scotland; a grandmother was a Welsh woman. His father came to America during the Rebellion, and lost his all by the Tallahassee privateer. At twenty Mr. Miln began to preach among the Methodists. Then he cast his lot among the Brooklyn Congregationalists. Outgrowing this coat also, he thought of studying law, but gave up that plan for his Chicago pastorate. Edwin Booth, whom he resembles, is his friend and adviser. W. H. Crane, the comedian, writes him a flattering letter. He has recently played an engagement in St. Paul. He says he shall play Bertuccio, Hamlet, and Richelieu, and leave Iago severely alone for the present. Henry E. Abbey praises him, and Wakeman, the northwestern critic, tempers the wind of journalism to the shorn parson. In hight Miln is four or five inches under six feet. In one way he is a Trinitarian. He says that good acting requires brain, culture, and feeling. When his present contract is over he will go abroad to study European actors.

The Crime of the Nation.

The founders of this government refused to grant to Congress power to punish any offenses save treason, felonies on high seas, counterfeiting United States coins, etc., and offenses in the army, navy, and in districts exclusivly under United States jurisdiction. The Debates on the Constitution are full and clear on that matter. But Patrick Henry predicted Congress would assume power to punish any offense unless the provisions of Amendment No. 10 were made and incorporated in the Constitution, which also declares all enactments contrary to its provisions to be null and void and of no effect.

In a few years Congress, under lead of the old tory spirit, passed a bill to punish sedition, and a bill to punish for frauds committed on United States banks. This aroused the whole nation, and Jefferson and Madison drafted the celebrated resolutions of '98, that declare those acts of Congress null and void, because Congress has no power to punish any offenses except those named. Jefferson was elected president on the issue, and Congress receded from the steps taken by it.

How does it happen that to-day Congress has just passed a bill to punish masters of vessels for landing Chinamen on our coasts?

How is it that Congress punishes for selling tobacco or spirits, or manufacturing them contrary to the act of Congress? It punishes for all manner of frauds, burglaries, larcenies, assaults, forcible resistance to officers, killing them; for advertising business on prohibited paper; for neglecting to use stamps, or to erase them on papers, boxes, barrels; for sending papers prohibited through mails; for charging fees in certain cases, and for embezzlement, and for a thousand other offenses made by act of Congress.

How was it, Mr. Editor, that you were tried and imprisoned by Congress law for sending a pamphlet by mail?

Reading Jefferson's letters, I hav just come across one in reference to this same illegal punishing by Congress, dated September 26, 1798, to Mr. Rowan, in which he says, "The habeas corpus secures every man here, alien or citizen, against everything which is not law, whatever shape it may assume." It does so no longer, else why in your case, and those of the thousands of others illegally punished of late, was it not applied for?

It has been construed away. In most cases, from the United States district courts there is no appeal. The accused may be dragged from his county hundreds of miles and tried by juries not of the vicinage, therefore not juries at all. He is compelled to find security, go and come, carry his securities and witnesses, all at his own expense. Mere accusation itself is a dreadful calamity. If acquitted, he is never reimbursed. Higher courts will refuse to issue habeas corpus, because the court of trial has jurisdiction, or for some other cause coming within the exceptions of the H. C. act. To enforce these statutes a multitude or spies called agents are necessary. These men liv by blackmail. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in his report for the year 1881, says, "Numerous prosecutions hav been instituted for most trivial violations of law, and arrested parties taken long distances and put to great inconveniences and expense, apparently for no other reason than to make costs."

What a grand spectacle! A great nation dragging individuals before its courts as criminals, all done in plain violation of its organic law! Which is the real criminal—the poor accused or the great nation? All the crimes of the decalog committed in one day by individuals do not equal the intense guilt of one deliberate violation of the Constitution. I call on truth seekers everywhere all over the land to consider this. The intent of the law, where there can be any doubt, is to be gathered from the intentions expressed by the lawmakers; the debates and writings of the founders prove their design was to prevent this very abuse of taking people from their counties. They therefore clearly state that they giv to Congress power to punish only the few offenses named. Other offenses against property or officers of the United States were to be punished by the states. Moreover, we can see that every act of Congress that requires such punishing by Congress is in itself unnecessary or arbitrary, and we were better without it.

One false step by Congress calls for others to bolster and sustain it, until finally all our dearest liberties are at the mercy of some thief or forty thousand government officials. They understand and correspond with each other. Bureaus, commissions, and secretaries correspond with courts to advise and instruct. So complete is the network woven over us that at one blow, by one order, the executiv of the nation (as Hayes said, "Of the party which I represent") could hav twenty or more leading men in every county of this Union arrested and dragged hundreds of miles from his home.

But we are a law-abiding people—can't tolerate the word rebel, and every act of Congress is law, so we are taught to believe. A few earnest truth-seekers might open the people's eyes if they would.

Now Let Mr. Sunderland Elucidate.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I would not deprive LaRoy Sunderland of his ecstatic joy in ringing his changes on that common word, "mystery," when applied to the poor Spiritualist, if I could. On the contrary, I would fain make him happy over the term in other departments of nature. Let him elucidate any of the most common phenomena around us to the point of freeing them from all mystery. Let him begin with grass and go to the bottom of the matter. I hope he'll dissect and expound, to his own logical mind at least, the inherent attributes of the eternal cause that has resulted in making "grass grow" on our planet. Let him analyze a link in that chain of cause and effect, coming from the eternal past, that was forged so long ago that the surface of the earth would be inadequate to contain an infinitesimal part of the figures that would be required to express the eons of time that hav since rolled away. When that is accomplished he will not hav fairly begun. All beyond will be no less mysterious. Or let him take fire and giv its latest scientific analysis, and he will be as far from dispelling its mysterious origin or intrinsic qualities as the boy was who simply declared that "fire burns because it is so darned hot."

I was a subscriber to Mr. Sunderland's Magnet, a monthly published forty years ago, more or less. It was a mystic magazine, yet containing much truth, probably. Yes, mystery is everywhere. But if any one wishes to see "mystification" worse "mystified" he is commended to LaRoy's "mysterious" hobby, "Ideology."

A screw must be loose in either the mental or moral machinery of one who, like Mr. Sunderland, declares that Spiritualists are insane, when such men as Hare, Mapes, Sargent, Garrison, Lincoln, Wallace, Crookes, Zollner, and thousands of others who will not suffer in any respect when compared to Mr. Sunderland, were or are Spiritualists.

Memphis, Mo., Nov. 16, 282. Stephen Young.

"Cynical Carlyle."

If cynicism really was a distinguishing feature in the character of the great author, shall we accept the bare fact and malign accordingly, or with the more gracious charity inquire the reasons? Apart from the alleged malady tendered as an excuse by his friends for his mental distemper, there were evidently other causes co-operating to produce and irritate the one so much complained of. If "boiled grass and meal husks" could furnish a text for a national revolt, it is not strange that the like unsavory pabulum often forced upon him as an intellectual repast should provoke revolt in a mind hungering for the rich succulence of rational thought and the rare vintage of congeniality. While he was honored by many visitors, they were not always such as would admire and understand him, but too often were curiosity-seekers or a kind of parasitic idlers, who thought to add to their own importance by admittance to the presence of celebrity. Although his greatness was inherent, it was by dint of severe labor that the world was brought to know it, and it is not surprising if untimely interruptions did something to both engender and elicit repellent qualities. We all know that to preserve an unruffled composure upon all occasions is not the easiest thing in the world. To be compelled, as Carlyle often was, to entertain those alike averse to his sentiments and indifferent to his interests, made, as it were, a sufferer by sheer effrontery, ought to prove fatal to any patience. Realizing a fact not generally conceded, that words are of small moment unsupported by a principle, he cared as little for their shallow platitudes as they for his splendid genius; and though he may hav cured a few ills by the defensiv armor of a brusque demeanor, it is presumed ills no less grievous shared interment with his remains. Time with such as he was is of the utmost value, and to defraud him of that defrauded him of reputation as well. The rare gems of thought, brilliant ideas, and glowing imagery escaping beyond recovery was an impoverishment that he might hav computed, though the world never will. The broad statement that an overwhelming majority of the race are fools, if not complimentary, is at all events pretty well corroborated; and as it was not possible for him to exterminate this prolific species of animal, to make his intrusion a penal offense cannot be designated unpardonable. Regretting that he was not more munificent in his justification of resistance to tyrants, we must still thank him for taking his place among the meager rank and file of unpopular thought, and with true military skill crossing swords with his opponents. The mind that is not more or less obsequious to public opinion is indeed unusual, and that Carlyle was not more so makes him the hero that he is. Being, as he manifestly was in a measure, subjectiv to this restrictiv influence, against which his better nature must hav contended, the contest was surely trying to his intensely nervous temperament.

Leaving graver charges to be more seriously dealt with, the annoying infringements mentioned may serve as a partial palliation for his sometimes trenching upon fastidious requirements and exacting formulas. Old Virginia.

So, or Not So.

Is human testimony able to establish a doubtful statement? I wish to show how shamefully incredulous and unreasonable some persons act respecting a matter. Nor are they illiterate people to whom I refer. Many of them are cultivated and are accustomed to reason on most subjects.

In examining facts we are obliged to accept the testimony of others as to a great many things. One is very unreasonable to say he will believe only what he himself witnesses. The great mass of people are forever excluded from the opportunity of testing for themselvs. They accept the Copernican theory, the Newtonian theory of gravity, on others' testimony.

Respecting so-called miracles there are some who to-day repeat the specious fallacy of Hume. Yet a very little reflection will show its falsity to be as transparent as the saying "wisdom of our ancestors," or the "after which, on account of which" of the logicians. Either human testimony can establish any statement it may support, or it is not competent to establish anything so far as we are concerned. Let us take Spiritualism for instance. If the educated reader will reflect a moment he will agree with me, I think. The testimony furnished by such names as Judge Edmonds, Drs. Grey and Dexter, Gov. Talmage, Profs. Mapes, Crookes, Huggins, and Wallace; by the committee of the London Dialectical Society; by the thousands of names appended to the petition to Congress in April, 1854; by the at least ten thousand other competent, credible witnesses of character far above the average, ought to suffice. Moreover, the character of the phenomena is so varied as to meet every conceivable objection, being physical, mental, appealing to every sense, in daylight or dark, musical, oratorical, past-telling and foretelling, feats the most trivial and contemptible, and again the most wonderful and terrible. To entirely discredit, after a study of the proofs, one's stolidity and conceit must approximate the asinin of that professor who has so elaborately taught us we are not qualified to trust our own senses as witnesses for the facts, yet never informing us why then we should trust them against the facts, and leaving us to infer that he alone of all the world is the only true expert.

I venture to say that never in this world has there been such a complete and monstrous mass of proof concerning any subject. The mind is simply overwhelmed at its contemplation. The testimony would be impossible to sustain a falsehood.

"A Truth Seeker Around the World."

Dear Friend Bennett: I hav just finished reviewing volume III. of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and am greatly delighted with it. The illustrations are very valuable, because they show exactly how the reality appears, which words never can do. We see the Hindoo women and the Indian weavers with their odd-looking looms; the heathen temples, with all their varied and grand architecture; the curious-looking gods, that are worshiped with the same honest, earnest sincerity that Christians worship their ideal deities. We see the far-famed Ganges lying peaceful and quiet, with its margins of strange-looking plants, grasses, and trees. We see the tea plantations, the tea-pickers, and the process of drying the tea, and wonder to ourselvs how the tea tastes that is valued at twenty dollars a pound. We see the palanquin looking precisely as it used to in our old school geographies, for the Chinese are almost a stationary people in their habits and ways. We see the great car of Juggernaut, and poor, ignorant devotees lying stretched out in its track patiently waiting for martyrdom beneath its enormous weight. We see trees, fruits, and landscapes of these far-off pleasant heathen climes, all looking like pictures of dream-land, so different are they from our own home-scenes, places, and faces. One sketch, "In the Mountains of Ceylon," represents a youth and maiden walking by the water's edge, and perchance discoursing of the old, old story —ever new and beautiful to the new ears that listen to its impassioned utterances of love and devotion.

I think if thee had never published any other books but these they alone would hav immortalized thee, so graphically, artistically, and yet simply is everything narrated, so honestly, too, is the pro and con of it all put before the reader.

The chapters on Occultism interest me deeply, and yet I cannot but think the whole thing some well-devised thaumaturgic operation. I cannot believe that mind can move matter. I'm sure mine never has. Nevertheless it is a privilege to read and know what others hav seen and heard and read, though we fail to comprehend all the processes that produced the events narrated.

In a week or two I shall send the $1.50 for the last volume. Of course, every one who has the rest will want this, as the series will be incomplete without it, and besides this, every one will want to hear about Japan, one of the most interesting countries of the world, and to read of all the places and people thee visited in California, and through the rest of the route on to New York, and the glorious reception there, and will also want the index to the four volumes. I think any one who has read these books can appreciate the lines of Whitman:

I see male and female everywhere,
I see the serene brotherhood of philosophs,
I see the constructivness of my race,
I see the result of the perseverance and industry of my race,
I see ranks, colors, barbarisms, civilizations. I go among them
—I mix indiscriminately,
And I salute all the inhabitants of the earth.

Spurious Epistles of Paul.

If the following passage was written by Paul, then our claim that he lived 63 B.C. must be given up:

Jesus, the Messiah, who attested a good confession before Pontius Pilate (1 Tim, vi, 13).*

But the whole epistle is declared spurious by the following eminent authorities: Schleiermacher, Eichhorn, DeWette, Baur Usteri, Luecke, Neander, Bleek, Rudow; and though most of these do not giv up the authenticity of 2 Timothy and Titus, yet the critics of the Tubingen school do, while orthodox scholars, like Ewald, Mangold, Mey, and Holtzmann favor the supposititious character of all three epistles. The argument is fully presented in Davidson's "Introduction to the Study of the New Testament," pp. 144–185.

It is enough for our purpose that the first epistle to Timothy is spurious; but Dr. Davidson argues that the other two cannot with any logical consistency be saved from the same fate.

The chronological order of the epistles is: Titus, 2 Timothy, 1 Timothy. Schleiermacher, who died 1834, made the first formal attack on the authenticity of 1 Timothy, which he believed to be compiled out of 2 Timothy and Titus. Davidson finds no trace of the epistles prior to A.D. 130, but thinks they may hav been written as early as 120.

No other mention of Pontius Pilate, or of any event occuring about his time, is to be found in any of the New Testament epistles or in the apocalyps. The anointed savior (mashiach Jeshu—christos Iesous) of these books cannot be identified with the Jesus of the gospels, except in the spurious first epistle to Timothy. Antichrist.

*We quote from the Peshito or Syriac version of the New Testament, translated into English by the late Rev. James Murdock, D.D., of New Haven, and published in 1851. All our quotations will be made from this version for reasons given in the appendix of Dr. Murdock's English translation. Briefly, those reasons are: 1, It is the purest of all versions; 2, The Syriac is the language in which the greater part of the New Testament was originally written; 3, It is the language which Jesus and the apostles spoke; 4, The Syriac or Peshito version was formed at the very commencement of the Christian church. N.B.—The above reasons are in the exact words of various eminent Christian authorities from 1568 to the present time. See aforesaid appendix, or chap. vi of our "Life of Simon Kepha" when published.

The Old and the New World.

From the New York Ledger.

The notion generally prevails that America is more distinctivly modern than the other quarters of the earth, and it goes popularly by the name of "the New World." It is also assumed that whatever culture and civilization exists on this side of the globe is an importation from some part of Europe. It is true that when Columbus is said to hav discovered America—it had been visited by the Northmen long before, but their explorations came to nothing—that portion of the country which most of us inhabit was an uncultivated wilderness; but there were other regions, in both North and South America, where for thousands of years a civilization had flourished which, in some respects, was in advance of that on the other side of the Atlantic.

In the Old World Egypt was "the cradle of civilization," and the points of resemblance between that wonderful land and certain nations that existed on this continent ages ago are most strikiug. Mexico more truly deserved to be called "the land of pyramids" than Egypt, for they were far more numerous in Mexico than they were in the land of the Nile, and in some cases very much larger. The most gigantic structure of this sort in Egypt is known by the name of Cheops, and it is 746 feet square, covering an area of eleven acres. The pyramid of Cholula in Mexico, as measured by Humboldt, is 1,400 feet square at the base, and covers forty-five acres. The construction is substantially the same in both countries, the pyramids being built of hewn stone, originally covered with cement, and penetrated by small galleries, with openings at some distance above the base. They appear to hav been applied to the same uses as tombs, temples, and observatories, and face the four points of the compass.

Populous cities were to be seen on this continent, laid out with the highest engineering skill in streets, and court-yards, and parks, and gardens, and the houses adorned with rich and costly furniture, graceful draperies, gold and silver ornaments, and ceramic wares of the nicest finish and most artistic designs. The temples of religion were magnificent beyond description; immense reservoirs were constructed for the public benefit, and supplied with water from the mountains by substantial aqueducts; the walls of massiv prisons are still standing in good preservation; the markets were supplied with fresh provisions by means of "fast expresses;" cotton was abundant and cheap, and the calicoes that were woven and printed a thousand years ago still retain the freshness of their colors; the same tools were in use that we are familiar with, and many of the same implements of war, and a great variety of musical instruments; coins were employed as currency; agriculture was reduced to a science, and the process of irrigation carried to the highest perfection. The inca, or emperor, identified himself with the work of the husbandman by officiating at grand processions and ceremonials in the temple at the opening of the spring and the close of the harvest.

The facilities for traveling were perhaps the most stupendous feature in that ancient civilization. Carefully constructed roads, from 1,500 to 2,000 miles in length, were opened in Peru, with hotels and post-houses at little intervals, where relays of horses were always kept in readiness for the traveler; these roads were carried over a most precipitous and mountainous country, where deep ravines and low-lying rivers had to be crossed by long suspension bridges, sometimes hundreds of feet from the water. What country was there in Europe at the time of the Middle Ages that could boast of such works as these?

The social condition of some of these old American people was, in certain respects, far in advance of that existing in many parts of Europe. In Peru, for instance, there was no abject poverty and no oppression of the government fell heavily upon the laboring classes. Provision by law was made for the families of those who were slain in war, for widows and orphans deprived of their means of support, for the sick and maimed and decrepit. Abundant supplies of grain were always kept in the public store-houses, as a provision in case of famin. Courts of justice existed for the trial and punishment of offenders, and—unlike what we sometimes see nearer home—the laws were rigidly and impartially administered.

The resemblances between the religious ages of the New and the Old World are most extraordinary. The Americans recognized the sun, moon, and planets as the representativs of divinity—they believed in the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body—embalming the dead body as the Egyptians did; they had a regular order of priesthood, and a magnificent ritual; like the Roman Augurs, the priests predicted the future from an examination of the entrails of animals slain in sacrifice. There were orders of women vowed to celibacy—vestal virgins or nuns—and the violation of their vows was punished by burning them alive, as was the practice at one time in Europe. The second table of the Ten Commandments was, in substance, the basis of the moral code and of the civil law. The Peruvian high priest alone was allowed to enter the Holy of Holies, and, as was the custom among the Jews, he ate the flesh of the sacrifice offered as an atonement, poured the blood upon the ground, and sprinkled it upon stones and walls, and also upon persons. The rainbow was regarded as a sign that the earth would never again be destroyed by a deluge. Water was poured upon the head of children soon after their birth, and then the mouth and breast were touched by the moistened fingers, and a prayer was offered to the effect that the water "may destroy in thee and put away from thee all the things evil and adverse that were given thee before the beginning of the world." Then it was said over the child: "Now does it liv anew, and anew it is born; now again it is purified and cleansed."

Among the other extraordinary resemblances in the old civilization of America to that of our European progenitors may be mentioned the fact that they divided the year into twelve months and counted by tens. The trade of the father descended to the son, bards and minstrels sang at the great festivals, toasts were drank and good health invoked, triumphal arches were erected to commemorate a victory, and the path of the returning conquerors was strewed with leaves and flowers. Fashionable people made their social calls in the same sort of old-fashioned sedan-chairs that once abounded in the streets of London.

If I had room I might go on to multiply these points of resemblance almost indefinitly, but enough has been said to provoke the question, "How are we to account for such a condition of society on a continent which our European forefathers had never heard of, and more especially for the extraordinary similarity that existed in the usages and opinions of the Western and the Eastern nations, which had never been presumed to hav been brought in contact with each other?"

One thing is certain, they must hav had a common inheritance, and in the beginning started from the same source.

Truth.—A Poem in Three Parts.

CANTO XI.

Spirit philosophy is most sublime
Of all religions since the birth of Time.
That unfleshed spirits often with us stay
To drive our sorrows, cares, and fears away;
That loving friends who passed from mortal sight
Are often with us, both by day and night.
Our spirit friends are infinitly dear
When we do realize their presencé here.

They giv us warning of impending ills,
With joy and happiness our bosom thrills.
They come to comfort us, both night and day,
Amid the sorrows of our earthly way;
And when life's journey, toils, and cares are past,
Conduct us to their happy homes at last.
How joyful for the poor and oppressed
In spirit worlds to be forever blest!

Though dearest friends hav all gone on before
We hope to meet where parting is no more;
True skeptics then will never more complain
When they do find their long-lost friends again.
And Infidels will never, never doubt
When they hav found the laws of nature out.
"Winter"—who takes a superficial view
Beyond the grave—will be a spirit, too!

Lands of immortals and unfading flowers,
Ambrosial fruits and aromatic bowers,
Celestial lands of everlasting love,
Delightful "mansions" in bright worlds above,
Where perfect beings, beautiful as light,
Fill human spirits with supreme delight,
And shining rivers—seas as smooth as glass—
Reflect the lovely beings as they pass!

Grand trees of life, down by the river side,
Where flowers bloom and waters gently glide,
In lovely mansions mid the flowers here
Our dearest friends of early life appear,
And introduce us to the shining bands
In spirit gardens in the summer-lands;
Sweet strains of music, no discordant sound,
Infinit joy and happiness abound.

In robes of white the joyful millions shine,
Always progressing, they become divine,
Surpassing gods in beauty and in grace,
Pefected bliss in every loveiy face.
Youth, beauty, grace, and love the hours beguile,
And glorv beams in each angelic smile;
Each joyful spirit its true mate will find
Adapted to each pure progressiv mind;
Together the grand universe explore,
Upward and onward, thus, forevermore.

CANTO XII.

Oh! what a grand delightful truth is this,
We hasten to the perfect worlds of bliss.
Immortal lands of beatific light,
Effulgent glory, glittering and bright,
With highest intellects, the most profound,
And the vast universe revolving round!
And higher thoughts expand and fill the soul,
While age on age in endless cycles roll.

There unfleshed spirits in supreme delight
Soar over the wide celestial fields of light;
Rivers and seas, as smooth as shining glass,
Reflect angelic beings as they pass,
And soar above those great cerulean plains,
Where intellectual perfection reigns,
And lovely beings from all worlds in space
Do hasten to this dear, delightful place.

And from this earth are spirits coming fast,
Through gates celestial they are crowding past;
The joy and happiness of all complete,
For each arrival on the golden street.
No fiction ever was conceived so grand
As souls progressing in the spirit land.
From world to world in ecstasy they soar,
And the grand universe with zeal explore.

And this unfolds new powers of the mind,
Thus spirit intellects become refined;
Knowledge increases as the ages roll,
This satisfies the pure expanding soul.
Grand panoramas of all worlds in sight
Giv new sensations of supreme delight;
The lovely universe refines and moves,
And all profound intelligence approves.

Laws of the universe, sublime and grand,
Will bring delinquents to their nativ land,
Where pain and sickness, sorrow, sin, and strife
Will be exchanged for everlasting life;
Exchanged for love and ever-blooming flowers,
Rivers and plains, celestial groves and bowers.
Perfect, immortal, everlasting bliss
Will make amends for severed friends in this.

When all the raging storms of life are past,
And worms hav changed to butterflies at last,
Join the grand millions who hav gone before,
Where tears and sorrows will be known no more.
O spirit land of ever-blooming flowers!
When will that grand inheritance be ours?
O sacred Truth! O precious, soothing balm!
For storms of life, an everlasting calm?

CANTO XIII.

Our long-ago unfleshed, departed friends
Await our coming, when life's journey ends,
Where lovely flowers always are in bloom,
And fill the mausions with their sweet perfume.
Our spirit powers, blooming one by one—
Whose first unfoldment were on earth begun—
In spirit lands unto perfection brought,
Become the cherubim's and seraph's thought.

O sacred truth! O grand and lovely theme,
Which separates the real from the dream!
Eternal truth be our unerring guide,
While spirits in the body we abide.
Till "born again," our happy spirits rise
To pure, serene, celestial, cloudless skies.

Then cruel creeds can nevermore control
The highest aspirations of the soul.

The erring creeds of bigots we forsake,
The chains of ancient superstitions break.
From nature and philosophy we trace
The past and future progress of the race.
We thus obtain a spiritual life,
Free from all doubts, anxieties, and strife;
Lay up a treasure that will never rust,
When mortal bodies mingle with the dust.

Be ours to listen to the gods within,
And keep our minds from doubting and from sin,
And calmly wait for that delightful change
When we the grand old universe will range.
Delightful truth and prospect so divine
For thee, O man, to know that this is thine—
That thou wilt yet the universe explore
With the vast billions who hav gone before!

'Tis ours now the universe to scan—
Giv truth and science to the coming man.
Let all the nations understand and see
Our institutions and our minds are free.
Laws of the universe hav all the powers
Of perfect spirits in celestial bowers,
And while the perfect universe endures,
Its law man's final happiness secures.

What sometimes unto man seems dark and drear
In spirit worlds will doubtless disappear;
Mankind will see with clear, celestial sight,
Laws of the universe exactly right;
And unbelievers will no more complain
When they do find the loved and lost again.
Profound intelligences all approve,
While rolling years, decades, and ages move,

CANTO XIV.

Truth changes not like all of earthly things;
Death lays his cold and icy hand on kings,
And in the dust are undistinguished laid,
The crown and scepter with the humble spade.
When states and nations, kings and kingdoms, fall,
Eternal truth will triumph over all.
And this is truth, the laws of matter will
Man's highest aspirations all fulfil.

The bones of monarchs, emperors, and kings
Molder and mingle with all meaner things;
Kingdoms and states and empires all decay—
All earthly things in time will pass away,
But sacred truth will triumph to the last,
Till mundane glory is forever past.
When gods and creeds and Christian tyrants fail
Eternal truth will finally prevail.

Whatever Jew or Gentile may proclaim,
From laws of nature all existence came.
The origin of gods and man is fire;
Without the suns the gods would all expire.
Our dazzling sun produces all we see.
This is the law throughout immensity,
And we repeat, man's origin is fire;
Without the suns the gods would all expire.

Death of the gods will bring eternal peace,
And persecutions will forever cease;
Preachers and spirits will employment find—
Become a real blessing to mankind.
This is the highest thought of thinking man.
All things are good enough without a plan;
The grand old universe is good and sure,
And its progression always will endure.

All human spirits will survive to see
The end of discord—perfect harmony.
We dearly love a good and moral life,
Free from all error, bigotry, and strife.
If there is not a future state of bliss,
We try to make a noble use of this.
A future state or not, no skeptic will,
By Jesus' orders, murder, slay, and kill.

If there are gods, they must be good as man,
And do for all the very best they can.
If there's no god but nature, life, and force,
There is no endless punishment, of course.
Saints go to hell or heaven and rejoice—
Christ pays their money, and they take their choice.
Halls, temples, palaces, and churches grand
Will crumble down by Time's consuming hand;
But sacred truth will triumph to the last—
Till mundane glory is forever past.

CANTO XV.

All nations should, by love and union here,
Now be preparing for a higher sphere—
Stop all oppression, mankind happy make,
Become philosophers for goodness' sake;
Learn from the skeptics not to persecute;
Produce, like Infidels, the best of fruit.
Upward and onward skeptic minds expand,
To an existence infinitly grand.

TRUTH SEEKER patrons, cling unto the truth.
In all life's stages—manhood, age, and youth—
Defending truth, you nobly lead the van;
You carry forward the reforms of man.
Truth still advances, greater light appears,
Always progressing with the rolling years.
Be truth alone your everlasting shield,
Till persecutors and oppressors yield.

The truth will flourish with all noble men—
Truth crushed to earth will always rise again.
That perfect adage never yet did fail,
Great is the truth, and will at last prevail.
The laws of nature let us now obey—
Liv in the sunshine of the present day.
Let matter, mind, and reason harmonize,
Till spirits reach their nativ kindred skies.

When dying strife obstructs the failing breath,
When the heart sickens, and each pulse is death,
Truth will sustain the moral and the just—
Grace their last moments with a perfect trust;
And when the storms of mortal life are o'er,
Join the grand millions who hav gone before.
Truth givs this hope, this precious soothing balm:
For storms of life, an everlasting calm.

THE END.

I feel, for one, that we hav a true and competent exponent of our noble cause and must succeed.

Inclosed is $12 to be appropriated as follows: The four volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" to M. C. Tucker, Lyons, N. Y.; the fourth volume to Jacob Buckeneer, Lyons, N. Y., and the fourth volume to Dr. C. B. Tucker, Auburn, N. Y., and the balance to my credit on the paper for 1883.

Fraternally yours, DR. C. B. TUCKER.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, NOV. 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It seems a shame that a letter of "Welcome Home" has been so long delayed by one of your most earnest friends and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I feel ashamed of myself for not sending my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER long before this, but, did you know all, that cutting circular would not hav come to me. This year has been a bad one for me—often without absolute necessities.

Volume III. of "A Truth Seeker Around h e World" has just come to hand. I am surprised it has come so promptly. Often my TRUTH SEEKER has failed to reach me on time. I get so excited over this condition of the mails that I feel like cursing a blue streak to think that voters will permit such derangements in their affairs. Yours truly,

MRS. H. M. LYNDOLL.

SCOTIA, NEB., NOV. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Business first and pleasure afterward. I inclose $5—$2.50 for TRUTH SEEKER for 1883, $1.50 for volume four of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and for the balance left in your hands please send me one dollar's worth of books. I will trust to your judgment to select if you decide to send books.

Isn't Mr. D. M. Bennett just a little bit queer or occult when he calls Yahweh a myth, and ccuses him at the same time of crime? As though a nonentity could commit crimes, be blood-thirsty, etc.!

A. S. KELLOGGS.

[Of course we believe in the existence of no such character, but take the one that is given him and comment upon it.—ED. T. S.]

FRANKFORT, MICH., NOV. 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received the third volume of your trip around the world, and I am more than pleased with the set. I note your circular in relation to the fourth volume to complete the set, and here inclose the required amount for same.

As I desire some other publications I hav seen advertised in your valuable paper, also to renew my subscription, which will soon expire, I inclose post-office order for $13, to be applied as follows: Subscription for TRUTH SEEKER, $2 50; fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World, $1.50; "History of Civilization in England" (Buckle), cloth, 2 vols., $5; "History of Woman Suffrage," 2d vol. (edited by Mmes. Stanton, Anthony & Gage), $5. I hav the first volume, and want only the second. Send by mail. Yours very truly, N. A. PARKER.

CARROLLTON, ILL., NOV. 25, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I am really glad you are safe at home again, and, I see, as hard at work as ever. I hav received the third volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and am well pleased with all. You say now you hav filled your contract, so you want $1.50 for the fourth volume. I think you hav not only filled your contract but you hav done a great deal more. I don't see how you can come out even, so I will now send you $1.50 for the other volume, and fifty cents to pay postage on what I hav already got; and as my time is nearly up for THE TRUTH SEEKER I will inclose post-office order for $4.50, which amount will carry me up to Jan. 1, E.M. 284. I see you intend to reduce the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER to $2 50. That will not be very hard to do, provided you can stand it. Hoping to see you out this way ere long, I close. Yours for universal mental liberty, WM. BLACK.

ERIE, PA., NOV. 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: You will find fifty cents inclosed, for which you will please send me two copies of the "Crimes of Preachers." I met the Rev. Dr. Eddy, brother of the prominent divine of Detroit, and in a controversy at Corry, Pa., I told him that there was no set of professional men that were convicted of crime as often as ministers of the gospel. Of course he disputed me, and this is one of the reasons I want the "Crimes of Preachers." I gave him the statistics of Auburn prison for the year of 1880, and under the roof of that building there were 1,300 prisoners—1 Infidel, 3 Jews, 54 ministers of different creeds, the balance, 1242 prisoners, according to the Christians, were all Infidels. This is the way they reason. Wishing you success in your new departure of reducing the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER, although I would take it if it cost $6 instead of $3, I remain yours truly, H. C. GREGE.

MILFORD, MASS., NOV. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.25, for which continue my TRUTH SEEKER till Jan. 1, 1884; also send a copy to a new subscriber, Charles C. Fisk, Milford, Mass., from Dec. 1st to Jan. 1, 1884. While such men as Anthony Comstock hav access to the mails, and would suppress your paper, it is not wise to tempt him to steal by sending greenbacks through the mail, for though not yet decided to be obscene they might be unseen by you. Had rather trust the unlegalized robbers of the mail, feeling that the greenbacks taken by them would be put to better use. Called at your office last May on my way to Europe, not expecting to see you, yet came very near it, as Eugenr showed me—not the hand-writing on the wall, but in the letters sent by you for publication, and I took them in my hand as the next best thing to greeting their author. The length of the letters conclusivly showed that what had been written about early rising must be true.

Yours for the right, CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

GLEN HALL, PA., NOV. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5, to be applied in the following manner: $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, 50 cents for two pamphlets, "The Crimes of Preachers," 15 cents for one "Liberty and Morality," by W. S. Bell, 10 cents for "The Sabbath," by M. Farrington, and the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." The three volumes that I subscribed for hav come to hand, and I hav read them and found them very interesting and instructiv. It seems to need the fourth volume to make the chain complete. The last volume, I anticipate, will be the most interesting; it will treat on our own country and show what rapid strides the western states hav made in population and intelligence. They are away ahead of us in Liberal views. They hav their Liberal lecturers, which are very much needed in this part of the vinyard. The professed Christians of the different denominations are having their protracted meetings all around, and I never hav seen so light a harvest in converts. If we were favored with Liberal speakers to entertain the people it would not be many years till the churches would be used for halls for Liberal lectures. The masses are hungry for something reliable. They hav been fed on chaff and husks till it ceases to supply the cravings of an inquiring mind that is being freed from the shackles of superstition and priestcraft.

Yours truly, R. S. LAMBORN.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., NOV. 28, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received Vol. III. of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and am well pleased with it. Seeing the postage cost you some sixteen cents, which shows how cheap Uncle Sam sends the production of the pen, type, ink, and paper all over our beloved country, yet this sixteen cents should not be borne by you, who hav given us more valuable information about foreign lands than all the writers I hav ever known. Your description of Palestine shows what a blunder Jehovah made in choosing that land for his chosen people, when if he had the power attributed to him by the Christian world he could hav placed his people here in our country where they could hav had homes and lands that a god could hav had some credit for planting a colony of his offspring. But as he was to become a mere Jew, an infant of a Jewish girl, vacate all his power over man, and lay aside all laws of nature and become his own father and mother, and his own executioner, perhaps it was wise to choose such a land as he did, and thus totally mystify every idea of nature and nature's laws, so the Christian can found his faith in miracles. I inclose $1 toward paying postage on my three books and the balance for some one who is not able to pay. I hope all who can afford it will do likewise. H. WILLIS.

HAMBURGH, N. Y.

Last Sunday evening I lectured before the Hamburg Liberal League in the Academy Hall in the village of Hamburgh, N. Y., and was pleased to learn that the League there is in such a prosperous condition. It has a membership of some twenty-five intelligent, activ Freethinkers. Mr. James A. Taylor is president, and A. C. Calkins, Esq., secretary. I made the acquaintance of the following named members: Geo. Walker, James Taylor, Mr. Calkins, Levi Brown, E. C. Hubbard, Stella L. Walker, A. E. Williams, Mrs. E. M. Sickmon, Mr. Eli W. Sprague, Mrs. Adelia Sprague, and a number of others whose names I hav forgotten. Mrs. E. M. Sickmon is the vice-president of the Freethinkers' Association for Erie county and is one of the most efficient vice-presidents in the state. She has sent in some fifteen names to the directory.

Hamburg I found to be a very bigoted place. There are a number of orthodox churches in the village in full blast, and as they were engaged in a revival effort they were terribly alarmed to learn that an Infidel was coming there to speak, and the preacher warned all the people to keep away from our meeting. But they did not all keep away. We had present some three hundred people, more than were in attendance at all the churches that evening. Many of those attending, I learned, were orthodox church-members, who, of course, came out of curiosity; but they all listened quietly and attentivly for two hours to what I had to say. It was the first Liberal lecture that was ever delivered in the town, and I hope will result in some good. I was glad to notice a large portion of the audience were young men. I found the Liberals in Hamburgh all admirers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor.

I would like to make engagements to lecture on Sundays in western New York and western Pennsylvania. H. L. GREEN.

BOZEMAN, MON., NOV. 21, 282.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals here congratulate you on your successful trip around the world. Your letters, which are published in book form, will be a valuable addition to any library. We congratulate you also because of your manliness as shown in the last few years. We detest the unmerciful disposition of Christians and their religion in depriving honorable citizens of their inalienable rights. We protest also against the abominable intrigues of Christian churches to force their peculiar sentiments on the country at large through the legislation of the different states and territories. They clamor for liberty in the pulpit, but secretly bind chains around the minds and rights of the individual. Protestant churches are aiming to effect in this country what the papacy has been trying to do in Continental Europe, viz., to subject every citizen to her ecclesiastical laws. It is evidently the duty of every Liberal and of every citizen who would defy the tyranny of the church to sever politics from religion, and giv to each their proper sphere. Let the ecclesiastic follow his business without calling on the politicians to aid him. What Liberalism claims is the extension of equal rights to every citizen, irrespectiv of creed or nationality. If the religionist claims a right to preach his gospel, we claim the right to preach our gospel. If he wishes to express his views on Judaized paganism, we also claim the same right.

What right the church has to order the Bible to be read in the public school, or what right she has to make w tnesses in courts of justice take the judicial oath, or what right she has to make the observance of her Sabbath binding on the citizen, I fail to see. Such coercion is certainly inconsistent with the principles of pure democracy and republicanism. Why do not Liberals throughout the Union manfully combat such organized tyranny? Why do they not, as patriotism and duty demand, compel their political representativs to giv them their unquestionable rights? If Liberalism in this country, especially in the Southern and Western states and territories, allows the church to govern the legislativ halls, then she deserves to be defeated.

Our League here is in a prospering condition. We hav commenced to hav lectures regularly, and some of our members occasionally debate with Christians. Our hall will be erected as soon as possible. By spring we hope to be using it for Liberal purposes. The Liberal sentiment is very powerful and extensiv in Montana. The only inconvenience we experience at present is the lack of proper organization. I hope that Montana Liberals will take the hint and act accordingly.

The churches in Montana (and there are several) do not seem to prosper much. We hear of no revivals. I presume that the Holy Ghost has not yet thought of this place, or is too busy in the states keeping the Christians in good order. The accessions to the churches are generally from churches in the states, and many of the congregations attend church on the principle of policy.

It is difficult to convince Montanaians that a child was ever born without a human father, or that any man ever rose from the dead and took his flight into space to sit on the right hand of a ghost. Neither are they easily convinced that when they die God (if there be one) sends a retinue of black demons to transport them to the tropical climate of gehenna. Consequently we never hear of hell from the most orthodox pulpit. We hear occasionally of Christ coming to set the church and the world right, but we all here think that if he never did come, or if the Christian church never made the pretension that he did come, society would be much purer and loftier than it is to-day. JOSEPH L. ANDREW.

ANN HARBOR, MICH., NOV. 18, 282.

MR. EDITOR: If you will permit me I will giv your readers a little of workings of theology in our part of the country. Here in the University of Michigan at the medical college there has been quite a disturbance created, the report going the rounds that Prof. E. Frothingham was an Infidel, and that he was trying to root out the churches, etc.

This was started by a few remarks that the professor had made in one of his lectures. He was explaining the advancement and progression of the different professions, and to the point where he said that a great many men would exaggerate the truth to carry their arguments. For instance, a lawyer deceive to make his side appear the most acceptable, and doctors would often go beyond their assertions, and even theologians (says the professor) would deceive the public in order that their arguments seem clear.

These remarks had quite an effect on some of the students, who were of a sanctimonious disposition; and one of those students took it to heart, and reported Prof. Frothingham to the president of the university, Mr. Angell, who is quite a religious man, and he also thought this quite an offending statement to make in the presence of so many Christians. The student that made the report was Mr. Morgan, of California. He stated to the president that Prof. Frothingham said all preachers were liars. Of course this was quite rough and insulting to all Christians, etc., they thought.

There was a meeting of the faculty held to investigate matters. During this time it could be heard among some of the students, "Prof. Frothingham ought to be discharged, the faculty ought to bounce him, etc., for 'giving Infidel lectures where he was paid to lecture on medicin," and all such reports and utterances were heard by the writer.

Now, this man Morgan that made the report claims that he himself was a preacher. According to this, he had at one time engaged in the soul-saving business. In other words, "a retired sky pilot," who is now studying medicin. It seems that he thought it was not a paying business, and that perhaps he could accumulate more of this world's treasure by practicing medicin.

As very likely Prof. Frothingham will not get the "grand bounce" for what he said, I think this not much liberty for a state university based on secular principles. Also in the beginning of a term the professor would giv a history of the science of medicin, beginning at some remote period of time, and tracing it down to the present day, and through the dark ages. That science has a peculiar history, and now and then where the church has interfered with its progress and wherever the word "church" was uttered there was always a class or crowd that would hiss, make a hissing noise, endeavoring to insult the professor. It seems to hav gone to the hearts of those "Morgans." It reached the mark every time.

And remarks hav been made by those connected with other departments that in the medical department the professors were trying to make "skeptics" of the students. But the progress of Christianity among the students may be seen when the Monthly Bulletin (a small Christian paper printed by the Young Men's Christian Association) comes out, and it is sent to each student gratis, and goes to the post-office and sees those papers on the floor, as they are never taken out of the-office; they are dropped right onto the floor, left to be swept up by the post-master.

This case has caused no little talk. It induces a great many to express their opinions, and causes a great many arguments and disputes.

Another objection that those Christians hav to Mr. Frothingham is that he refers to the works of Charles Darwin as the greatest scientist of the world, and takes extracts from them.

Now, it seems peculiar that those followers of Christ are so irritated when some scientific truth is brought up. Those fellows are behind time. They ought to hav lived several hundred years ago, then their mode of education was in full blast. They might hav been with the majority in those days in putting up obstructions for the progress of science.

I will close, hoping that some at least of this bigotry will cease among the students of the university of Michigan. Yours, etc.,

AN INFIDEL STUDENT FROM OHIO.

The Ohio Materialist.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, NOV. 19, 1882.

BROTHER BENNETT: I must giv you full credit for scolding. I never remember being so unmercifully scolded before. You must take me for a small boy, and you my ma. I am now a little over seventy years of age, but this terrible scolding makes me feel quite young again. Why, friend Bennett, I think it is a little honorable to be scolded by so great a man, who has seen the whole world and much more. I fear I shall become a wee bit popular as the result of this fearful castigation, moreover. Doubtless it will delight the minds of all those awful penetrating folks who are so well able to see so very deep into a millstone, while the blind and hateful Materialist cannot see one inch from his nose. Oh, what a deplorable condition we poor, ignorant Materialists are in, and T. Winter in particular! He must now take a back seat, right behind all those grand and powerful mental ponderosities whose extraordinary vision can scan the unknowable and the unthinkable, or any other mysticism with as much ease as a chicken lays an egg. Oh, the wisdom and power of some exalted people! It is past finding out. They seem to know everything before they were born, and bushels after they are dead. Why, whatever would this small world be worth were it not for these matchless wiseacres? Why, these great little lights of retrogressiv proclivities claim to be able to see and know two worlds at one and the same time. Awful people, that! I think it's a tremendous big feather in the cap of this benighted bosh of a Materialist to be banged and knocked around by such celestial intelligences. I feel as if I was only a very short distance from the shining shore. A few more spiritual kicks and I'll be there. It's awful utterly nice to feel the toe of some lovely spook touching the carnal body of a stubborn Materialist and lifting him right into kingdom come. Oh, what a comedy life is, excepting what is farce! It's all right, for if tragedy was on top the mind would sink beneath a weight of woe, and this beautiful world would not appear to the sensible or insensible Materialist as the very best he will ever know. Think not, Brother Bennett, that I hate anything human. No. It's only what defrauds humanity I oppose I claim to be an unadulterated Infidel, and am proud to confess it. I like no tricks, shams, or deceptions, but honest and square dealing with every mortal, wise or unwise. I think it's wrong to take the least advantage of any person's credulity and make merchandise out of them.

In conclusion, I would say that although you hav scolded me so awful much I hav a grain or two of sense not to resent it. No, you could not offend this Infidel. His head is too level, and don't you forget it. I hav never been personal to anyone. I wrote a little what you might perhaps call doggerel to that man Severance, because he used words unworthy of a gentleman toward me, who never harmed him in my life. I attack not men but systems, and Spiritualism is an open question equally as much as any other system of religious theology. It stands opposed to Materialism, and you know it. Therefore it must expect to bear its share of rebuke as well as all other priestly theologies.

I know billions of people expect a second life, but that does not secure it. Millions of people would like to be in easy circumstances, but no matter how much they wish it it does not come. Some would like to be ever young, but time and nature make them old. It's one thing to desire, but quite another to realize. But I hav done, and I remain as before,

Your friend, T. WINTER.

THE clergymen at Hartford have been discussing the subject of "faith cures." Several of them had great respect for the statements of persons who believed themselvs to hav been cured by this method. There was a general call for increased light on the question, but especially for more definit information, vouched for by trustworthy persons. It was not thought that the persons who say they hav received benefit from faith and prayer were cheats or frauds. Yet the suspicion was expressed that in some instances they might be enthusiasts, deluding both themselvs and others. There was not one of all these scholarly Hartford pastors who was willing to come out squarely in favor of faith cures and recommend them.

Truth and Freedom.

BY WILLIAM D. GALLAGHER.

For the truth, then, let us battle,
Whatsoever fate betide;
Long the boast that we are freemen
We hav made and published wide.

He who has the truth and keeps it
Keeps not what to him belongs,
But performs a selfish action
That his fellow-mortal wrongs.

He who seeks the truth and trembles
At the dangers he must brave
Is not fit to be a freeman—
He at best is but a slave.

He that hears the truth and places
Its high promptings under ban,
Loud may boast of all that's manly,
But can never be a man.

Bold in speech and bold in action
Be forever. Time will test
Of the free-souled and the slavish
Which fulfils life's mission best.

Be, then, like the noble ancient:
Scorn the threat that bids thee fear;
Speak, no matter what betide thee;
Let them strike but make them hear.

Afterglow.

From Our Continent.

To one abstruse conundrum much serious thought I giv:
Why is it that the good men die, and all the bad ones liv?
Or why is it we never know our neighbor's rare perfections
Till his last will and testament is read to his connections?

Ah! then the daily papers spread his virtues all abroad!
They say he was "an honest man—the noblest work of God;"
How good he was, how wise he was, how honest in his dealing;
What tenderness of heart he had, and what a depth of feeling!

Perhaps the man was one of those—ah! would that they were fewer!—
Who all his life ground hard and close the faces of the poor;
Who drove his debtors to despair by premature foreclosure,
Then paid his pew rent in advance, with infinit composure.

Perhaps he was the lordly head of some unhappy place,
Called home, by use and courtesy, but lacking all its grace.
Who held his children criminals for every trifling error;
Who pinched his household half to death, and kept his wife in terror.

Perhaps he was a lawyer deep, whose quibbling tricks and words
Helped base executors to rob poor widows of their thirds;
Perhaps a thrifty groceryman, whose wheedling, false palaver
Sold toughest steak for porterhouse, and chickory for Java.

Any of these he might hav been—the type are nowise rare—
But when he dies, behold! we passed an angel unaware!
Since type and tongue proclaim his worth, what cynic shall dispute them?
"Many there be who meet the gods," we read, "but few salute them."

Why don't the papers say fine things of men before they die,
And indicate these saintly souls ere yet they soar on high?
Then we might recognize them ere grim death and cold obstruction
Hav made it quite impossible to get an introduction.

Ah! well, perhaps, when I at last beneath my burden faint,
I, too, shall win the titles of a paragon and saint,
And be, when death's cold breath has blown aside life's dust and soiling,
A grain of that peculiar salt which keeps the world from spoiling.

Spiritualism and Arithmetic.

From the New York Sun.

A recent Belgian paper relates marvels of a new lightning calculator, a youth named Jacques Inaudi, far surpassing those recorded by Zerah Colburn and others. It describes his first exhibition at a public hall, in Antwerp, called the Bardo. A large blackboard was on the stage. One of the audience, who is described as a mathematician of considerable force, wrote on it lines of figures, as they were called out by the public, extending to trillions, that is, millions of millions, Inaudi's back being turned to the blackboard. Upon these he performed stupendous operations in addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division before the other had time to begin upon them. "Lightning is not quicker," says the Precursor of Antwerp.

The exact age of some one in the audience was then asked for. One person (of course not a lady) gave his age as 32 years 3 months and 2 days. In fifteen seconds Inaudi announced correctly the number of seconds he had lived. Let anybody figure that out with slate and pencil. Another person then announced his age with a similar result.

The exhibitor of Inaudi (called his barnum with small b, that word having become pretty well naturalized in that sense in the French language) then called on the public for the figures on which he should perform six different operations simultaneously, namely, an addition and a subtraction running into trillions, a not less arduous multiplication and division, and two root extractions, the square and cube roots. Inaudi simply heard the figures announced, never throughout the whole exhibition turning his face to the board. He asked for six minutes for the task, beginning as usual to repeat the figure they had been announced. "How much time hav I left?" he presently said. Three minutes, was the answer. "I hav done," he replied, and the correct results of all the six operations rattled off from his lips. And during the three minutes consumed in his inconceivably gigantic labor of mental arithmetic he had been conversing freely with the audience, and answering all their questions. The Precursor wonders that the ceilings and walls were not brought down by the storm of the applause.

Being four times recalled, at the fourth time he offered to repeat, in their order, all the vast array of the figures which had now accumulated on the great blackboard, none having been effaced. And he did it within a minute, playing with millions, billions, and trillions. No wonder that the Antwerp journal exclaims that it was "vertiginous." It almost takes one's breath away to think of those six operations performed in three minutes without sight of the figures, and while conversing with the public and answering all their questions. The Precursor thus concludes:

Jacques Inaudi is entirely self-taught, and calculates after his own fashion. He does not know how this science came to him. It was an illumination. It seemed, he told us, that a veil was torn aside in his mind. He was then six years old.

The Precursor does not giv the age of this youth or boy, merely calling him "the young Inaudi." But the manifestation of the faculty seems to hav begun suddenly at the age of six years. It is difficult to accept its expression of his "mental faculties." Surely it could not hav been his mind which worked out the six formidable operations simultaneously in three minutes, while at the same time he was conversing with the audience and answering their questions. Nor could there hav been any tricks of preparation in advance, or aid of a confederate, when the figures were given to him on the spot and noted down as they were called out by a crowded, promiscuous audience. It must hav been a case of what the Spiritualists call mediumship, in which an outside intelligence acts through the mind and organs of the medium—analogous to the numerous cases they record in which totally unlettered mediums hav spoken or written in languages unknown to them, languages both modern and ancient, including Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Oriental.

On that theory it may well hav been the spirit of Zerah Colburn, or some of the anterior lightning calculators, probably themselvs similarly mediumistic in their day, though none of them seems to hav equaled the performance of Inaudi. It tallies well with this theory that they all seem to hav lost the faculty as they advanced in years, whereas matured mental powers and long practice ought then rather to hav increased their ability. We hope that young Inaudi's "barnum" will bring him over to this side of the Atlantic, and present him before an audience in the Academy of Music.

The negro musical prodigy, Blind Tom, is also held by the Spiritualists to be a medium, and that it is not he alone, but some great musician of the past who acts through him. It is certain that he was an idiot. He began in childhood on a Southern plantation, where he used to hang about outside under the open windows where his young missuses were playing on the piano, and was one day found perched on the piano stool playing astonishingly for himself. So I was told in London by the late Gen. Wigfall, of Texas (of both the United States and the Confederate senates), who had known the family to which he had belonged. I went to hear him in the St. James Hall in London, where I heard him play three different tunes simultaneously, one with the right hand on the piano, one with the left, while he whistled the third. A well-known musical composer went on a stage and played a long and brilliant performance of his own composition, which had never before been played or published. The blind negro youth then succeeded him at the piano and played the whole with equal brilliancy, and apparently without missing a note. All the musical world of London were there, and the applause was thunderous. When the musician would strike ten different notes with his ten fingers in one crash of mingled sound, Blind Tom would never fail to decompose the sound and tell all the different notes which had been struck. When playing or listening a rapt expression seemed entirely to transform the stupid idiot face of the negro lad, apparently then about eighteen years of age. During the interval between the two parts of the exhibition, I made my way to the retiring room in the rear, introducing myself as a compatriot to two gentlemen whom I found there drinking a glass of wine at one end of a large room. Blind Tom was at the other end, gyrating round in an oval dance with his hands hanging down like paws before his breast, his tongue lolling out, and slobbering in a truly disgusting fashion. About the fact of his absoute and utter idiocy there could be no question, though I hav been told that his mentality has considerably improved since then, a not uncommon circumstance.

NOBODY was more bitterly witty than Lord Ellenborough. A young lawyer, trembling with fear, rose to make his first speech, and began: "My lord, my unfortunate client—my lord, my unfortunate client—my lord——" "Go on, sir, go on," said Lord Ellenborough; "as far as you hav proceeded hitherto, the court is entirely with you."

LORD CHESTERFIELD, hearing that a man of low family had married the daughter of a lady not renowned for her morality, remarked that "nobody's son had married everybody's daughter."

MISS MITFORD is giving an account of a conversation Mr. Fields had had with Carlyle: "'So, sir, ye're an American?' quoth the self-sufficient Scothman. Mr. Fields assented. 'Ah, that's a wretched nation of your ain. It's all wrong. It always has been wrong from the vera beginning. That grete mon of yours, George' (did any one under the sun ever dream of calling Washington George before?)—'your grete mon George was a monstrous bore, and wants taking down a few hundred pegs.' 'Really, Mr. Carlyle,' replied my friend, 'you are the last man in the world from whom I should hav expected such an observation. Look at your own book on Cromwell! What was Washington but Cromwell without his personal ambition and without his fanaticism?' 'Oh, sir,' responded Carlyle, 'George had neither ambition nor religion, nor any good quality under the sun. George was just Oliver with all the juice squeezed out.'"

A VERY curious document has recently been discovered in the state archives of Hesse-Darmstadt. It is the official tariff of Darmstadt and Bessungen, in the latter part of the fourteenth century, to the executioners of those towns for the performance of their duties. To boil a criminal in oil brought the executioner 24 florins, while breaking a man on the wheel gave but 5 florins 30 kreutzers. Criminals were hanged at 10 florins per head, and burnt alive for 14. To apply the torture of the rack brought but 5 florins, and branding on the back or forehead, or cutting off nose and ears were the same price.—The Antiquary.

THERE is very little, if anything, says the Lancet, to be said against the use of tobacco in an average state of the organism. Those who are unfavorably affected by it should abstain, and it is wholly inadmissible in youth. We would go so far as to say that no young man should smoke before he has attained his majority, and it would be well if he deferred the use of tobacco altogether, and in every form, until the extreme limit of development, which may be placed at the age of 26. It is impossible to giv any precept as to the time and mode of smoking. Speaking generally, the points of caution should be to avoid irritation of the mucus membrane of the mouth and fauces, loss of salivary secretion, and super-excitement of the nerves and nerve centers. Cigars are better than pipes, and far better than cigarets; but no cigar should be smoked for more than three-fourths of its length, even with a mouth-piece. The smoke should be taken into the front of the mouth and ejected as rapidly as possible. Properly and moderately enjoyed, tobacco-smoking, the writer concludes, is not a baneful habit, but one that may be reasonably enjoyed.

Gems of Thought.

A NOBLE ambition that emulates the virtues and graces of others is worthy of us all. Even envy hath its uses when it leads us to strive for the good and the joy we see others possessing. If our neighbor is full of the elasticity of health, and we feel envious of his treasure, we strive by imitating his conduct and his care of the physical system to secure the same boom for ourselvs. Thus we experience the good of envy and learn that all evils hav their uses as well as abuses.—Elmina D. Slenker.

NO one meditating on the present condition of the intellectual world can fail to be arrested by the evidences of its deep-seated current. Yeast is working everywhere. Ancient formulas and time-honored creeds are yielding as much to internal pressure as to external assault. The expansion of knowledge is loosening the very earth clutched by the roots of creeds and churches. Rejoice over this or deplore it, the fact is unmistakable. Sects and parties, in the endeavor to sustain their position and to preserve at least their watchwords or the outward semblance of their creeds, now-a-days snatch eagerly at compromises which, a few years ago, would hav been scouted as heresies.—George Henry Lewis.

AS to what are called the teachings of Jesus, on which such stress is laid, as making him to be a supernaturally divine revealer, not being original with him, they cannot, whatever their excellence, bear the weight that is laid upon them. In truth, they are not all excellent; and those of them that most challenge our admiration were well known before the time of Jesus, and had long been current among Jews and gentiles. As to the ground taken by Mr. Stopford Brooke and others [such as Parker of the last generation and Savage and Chadwick, also David Swing, of Chicago, of the present day] that the best Spirituality of the New Testament, though not born with or peculiar to Christianity, has received a special unction or power, whether supernatural or not, as delivered by Christ; it seems to me that this is rather a devout fancy than a well-grounded opinion; and, if correct, cannot do more than entitle Jesus to a high place among the most efficient instructors among mankind. To single Jesus out as standing alone and as being the one "who spoke as never man spoke," certainly seems extravagant, and without anything approaching to a foundation in the facts when dispassionately examined.—N. R. Waters.

OBSTRUCTIONS are never wanting, the very things that were once indispensable furtherances become obstructions, and need to be shaken off and left behind us—a business of enormous difficulty. It is notable enough, surely, how a theorem or spiritual representation, so we may call it, which once took in the whole universe, and was completely satisfactory in all parts of it to the highly discursive, acute intellect of Dante, one of the greatest in the world—had, in the course of another century, become dubitable to common intellects; become deniable; and is now, to every one of us, flatly incredible, obsolete as Odin's theorem.—Carlyle.

HUMANITY must answer when God speaks,
As sure as echo to the human voice;
And every grand o'ertopping lie which breaks
With furious flood and century-defying noise
In the eternal symphony that joys
Along, is but one baser pipe or chord
That shall be tuned again when Reason sits as Lord. —The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

MENDICANT orders, bodies of good men doomed to beg, were instituted in the Christian church; a most natural and even necessary development of the spirit of Christianity. It was itself founded on poverty, on sorrow, contradiction, crucifixion, every species of distress and degradation. We may say that he who has not known these things, and learned from them the priceless lessons they hav to teach, has missed a good opportunity of schooling. To beg and go barefoot, in coarse woolen cloak, with a rope round your loins, and be despised of all the world, was no beautiful business; nor an honorable one in any eye till the nobleness of those who did so made it honored of some.—Carlyle.

THEN let us cheerful acquiesce;
Nor make our scanty pleasures less
By pining at our state.
And, even should misfortune come,
I, here who sit, hae met wi' some
An's thankful for them yet.

They gie the wit of age to youth;
They let us ken oursel;
They make us see the naked truth,
The real guid and ill.

Though losses and crosses
Be lessons right severe,
There's wit there, ye'll get there,
Ye'll find nae otherwhere. —Burns.

MAN is an embodied paradox, a bundle of contradictions; and as some set-off against the marvelous things that he has done, we might fairly adduce the monstrous things he has believed. The more gross the fraud, the more glibly will it go down, and the more greedily will it be swallowed, since folly will always find faith wherever impostors will find impudence.—Colton's Lacon.

THE first attempt to murder the Prince of Orange was committed by one who carried, in the same pocket with his pistol, a string of prayers to the Virgin Mary and the angel Gabriel and a catechism of the Jesuits.—W. S. Lander.

ON all occasions it is well to be a little more than tolerant, especially when a wiser and better man than ourselvs thinks differently from us. Religious minds will find an additional reason for humility when they observe such men as Beromec and Fenelon adhering to the religion they were born in, amidst the discussions and commotions of every land around.—Lander's Imaginary Conversations.

CURSED be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way. And all the people shall say, Amen.—Deuteronomy, xxvii, 18.

Odds and Ends.

HEARD in a boudoir: "Mercy on me, what are those horrible sounds up-stairs?" "Oh, that's nothing but dear George; I suppose he has lost his collar button again."

IT is alleged that there is a man in Plattsburgh, N. Y., whose name is Constant Agony. But we shouldn't wonder, if you got down to solid facts, you'd find his name to be Boyle.

A GENTLEMAN whose vocabulary was mixed wished to praise a certain lady reader. "Yes," said he, "besides being a very fine elocutionist, she has a great deal of ejaculation."

"WHAT station is this?" asked a lady passenger of an English tourist near by. Looking out of the window and reading a sign on the fence he replied, "Rough on Rats, I guess, mum."

THERE seems to be a great kick, so to speak, about ladies wearing their hats in the theater, but not a single complaint has reached us thus far inveighing against their keeping them on at church.

A CASE of domestic scandal was under discussion at a tea-table. "Well, let us think the best of her we can," said an elderly spinster. "Yes," said another, "and say the worst; that is the fashion."

OUT West when a saloon is blown up with dynamite it is blamed upon the temperance men, and yet the fellows who hav heavy accounts chalked against them on the slate are very much interested in having the place demolished.

THERE is a salt mine in Austria that has been worked for more than one thousand years. The Austrians may hav a great deal of experience in working salt mines, but when it comes to salting mines the Californians can teach them a thing or two.

THERE is nothing sometimes like hitting the nail on the head. At a recent fire at Ottoway some one sent a telegram to the owner, who was in Boston, saying: "Premises all on fire. What shall we do?" The answer came promptly, "Put it out."

A PEASANT comes to a broker to exchange a hundred-mark note for silver. The broker gives him a hundred-mark roll, which the peasant opens to see if it is all right. He counts up to seventy-one, and then puts it all in his pocket. "It was all right so far, so I suppose the rest is right too."

HOW TO MOUNT A HORSE.

In mounting, face the near side of the horse. The near side is the side nearest yourself. If you stand on the right side of the horse, which is the wrong side when you mount, you will face the crupper. Then everybody will know that your name is Johann Gotlieb Ernisgefolger.

If you cannot mount from the ground lead the horses to a high fence, say "Whoa" two or three times, and jump over the horse's ears. You will light somewhere on his neck, and you will hav plenty of time to adjust yourself while the horse is running away. Another method of mounting, largely practiced by young gentlemen from the city, is to balance yourself on one foot on the fence, and point the other leg at the horse in the general direction of the saddle, saying "Whoa" all the time. The horse, after this gesture has been repeated a few times, backs away, pulls the alleged rider off the fence, and walks up and down the lane with him at a rapid gallop. This gives the rider in about ten minutes all the exercise he wants for a week.

If by some miracle you manage to get into the saddle, hold on with both hands and say "Whoa." The faster the horse goes the tighter you must hold on, and the louder you must "holler."

If you are from New York or Philadelphia you will shorten the stirrup until your knees are on a level with your chin. Then, as you ride, you will rise to your feet and stand in the attitude of a man peering over a fence to look for his dog, and then suddenly fall in the saddle like a man who has stepped on a banana peel. This is the English school. It is hard on the horse, but is considered very graceful. A man cannot wear false teeth, however, and ride in this manner.

THERE was a young man at the Central Market Wednesday who looked the perfect specimen of the greenhorn. His hands were large and red, his clothes didn't fit, and his cowhide boots had just been rubbed down with fried meat gravy. He was looking at everything with open mouth, when a couple of young men who had been driven in by the rain commenced to guy him. One of them asked him if he was on a bridal tour, and the other insisted on calling him Shakspere. Liberal offers were made for his coat and boots, and an attempt was made to secure him for a lecturing tour through the country.

The young man took everything in a calm, matter-of-fact way until a gentleman came along and said to him:

"See here, my friend, why do you stand these insults?"

"Are they insulting me?"

"Of course they are."

"And should I resent it?"

"Certainly you should."

"Then I will. I didn't know exactly what to do, but thought I'd hold on for advice. If you say go in and slam 'em I'll do so."

"I would."

"Then I will."

In the coolest kind of a way he removed his coat and rolled it up and laid it down, placed his hat on the bundle, and without a word of warning he waded in and knocked one off the end of the bench and the other clear over it, and then gave each a lift with his cowhide. He won a complete victory inside of two minutes without receiving a scratch, and as he put on his coat he said to his adviser:

"Much obliged for your kindness, stranger. If that's the way you do here in Detroit I'll hav six months' sickness on my knuckles for the next chap who asks if they had to hire a hall to finish my boots in."

IMPORTANT.

There are several base and worthless imitations of Dr. Thayer's Magnetic goods upon the market. The only apparent merit they have is Cheapness. Cheap goods in this line, as in every other, are dear at any price, and cannot render as efficient service to the patient, because they DO NOT HOLD THEIR MAGNETIC CURRENTS OVER THIRTY DAYS.

"Magnets, whether Natural or Artificial, would soon Lose their Power if they were left to Themselves. They must therefore be Provided with Armatures." (See Ganot's Philosophy.)

KNOW THYSELF.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase and read the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, entitled the Science of Life; or, Self Preservation. It is not only a complete and perfect treatise on Manhood, Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in man, Errors of Youth, etc., but it contains one hundred and twenty-five prescriptions for acute and chronic diseases, each one of which is invaluable, so proved by the author, whose experience for 21 years is such as probably never before fell to the lot of any physician. It contains 300 pages, bound in beautiful embossed covers, full gilt, embellished with the very finest steel engravings, guaranteed to be a finer work in every sense—mechanical, literary, or professional—than any other work retailed in this country for $2.50, or the money will be refunded in every instance. VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

EXTERNAL APPLICATION,

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. ☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. E. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. ☞ Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notices from the Press.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Times.]

We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician, who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of those who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

[From the Star Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.]

TO INVALIDS AND OTHERS: The Banner seldom indorses any doctor or medicin, but it is free to say to all interested that Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., is not only a skilful and reputable practitioner, but one of the most successful physicians in the United States.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 9. No. 50. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, December 16, 1882. | NO. 21 CLINTON PLACE, NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

Prof. Swing, of Chicago, characterizes the Salvation Army as "bric-a-brac in religion."

Mr. Beecher says that the God depicted in orthodox creeds was an infernal demon, worse than any imagined by Dante, and he would not worship such a God even if he were damned for it.

Speaking of the enforcing of the Sunday law on the 3d, the Christian Intelligencer says: "Last Sunday's crusade by that noble army of apostles, the New York police, was shrewdly arranged to bring all Sabbath legislation into odium."

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says that Herbert Spencer looks well, but protests that his bronzed look is only a temporary consequence of the sea voyage, and that he feels in reality the reverse of benefited by his trip.

It is declared that the largest, most elegant, most costly, and in every way the finest church building on the American continent is the Cathedral of Mexico. It was largely built of the stones of the Aztec temple that stood upon precisely the same site, and which was destroyed by Cortez.

An ungodly joke is reported in a Sheffield paper. The promoters of a church bazar received an offer from Manchester of a horse and trap, and gladly accepted it. One of them then went to the railroad station to receive the present, which proved to be a clothes-horse and a mouse-trap.

The days of the so-called False Prophet of Soudan's influence appear to be numbered. Col. Stewart, who was sent to Soudan to investigate the condition of the country, reports that the False Prophet and his followers hav been repulsed by the national troops in two instances, and that Khartoum is safe.

John Wesley, when preaching against riches, said: "To ride in a coach here and to get to heaven hereafter is almost too much for any man to ask." Very few ministers of the present day will regard the opinion of Mr. Wesley as of any great importance, unless they chance to liv within walking distance of their churches.

The Grand Rapids Times says: "Three persons hav become insane in consequence of attending the revival meetings of Harrison, 'the boy preacher,' in this city. The last case is a Miss Emmons, who is said to hav become a raving lunatic. She was apparently in good health when she began to attend the meetings."

When Ben Butler was in Washington some time ago he called at the City Hall on some legal business. The venerable clerk of the court, Mr. R. J. Meigs, Sr., said to him, in the course of a conversation about politics, "General, I'm afraid you are getting into bad company." "Oh, no," said Gen. Butler, "I never change my politics; I change my friends sometimes."

Corken was a Congregational preacher at Salisbury Point, Mass. He was rapidly making a reputation as an orator when a village paper reported one of his sermons, and it was found to be identical with an old discourse by Canon Wilberforce. Then he left the pulpit, and became a physician in Lynn, but with no better luck, for he is now under arrest for malpractice,

Dr. Hawks, an eloquent and popular New York divine, once asked the vestrymen of his church to increase his salary because of his increased family expenses. "Don't trouble yourself," said the vestryman; "the Lord has said he will care for the young ravens when they cry." "I know that," said the clergyman, "but nothing is said about the young Hawks."

The Salvationists seem to think that the devil and his works are specially manifested in Brooklyn. In their War Cry they say that the devil has tried harder than ever during the past week to get the best of their Hallelujah Band, but that, as they hav the whole gospel armor on, the old serpent can hiss and hurl his fiery darts until he is tired. They say they are pressing on to glory, and are determined to take with them just as many souls as will go. Brooklyn people generally are invited, without preference as to denomination.

Col. Ingersoll told Judge Wylie, when the Star route trial was resumed on the morning of the 8th, that sometimes he thought his Honor's decisions were right, and sometimes he thought them wrong; but that he (Ingersoll) might be mistaken both times. There was some laughter at this, which Judge Wylie rebuked by telling the audience that they were not at the opera comique.

The divided skirt and the hygienic petticoat having proved hopeless failures, the Women's Dress Reform Association of London will offer prizes this winter for a design intended to do away with the inconveniences of the present styles, without making too marked a departure from "the distinguishing characteristics of female attire." The problem is believed to be a difficult one to solve.

In the Richards-Babcock libel case at St. Johns a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff, Rev. J. E. Richards, with damages at $100. The jury had been given some special questions upon which they were asked to report findings, but they were not equal to solving the conundrums and gave them up. On the question of damages two jurors are reported to hav favored giving $1,000, three $500, two $200, and five 6 cents.

The Rev. Dr. Hicks, of Washington, who acquired some celebrity by appearing as the spiritual adviser of Guiteau, now comes to the front as an outspoken disbeliever in hell. He freely announces his willingness to be damned for holding that there is no such place as hell. His position is a very safe one, according to his own holding; for, if there be no hell, there is in all probability no place to which the damned may be sent.

Lead from church windows facing east is yet believed in some remote country places in Schleswig to be a certain cure for the falling sickness. The remedy cures by the touch, but to be effectiv should be stolen at the hour of midnight by the sick person, who must be alone. Village churches in Schleswig are located in the burying-ground, and as few superstitious persons hav the courage to brave its terrors at the hour when ghosts are abroad, the "cure" is sufficiently rare to hav preserved its reputation for efficacy from the middle ages to the present day.

A Cincinnati woman was nursing her husband, a broken-down sot, when he leaped wildly from the bed, brandished a huge knife, which he had surreptitiously obtained, and threw her on the floor, declaring that he was divinely commanded to slay her. Then ensued a desperate fight, in which the woman held fast to his hands with all her might, and he was only able to inflict a few small cuts. Just as her strength was failing, her screams brought help from several neighbors. His assault seemed to them so atrocious that they did not interfere when he turned the blade against himself, but allowed him to commit suicide unhindered.

Mayor Harrison, of Chicago, being requested to enforce the Sunday laws of that city, replied that he would not undertake any such thing. "I believe in Sunday as a day of rest," he said; "but what is rest to one man may be labor to another. Rest is not simply doing nothing, but is a change. A man sitting at a desk all the week, occupied with mental labor, finds no refreshment in a stiff-back bench in a church on Sunday. The Sunday of the Puritan fathers was beneficial to them because they spent the week in outdoor labor, but men of sedentary habits need to reverse the usage. Any attempt to compel the people of Chicago to be pious will fail, and it ought to."

Many queer stories are told about the absurd way in which uneducated people muddle the prayer-book, especially the marriage service part of it. A comic paper makes a Hampshire incumbent responsible for the following: He said that in his own parish it was quite the fashion for the man, when giving the ring, to say to the woman: "With my body I thee wash-up, and with all my hurdle goods I thee and thou." He said the women were generally better up in this part of the service than the men. One day, however, a bride startled him by promising, in what she supposed to be the language of the prayer-book, to take her husband "to 'ave and to 'old for this day fortnight, for betterer horse, for richerer power, in siggerness health, to love cherries, and to bay." What meaning this extraordinary vow conveyed to her own mind, the incumbent said it baffled him to conjecture.

In a trial in Germany recently, a curious document was produced, which was called forth by the marriage of the Count de Sulz, a Roman Catholic, to Agatha, Countess of Hanau, a Protestant, in the year 1605. At the wedding the bridegroom solemnly swore to respect his future wife's religious views, and signed, sealed, and delivered a deed to that effect. It was couched in the following terms: "I, Rudolph, Count of Sulz, hereby promis on my honor as a nobleman—or may the devil take me—that I will allow my future wife to remain in her religion, nor will I offer her any inducement in the slightest to abandon it. I hav at home two Bibles; if that is not enough for her, I will get her two more. Let her read in them bravely and industriously. Moreover, it is her body, not her soul, I take. I shall remain in my religion, in which I hav been brought up from my youth. I know that I am on the right road; if she won't go to heaven, let her go to hell. Signed, Rudolph, Count of Sulz."

Rural Sunday-school enterprise in Ohio receives a set back in the decision of Judge Conner, of Cincinnati, that school-houses cannot be used for religious purposes. A school-house in Symmes township had been used for a Sunday-school. Out of this use grew the habit of using it for religious worship by a sect calling itself the "New Lights." The doctrins of the "New Lights" happened to be obnoxious to some of the neighbors, who brought suit against the Board of Education of the township. It is in this suit that Judge Connor gives his decision. The judge holds that school-houses were erected only for purposes of secular education, and not for use on Sundays or for the purpose of imparting a knowledge of religion. A perpetual injunction is decreed restraining the Board of Education from allowing school buildings to be used for Sunday-schools or for religious services. It is a fact worthy of the attention of the courts generally that since the African Sunday-school Union began its missionary work in 1824 a large proportion of the Sunday-schools organized by it missionaries and agents hav had beginning in country school-houses.

SUNDAY DOUBTS AND DIFFICULTIES.

Pity the sorrows of our poor police,
And also of our troubled justices,
Who must decide that they themselvs are geese,
Or hold to what some rusty-fusty says.

Each fellow on a Sunday, as he knows,
Must do no sort of work, unless if he
To some official very clearly shows
To be of charity or necessity.

But which is which is where the joke comes in,
And here the best official guesses vary;
'Tis hard to tell what labor is a sin,
And what is charitable or necessary.

The question is quite difficult, indeed—
Beyond all reason and all rhyme it is—
If Parson Bubble's talk fits any need,
Or if an unallowed pastime it is.

If Parson Hotspur's wordy war is right,
It follows by the reasoning's parity
That Jimmy Stryker's quiet chicken fight
May well be styled a work of charity.

"Is blacking boots a sin?" asks Justice Jones.
He ponders well, and cannot guess it is,
Then puts a gamin on his narrow bones,
And classes him among necessities.

Some say you musn't giv a man a drop
To build what Scotchmen call a bleeze in him,
But 'tis a charity to fill him up
With something that will start a freeze in him.

There is a fellow, solid and sincere,
A German voter, whose reliance is
Upon the plea that schooners of his beer
Must rank with surgical appliances.

So many men hav each a separate view,
Such varying wisdom is exhibited,
That some folks say this rule alone will do;
Let all or nothing be prohibited. —The Sun.

Spiritualists claim that he has supernatural aid, but cannot explain why spirits should permit themselvs to be used in the production of phenomena designed by the alleged medium to disprove their own existence. Obituary.

D. M. BENNETT.

BORN DEC. 23, 1818; DIED DEC. 6, 1882.

His Influence.

No one has exerted greater influence on the Freethought movement in the United States for the past eight years than the man whose likeness heads this sketch. Bold, aggressiv, hard-working, from the time he first came prominently before the Liberals of the country, he commanded the attention of the Freethinking world, and drew upon himself the hatred of the churches. He made for himself the very best friends, and the very worst enemies. Honesty is always hated by roguery; truthfulness is always detested by hypocrisy. Honesty and truthfulness being the pre-eminent qualities of Mr. Bennett's character, he enjoyed his share of persecution and hatred by the rogues and hypocrits which a decaying theology inevitably breeds. But with the bitter there was some sweet. The loyal friendship and undying love of thousands of good and true people all over the United States were his firm support, and in the darkest hour hav been a ray of light that cheered even the gloomy prison cell to which Christianity had consigned him. Since his liberation from that cell no man has been more honored by his friends, who, remembering his bravery and his stanchness, endeavored to make his life worth living, and the memory of the past a sacred heritage.

His Career.

Mr. Bennett's career has been checkered even more than ordinary by the ups and downs which come to all men. While pursuing the mercantil business he was alternately poor and wealthy. Since he devoted his life to spreading Freethought he was one year in prison for his heresy, and the next, the Freethinkers' honored delegate to a world's convention.

His full name was DeRobigne Mortimer Bennett. Being a plain man, and not fancying complicated titles, he invariaby abbreviated it to D. M. Bennett, and it is by this name that he is known everywhere. He was born in Springfield, New York, on the eastern shores of Otsego Lake, December 23, 1818, and consequently would hav been sixty-four years of age on the 23d of this month. His father, an honest, hard-working man, followed farming till his boy was ten years old, when he moved into the village of Cooperstown, New York, where four years were spent in acquiring such education as could be obtained in those days in district schools. His mother was a Methodist, belonging to the church. He was a constant attendant of the Sunday-school, learned twenty or thirty verses of the New Testament during the week, reciting them to his teacher on Sunday. He grew up a firm believer in orthodoxy. At the age of twelve he obtained a situation in a printing office as "roller-boy." He remained there nearly two years, when a new invention in printing presses, by which "roller-boys" were superseded, threw him out of that employment. After this he labored in a wool-carding establishment for several months, when he went to liv with a Doctor Barker, a brother of his mother, who, when the urchin was but four years old, had promised to take him and make a doctor of him. When the uncle beheld the young candidate for M. D. honors—a slender lad of fourteen, and weighing only seventy pounds—he concluded he was too small to hold all the learning necessary to a physician, and recommended him to wait awhile. He therefore turned his trip into a visiting one, intending to return to his mother. While stopping with one of his relativs, two Shakers came to pass a night. On learning that he was about to journey back to his home, with the kindness characteristic of these people, they offered to take him with them as far as they went. He accepted the offer, and in September, 1833, he first saw the home which for thirteen years was to be his. After staying ten days as a visitor, and receiving innumerable kindnesses, he concluded he would like to liv where children were made so happy, and accordingly he confessed what few sins he had on hand at the time, as required by the rules of the order, and became a Shaker. Besides attending the Shaker school, he was placed in the seed garden as helper. This he followed for three years, when, being troubled with lameness, he was inducted in the shoemaking art. Four years he followed this, when he was again put in the medical department, finally becoming physician to the society, and controling the business of herb raising. He became familiar with botany and chemistry, and having a fair medical library and the benefit of the old retiring physician's experience, he became a skilful doctor. He pursued in his practice the eclectic system with good success.

Marriage.

In the summer of 1846 many of the younger members of the Shaker community grew dissatisfied with the restraints of the order, their faith in the religion which separated the sexes and deprived men and women of the society and mutual helpfulness of each other became less, and this feeling was shared by Mr. Bennett, Mary Wicks, his future wife, his sister and her future husband; and in September of that year these four chartered a carriage, rode to Lebanon Springs, sent back word of what they had done, and waited for the Shaker elders to come up and settle. After the settlement the quartet proceeded to Cooperstown. On October 19th Mr. Bennett was married. Before leaving the Shakers Miss Wicks had been employed as instructress for the little ones who had been taken by the Shakers to rear, and the universal sorrow at her leaving testifies to her worth and gentleness of character. She was beloved by all at the community, old and young; and the friendship with which they regarded her has never ceased. She has been a most estimable helpmeet to Mr. Bennett, suffering keenly with him in his trials, and rejoicing with all her womanly heart in his triumphs. She is a faithful wife, and kindly, steadfast friend, caring not to be seen by the world, but happy in aiding her husband in any way possible. No sketch of Mr. Bennett which omits the virtues of his patient little wife can be complete.

To the careful Shaker training, the inculcation of morality and sobriety, of honesty and hard work, Mr. Bennett was undoubtedly greatly indebted for a long life free from sickness. A healthy body givs a sound mind; and that he did so much work at an age when most men are tired and want to rest, proves that a youth and early manhood spent in quiet industry is the best capital to fall back upon in after years. Good health is better than money in the bank.

After his marriage, upon the representations of a nurseryman named Bryam, Mr. Bennett removed to Bradenburg, Kentucky, some forty miles below Louisville. It was an uninviting locality, and as the Christian institution of negro slavery was then in its palmy days, all northerners were viewed with distrust. The representations of Bryam were also found false. So the newly married couple started for Louisville, where Mr. Bennett soon obtained a clerkship in a drug store, which situation he held for nearly a year. At the termination of this engagement, with the small sum of money he had been able to save and a little left his wife by a deceased brother, he started a drug store of his own. The business went slowly at first, but gradually, by honest work and dealing, improved until he had amassed a snug little sum.

After eight years spent in dispensing drugs the store was sold, and he removed to Rochester and engaged in selling shrubbery and fruit trees for a large Rochester firm. By a cold snap in the west he lost $4,000 at one time. He tried to recuperate the next year, but without success. He then gave up the nursery business for himself and traveled for another man.

In 1859 he removed to Cincinnati, bought another drug store, and commenced putting up proprietary medicins, which he circulated throughout the adjoining country. His early medical practice at the Shakers, and his practical knowledge of herbs, enabled him to make good medicins, and he rapidly grew wealthy, realizing some years a profit of $10,000.

In 1865 he sold out his business, realizing more than enough to hav made him independent for life had he invested it safely; but thinking he could make more, and being incapable of resting in idleness, he embarked in several enterprises, all of which proved total failures. He lost $10,000 in petroleum and mineral lands in Tennessee, $7,500 in insurance stock, $4,000 in mining lands in Sonora, $4,000 in chromo-lithography, $2,000 in bed-spring manufacture, $5,000 in buildings, and various smaller sums in other enterprises. After two years of gloom and ill-success he bought a drug store in Kansas City, and endeavored to get up again in the world. But trade opened dull, and after several months he sold out at a heavy loss and came back to New York and engaged in the manufacture of brick. This experiment also proved unsuccessful.

He then spent a few months as a commercial traveler, after which he manufactured some proprietary medicins at Rochester, but the sale was not encouraging. Receiving an offer to go to Paris, Illinois, and conduct a drug store, he accepted it, and passed three years in that town very pleasantly, but not all in the drug business. After some fifteen months at that he concluded to engage in the seed business again. The first year he contracted for the planting of fifty acres, but the failure of the contractor to keep his engagement, and dry weather, made the crop a short one and unremunerativ. To carry out his ideas more money than he could command was necessary, and he took in some partners. The next year seventy-five acres of seeds were sown, but another dry season caused another short crop.

The Truth Seeker.

It was during this summer and at this town that THE TRUTH SEEKER was started. Mr. Bennett had all along been growing more Liberal in his theological opinions. In 1848 he read, for the first time, an Infidel publication, which shook his confidence in the truth of the Bible and Christianity. Two years later he visited New York, calling upon Gilbert Vale, then editor of the Beacon, and purchasing some twenty volumes of Freethought works, among them being Paine's "Age of Reason." He read and re-read that, saw it was unanswerable, and from a strict churchman, praying twice a day, and asking a blessing at each meal besides, he became an outspoken Freethinker.

While still engaged on his seed farm he began a discussion on the efficacy of prayer with a couple of ministers, which dispute was carried on in the local papers. But the editor of one being—as is usually the case with Christian editors—unfair toward Mr. Bennett, he determined to hav a paper in which he could say what he thought about the scheme of salvation. He issued the first number and sent it broadcast over the land. He met with but little encouragement, and it was a doubtful matter whether there would ever be but one number. He decided, however, to issue a few more numbers. Subscriptions coming in more rapidly, he decided to go ahead, trusting there were enough people in the country who had a love for truth to sustain him.

While the life of the paper was hanging in the balance, and a cold breath would hav extinguished it, his troubles in the seed firm culminated. The godly partners took advantage of him and forced a dissolution of copartnership, wronging him out of two years of hard labor and $2,500 in money.

There being nothing further to keep him in Paris, and realizing that it was not the best place from which to issue a paper, he determined to remove to New York. At Paris the paper had been but eight page. On his removal to New York he increased the number to sixteen. At the commencement of the second volume he made it semi-monthly, his ultimate object being to make it a large weekly and an organ of which the Liberals of the country might be proud. At the beginning of Volume III. he reduced the number of pages to eight, and increased the frequency of issue, making it a weekly. Volume V. began as it is now, a sixteen-page weekly—the largest Freethought paper in the world. It is unnecessary to follow the paper in all its trials and embarrassments. It had but little capital to back it, and many times it seemed doubtful whether it would liv or not. But it still livs, and bids fair to for many years to come. It has gained a place in the affections of the people, who love it because it never swerves from the straight path of duty in advocating human rights and mental freedom.

His Persecution.

In 1877 Mr. Bennett's persecution began. There is in New York city an organization known as the "Society for the Suppression of Vice." It is a sort of branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, holds annual meetings in its hall, and is composed of its prominent members. Ostensibly formed for a good purpose, it has been perverted by its too zealous Christian officers into a society for the suppression of Infidelity. It secretary is Anthony Comstock, as dirty and contemptible a villain as can be met with in the whole United States. Mr. Bennett never bothered his head about this society, and the secretary was of course unknown to him. Taking advantage of this, Comstock called at the office and asked permission to look over the books for sale, which was readily granted. He spent some time at it, finally purchasing for eight cents two tracts, "An Open Letter to Jesus Chsist," and "How Do Marsupials Propagate?" The first was written by Mr Bennett, and the latter by A. B. Bradford, a re formed clergyman of Enon Valley, Pennsylvania. These were deemed sufficient upon which to institute proceedings for blasphemy and obscenity. In order to bring the case before Comstock's favorit judge, Benedict, it was necessary to hav the pamphlets sent by mail. Accordingly, Comstock wrote a decoy letter, in the name of S. Bender, Squan Village, New Jersey, ordering the two tracts named. The order was of course filled.

On November 12th Comstock visited Mr. Bennett's office, armed with a warrant from a United States commissioner, and accompanied by a United States marshal. He arrested him and took him before United States Commissioner Shields, and also seized and bore away all the tracts of the two kinds named he could find upon the shelf. The commissioner fixed the bail at $1,500, which was given. Comstock went before the grand jury and told his story, and a bill of indictment was found against the accused. A few days after the condemned tracts were by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll brought to the notice of the postmaster-general at Washington and other officials there, and they were asked if it was their purpose to prosecute the publishers and mailers of that kind of literature. The result was that about January 28, 1878, instructions were sent from Washington to New York that the case against Bennett be dismissed. Comstock was displeased at this, and declared he would yet "get even with Bennett," etc.

In August, 1878, the Freethinkers of New York held a four days' convention at Watkins, at the head of Seneca Lake. Mr. Bennett attended with an assortment of his publications for sale. Near his table was one occupied by Josephine S. Tilton, who sold several pamphlets published by her brother-in-law, E. H. Heywood, who, in the preceding June, had been sent to prison two years by the United States court in Boston, for mailing to Comstock, under the fictitious name of E. Edgewell, a copy each of "Cupid's Yokes" and Trall's "Sexual Physiology." When Miss Tilton had occasion to leave her table for a moment, Mr. Bennett frequently acted for her in her absence, serving customers with what they called for from her table. In this way he probably sold one or more copies of "Cupid's Yokes." He had none for sale himself, and all he sold was for her, in which he had not the slightest pecuniary interest. Upon the authority of Anthony Comstock's father, it may be stated that the son had written the Young Men's Christian Association at Watkins to cause Bennett to be arrested if he sold "Cupid's Yokes." A young man named Warren Hurd was delegated to buy a copy of the tabooed pamphlet of Mr. Bennett, and for his handing one from Miss Tilton's table he was arrested, as was also W. S. Bell, who assisted Mr. Bennett in selling books. Subsequently Miss Tilton and George Mosher were also arrested upon the same charge. Bail was easily furnished. The grand jury of the county soon met, and as it was known that the arrests had been made at the instance of the Rev. Mr. Waldo and other leading Christians in the town, a bill of indictment was readily found.

The case was never brought to trial, although Mr. Bennett, Mr. Bell, and Miss Tilton made a journey to Watkins for the purpose. What has become of the indictment is not known.

When Mr. Bennett was arrested and indicted at Watkins he felt that he had been wronged. He knew the pamphlet was not obscene in the meaning of the statute. As an American citizen he considered he had a right to sell it, and although he took no particular interest in the pamphlet, he felt sure it was not illegal to sell it, and he announced in his paper that he would do so. Here was Comstock's opportunity. He again resorted to his system of falsehood and hypocrisy. He wrote in the name of a fictitious personage, professing great sympathy and friendship, ordering books, among them "Cupid's Yokes," which, of course were duly sent by mail. Comstock, upon the meeting of the grand jury, went before them, and easily procured an indictment, and Mr. Bennett was again arrested, making the third time. Truly, Comstock pursued him with persistent hate.

Conviction and Imprisonment.

District Attorney Woodford did not think the grand jury should hav found a bill; he did not regard the pamphlet as obscene. But his assistant, W. P. Fiero, did, being a zealous churchman, and he conducted the prosecution. The result was that Mr. Bennett was convicted, although one of the jurymen wrote to the New York Herald afterward that he rendered a verdict of guilty only that the case might come before a higher court. The case was appealed, but as one of the judges was the same that tried the case, the verdict was affirmed, and on June 5, 1879, he was sentenced to thirteen months' imprisonment at hard labor and to pay a fine of $300. After the sentence he was taken to Ludlow-Street Jail and placed in a miserable cell. His first meal in the prison consisted of a piece of bread and cup of tea. Afterward, on agreeing to pay his board, he was removed to a larger and more comfortable cell. Here he remained seven and a half weeks, in pursuance of orders from the attorney-general in Washington, while the president was considering his application for release. A petition bearing nearly two hundred thousand names was sent to Hayes, who was then acting president, and Col. R. G. Ingersoll worked indefatigably for nearly seven weeks to secure Mr. Bennett's release. In a letter to Hon. Elizur Wright, Attorney-General Devens declared that the book was not obscene. Mr. Hayes himself said he did not so regard it. But the Christian ministers all over the country protested against the pardon of the Infidel, and Mr. Hayes was afraid to act in the matter. About fifteen thousand letters were written by the Freethinkers to the president, but in this matter he was controled by the church and his wife, who is very pious. Comstock went about the country getting signers to a petition addressed to Mrs. Hayes. It seems he knew where the power lay. Mrs. Hayes controled her husband, and the church controled her. For four years the United States had a woman for president.

On the 28th of July Mr. Bennett was taken to the Albany Penitentiary, and placed at hard labor. He remained at work in the shoeshop about two months, when his health gave way and he was transferred to the prison hospital, where many kindnesses were shown him by the wife and daughter of the superintendent of the prison. He was allowed writing materials, and in the hospital, surrounded by sick prisoners, he wrote two large volumes on "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." He was allowed to write home only once in four weeks.

The Martyr's Release and Reception.

He was released April 29, 1880, two months and five days being deducted for "good behavior." He was tendered a reception at Chickering Hall, New York city, by the Liberals, which was a grand ovation. Two or three thousand people were present more than the hall could hold, who were anxious to honor to one whom the powers of the church had sought to disgrace.

In August, 1880, the Freethinkers held an International Congress at Brussels, and Mr. Bennett was chosen by the Liberals of the United States as one of their delegates. They also furnished a portion of the money necessary to make the journey. After attending the Congress, Mr. Bennett devoted a few weeks to seeing Europe, embodying his observations in a volume called "A Truth Seeker in Europe." The letters were also published in his paper.

Around the World.

These letters were very highly prized by his friends, and led D. C. Coleman, of California, to propose that he make a tour around the world and write it up, making a book of the same. Mr. Coleman offered to be one of a number to advance five dollars each to pay expenses of the tour, each subscriber to receive in return a copy of the book. Mr. Bennett accepted the proposition if enough felt like joining to pay expenses, he being too poor to do it himself. In the course of a few weeks several hundred agreed to advance the sum, and Mr. Bennett announced his intention of going. On July 30, 1881, in company with Mr. D. C. Bridges, he sailed, and was absent just one year.

On his arrival at San Francisco from his journey, he was greeted with many honors, and receptions and banquets were held in the various cities passed through on his way to his home, at which he arrived in perfect apparent health and strength on the 30th of last July.

Besides attending to his editorial duties, conducting a large correspondence, and writing the books named, Mr. Bennett found time to write several large volumes, among which are "The World's Sages," "Champions of the Church," "From Behind the Bars" (written while awaiting Hayes's decision on his application for pardon, in Ludlow-Street Jail), "Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories," etc., "Interrogatories to Jehovah," and conducted two debates in his paper, both of which make large volumes, one being with the Rev. G. H. Humphrey, the other with Mr. G. M. Mair, besides innumerable tracts. He was an indefatigable worker, rising at four o'clock nearly every morning and laboring till late at night. His writing has often been compared to Voltaire's. He has an easy, flowing style, plain, and to the point. He was an Evolutionist and Agnostic, and saw enough to convince him that Spiritualism is true, and that this life is not all there is of man. He was kind and genial, full of fun, and at 63 felt, as he has often said, as young as he ever was. Among business acquaintances his word was as good as his bond. He was a good husband, a warm friend, and an implacable foe to what he considered wrong. Honesty in dealing and truthfulness of expression were the two prominent traits of the man. As the Infidel, the opponent of Christianity, the hater of shams, the exposer of priestly frauds, the detester of superstition, the destroyer of dogmas, the crucifier of creeds, he was severe and uncompromising. He was an Iconoclast. With him the whole Christian scheme was false, and all that is false must go. As the advocate of human rights, of mental and physical freedom, he was fearless, and would sooner walk to the dungeon or the stake than abate one jot or tittle of his claims for liberty. His writings abound with eloquent appeals for the cramped and chained of earth's poorest people—the creed-bound slaves of a false theology. In his way he was a deep philosopher. While not possessing a college degree, he was widely read in all the philosophies and reforms of past and present. He was thoroughly familiar with all the arguments of the church, and able to meet them with the truth as known to science. He was an able debater and brought volumes of facts together. When he touched a subject he exhausted it. If he was voluminous he was also thorough. One of his books is a compendium of all the facts known on the subject, and in his practical way he makes his points so plain that none can err or fail in understanding him.

Illness and Death.

During his absence changes had been made in the holders of the building in which he had his office, so that he deemed it best to make a change, and rented the premises now occupied by the TRUTH SEEKER. In fitting up the place the painter he engaged proved to be a worthless fellow, not keeping his engagement. And as no other could be procured, Mr. Bennett, with his usual disregard of himself, pulled off his coat, and worked for several hours at that, which gave him a slight cold, and, as some think, helped to poison his system through absorption of lead. But he attended to the duties of his office regularly for several weeks, and no one, least of all himself, thought it would terminate so sadly and irremediably as it has done. On Friday, Dec. 1st., he came to the office, bringing with him the last three pages of manuscript of Around the World he ever wrote. In response to the solicitous inquiries of the writer and his other employees, he said he did not feel well and thought he would go home and rest, and finish his writing the next day. He went to his home and soon after arriving there complained of feeling weak, and was helped in his bed by his wife.

Up to this time he had had no medical attendance, relying on his own considerable skill for such slight remedies as he thought necessary, but now it was felt to be imperativ, and Dr. E. Guernsey, of 18 West 23d street, one of the very best homeopathic physicians in the city, was called, who pronounced the disease to be gastric fever. Mrs. Bennett was unremitting in her attentions, and nursed her husband through the sad days and nights he lay stricken, never leaving him, and all that affection and medical skill could do was done. No thought was entertained other than that he would soon be up again. Gastric fever is a painful disease, but in response to questions he said he was not in much pain, only he felt a fulness in the chest, which he wished could be relieved. On Sunday he was about the same, lying still and taking but little notice of things around him, except to occasionally giv utterance to his solicitude concerning his wife, and speaking of his incompleted book, which he had struggled so hard to finish. Occasionally his mind wandered. He was felt to be very sick, and the doctor was with him several times. Monday he lay in a half conscious state, but knew the friends whose duties and affections called them to his bedside. But he grew worse. The night was passed in anxiety by his wife and friends, and the coming of the day was watched with fear. The fulness in his chest increased, and the physician confided to his watchers that his heart was affected. He lay all Tuesday with but little change. He knew his friends, but could only make it known by a half-choked whisper. Tuesday night at 10 o'clock he suffered a stroke and sank into a totally unconscious state. The physician who was by him took his weeping wife aside and told her that unless some great change took place shortly her husband must die. All night long he lay in the same way. The agonizingly hoped for change did not occur. The great brain was paralyzed forever. With the coming of the morning his absent personal friends were summoned by telegraph, and they came but to see him die as peacefully as a child goes to sleep. He but stopped breathing.

Throughout all his conscious moments he bore himself as became the great hero he was. His solicitude was for his loved and loving wife, not for himself. If he thought of death, he did not make it known. No man ever journeyed to the end more tranquilly. No soldier was braver, no patriot more undaunted, no statesman more assured, no sage more untroubled. His memory will long liv in the hearts of his friends; his monument will endure in the magnificent works wrought by his own hand for the enlightenment and disenthralment of the world.

Others abler will pay more eloquent tributes to his greatness, but no grief can be so deep as that of the wife left lonely, and none more sincere and heartfelt than that of his stricken personal friends and employees. Time may partially heal the wounds, but it can never bring to us another D. M. Bennett.

If longer life had been vouchsafed to him it would hav been devoted to propagating the doctrin of modern Infidelity and in freeing the race from the domination of theology. He saw the evils which Christianity has wrought, and understood the dangers to our country its control would entail. While he lived he combated error and spread the truth, and when he died he was willing to take whatever nature had in store for him. During life the friends of liberty had in him a host; by his death the immortals hav one more to share their crown.

The Obsequies.

The news of the death was telegraphed to the leading Liberals of the country, and such brief announcement was made in the paper as we could. The unexpected event brought tears to the eyes of hundreds. It could hardly be comprehended. Every one expressed their grief. Especially were the Boston friends of Mr. Bennett prompt to give voice to their sorrow at the irreparable loss to the Liberals of the country and the world. A meeting was called at Paine Hall, and a delegation chosen to attend the funeral, composed of J. P. Mendum, Lucy H. Colman, W. S. Bell, and Josephine Tilton. Ernest Mendum accompanied his father, who is in feeble health. Mr. Seaver was too ill to come, and W. S. Bell was prostrated at the last moment, and Dr. J. H. Swain came in his place. Mr. Chainey sent his heartfelt sympathy and made his Sunday lecture a memorial service, as did also Moses Hull in Erie.

Here in New York friends were most kind and sympathetic, all uniting in offering their services in making the sorrowful but necessary preparations for burying the friend of thousands.

The remains were laid at rest in his home, watched by the tearful relatives, until Sunday, the day appointed for the last expression of sorrow and final rendering of service to the dead. This office was closed and none but the most important business transacted.

Sunday morning the remains were taken to the German Masonic Temple, 220 East 15th street, the hall where the Liberal Club holds its sessions, the house being too small to accommodate the hundreds of friends who came to attend. The pall-bearers were Dr. E. B. Foote, Dr. J. H. Swain, Samuel Stoddart, J. D. Center, Henry Stone, and H. B. Brown. The hall was crowded to its utmost limits, among the more prominent New York friends being Courtlandt Palmer, S. P. Andrews, Daniel E. Ryan, Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., Dr. E B. Foote, Jr., E. W. Chamberlain, Dr. Wm. McLaury, Louis Post, T. C. Leland. T. F. Leslie, and hundreds of others personally unknown to the writer. Among those from a distance were J. P. Mendum, Lucy N. Colman, Dr. J. H. Swain, Josephine Tilton, Hiram Wilbur, Capt. Geo. W. Loyd, H. J. Purdy, A. L. Gardner, Mr. Cook, and many others who did not make themselves known.

The body was met at the entrance to the temple by E. W. Chamberlain, chief usher, and the committee of arrangements, consisting of Daniel E. Ryan, E. A. Booth, and E. M. Macdonald. It was borne into the center of the hall and placed upon a large catafalque draped with a heavy black pall. A profusion of floral tributes were upon the casket, sent by the deceased's friends. The Drs. Foote sent an exquisite pillow of roses and camelias with the motto "The Truth Seeker at Rest," in purple flowers. Another beautiful pillow of white roses and calla lilies was sent by the employes of the office, who all loved Mr. Bennett with a devoted affection. Mr. Ryan laid a crown upon the casket as his offering. Others sent beautiful tributes, among them a broken column and sheaf of wheat with a sickle thrust through it by Mrs. Harriet M. Allyn, and an anchor and wreath, by some unknown friends. The organ's solemn tones were hushed and the choir sang:

Cover him over with beautiful flowers;
Deck him with garlands, this brother of ours;
Lying so silent by night and by day,
Sleeping the years of his manhood away,

CHORUS—Deck him with garlands, this brother of ours,
Cover him over with beautiful flow'rs.

Give him the meed he has won in the past;
Give him the honors his future forecast;
Give him the chaplets he won in the strife;
Give him the laurels he lost with his life.

CHORUS—Deck him with garlands, etc.

Cover him over, yea, cover him o'er,
Husband and brother, he greets us no more;
Crown in our hearts this dead hero of ours;
Cover him over with beautiful flowers.

CHORUS—Deck him with garlands, etc.

At the conclusion of the hymn, which was taken from "The Truth Seeker Collection," Mr. S. P. Putnam read the following ode written for the occasion:

Into the silent grave
Thy flesh hath passed to change to other light;
But not thy spirit brave
Sinks from our hearts into that mortal night—

For it is like a star;
It glows supremely still with warmth and power;
Where truth and progress are Still art thou, quick as in life's choicest hour.

Death is the crowning touch;
It gives to earnest work its crystal flame;
It is no nightmare's clutch,
It is the gleaming stillness of grand aim.

The hero sleeps sublime
Upon the solemn hight of busy years,
While viewless hands of time
Weave radiant promise 'mid our blinding tears.

Life's deep is round us now,
The measureless expanse of human worth;
Deep unto deep doth flow
Of joy and grief making for love new birth.

Manhood's immortal grace
Is on thy brow and stars thy coffined dust;
Thy narrow resting-place
Is like a throne where reverence we must.

Truth was thy valiant sword;
Unsheathed thou kept'st it ever flashing bright;
Thou spok'st the living word,
Because a Seeker dauntless through the night.

Thy course is onward still;
In beating hearts of millions yet to be,
In the large hopes that thrill,
In all that poets sing and prophets see.

Thy task is finished quite,
But through the endless years it fruit shall grow;
Thy harvest's golden light
Flings its far wealth into the ages' glow.

Not hopeless do we stand;
Our grief but waters roots of deeper life;
And so new flowers expand
For laurel glories 'mid the future's strife.

We bring fresh flowers to thee,
Thou conqueror, to garland thy soft sleep;
Affection's tribute free
In beauty thus thy memory to keep.

The world rolls on, and we Go forth to tasks sublimer for thy zeal—
To sweeter liberty,
Because thou answered'st Freedom's dread appeal.

Within the living past
Thy restless spirit finds its peaceful state,
Whence mortal flesh is cast,
And thou art one with all the good and great.

Mr. Wakeman then gave the address, which is unsurpassed as a manly tribute to a departed brother. Its tender pathos often moved the audience to tears, and its strong words of hope did as much as may be done to soothe affection's wounds:

We are here, my friends, in obedience to an instinct as universal as our race, as eternal as time and love; for here is present the fear, the sorrow, the mystery of death. In every age and clime the human heart has responded to the instinct which makes the rude savage deposit with his dead his chief earthly treasure, which makes the barbarians rear over the remains of their dead the cairn or the pyramid, and which causes civilized men to enshrine their memories in the beautiful temple or the spendid tomb; by all these man tries to express his veneration for those whom he loved and honored. It is the burden and the test of every religion to respond worthily and nobly to this sacred and universal sentiment. Every religion has to heed its questions; every religion reveals its strength largely in proportion as it is able to answer them. What is death? What is, or shall be, the day of judgment? What is the immortality which can conquer this death? Those questions come down to us through all the vast processes of ages, from every stage of culture. If we could change religion, they would still remain to be answered. If science takes the place of theology, it assumes only the burden of a more truthful and worthy answer. We are here in this singular position, standing beside a brother who has fallen in the strife of life, and who has bid defiance to the past, and has demanded, with all his soul, that those questions shall receive a different answer from that which the past has given them; we are here to speak his voice, to utter the deepest thoughts of his heart. What is death, in the view of our fallen brother?

In its physical aspect, science gives the answer that he would give. Death in the past has been a terror, a fear, a horror; the hobgoblins of despair have flitted through its domain and covered all with the gloom of terror. To our brother that fear of death was one of the great curses that rested upon mankind which he wished to remove. He had no fear of death. He knew, as science teaches, that it is simply the ceasing to live; that it is simply the fact that the physical system, worn or broken, can no longer continue the process of life and its manifestation; he knew that to die was, in nature, nothing more than to be born, that it was a natural process, and that those who reach it, reach it as though they were but children, to fall asleep again in the arms of nature from which they sprung. He banished all of that gloom of the past from death; he threw sunshine around the end of life; he refused all the feeling which has formerly rested as a curse in connection with the simple end of life. He has, in a beautiful expression of his own, suitable to occasions of this kind, put his thoughts upon record, and I can do no better than express that feeling in his own words. He says:

If at death our consciousness, as many believe, ceases; if our individuality comes to an end; if the gases and fluids of which our organizations are composed gradually disintegrate and slowly return to the fountains and sources of nature whence they came, if we gently fall into a quiet, peaceful sleep which knows no waking; we are at least free from pain, anguish, care, and anxiety, and all ills that may hav a real or fancied existence. If, on the other hand, as others again believe, it is in the economy of the universe that we have a continued existence, that this is not all there is of us, that we pass from a comparatively crude state to one more subtle and refined, from a rudimental, transitory, imperfect life to one ultimate, permanent, and beautiful, we assuredly have nothing to fear. If we have a continued existence there are no just grounds for apprehending that that other life has any more terrors than this. We will doubtless find there the same deity that exists here—possessing no more vindictiveness, no more cruelty, but the same kindness and love. We will meet the same universe with the same powers, the same forces and laws. There cannot be any other. So, whichever belief proves true, we have little to fear in the future. Whichever is correct, it is all right with our departed friend who now has left us.

Let us look upon death, not with apprehension and dread, but as it really is, a necessary change in Nature. Life and death are essential conditions and mutually follow and sustain each other. Flowers, plants, animals, and men are dying each moment, and all these are furnishing the elements, the material, for new forms of life. One form of life is constantly being built up of other forms. The constituents of small plants, upon decaying, enter into larger ones; large animals and large fishes are composed of the elements of smaller varieties, and the human race is made up of both the vegetable and the animal kingdoms. In the great law of compensation which abounds throughout all nature there is absolutely no waste nor loss of life-force or principle. Death is essential to life and equally forms a part of the laws of the universe. Let it then be regarded, not as an enemy, but rather as a friend. After the toils of a wearisome day are over, nought is so grateful as repose, nought so sweet as a peaceful, quiet sleep. At the close of a wearisome life we pass into such a rest, such an undisturbed repose. Cares, anxieties, toils, and troubles are superseded by a state of rest. This short word, rest, is full of meaning—full of consolation. To him oppressed with care, with distress, anguish, and pain, how sweet is rest. This word is replete with bliss; more suggestive of a perfect freedom from trouble and sorrow and ills of all kinds, than any other word in our language. Our departed brother is now at rest.

That is a purely physical answer to the question, and a pure, simple, and natural conception, which is consolation in itself. But our brother by no means would stop there. No high religion, no high aspect of life of any kind, in the human economy or in the wealth of human nature, ever stops there. One step further. What is that immortality that can conquer this death? That is the question which always follows the first answer, as to what death itself may be. Two answers have stood before all time; two answers that are as prominent to-day as ever. One is, that the individual, personal consciousness continues; that this life process, in some way not as yet fully known to us, continues in a future life, in some way and form that we as yet but little know. The next answer is, that there is a corporate immortality on earth, which receives all of life's influence, power, and goodness; that the works of a man continue in the human race forever and ever in an indefinite future. Both of these immortalities, and especially the latter, have strengthened during the last hundred years. Both have been substantially adopted by the higher races of mankind. Both were cherished and believed in by our departed brother.

In the first immortality he was induced, from early youth, to look for consolation and encouragement in life; and in his later years he felt that more and more the proofs were gathering around him by which that feeling of hope, consolation, and encouragement could be sustained. He was willing to believe, if it can be shown by actual fact, that that process of life and of personal consciousness does not die with the human frame.

He made a discrimination between the dogmas of the past, which were the curse of mankind and will be swept away, and the hope which, under the laws of science, he could cherish. The continuation of the process of life he distinguished from that theology which had gathered around it and made it a curse instead of a blessing. In that aspect of life we may, his friends may, all those who can may, believe that his own personal consciousness remains; that that power which here was such an unwearied laborer in the right and the good still continues its processes and follows its development in a higher sphere, under better circumstances, and with those who know better how to appreciate the motives and the life of their colaborer who has left us. He was cheered by the assurance that from all the analogies that we know of life, the best possible preparation for any such higher state, the only guaranty of a better and higher life, is a life of fearless, useful, honest activity on earth; and that right, that deed, as I may call it, that title clear, to the higher mansion—if one there be—our departed brother lying here we may feel sure has received. That beautiful vision at the close of the second part of Faust, where the angel bands defeat all the enemies of human hope, happiness, and bliss, where they descend and rescue the pursued wanderer of the earth, where they bear him aloft, ever more to dwell with the angels—that beautiful passage I know is too familiar to repeat to you, but it embodies the truth that in every immortality of every religion and of every age, the fearless, honest, useful man, who has served his term of life, may be sure of his reception above; that no power can defeat that eternal law of right and wrong which demands his continuance as long as time exists.

One thing more, to our brother, was equally clear, and that is, that as the human race advanced there was an immortality—not, perhaps, of personal consciousness, but of personal effort, personal good, personal influence, that continues as the better part of man, the unselfish part, the part that is truly good and beneficent on earth; and he felt assured, more and more as he grew in years, that that kind of immortality known as the corporate or positive immortality was equally true, was certainly beneficent, and was a manifest reality.

In that discourse from which I have read a few lines let me read what would bear upon that view of immortality:

But, friends, let us remember that all that is noble and beautiful is secure from the moldering touch of time. While what appears like the remorseless hand of death is robbing us of our most valued treasures, let us not forget that

"Bright things never die,
Even though they fade,
Beauty and minstrelsy
Deathless were made."

In one sense, my friends, we do not die—we cannot die. No noble act, no generous impulse of the heart, has ever perished.

"There is no death in this wide world,
But one eternal scene of change;
The flag of life is never furled,
It only taketh wider range."

"There is no death; the senseless clay lives in the waving corn;
Thus earth, a mighty sepulcher, gives up its dead, nor can
It hold them back; each water drop and grain of sand is borne
Alternate into plant, or noble brute, or noblest man."

Good friends, let us not lament the inevitable. We are all in the arms of Mother Nature. The universe has amply provided for all the wants and all the conditions of mankind, in life and in death. Let all that is noble and worthy in the lives and characters of those we hold most dear be fondly cherished in our heart of hearts. Let the same be held in sacred remembrance as an impetus—an inspiration—to those of us who remain behind for awhile, but soon to follow after.

"Powers depart,
Possessions vanish and opinions change,
And passions hold a fluctuating seat,
But, by the storms of circumstance unshaken,
And subject neither to eclipse nor wane,
Duty exists; immutably survives."

How can I express more eloquently and beautifully the existence of this corporate immortality of mankind? He cherished that hope; it was the impulse of his life and of his sacrifices. He believed in that sacred word, duty. He did not labor merely for his own personal satisfaction, or aggrandizement, or pleasure, but he felt that impulse back of him that enabled him to do his duty, and to make a stand all alone, fearlessly and without regard to consequences, which, in this day of comparative degeneracy, fits him to be honored by us as a hero. In view of this latter phase of immortality, this latter day of judgment, which grows stronger and stronger as the ages advance higher and higher, the duty is placed upon us of measuring this man, here and now, as far as we can. We must not see the life and memory of this man pass down into the future without some explanation that we can make now, as we, his friends and associates and relatives, stand around his mortal remains. The day of judgment must begin here and now. It may not end now—I feel sure that it will not—for as the years go on one after another, as the Truth Seeker rises stronger and stronger in this corporate immortality, those who have known him to despise will learn to honor him or to fear. The power of this man is but begun; that is my conviction. Let us cast our eye over his life and see.

In 1818, the 23d day of December, DeRobigne Mortimer Bennett was born, upon the shores of Otsego Lake, in New York. His parents, not wealthy, were farmers. They cherished their child, and they gave him all the advantages which such a neighborhood could command. While yet in his childhood one of his first and bitterest recollections was one of misfortune. His father failed in business, his farm was sold out, and one of the most painful recollections of our brother's life, and one which, let me say, I know too well how to appreciate, was the sad picture of seeing his mother in tears, while the little heir-looms, and the articles of furniture which she had made with her own hands, were sold to satisfy remorseless creditors. That first touch of misfortune undoubtedly gave him the feelings of sympathy which continued with him throughout his whole life, in the form of a tenderness of heart unusual among his class of people.

He worked at farm-work during his youth. He had the hope that he might rise to one of the learned professions and become a physician; but misfortune followed him. His father died, and his mother was unable to provide for him as she wished. During a visit to the Shakers at New Lebanon, N.Y., he was brought into connection with that community. They took a fancy to the youth, and he to them.

It seems that shortly after his father died, he drifted into the Shaker community, at about fifteen years of age. For thirteen years he was under their tuition and influence, and there was laid the second foundation, or stratum, of his character. He was among them always respected; he was a good boy; he did his work well, and he was promoted by them. More and more confidence was placed in his ability, industry, and faithfulness. He adopted their tenets, and he was placed in charge of their business departments, especially that of herbs. He became their physician. He studied medicine, though he took no title of doctor—a title he deserved, perhaps, more than thousands who take it, and he became their eclectic physician on becoming of age. In 1850, when he was about 33 years of age, it occurred to him and to several other young members of the community that that community was not the whole world; that there was within his own nature—that there was, just beyond the bounds of that community—something which it could never satisfy. He mentioned his feelings to one of his colaborers, a young lady in charge of the children who came to the community for education, and who was respected among them as one of their leaders—a teacher named Mary Wicks; and, to his surprise, he learned that she had arrived at a similar state of skepticism as to the completeness and fulness of the Shaker tenets. The result was that they concluded to try the world together; to leave their little Eden and seek another in the world beyond, perhaps without a Providence to guide whither they should go. They left the community with two others, and to the great horror, doubtless, of their good Shaker friends, they perpetrated matrimony, were duly married, made their peace afterward with their Shaker brethren, and started out into the world to make their fortunes or suffer such fate as might await them there.

Mr. Bennett had been skilled in the nursery business, and he tried that. He was also skilled in medicine, and from one trial to another he went until finally, at Cincinnati, he established a large drug business. He acquired a very considerable property; he had met with worldly success. In an unfortunate hour, as it seemed, though perhaps it proved much the best in the end, he sold out his business and invested in other mercantile speculations.

The times changed, and the conditions of life upon which he had based his venture were swept from under him. Thousands failed, and he failed with them. Then followed one step after another to recuperate; he did not meet with the same success, however, but with much disappointment. But during this time his mental growth had received a singular development. The early piety of his childhood, where he had learned chapter after chapter by heart, to satisfy the Sunday-school teachers under whom his mother placed him, and the inspirational development of faculties which he had received among the Shakers, met, in the outer world, a rude contrast. It seemed to him perfectly clear that those tenets and that inspiration were not the whole of life, and that they did not solve the world as it stood before him then. He was led to inquire as to the fundamental validity of those teachings. In 1848 he met with a book which has been the guide and opener of the mind and heart to, I may say, millions—Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." He read that book night and day, with his Bible, with prayer, and with anxiety unspeakable; yes, with prayer. But let me tell you that the Freethought ranks have received no deeper, no more precious souls, than those who have come into them from that singular rebellion of inspiration which was started in England by George Fox, the leader of the Quakers. The Shaker community was but the culmination of Quakerism—it was Quakerism brought to its logical results. They believed in the actual continuance of inspiration; they acted as the representatives of the principle of spiritual life which flowed from the divinity itself. They received their divine afflatus at first hand. They went not only to the Bible for inspiration—they went to the divine nature itself, and took part of its own heart into theirs. That was a basis of character very powerful; for a man that is founded upon his God, the highest God that he knows, is simply invincible while he has life; you may kill him, you may crush him out, but you never can conquer him, because you never can conquer that fundamental belief in the right. It is that unswerving conviction which makes him the king, beyond all other men, in regard to his own life, belief and conduct. That invincible nature which comes from that doctrine of direct community with God, taught by the Quaker brethren, has given us the most fearless, the most honest, the most sacrificing and the most beneficent reformers that mankind has ever known. You cannot understand Thomas Paine unless you know that at first, and in a very important sense to the last, he was a Quaker; you cannot understand our departed brother unless you know that he spent his youth in the midst of a feeling of direct communication with the Almighty. The greatest men of our times have taken their pre-eminent conviction of soul from this element of which I speak. To that more than to anything else we owe the abolition of the slave trade and of slavery in England and in this country. They have a belief in an eternal God, they have a conception of an eternal sense of right in the human heart, and they have made others feel it, whether they would or no, through social changes and political revolutions.

Of that stock he was, and upon that foundation, built upon the eternal, our brother rested himself; and when the storms came and the winds blew, they might as well have struck, like the roaring waves, against the ledges on the rock-bound coast of our land. Immovable as a mountain, strong as the spirit of the Almighty God incarnated in man, was that sense and conviction of right which he had inherited, and to which he would sacrifice life and everything before he could prove false to it for a moment.

In that spirit he pursued his inquiry into the history of the dogmas and traditions of the past. He gave his honest verdict upon them—that they are false! and that was enough for him. He saw that in their influence upon mankind they were obstructiv and destructiv and a curse, and that at this stage of the world's progression, when they were no longer credible, they should be, with all reverence, perhaps, but nevertheless peacefully and quietly, buried in the history of the past. He was made to feel the necessity of that by an incident. In his inquiries he had questioned the use and authority of prayer, and the clergy in the neighborhood with whom he had consulted, sprung upon him like a pack of wolves. They began to traduce him, they tried to crush him out. They said he had a bad influence in the neighborhood; they read lectures against him in the pulpit, and when he sought, through the papers which published the sermons of his opponents, to get printed some little statement of his own, written in plain, homespun, farmer's style, would they print it? No. They tried to break up his business, and then he said: "I will stand this no longer. The last dollar that I can earn shall be spent in printing what I believe to be the truth, and these neighbors, the people around me, shall know what manner of man I am." And so he started to print, and his little tracts were scattered from house to house, even thrown into door yards, for he meant to be heard. The days went on. They tried to suppress him more and more. Finally they said, "Who are you?" He said, "I am a truth seeker, and I must know what is true."

Some time after this he started a little paper at Paris, Ill., and called it THE TRUTH SEEKER. Whether it could continue or not seemed doubtful. There was nothing to sustain it except his own indomitable will and his slight earnings, but he printed what he saw to be the truth, and defied the world.

He studied more and more. He saved his money to buy books to study out the truth and to make others see it, because that was the joy and pride of his life. The paper was received a little more favorably. A few earnest friends gathered around him, and they said, "It shall not die." They said it was worthy of a higher place; that it was a candle not to be put under a bushel, but to be set on a hill. They told him to take that paper to New York, or to some great city, and start it there, and to speak just in his own plain, homespun style, to what President Lincoln nobly called "the plain people of the country." That style which has been made immortal by Thomas Paine, which made Cobbett popular with the middle classes of England; which to-day makes Charles Bradlaugh the peer in influence of any man on earth, that was the style of this man. He had more honesty at the bottom, more sympathy and good feeling, more good nature and pure humanity in his heart than any other person; and that feeling and that human sympathy gave him his power to express himself so that he must be heard. That power is the attractive influence, but back of it lies that wealth of sincerity and conviction and human sympathy which is better than all the learning of the schools and all the wealth and power of the learned institutions of society. That paper was placed in New York, and there was then also doubt as to its continuance. Were there any people here who would listen to him? But few. Was the enterprise to be broken down? It looked like it for a while. But that same quality of plain, honest speech and perseverence sustained him; a few people in New York rallied around him, determined to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a permanent institution in the thought and progress of American life. As a Liberal, an Infidel, a Freethinker, he soon attained power, simply because of the instinct to do right and to speak aright.

But he was not only called to speak for liberty but to suffer.

He attended the conventions of the Liberal societies, notably one in Watkins, in 1878. He acquired such pre-eminence that his enemies, interested in supporting superstition, thought it was necessary that he should be "crushed out," and they determined that it should be done. They commenced a persecution for that purpoee, and upon that turned, to a great extent, the future of his life, and, it may be, the future of American liberty. It seemed to be a trifling thing, the passage of those laws by which the power of commencing public prosecution for criminal acts was taken out of the hands of the officers of the law, responsible to the people, elected and paid by the people, and passed into the hands of a few amateur societies, gotten up by church-members. It seemed a trivial thing, and the motives for which those steps were professed to have been taken were so pure and good that it seemed that no one, except out of pure wickedness, could object to the new proceedings which were introduced into our republican law; but Mr. Bennett saw at once that what was apparently simple and pure was an engine which could be used for purposes of oppression, persecution, and wrong; he saw that it was reproducing in this country an ecclesiastical power which would give effects to the beliefs, simply, of those who cherished the older superstitions and the interests connected with them. He saw that if it was continued it was a power for persecution without limit, and that it must end in the destruction of the distinction between the state and national authority in the prosecution of crime, and place both under ecclesiastical methods; that it meant the union of church and state instead of a purely secular government. He was among the first to raise the cry of alarm and of warning. Then they said, "Certainly this man must be crushed out." They sent their "Agent" to his office, in 1877, to hunt over his books to see if they could not find something upon which they could trap him. They found two or three little pamphlets that they tried to make a prosecution lie upon, and he was arrested. But when the matter was laid before the authorities at Washington they said it would not do; it was too thin. Then, you may remember how he went to Watkins Glen in 1878. We held our convention, and at one of the booths held around the stand there was for sale a little pamphlet, a trifling and unimportant thing, and Mr. Bennett, who had been watched, in the kindness of his heart, offered to make sales for a young lady attending one of these booths, who had to be absent for a short time. Thus one of the pamphlets was bought of Mr. Bennett. Two or three persons who were engaged with him in selling at that booth were immediately arrested and brought before a police justice, where they were held to bail to answer an indictment before the grand jury. I remember walking with Mr. Bennett on that occasion to his hotel, and I never shall forget the feeling of humiliation and indignation with which that man was charged. Said he, repeating it over and over again, "Can this be all there is of American liberty?" He said, "As long as I live I will fight this spirit of persecution, and I will make the church see that it can never control this country again; as soon as I get back to New York I will publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER a notice that I will sell that pamphlet in the regular course of my business if it costs me my life." He came back to New York, and the first thing he did was to put in THE TRUTH SEEKER a notice that that pamphlet was for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and he said, "If it means a prison, then a prison let it be." Those were his words. A gauntlet thrown down in that way had to be taken up, and in a short time a decoy letter came from the same "Agent" who had formerly gone through his office to see if he could not find something upon which he might be arrested. He was arrested, he gave bail, he was tried. The proceedings of that trial are published. They say stronger than any words of mine: When the innocent is convicted the judge and law are condemned.

The judge was swift to rule against him, swift to do him injustice as it seemed to us, and to all fair-minded men, as I believe. He was tried with apparent kindness, but the velvet paw scarcely concealed the claws of ecclesiastical persecution. Back of the prosecutor sat the agent of this ecclesiastical society, and back of him sat the leading representative of ecclesiastical fanaticism in this country. In front of those two sat the public prosecutor, one specially employed for this purpose, who did not represent either his principal in office or the power that directed the public prosecutions at Washington, for both of those officials had said that this book was not within the meaning of the law under which the prosecution was attempted. Thus in line sat those three, and the spirit of religious bigotry and intolerance passed from this fanatic through the agent and the public prosecutor, up to the judge, who ruled invariably against the accused. Those were the influences which underlay and controled that whole prosecution. I am sorry for the honor of American jurisprudence, but the stigma of that and similar trials in our United States courts will in time be only second to that of the trials held by Judge Jeffries in England. Time and Liberty will place them where they belong. The record of the American Inquisition will be written yet. Let its minions remember that the immortality of infamy that awaits them is assured by the very laws of progress.

I was not Mr. Bennett's lawyer. I was his friend and bail on that trial; but I believe that his counsel did everything that could hav been done, and I believe that it was a predetermined fact that that conviction had to be had, and that everything was conducted to that end with such unsparing disregard of the ordinary rules of justice, law, and fair dealing that no other result than that arrived at could have been expected. You know he tried to appeal; he tried to get three judges to reverse the decision of one, but in vain.

The very same ground which had been held sufficient on a similar trial in England, in the Bradlaugh case, was overruled directly by the court here. He expected that that ground would be sustained in this country as in England. He sought an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, which could only be done by a divided bench. The bench would not divide. He then appealed to the chief justice of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus. The judge held that the only question of constitutional law which could be thus brought up had been passed upon unanimously, by the Supreme Court, and so the writ could not be granted. I state this here because it has been said that he did not exhaust all the remedies of the law. I want to remove that idea and suspicion in regard to our departed brother, and I say that he did everything that was possible to be done to let the law vindicate itself, that the course of justice in these United States might be able to vindicate itself, and remove the stain and stigma which has fallen upon it by reason of that prosecution

He failed. You know how he went to prison. You know how patiently he tried to bear that terrible crushing weight which falls upon the sensitive heart when it feels the prison doors close behind it. For seven weeks or two months he endured the severest prison discipline, and at the end of that time it became perfectly apparent that if that course of discipline was continued he would be a dead man in a short time. I cannot express my feelings of abhorrence at the ignorance of the true nature of this man which led some to suppose that he could simulate an illness which was not real. He had then, while in prison, a touch of this same disease which has placed him before us today. The first touch, the first breaking down of his constitution, was there. His physician recommended that he should be sent to the hospital, and that he should be allowed recreation for his mind, by being permitted to write and compose books, if he chose. They said that unless this man is removed from the strict discipline of the prison and given some occupation for his mind he will be crushed and die. Under that view he was taken to the hospital; and he commenced to write a great work in prison. It is not so much an original work as a compilation, and you know how faithfully he did it. The book is published in two large volumes—"The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." It is an admirable resume of the progress of thought in past ages. That work enabled him to live; it occupied his thoughts and kept him from that stagnation and death which overtake men who are taken from their intellectual environments and reduced suddenly to enforced labor or inactivity. Imprisonment is not by any means the same to all men. It depends upon the degree of culture, upon the standard of life, and upon the associations and the habits of the individual as to what the punishment may be. To a man who is merely an animal, physical confinement is a very different thing from what it is to a man of large moral and intellectual nature; while to the first it may be a small punishment, to the latter it is often fatal. This great inequality is not regarded by our law, which seems to be made for brutes and to be largely executed by brutes.

Mr. Bennett left that prison, and you know how he was received at Chickering Hall, where thousands were turned away from the door who had come to do him honor. But few, however, in that large audience knew how deeply that man had suffered. From the moment that he went to that prison his heart was broken. His health began to fail, and his apparent good health since has been apparent, and nothing more. Silently, by one means or another, he has tried to fight it off. He went to Europe as a delegate of the Liberals of this country; he went around the world, but he carried that broken heart with him. He came home to write out the history of his travels, and as he came near its end, "What more remains?" he said; "this is my last work; I only hope I may liv to finish it; this is all I ever expect to do; I will then resign the labor of my life to others, and I charge upon you who will be selected as my successors that you continue the work I have begun, and keep alive THE TRUTH SEEKER that it may vindicate the position I have taken in behalf of intellectual and political liberty, and the emancipation of mankind from the slavery of superstition and priestcraft." He was a true soldier. The world knew the worst of him; that was the trouble. He was too sincere; what others merely think he might write down, and the small souls who were so far beneath him in purity of character that they could scarcely understand his nature were willing to pick up and scatter to the winds these loose thoughts, as if they were the whole of the man. Those who knew him knew better. A more childlike, tender, beautiful heart, it seemed to me, a man never carried. And that smile of his, so much like that of our old friend and former president of the Liberal Club, Horace Greeley. Why did it spring to his lips? It was often because he had a heart so tender that only in that way could he shield off the blows that would hav hit and wounded it.

My friends, this mask of dissumulation that civilization has thrown around us, it is well for us that we can wear it, but our brother was too sensitive; he felt keenly; he was too earnest, and that original education of his had make his heart almost as naked to the world as it was to his God. We must cherish the memory of him who thus has suffered more than we can think. We must cherish the memory of him who has fought for the

A Deadly Blow at Political Puritanism.

Amidst the general wreck caused by the political storms which raged all over the country during the months of October and November, there is one result which deserves, but has not yet received, the attention of those who study into the causes and consequences of things. It is the stunning, if not fatal, blow that has been given to what may be called political Puritanism.

The distinguishing idea of the Puritans of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and their descendants now, was and is that piety toward God, orthodoxy in belief, and good morals in eating, drinking, and wearing clothes, could all and only be put into a man's heart, head, or life by an act of the legislature. It grew out of the Pauline teaching that political government was an ordinance of God; that political officers—"the powers that be," and whosoever they might be, whether king or kaiser, are ordained of God, and are the divinely-authorized executors of the last will and testament of Jesus Christ, the king of nations, as that will is expressed in the Bible; that all wrong-doing, whether crimes, or vices, or unbelief, is a sin against God, or non-conformity to his law; and that the function of the civil magistrate, as the minister of God, is to restrain and punish such transgression or non-conformity.

Now, the American idea, embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, is the very reverse of all this. The founders of the republic held that civil government was not an ordinance of God, but a human agency, devised by man to secure the rights of man; that all government derives its just powers, not from God, but from the consent of the governed; that when from any cause a government fails to accomplish its only legitimate object of securing the rights of the governed, the people, who are the only source of lawful powér, hav not only the right, but it is their duty, to revolutionize and reform that government, and make it fulfil its mission—not by bloody insurrection against those in office, but in the more peaceful and effectual way of the ballot. The American idea is that as God is supreme and can attend to the interests of his own kingdom without the help of mortals, the main object of human law is the protection of the personal and property rights of the citizens; that all the sin it knows anything about is the sin against society, and that a large number of the follies and vices of human character, as they develop themselvs in life, should be left for correction to the censure of public opinion as it may be expressed through the mediums of the printing-press, and the free discussion of the platform. Personal habits, whether dressing ridiculously, drinking intoxicating liquors, using opium, tobacco, or other narcotics—all these and others belong to the individual, and can not be reached by law. If the law would undertake to prescribe to a citizen what he must eat, drink, or wear, what religious creed he must accept, how, when, and where he must say his prayers and worship God, government becomes a despotism, and the people become slaves. Yet this is political Puritanism. It makes the government protectiv and paternal. That is, to justify its oppression it keeps the people eternally in the swaddling bands of infancy, and constitutes the governing power a father whose duty is to pry into the private habits of his household, and, if wrong, punish them as sins committed against God. It is astonishing and humiliating to read the history of our ancestors when they were under the disciplin of political Puritanism in the seventeenth century, and see the abject bondage they were in, and how patiently they submitted to it. And it shows that religion, whether good or bad, has such an expulsiv and transforming power that it molds men into any shape of character.

But the government of the United States was set up as a protest against the Puritan and European idea that the civil magistrate was a father, and that the people were his unquestioning children. And when we remember that its founders had all been born and educated under this Puritan influence, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States look like divinely-inspired documents, a revelation from heaven, containing truths heretofore entirely unknown. No wonder the monarchs of Europe trembled on their thrones and felt them giving way at the declaration that all men were equal in political rights, and that governments derived all their authority, not from God and by his grace, as kings claim, but from the people, their sovereign will being made known by their ballots. These are revolutionary ideas, and they are at this moment doing their work by the slow but safe process of evolution in shaping the destinies of all the kingly governments on earth.

It was the un-American, officious, inquisitorial, and intermeddling political Puritanism which the people of Ohio, and especially the foreign element of her population, so effectually rebuked last October. The countrymen of Luther and of Calvin had been taught by these great reformers that the Jewish law of the Sabbath was not binding on the consciences and lives of Christians, but that all the days of the week were alike holy. The custom of their nativ land was, after the toil of the week was over, for the father of a family to take his wife and children to the beer-garden on Sunday, and there enjoy the innocent amusement of music and social intercourse with his neighbors. But on migrating to this "land of freedom," whose national Constitution is so purely secular that it knows no God, no religion, and no Sabbath, they find themselvs annoyed by state laws which interfere with their personal rights, and which giv a hypocritical sanctity to Sunday not required by the New Testament at all, and in opposition to the teaching and example of all the reformers of the sixteenth century. Roused into indignation by this attempt at persecution, they rebelled against the Puritan politicians and gave the state to the Democrats.

There was another large class of people in Ohio, besides the Germans, who were disgusted with the cant and duplicity of Gov. Foster in starting the project of getting up a day of fasting and prayer for the saving of Garfield's life. Foster is a mongrel Samaritan. That is to say, he ostensibly, and I may say ostentatiously, "fears the Lord, but really serves his own gods." He seems to hav thought that, as nearly all the clergy and church people are in the Republican party, it would be a good stroke of policy to scare away the lions (see 2 Kings, xvii.) that might intercept his way to a seat in the United States Senate, and therefore, to propitiate the Puritan sentiment, he suggests to the nation a day of prayer. Of course, at such a time as that, when the country was surging with excitement, the suggestion took; and the world, in the eighty-first year of the nineteenth century, witnessed the ridiculous spectacle of a nation of fifty millions of people down on its corporate knees at the same hour, praying the God of the universe, who is a god of law and order, that a miracle might be wrought by preventing a leaden bullet, fired by an assassin into the vitals of a living man, from killing him! Of course the Supreme Being, as might hav been expected beforehand, was not going to reverse all the laws of nature and dislocate all the machinery of the heavens and the earth, even to save the life of our beloved president; and so the bullet and the doctors did their work. Garfield died, and the corporation known as "the United States" became a laughing-stock to the rest of the world, and probably to a vast majority of the people themselvs who belonged to the corporation, and who were forced to go through this solemn mockery. To the honor of the governor of Texas, it must be said that he refused, officially, to take part in this childish pageant, believing that it was a national insult to the God of law to ask him to work a miracle.

But the Puritan philanthrophist and politician asks: "What can we do to stop the tide of intemperance and other bad habits of our people, which are injuring thousands of born and unborn human beings?" I answer, nothing by legislation. Bad personal habits, and especially those which are artificial and unnatural, can only be cured by reason and the study of the laws of heredity. Preach physiology and the laws of life and health to the people, beginning at the common school. Teach them the wholesome doctrin that the great power in the universe that works for righteousness has annexed suffering to transgression by a law which is irrepealable; that no violator of law, physical or moral, can go into a bankrupt court, and, by shedding a few tears of repentance, get another person to pay his indebtedness at the rate of a hundred cents on the dollar; but that he must himself pay the debt to the uttermost farthing. Show how the vicious indulgence of unnatural appetites destroys self-respect, forfeits the esteem of others, undermines manhood, and converts men into spent rascals, stamps their children with imbecility and waywardness in their mother's womb, and brings on premature disease and death. Cherish the sentiment of honor among young men, and make them too proud to do a mean act. Teach the duty of self-reliance in the grand struggle of life, and the survival only of those who display wisdom and energy of character. This is the kind of instruction that the world needs in order to make men erect in their walk and free, instead of broken-backed slaves to sin and shame. But it is impossible, from the nature of man, to do it by legislation.

If the Republicans two years hence shall place the general government in the hands of the Democrats, as they hav this year entrusted the majority of the state governments, I express the hope of thousands of our most intelligent and upright citizens, that they will fall back upon the true Jeffersonian principles of the Constitution in regard to the proper relation between the state and the church, and banish political Puritanism from our public affairs, root and branch, and thus do for the honor of Christ what the church has never done—vindicate his saying that his kingdom is not of this world. Political Puritanism is the fly in our apothecary's pot of ointment which sends forth a stinking savor into the nostrils of all enlightened lovers of their country. It is an anomaly in our free and secular government. It is a nuisance and hypocrisy which ought to be abated.

Prof. Haeckel on Darwin.

In Nature appears a report of the remarkable address given by Prof. Haeckel at the recent Eisenach meeting of the German Association of Naturalists on the theories of Darwin, Goethe, and Lamarck. The address is mainly devoted to Darwin and Darwinism, and of both, we need scarcely say, Prof. Haeckel has the highest estimate. He said:

"When, five months ago, the sad intelligence reached us by telegraph from England that on April 19th Charles Darwin had concluded his life of rich activity there thrilled with rare unanimity through the whole scientific world the feeling of an irreparable loss. Not only did the innumerable adherents and scholars of the great naturalist lament the decease of the head master who had guided them, but even the most esteemed of his opponents had to confess that one of the most significant and influential spirits af the century had departed. This universal sentiment found its most eloquent expression in the fact that immediately after his death the English newspapers of all parties, and pre-eminently his Conservativ opponents, demanded that the burial-place of the deceased should be in the Valhalla of Great Britain, the national Temple of Fame, Westminster Abbey; and there, in point of fact, he found his last resting-place by the side of the kindred-minded Newton. In no country of the world, however, England not excepted, has the reforming doctrin of Darwin met with so much living interest or evoked such a storm of writings, for and against, as in Germany. It is, therefore, only a debt of honor we pay if at this year's assembly of German naturalists and physicians we gratefully call to remembance the mighty genius who has departed, and bring home to our minds the loftiness of the theory of nature to which he has elevated us. And what place in the world could be more appropriate for rendering this service of thanks than Eisenach, with its Wartburg, this stronghold of free inquiry and free opinion! As in this sacred spot 360 years ago Martin Luther, by his reform of the church in its head and members, introduced a new era in the history of civilization, so in our days has Charles Darwin, by his reform of the doctrin of development, constrained the whole perception, thought, and volition of mankind into new and higher courses. It is true that personally, both in his character and influence, Darwin has more affinity to the meek and mild Melancthon than to the powerful and inspired Luther. In the scope and importance, however, of their great work of reformation the two cases were entirely parallel, and in both the success marks a new epoch in the development of the human mind. Consider, first, the irrefragable fact of the unexampled success which Darwin's reform of science has achieved in the short space of twenty-three years, for never before since the beginning of human science has any new theory penetrated so deeply to the foundation of the whole domain of knowledge or so deeply affected the most cherished personal convictions of individual students; never before has a new theory called forth such vehement opposition, and so completely overcome it in such short time. The depicture of the astounding revolution which Darwin has accomplished in the minds of men in their entire view of nature and conception of the world will form an interesting chapter in the future history of the doctrin of development."

Describing a visit which he paid to the late Mr. Darwin in 1866, Prof. Haeckel says:

"In Darwin's own carriage, which he had thoughtfully sent for my convenience to the railway station, I drove one sunny morning in October through the graceful, hilly landscape of Kent, which, with the checkered foliage of its woods, with its stretches of purple heath, yellow broom, and evergreen oaks, was arrayed in the fairest autumnal dress. As the carriage drew up in front of Darwin's pleasant country-house, clad in a vesture of ivy and embowered in elms, there stepped out to meet me from the shady porch, overgrown with creeping plants, the great naturalist himself, a tall and venerable figure with the broad shoulders of an atlas supporting a world of thoughts, his Jupiter-like forehead highly and broadly arched, as in the case of Goethe, and deeply furrowed by the plow of mental labor; his kindly, mild eyes looking forth under the shadow of prominent brows, his amiable mouth surrounded by a copious silver-white beard. The cordial, prepossessing expression of the whole face, the gentle, mild voice, the slow, deliberate utterance, the natural and naive train of ideas which marked his conversation, captivated my whole heart in the first hour of our meeting, just as his great work had formerly, on my first reading it, taken my whole understanding by storm. I fancied a lofty world-sage out of Hellenic antiquity—a Socrates or Aristotle—stood alive before me. Our conversation, of course, turned principally on the subject which lay nearest the hearts of both—on the progress and prospects of the history of development. Those prospects at that time, sixteen years ago, were bad enough, for the highest authorities had for the most part set themselvs against the new doctrins. With touching modesty, Darwin said that his whole work was but a weak attempt to explain in a natural way the origin of animal and vegetable species, and that he should not liv to see any noteworthy success following the experiment, the mountain of opposing prejudice being so high. He thought I had greatly overestimated his small merit, and that the high praise I had bestowed on it in my 'General Morphology' was far too exaggerated.

"We next came to speak of the numerous and violent attacks on his work, which were then in the ascendant. In the case of many of those pitiful botches one was, in fact, quite at a loss whether more to lament the want of understanding and judgment they showed or to giv the greater vent to the indignation one could not but feel at the arrogance and presumption of those miserable scribblers who pooh-poohed Darwin's ideas and bespattered his character. I had then, as on later occasions, repeatedly expressed my just scorn of the contemptible clan. Darwin smiled at this, and endeavored to calm me with the words, 'My dear young friend, believe me, one must hav compassion and forbearance with such poor creatures; the stream of truth they can only hold back for a passing instant, but never permanently stem.' In my later visits to Down in 1876 and 1879 I had the pleasure of being able to relate to Darwin the mighty progress which in the past intervals his doctrins had made in Germany. Their decisiv outburst happened more rapidly and more completely here with us than in England, for the reason chiefly that the power of social and religious prejudice is not nearly so strong here as among our cousins across the channel, who are better placed than ourselvs. Darwin was perfectly well aware of all this; though his knowledge of our language and literature was defectiv, as he often complained, yet he had the highest appreciation of our intellectual treasures."

Good as Far as It Goes.

The New York Advocate and several other papers hav recently interested their readers by discussing the propriety of allowing congregations to worship in Methodist churches who do not believe our doctrins. Few of these articles exhibit that spirit of Christian liberality which our age demands and enforces, and instead of convincing those who are searching for truth that we are intellectually able to defend our doctrins against any array of opposing forces, they are led to believe that it is still necessary for us to retire behind our physical bulwarks to prevent our people from hearing the doctrins of others, and deserting us for them. Of course, there should be a limit to our liberality; for instance, if a house has been dedicated to the worship of God, downright Infidelity should be precluded from parading its tenets in that house, but the doors should not be closed against any worshipers of God, even though they follow not with us in many important doctrins. If our people hav not the moral power to sit with impunity while adverse doctrins are flaunted in their faces, they are best but poor Methodists. The minister who fears the bold dash of a Robert Ingersoll has certainly been remiss in performing his obligations to his flock, for if Infidelity can overthrow in two or three lectures what the minister and his compeers hav been years in building up, it indicates that the training has been of an inferior kind. Alas! what more hav some congregations to depend upon, so far as the minister is concerned, than a few pathetic stories by which they hav been brought into the church and upon which they hav been nourished ever since? It seems to me that as the warfare is an intellectual and not a physical one, our people should learn from the pulpit a reason for the hope that is within them, and not only so, they should learn the reason why we reject the multifarious teachings of Infidelity, till each one can proudly stand amid the darkest storm

> And say to cold Ridicule and Scorn,
> "Pass on! I heed you not;
> Ye may pursue me till my form
> And being are forgot;
> Yet the spirit which you see,
> Undaunted by your wiles,
> Draws from its own nobility
> Its high-born smiles."

The lecture-rooms hav been frequently closed against Ingersoll, and if persons who hav charge of them feel inclined to shut them against such teachings it is perhaps nobody's business, yet I fail to see in such acts anything to call forth especial rejoicing from Christians. It is not even a sign of the progress of our principles, any more than the fact that doors hav been closed against us is evidence of the progress of Infidelity. I cannot be accused of undue sympathy with Infidelity, but I do object to a physical warfare to gain a spiritual victory. If Christianity cannot stand by reason against all the scoffs, ridicule, and intellectual animosity of its enemies, let it fall. Religion claims the right to exist simply because it has gained in the great contest and intellectual supremacy, and not because it has been physically able in certain districts to crush out its opponents. The true spirit of Christianity invites a thorough, honest investigation of the whole matter. "Come, let us reason together." No man is honest who closes his eyes upon either side of this conflict. The honest man's motto is not "Infidelity," it is not "Christianity," but it is "truth." He searches diligently till he finds the truth, and then inclines either to Infidelity or religion as truth directs. I will say in passing that I believe whoever investigates the whole matter will be intellectually religious, whether he ever has the manhood to liv up to his convictions or not. Our mode of warfare should not be to hide from our people the principles of those who oppose us, but boldly, with the sword of reason, whetted in truth, approach every error and sever it from their minds, remembering that even Infidels sometimes speak the truth, and hav in the past discovered to us some of the greatest beauties of our holy religion. We should never be afraid of the truth, by whomsoever spoken, for it cannot militate against anything that we should hold as an article of faith. The word of God, faithfully preached, properly expounded, and vigorously defended, will insure us the victory. (Rev.) Geo. B. Armstrong.

Ingersoll Defended by a Preacher.

From the St. Louis Republican.

Rev. Dr. Snyder delivered last evening to an intelligent, large, and attentiv audience a discourse upon the attitude of the church toward nineteenth century Infidelity and unbelief. He said that whatever people might think about the brilliant lecturer who had recently appeared in the city, no man of reason would fail to admit that the lecturer deserves consideration from the fact that he represents a vast and voiceless constituency. People do not flock to hear him on account of his eloquence, his wit, his sarcasm, but rather because he boldly givs expression to the fears, the hopes, and even the scorn of men and women who hav broken away from the popular faith. Bitter and merciless though this man be, he is the representativ and spokesman of a vast number of serious and conscientious people, as Bradlaugh is in England at the present day. With the man the lecturer had little to do; but people, Christians, could not afford to remain longer indifferent to the philosophy of which he is the prophet. Christians would be indeed short-sighted were they not alive to the reality of the existing difference between the church and a great mass of people. The old objection to the argument with Infidels, "These things hav been answered hundreds of times; they are all old," will no longer do. The popular faith was never so beset with enemies as now, and orthodoxy and Christianity never more needed doughty champions than it does now. Orthodoxy has its champions in Rev. Mr. Talmage and Judge Jeremiah Black, and they are inclosed in the armor of their faiths. Their method of fighting much resembles that of the celebrated knight, who made such fierce and warlike onslaughts upon the windmill. They wage their war as a forlorn hope. The speaker asked his hearers to take a look into theology to see in how far the celebrated modern Infidel is just and in what respect he is unjust. Through all the creeds, though they may differ in minor respects, run fundamental principles. They all agree that a three-fold deity created two weak persons, not for any benefit to themselvs, but simply for his own glory, and placed them in the way of a tempter who succeeded in bringing about their fall. They fell and the great God imposed upon them a transmissible curse which goes on from generation to generation, from age to age. The entire race must share the guilt of the single sin. To provide a remedy he offers to bear the whole measure of his own wrath and sends his only begotten son to bear the suffering.

Yet this theology maintains that while all men suffer for the original sin, but few hav aquired the grace given by the great expiation. The curse is universal, the blessing is restricted to a few. Then, again, God drowns the whole world, with the exception of a very few, as a punishment for offenses against him. But this great punishment does not interrupt the curse, and thousands are destined to be cast into the ocean of fire whence arise the unending wails of despair and pain. Such being theology, the speaker could not see how any man could avoid Calvin's logic. One link in that logical chain being broken could result only in the utter destruction of the orthodox philosophy. Against such a theology arises the protest of the thinking people of the age. What could man think of a merciful God who creates those people and who from the beginning knows they will fall, yet will curse them for doing so? That an intelligent being will swear to visit punishment upon the race of trangressors, yet visits his wrath upon his innocent son? What could they think of a good and merciful God creating a dismal dungeon called hell, where the transgressors will be punished not until the great suns burn out and die, not till the stain of the mortal crime is obliterated in the fiery ordeal, but forever and forever! What rational hope could there be under such a theology for the salvation of such men and women as Spinoza, George Eliot, Channing, John Stuart Mill, Emerson? The theology looks to the salvation only of those who profess faith in Christ. These people judge Christianity calmly, and calmly judging, calmly reject this theological system. The question is, Will sincerity of living and acting lead to salvation, or is it only necessary to hav accepted spiritually the atonement grace? If the former be true, then the doctrin of the necessity of accepting the grace given by the redemption is a superfluity. If the Atheist and the Infidel hav the same hope for salvation as the Christian, then Spinoza, Emerson, and George Eliot may be in heaven. Is it too much to say that this doctrin is repugnant to the conscience and to human understanding? Concerning the Bible, Ingersoll argues not kindly; but then it is a painful fact that the orthodox Christians hav not always been generous and just in their discussion of the book. If everything in the Bible from the beginning to the ending is to be regarded as infallibly inspired, as the religious meat and the religious gage for all peoples, then all Ingersoll says is pre-eminently just. The Bible does say that God made the world in six days; that he set apart the seventh for his own worship; that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still; that King David, murderer and adulterer, was a man after God's own heart; that Jonah remained for three days in the belly of the whale.

The Bible does justify moral actions far below the civilized ethics of modern times. It nowhere condemns bigamy or human slavery. If the decalog is to be regarded as the sole rule of life, and the sole gage of right and wrong, then Ingersoll is right in declaiming its defectivness. Believers in the Bible distort it to show there is no contradiction between Genesis and geology. Even if there be no contradiction, what does it prove for supernaturalism? It has been attempted to maintain a system of geology and science upon a Bible foundation, but the system proved defectiv, and not until science was separated from the Bible did it attain its surety. Science is the revelation instead of the Bible. If a man believes in the Bible he believes in immorality, and barbarism, and savagery. Prof. Irving's case was discussed at considerable length by the reverend speaker, who ridiculed the idea of expelling a minister from the church simply for saying that in his opinion Socrates was probably in heaven and occupied there a higher position than Catharine II. of Russia. A great mass of the thinking people do not believe in the common faith. The living creed is ever different from the written creed. Some dare to courageously express their faith in the living creed. Ingersoll cannot be blamed for refusing to sing the pæans of Calvinism. In the hands of those who receive the book as the sovereign principle of life and thought, as the handbook of social, moral, and political life, the Bible becomes the obstructor of civilization and the obstacle to enlightenment.

Placing the Responsibility.

At a meeting of the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal church, held in Philadelphia, Oct. 16, 1882, the speaker of the occasion, Rev. James Morell, of Camden, N. J., submitted substantially the following statements:

1. The preachers of the Methodist Episcopal church are called by God and are employed in his service.
2. That the said preachers of the Methodist Episcopal church are appointed to their respectiv fields of labor by the bishops of said church.
3. That they, the said preachers, are paid more or less satisfactorily by the respectiv churches over which they preside; and,
4. It is desirable to hav some plan by which the responsibility for the payment of said preachers may be definitly ascertained.

Granted that these statements are true, then,

1. God alone is responsible for the payment for the services rendered by the said preachers.
2. The alleged fact that the churches under the care of the preachers are benefited by the services of said preachers, does not make the said churches responsible for the remuneration of said preachers, nor relieve God of that responsibility.
3. While it is alleged that God is wealthy and solvent, as per schedule,

(a) "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof;"

(b) "The sea is his, and he made it;"

(c) "The silver and the gold are his, and the cattle upon a thousand hills;" it is nevertheless true that,

I. There are in the United States one hundred thousand persons engaged in begging for money to carry on "God's work;"

II. It is difficult or impossible to collect the taxes on his property; and,

III. The "house of God" is usually ornamented with a mortgage.

In view of these statements, ordinary prudence would suggest that no preacher accept a call or employment from God without gently, yet firmly, insisting upon payment in advance for his services.

right, because from the sincerity of his character he was called to fight when others left the field. And now, in view of such a life, it is very evident that all of the immortalities that the human race has ever imagined, must attach to him. His personal consciousness, let it continue, if possible, among the angels forevermore; his life-long immortality of effort, of goodness, of heroism—that depends on us whether it shall continue or not.

And what consolation there is in the fact that the life that has been ended is thus worthy of every continuance! That is the glory and triumph of life after all. Not wealth, not learning, but sacrifice and duty done, is the crown that insures immortality. It insures, also, comfort and consolation to those who have stood so dear to our brother, who have cherished and loved him beyond expression. Let us pour into that widowed heart the feeling that we will do justice to this noble soul that has departed, and that it will still live in us. Let us say here to her and to those around her, Rejoice that your worthy one still lives; rejoice that the power that he expended in this world still remains as your comfort and consolation, and that there are friends who will rally around you and make the purposes of his life yet a victory. To the still wider circle whom I see represented here I would say: Remember that you came here, as it were, to consecrate these remains and this memory. Remember, also, that you go forth consecrated by them. The power of this man shall not die; but to live, it must find its voice in your hearts. The kingdom of heaven is within you; the heaven of our brother is in you; that immortality which we know is sure and which cannot die is in you. The mortal man goes into the earth and mingles with the elements; his immortality, THE TRUTH SEEKER, lives in you. I would that every one of you should take an oath around these sacred remains that the noble cause for which he lived shall be continued forever as his earthly monument. Let it be, THE TRUTH SEEKER SHALL LIVE! It shall triumph! It shall carry the name of our departed brother down through the depths of the ages until the last enthralled soul is emancipated. Such lives, such souls, cannot die. If they could the world would sink back to barbarism and slavery. We are here to continue that life with all of our energy until the whole world shall feel its blessing and turn in gratitude and thankfulness to it.

Therefore, my friends, it is worthy that those who have been dear to him should bear forth these remains and commit them to his mother earth, the common mother of us all, there to mingle with the elements; there to become perhaps in time a new source of power. But remember that we also bear forth new hearts filled with all the good that he would do and think and feel, and that in the future the great lesson of our lives must be the realization of the highest thoughts and motives for which he lived and struggled. Such is the duty that science enjoins upon us; such is the hope that robs death of its sting and the grave of its victory; that rises in triumph over the grave, and makes immortality not a dream, but an assured certainty. That is the hope and the consolation by which we are inspired. Rise now to the higher life, the newer duty, the consecrated struggle for liberty.

Before the address was finished many of the audience were in tears. At its conclusion the choir sang the song of "Harvested:"

So ripe and full, the garnered sheaf,
Why should the harvest bring us grief?
Bowed down and bent by weight of grain,
His was a life not lived in vain.

Through toil and pain, he bore his load,
Through briars and brambles walked his road.
So grand and true, so great and good,
'Twas the mountain's top on which he stood.

So plain his life to others given,
In duty done, he found his heaven—
The burden raised, dried up the tears,
His glory through eternal years.

When this was done the friends took their last loving look at Mr. Bennett's peaceful face, and the casket was borne to the waiting hearse. Followed by carriages containing the nearer friends it was conveyed to Greenwood cemetery in Brooklyn.

AT THE GRAVE.

Sylvan avenue is one of the most quiet roads in that beautiful "city of the dead," and in one of the most quiet parts of that avenue is the place made sacred by this burial. It is in a valley of evergreens, charming at any season of the year, even in winter. When the burial took place a light snow was melting, and through its white pall here and there islands of brightest green shaded with evergreens seemed to break, as though Nature was refusing to submit to the death the season had thrown over it. When the earth fell upon the coffin, Mr. Wakeman stood forth with uncovered head, and while the cold rain beat upon the faces of the mourners, he spoke the final words:

FRIENDS: The time has come to say, "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust." The mortal remains of our friend must now, by immutable law, return to Nature, from whence they came; to Nature, the mother of all; the mother, the nurse, the sustainer, the harvester of all. They go to become a part of herself and of her mighty, eternal processes of change. From land to sea, from sea to land; in the mighty tempest or sunshine; from age to age, season to season, with day and night, they will pass on and work evermore. But for the present we leave them associated with the fairest of earth, with leaf and bud, with birds and flowers, and the ever-changing hues of the seasons and of night and day. A fit resting-place for the wearied pilgrim at last! But yet more, a fit symbol of his higher life that cannot be buried here. For only nature's mighty forces can body forth to us MAN'S highest powers in the great spiritual tempests of human progress. High and persistent as nature in his sublime motives, wild and resistless as the hurricane or the avelanche, the torrent of human progress sweeps aside with indignation the obstructions of superstition and tyranny. In this highest range of human activity our brother lived and worked. Right well he bore his part in the storms and strifes of his age and time, persistent as nature, but indignant, too, as her clouds and storms.

Nor less did his life harmonize with the milder scene around us. For, from his youth up, he too was mild and gentle, patient and kind of heart. His fellows looked to him for sympathy, advice, and consolation. To know him well was to love him. The friends of his youth never lost their faith in him, but like a crown of glory now gather around his grave. Happy veteran, that the companions of thy youth bring thee at this hour flowers and tears! Not far, then, can'st thou have been astray in heart or life! And this expanse, too, of white and green, of mingling snow and verdure, reveals thy inner, immortal life. The white, pure, sincerity of motive is ever the source of a newer, greener growth and progress. It melts and dies like this snow, only to give forth a higher life. So has it been, so must it ever be with the departed hero. The humanity of his heart atones for all the failings of life. It lifts him to the brotherhood of the good, the blessed, the immortal!

To his earthly form, as we commit it to the earth with grief, tenderness, gratitude unspeakable, we can only say, Farewell, forever FAREWELL!

To the Power of his Soul, this Higher Life, undying, still invincible for good, we open our hearts and receive it with, HAIL, immortal, ever more!

Evening Services.

In the evening the Fourth New York Liberal League, of which Mr. Bennett was the honored president, held a Lodge of Sorrow at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. The room was filled at an early hour by sorrowing friends who came to speak words of esteem and affection for him whom they had that day laid away in eternal rest. It is impossible to print the remarks in full, but we give the substance. It was a meeting of great fraternal feeling. The friends seemed to be drawn nearer together by their grief, and to realize that Liberals should have more social organizations and stand closer together in the bond of brotherhood.

Mr. Stone called the meeting to order. He said:

Ladies and Gentlemen and Dear Friends: I would say we have met this time to do honor, as far as we may, to the memory of our departed and worthy friend, Mr. Bennett. In order that this object may be more fully and perfectly attained, I would suggest the name of our brother, Thaddeus B. Wakeman, as president of this meeting.

Mr. Wakeman was unanimously called to the chair, and said:

Mr. Stone, as vice-president of the meeting, has made this motion. I would have much preferred that he had selected some other person to preside. As I have spoken so fully upon this subject to-day, I shall, of course, leave others to speak this evening.

MR. RYAN: Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen: As the chairman said, we are here to-night to do honor to the memory of our dead brother, Mr. D. M. Bennett. It was my privilege to be well acquainted with him, to know him thoroughly as a man, and now it is my privilege to bear testimony to his high character, worth, and moral principle. It would really be a waste of words for me to speak to you in regard to Mr. Bennett's character, because you know it just as well as I can state it; but we have to go before the public with this man's record, and now that he is dead we have got to make the world understand that he died in purity of heart as well as purpose, and that we living witnesses bear testimony to it. We want to fix his memory so indelibly in the hearts of the present that the future cannot assail it; and this is the time and the occasion to speak well of Mr. Bennett. Each man and woman should speak out the sentiments of their hearts, and though, like mine, they may not be expressed in the best language, yet they will be honest sentiments, and the world will be let to know that there is, right here in New York, a coterie of men and women of good character who are only too proud to do honor to Mr. Bennett, and to bear living testimony to their faith in him.

I propose that hereafter this association be known as the Bennett Monument Liberal League, and that to-night we inaugurate a new movement—new because Mr. Bennett's death makes it new. I move that we now reorganize the Fourth Liberal League of New York as the Bennett Monument Liberal League; and I propose that we start this Fourth Liberal League on a new lease of life, to undertake the work of building a monument to perpetuate the memory of Mr. Bennett; a monument which his admirers and supporters, and those that knew the man, may assist in building; a monument that we won't be ashamed of in a hundred years hence—something that would do us honor and do him honor; and I hope my fellow-Liberals are with me in the act.

The motion was seconded by Mr. Stone, and Mr. Ryan called for an expression of the feelings and sentiments of the members.

DR. SWAIN: I have not, like many of you, been intimately acquainted with Mr. Bennett, still I have known him well enough and seen enough of him to appreciate him as a man and as a worker. It may be said, and truly, that men who are weak and unable to do good work are not to blame for it; but it is nevertheless true that it is natural for a human heart to go out in admiration, respect, and even veneration or reverence for those high qualities which are inborn.

It seems to me Mr. Bennett was one of the men possessed of the qualities sometimes spoken of as virtues.. What he did was done without that great display of dramatic power with which many people preface their actions. It seemed to be the natural thing for him to do. It seems to me that the simplicity of action which characterized Mr. Bennett is always and invariably connected with, and the result of, a deep sincerity. Only those people are insincere, it seems to me, although I do not say that all such are insincere, but it seems to me that insincerity of purpose naturally clothes itself in that working for effect. Then, beside this simplicity, and the sincerity from which it sprang, there is another quality—one of the highest, not only of men, but of all animals, and that is persistent courage. Now that same quality was just as natural for such a man as Mr. Bennett to struggle, contest, and contend for what he in all sincerity believed to be right, as it was for him to exist. Looking at Mr. Bennett simply from this standpoint alone, without referring to other characteristics which he possessed, these qualities in him have seemed to me to make him really a superior man.

MRS. COLMAN: It seems to me that our friend Wakeman said everything that could be said in regard to the departed. He best knew him, and he has best spoken of him. I knew very little of Mr. Bennett until the time of his arrest at Watkins. From that time I became his personal friend. I am proud to know it, and a man or woman who suffers for conscience sake is immediately my personal friend. I am proud that I liv in an age that brings out men and women who become martyrs to the cause of truth. The highest honor, the highest eulogium you can pay to Mr. Bennett is, not to sing songs of his goodness, not to say pleasant things of his memory, but to take up the work which he so faithfully did, and carry it through to the end. The struggle of to-day for the emancipation of the mind, great as was the struggle to destroy chattel slavery, is more important. Who of us shall forget to do his duty? I wish I were young. I am sorry that my gray hairs tell of life nearly spent. But, so help me all humanity, I will never give up this struggle until every human being shall be utterly emancipated from superstition.

Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews spoke in favor of a stronger social union among radicals, and explained, in a deeply philosophical way, why the social feeling was not more generally fostered by Liberals.

CAPT. LOYD: I can hardly realize the situation. Saturday night I heard that D. M. Bennett was dead. My personal relations with Mr. Bennett were long and intimate. I was one of six who welcomed him to this city from the West. There were Brother Peck, myself, and some four or five others. I had known and comprehended his financial situation and the troubles he had been through. I pledged him my friendship as a business man and as a co-worker. I first came to the conclusion that Mr. Bennett was a man of quiet, earnest, honest thought; saw that he was determined to live as he thought, and therefore I knew that his life would be a success. So feeling, I urged THE TRUTH SEEKER upon quite a number of my friends, and I am glad to have lived to see the day of his success in the advancement of his opinions and our glorious cause, and to know also that as a business man he fell in the way of success instead of adversity. I feel proud in that light, and I feel sorry that he has left us. To my friend's resolution in reference to perpetuating his memory by erecting a monument, I say that his memory will be perpetuated, monument or no monument; but I am one who believes in those things to great men, honest men—ay, and courageous men. I am willing to do all I can to help erect that monument. I will pledge my reputation and my influence in the future for the monument to Mr. Bennett; and, of course, after that is started and when the means are got, the subject of a site will be a future consideration. I could say a great deal in reference to Mr. Bennett that it is unnecessary to say. I have found him a kind and affectionate man—ay, and an honorable man—and I have felt very proud of his acquaintance.

Mr. Chamberlain, to whom many thanks are due for his efficient services during the day, spoke as follows:

My acquaintance with Mr. Bennett has been only a very brief one; probably I have known him for a less time than any one present. I first made his acquaintance personally a few evenings before the grand Chickering Hall reception; but a year previous to that I had my attention directed to his case, and I was at that time a festive person, leading a purposeless life, you might say, in search of something to work for, some purpose to carry out; and it seemed to me there I had found it. I did not know Mr. Bennett, but I knew Mr. Wakeman as his attorney, and I went and called upon Mr. Wakeman, who received me with the utmost courtesy and kindness, and introduced me to the Liberal Club.

I worked with all my little might for the success of the Chickering Hall reception. I was glad to find in Mr. Bennett a man I could take by the hand and to whom I could open my confidence. A better acquaintance with him led me to revere him, to respect him as a man of the most sterling integrity, a man of the utmost purity. Such men as Mr. Bennett, men of sterling integrity, should be respected when found. I respected Mr. Bennett as I found him, and took occasion to go into his office and to make acquaintance with him.

Mr. Bennett has been cut off in the midst of an important work. His work is unfinished, although his part of it is done. It remains for us to perpetuate the principles for which he fought, and to carry on the work that he began. We also are the custodians of his reputation. Let us see to it that we maintain the integrity of that reputation; let us see to it that the name of D. M. Bennett shall be handed down to the generations in such a way that they must and shall respect it. More than that. There is another thing for us to do. We must see to it, and charge ourselves with it as a solemn duty, that the men who violate liberty of thought and liberty of conscience be made infamous.

MR. WEEKS: I would say that I have been drawn with an irresistible charm, in spite of the multitute of my own engagements, to read his travels around the world and some of his other writings. I read them at a time when scarcely anything else of equal length would have commanded my attention. I have been struck with an admiration of the man, of his earnest industry and genius, and the fact that so few things among his numerous writings are things that either his friends or himself would have wished to blot out. A few perhaps, a very few, might better not have been written. He, however, was among the wonderful men who would see the fault when it was mentioned to him, and would acknowledge it. He had no pride of opinion; he was ready to acknowledge an error. He was emphatically a truth speaker, but was too modest to take that title, so he took the title of TRUTH SEEKER for his paper. No circumstances would cause him to deviate from the truth. Even the notorious Joe Cook, the champion liar of the world, the champion slanderer of this continent and of everything that is good and pure and true, never dared to bring his vile tongue up to the point, I believe, of accusing D. M. Bennett of being untruthful. Obscenity he could accuse him of, for that is a word that could be applied to almost anybody, because nobody could tell exactly what it meant.

We all feel his loss. Those who have known him best feel his loss most seriously; but none of us would have been less acquainted with him for the sake of feeling that loss less. Every one of us that is capable of being inspired by a noble life and example feel ourselves larger, better, and greater for our acquaintance with D. M. Bennett. It must be so. I heartily indorse almost everything that has been said by the others here to-night, and I wish to say that while honoring the man in words and memory we must not forget that his greatest work, that for which we should honor him most by acting in like manner and spirit, was not so much his writings and utterances as his manly throwing himself in the breach against despotism and daring to brave its vengeance.

Let us then take this lesson from the strong point of the character of our friend, his truthfulness, sincerity, and devotion to truth, no matter where it landed him. I told him about the time of his arrest that they would probably make of him the John Brown of this late and last battle for liberty of opinion. He said he did not know but they would. They hav done it, and to-day though we have consigned him to the ground, his soul is marching on, and it will be an inspiration to every Liberal who has got a soul that he dares to call his own. I feel, for one, larger, stronger, every way more of a man, for the life of D. M. Bennett, and I presume you all do the same.

MRS. FERNANDEZ: This occasion was created to do honor to Mr. Bennett, and I think there could be no more fitting one. But in paying our tribute to his memory we should not forget one that still lives, one that helped him to bear his burdens and to become the man he was. I refer to his wife (applause). We all know how nobly she stood by him in the darkest hours of his trial, when he was slandered and abused, and how faithfully she carried on his work while he was in prison. She lost him then for a long time, but she steadfastly pursued her task and murmured not; and then when after she had so gladly welcomed him home he thought his duty called him to go around the world, she was patient and heroic still, and did all she could till he returned again. And now I wish to say that all Liberals should remember that she is alone, and if by dropping in and paying her a little visit now and then we can help her along and cheer her, and in some way make amends for her terrible loss, I hope we will all do it (applause).

MR. WAKEMAN: Mr. Ryan has suggested an amendment to the resolution that he offered about the monument. He proposes that a committee be appointed and instructed by this meeting of the League to draw up appropriate resolutions to express the feeling of the League upon the loss of their president. Both of those purposes would be accomplished by the appointment of one committee. There will scarcely be time this evening to draw such resolutions. I understand his motion to be that that committee shall be appointed to do that work, and to have it properly published. That will be the resolution that will be put before we adjourn.

MR. SEARING: The reason why I admired and honored Mr. Bennett was, first, he was a man. As he lies now in the grave my thoughts recur to an expression of Shakspere, "The elements were so mixed in him that nature might stand up and say to all the world, 'Here lies a man.'" Now Mr. Bennett as a friend and associate in all the relations of life was a man. He was honest, he was true; his word was as good as his bond. That is the first reason why I am here to say something in his remembrance. The second is that he was brave. When he thought that it was his duty to go into that breach and to maintain or illustrate the liberty, he went into that breach. In the city of Nuremburg, in Germany, there was an old artist who lived to be seventy, eighty, or ninety years old, and it became the superstition among all the children (he loved all the children and the children loved him) that that man would never die. But he did die, and they put on his tombstone simply the word "Emigravit." He has gone away from us. No artist ever dies.

> "Fairer seems that ancient city.
> And the sunshine seems more fair,
> That he once has trod its pavement,
> That he once has breathed its air."

Now, it seems to me that no matter what New York is, for the sake of the remembrance which his friends will have of Mr. Bennett as a true man, the pavements of this city will seem better and the air more fair for having known Mr. Bennett; and, as Mr. Wakeman said this morning, in consecrating the rites of Mr. Bennett, we not so much do honor to him as to ourselves in consecrating our own lives and our own purposes to higher aims and a nobler duty.

Miss Tilton, of Boston, invited any members of the club or New York Liberals to attend the memorial services in Boston next Sunday evening.

MR. STONE: Although there has been so much said to-day—perhaps all that is necessary—with reference to our friend's uprightness and manhood, mayhap even the half has not yet been spoken. In all my experience with Mr. Bennett, he was a man among men, a man who could feel and sympathize with and grieve over the wrongs of his fellow-sufferers. Look at any article that he has written on his travels around the world: no prison that he visits, no cathedral that he has passed through, but he has thought of those who toiled and suffered, and spent their time and lives in servitude and misery under those who ground them down and forced them, perhaps innocently, behind the prison bars. Every step of his pathway, and every word that I culled from those sacred memoirs that I have searched, from those writings, are filled with these breathings for humanity. He believed in or hoped for a future existence, but his god was Humanity. Let our god be Humanity!

I wish that those sentiments that have been expressed by our friend Mr Ryan may take root amongst us; that we may all feel that now our patriot leader has fallen we are ready to step into his tracks, and manfully take up the burden that he has laid by. I hope that every one here to-night will so inform themselves, if they have not already done so, that whenever the vile tongue of slander is heard they may be able to refute its calumnies and vindicate the honor and honesty that we know he possessed.

In regard to this monumental contribution, I second that with every feeling of my soul, and I hope that from to-night forward the sentiment and action of the New York Liberals will be such that we need not be ashamed of it at any time. Now, thousands of Liberals over this broad country are going to look here to see what action we take. If we step up manfully and do our duty, it will be the greatest revolution that has ever been in the cause. Let us step up and take such action that our Liberal friends throughout the length and breadth of the land will fall in with us at once. And by doing so I believe we shall help the cause that is most dear to the heart of every true freeman.

MR. WAKEMAN: I will say, in regard to this monument, that the place in which Mr. Bennett is buried—Greenwood—is one that is exceedingly beautiful. It is a place where two ways meet, which would make the monument that should be placed there over his remains very conspicuous. It is a very appropriate place, it seems to me, to have a suitable monument to his memory; and if this committee should be appointed and should propose a dollar subscription, for instance, from all the truth seekers in the United States, the fund necessary, it seems to me, could be very soon raised, and with an appropriate inscription, the work that has been suggested by that resolution might be done. I merely throw this out now before the committee is appointed to see if any suggestions may be made that the committee would follow out.

Mr. Putnam paid a glowing and eloquent tribute to the memory and worth of the hero dead, concluding as follows: "I hope, friends, as we pass away from this meeting, that we shall have our hearts warm, that they will burn within us toward one another, that we may thus have a beautiful, social life created here within this great city of New York, that we Liberals may know one another, that we may understand one another, that we may not be simple acquaintances, but that we may be true friends, and in and through such a society let us build a noble and an endearing monument, more lasting than the marble, to our dear friend, to our hero, D. M. Bennett."

Mr. Leland said: "As to that marble monument, let us not think of it for a moment. Let it take the shape of a hall for this social life to manifest itself in—a hollow square, with a roof on it, that will hold four, five, or six hundred people. Let it take that shape instead of a mere piece of stone for a grave."

Mrs. Macdonald spoke of the services of the deceased in the cause of woman.

Mr. Cook said: "Where there are so many veterans I think it is scarcely in order for a new recruit. I never saw Mr. Bennett until I saw him in his coffin. His eyes said nothing to me; but your presence does. I thought that I ought to be here, because Mr. Bennett died—suffered and died, I believe, in the cause of what he believed to be the truth. That is enough for me. I care for nothing more. That I believe we should honor above all things; what each one believes to be the truth, that he should have a right to defend. That we have a right to ask, and, I believe, that is what, as men and women, we should strive to win."

Dr. Foote said: "I feel very unequal to my task—what would be a pleasure under other circumstances. It is a very trying time to me. Mr. Bennett has always been a dear friend to me. He was my friend, and I was his, and I feel quite unequal to say what I would like to say. Several speakers have said some things which awakened in my mind something that ought to be said, but I really feel very unequal to it."

Mr. Wakeman said: "Dr. Foote will be remembered as one of those who has suffered under this very law, this same persecution, and I can certainly sympathize with him in his feeling and inability to express himself upon this occasion. He has known too well how it is himself."

Josephine Tilton said: "Mr. Bell was elected as as one of the delegates to be here to-day, but sickness overtook him and prevented. He wished I should say to all present that he regretted that he would be unable to attend."

Mrs. Colman said: "I wish Mr. Wakeman would say that Miss Tilton has also spent more than one night in jail for conscience sake."

Mr. Wakeman said: "Of course it is unnecessary for me to say that when it has just been said; but I may add that she has defied the prosecuting power of the United States and of the several states, especially Massachusetts and New York, continuously year by year, standing in the gap, and that she has escaped simply because, as I think, they think it is better to attack men than women. She has so far; I expect she will yet."

Mr. Stone spoke commending the proposition for a dollar subscription and pledged himself for the first $1, which was followed by a second and third subscription.

Mrs. Macdonald spoke in favor of Mr. Leland's proposition. She thought that a plain simple monument should be erected.

Mr. Leland said that in Boston they have a Paine Hall; New York should have a Bennett Hall.

Mr. Stone spoke in favor of Mr. Leland's plan; said he did not care what sort of a monument it was, and only wanted to get the ball rolling some way or another.

Mr. Leland suggested that if a hall was to be built perhaps the rate of subscription should be placed higher than $1.

Mr. Ryan was in favor of a valuable monument for the whole world outside to see, the Christian and the Liberal; and he could be put down for $50 for the monument outside.

Mr. Swain spoke in favor of a marble monument in the cemetery, "with such an inscription as would be the voice of an angel speaking unto the dead and damned."

Mr. Wakeman said: "The hour proposed for adjourning (10 o'clock) has arrived, and the business of this meeting now will be to pass that resolution. I understand Mr. Ryan to propose in that resolution that a certain sum be appropriated to put up a suitable monument over the remains in Greenwood, and then that a further fund be raised by subscription or otherwise to, if possible, erect a hall in memory of Mr. Bennett—a Truth Seeker Hall. Every newspaper in this city, nearly, has now a public building named by it and generally the name of the founder of the paper is added. And I should like to see THE TRUTH SEEKER after this have a line in it similar to that of the New York Tribune, 'Founded by D. M. Bennett;' and then that hall should be one in which all Liberals should feel that they had an interest—where, perhaps, the Liberal Club might meet, and where there would be a continuous home for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for Liberal thought and speech in New York. It is possible now for that to be done; and let the committee that is to be appointed consider the matter and report or frame resolutions which will embody that object if they think proper. The question before the League will be the appointment of that committee."

Considerable discussion followed as to the mode of the appointment of the committee.

On motion it was agreed that Mr. Ryan and the chairman (Mr. Wakeman) be appointed members of the committee, then to elect the other three members and that committee report and act. Some discussion followed. The meeting adjourned to meet Sunday evening next at the TRUTH SEEKER office at 8 o'clock. Mr. Wakeman remarked that in the meantime it is understood that the committee report through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Memorial Service at Erie, Pa.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Yesterday we held a Bennett Memorial Service in this city. We had a good audience, and all seemed to feel the loss to Liberalism. I gave a history of the life, work, and sufferings of Mr. Bennett. At the conclusion of the lecture the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That in the death of D. M. Bennett, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the world has lost one of its most honorable, intelligent, and valuable men.

Resolved. That we, the First Spiritualist Society of Erie, Pa., deeply sympathize first, with Mrs. Bennett, the bereaved widow; second, with the managers of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and third, with the Liberal public at large in their loss.

Resolved. That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication.

Erie, Pa., Dec. 11, 1882. MOSES HULL.

Letters of Sympathy.

BALTIMORE, MD., Dec. 7, 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: I learn this evening with sorrow of the death of "our Bennett" on Wednesday morning at his home. This is a sad blow to his family and to Liberals generally the country over. I trust THE TRUTH SEEKER will not fall also, but be sustained. Convey to Mrs. Bennett my sympathy in her bereavement. C. GARWOOD.

LUNENBURG, MASS., Dec. 8, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I learned last night that our friend Bennett has been removed from his family, friends, and co-workers, and joined the countless throngs ever "passing away, passing away." It is a painful event and so unexpected and unlooked for that I faltered on the intelligence communicated by Heywood through Dr. Foote. His loss must be made good by all the friends of the cause he so long and valiantly labored and suffered for. I trust the same head and hand that guided THE TRUTH SEEKER in Mr. Bennett's absence will stand at the helm, and all will go well for the cause. My sympathy I giv to his wife and friends. His life is a lesson, his death an admonition.

Yours truly, A. H. WOOD.

WELLESLEY, MASS., Dec. 8, 282.

E. M. MACDONALD: I am wholly unprepared for the sad tidings brought me by your communication of yesterday's date, just at hand. Can it be possible? Yet the mourning face of THE TRUTH SEEKER tells me that the sad story is all too true.

The death of such a man as D. M. Bennett. while yet the evening shadows hav scarcely commenced to dim the glory of his noon, is indeed a great calamity. I cannot reconcile myself to it as a loss for greater gain, either to him or ourselvs. It cannot but be all wrong. Of course we must learn to accept the inevitable; but we must also learn from such an event that even the "inevitable" should be held at bay as long as possible, by every attention to the demands of organic life.

Very gladly would I join you and all on Sunday next in the sad solemnities of the day, but this is impossible. Why should we not, however, one and all, whether there or in the privacy of our own family, honor his devotion to the cause of Freethought by consecrating ourselvs anew to the demand for the unrestricted rights of the individual?

With sincerest sympathy for Mrs. Bennett, and for all associated with our departed friend, in this her and their great sorrow, I am, I trust, with you for all that pertains to human advancement and well being.

Truly and faithfully, ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON

TROY, N. Y., Dec. 9, 1882.

MESSRS. MACDONALD, WAKEMAN, AND STONE: Dear Friends—It is with a feeling of sorrow and disappointment that I read of the death of poor Mr. Bennett to-day, from your circular—sorrow for the loss of so fine a man, and disappointment at his not being able to liv, even for a few years more, just when his life and career were becoming so promising. It has indeed been a sorrowful duty that you hav been called to do, to notify the Liberals of the country of the death of their chief. I am unable to attend his funeral to-morrow, but I hope (if I am alive) to be able some day to add my mite toward the erection of a fine monument for him, which, I doubt not will soon be commenced. One can hardly realize that Mr. Bennett is no more (as we understand it). If I ever wished for immortality it is now, to compensate him (in a measure, at least) for all he has suffered at the hands of his persecutors. How timely was the history of his life, given for the benefit of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a few weeks ago! One would really think that he seemed to feel that his life was drawing to a close, and therefore gave us a short sketch of it. The Liberals must feel the loss of poor Mr. Bennett as severely as they would that of a near relativ; it does seem so to me.

Thanking you very kindly for your note, and remembering the grief of his wife, who has now lost her best friend, I am, friends, yours fraternally,

WM. DALY.

The Conclusions of a Student.

I should giv millions of gold if the following theological doctrin could be established as true:

1. There is a personal, intelligent God.
2. Man is immortal.
3. There is a life beyond the grave.

To find out for myself whether the above premises were true or false I left home at the age of thirteen and plodded through college, law, and theology, and now at the age of 38 I propose to tell you what I hav found.

In the great treadmill of college I had to grind daily so much of Latin and Greek, and at the end of six years I learned that my teachers had been dead two thousand years. A dead age is teaching a living age. Modern life is feeding upon dead life that lived, did the work of its age, and passed away.

When I stepped out of this Latin and Greek treadmill I found I had paid three thousand dollars for a few manners and the ability to translate a few Latin and Greek phrases that no thorough scholar ever uses, and that I was, by my education and manners, isolated from my fellow-men.

I next tackled law, and after a five years' course, and five year's reading, I found it to be a greater humbug than Latin and Greek. I found it was all built upon dead statutes, passed to third reading and to death by Roman Ciceros, and woven and interwoven with the ignorance and brutality of decaying and dying dynasties for two thousand years. In a word, I found that the law was given by the rich as a legacy to the poor.

When Moses wrote, "Thou shalt not steal," he was at the head of a mob of three millions of vagrants who had stolen everything from their neighbors, the Egyptians, they could lay hands upon, and Moses and the elders around him had stolen everything from these peculiar vagrants; and in order to protect himself and his clique from the mob he thundered the command, "Thou shalt not steal."

So in all ages the rich thieves hav said in their statute books to the poor and little thieves, "Thou shalt not steal."

If a poor man toils and labors for the wealthy (i. e, becomes the wealthy man's voluntary slave at a per diem of fifty cents), and his employer refuses payment, the majesty of the law comes to the poor man's aid in the following manner: the poor man must secure the costs before the law will operate at all. If the law compelled the rich man to secure the debt, then one might find a definition for law.

I received the sledge-hammer blows of the majesty of the law in Coke on Littleton, Blackstone's whirligig, drove through two thousand volumes of Roman and British law, and learned at law that "law was a rule of action," or that "water runs down hill instead of up hill; and that the great majesty of the law and its fame was found in clearing the guilty rich, and in making convicts of the poor for civil sheriffs and wardens to grow rich stealing the food from the convicts' stomachs.

I found that in America there were 5,000,000 of these convicts, with 500,000 polished and unpolished public thieves guarding them, stealing their food and stealing their labor. For ten dollars, I found, a rich man could buy of the law an indulgence to flog or cowhide his poor neighbor, while his poor neighbor had to go to prison for the same act. I found that for twenty-five dollars this great government would sell any man an indulgence to manufacture drunkards, paupers, vagrants, thieves, and murderers, while the majesty of the law punished the vagrant, the drunkard, the thief, the murderer, for becoming such, and then set public thieves over him to work him and steal his food. O imperial, majestic law! I left thee and courted thy sister, Theology.

I was told in the lecture-room that theology was from two Greek words, theo and logos—theo, God, and logos, word or science of God. Here is what I got for four years' study and two thousand dollars:

1. God existed from all eternity. 2. Nothing else did. 3. God made out of the potentialities of nothing the immense universe of worlds in six days. 4. He saw from all eternity just what mankind would do, so he commenced dying from the beginning of eternity, and manifested said death in time on a wooden cross, in the obscure town of Jerusalem, in the reign of the Cæsars, under the command and warrant of Pontius Pilate. All this was done to save the elect that had been elected to eternal life millions of years before a shaft of light had left the quiver of the red-hot sun.

That God designed everything for man's benefit. He made the grass green to fit the condition of man's eyes, and the seas he made for ships to travel upon. An Irishman just at my left hand remarked, "How in the name of howly Moses, could Columbus hav discovered America if the ocean had not first been made?" Sure enough; but then Columbus might hav rode over or walked.

5. I was taught that a heaven of peace and joy awaited the truly good, and a hell of sorrow, of fire, and brimstone awaited the bad sinner.

Here is what I thought of the above premises after I got true with the study: 1. They tell you there is a God, but offer no proof of it. 2. They teach that something—i. e., countless millions of worlds—was once nothing; that is, that an abstraction existed from eternity, but that something did not; that God lived from all eternity and died from all eternity in order to appease the wrath of himself.

That God was boundless in benevolence and omnipotent in power, and worked and toiled to bless mankind from the eons of eternity, and yet created man naked, with the cold frosts of winter to come and go. He forgot to make a world full of clothing. He forgot to make the steam-engin, the steamship, the telegraph, the printing-press, the telephone, the loom, the mariner's compass, the telescope. But God did not forget to institute human slavery; he did not forget to command fathers to stone their own children to death (see Moses's laws); he did not forget to institute a priesthood and a government of kings to rule with an iron heel, and what the priesthood failed to steal from the poor ignorant people the kings took. O immortal God! how I worship you.

Your reign on earth has been in showers of blood. Your chariot was driven by Joshua axle-deep in the blood of women with child; it was driven by your servant Constantine, who put the cross on the hilt of the sword as a fit sign for the name in which he murdered the earth. Your chariot was driven through seas of blood till you reached the eighteenth century, when the mighty power of thinking men put a stop to your further bloody progress and drove you out of France and compelled you to behave yourself in England and Germany. Your inspired murderers in New England had to call a halt when the Constitution of the United States spread its civil leaves over the continent, and quietly and majestically repudiated Moses's god, Buddha's god, Brahma's god, Zoroaster's gods, Mohammed's god, and all the other gods too tedious to mention.

I never reached a solution of the vast mystery surrounding me. I know that I exist—that I am made up of a corporeal body of nerves, hinges, pullys, bones, and am a sentient, thinking being. I know when I think that every part of my being is in action; that all the wonderful and vast machinery of this body is in play to keep the King Brain in action. I am a vast locomotiv, in motion continually, without a stop; I build the fires in the engin-room, my stomach, daily, which consumes food, another form of fuel. I know that all I am and all I hope for is contained in this body—life, hope, fear, joy, and love. All knowledge is of an intuitiv nature, and all I know of the outside world is conveyed to my internal consciousness through the senses I possess. I know, after studying Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, and the German philosophers, that nature never lies. Thales, of Greece, Aristotle, Diogenese, Democritus, Archimedes, Lucretius, and a line of such scientists down to Galileo, Copernicus, Kepler, Newton—all found that nature never lies. Let us put these witnesses upon the stand and the prophets. The testimony of all the earth is that no man ever rose from the dead.

The prophets, priests, kings, and apostles say that Enoch, the seventh from Adam, went up to God; that Elijah went up in a chariot of fire, and that one Jesus, after being crucified, a spear run through his heart, and buried, did rise from the dead, because one woman said she found the grave empty one Sunday morning. Is this hearsay evidence of persons dead two and three thousand years ago any evidence to me? I demand, first, that they, the Christian theologians, prove that there is a God; second, that they prove he inspired men to do miracles; third, that those men did perform miracles; and, fourth, that a miracle, or an impossibility, is possible.

Let us bring the resurrection of Jesus into court and look at it for a moment. It is proved and granted on all sides that Jesus was dead when the centurian reported the fact to Pilate. Jesus was crucified on the charge of blasphemy, and hence was a criminal in the eyes of the law, and the executioner had control of the body. The two thieves that died with him were carried to the south of Jerusalem and cast into the fire of gehenna. Had it not been for Joseph, Jesus would hav shared the same fate, but it is represented that Jesus's enemies bethought themselvs the day after Jesus was buried, and asked a guard of Pilate to watch a dead man to keep him from rising from the dead, for they said to Pilate that "this deceiver said after three days he would rise again." If such a scene ever took place, the Pharisees and scribes would never hav called on Pilate at all. Had they believed that there was the remotest possibility of Jesus rising from the dead they would hav had the executioner carry the body along with the two robbers and seen that it was burnt without for a moment losing sight of it. After the arrest of Jesus they never left him a moment until he was dead.

This story would make any judge and jury smile. Science tells us that all nature possesses in itself the seeds of death. Theology says that man was created immortal, and Dr. Haven said to me in the class, "If science proves that man was created mortal we will hav to change our premises." What! change immutable, fixed, and unchangeable premises that God established! If science is true, then Jesus was a mortal god.

When Moses said, "Thus saith the Lord, your God," if Moses was sincere—and I judge he was because he committed a murder before he became the law-giver of the desert—did he know himself who said thus and so to him? Did Jehovah take pains to identify himself to Moses? The nearest Jehovah came to it was when he showed his hind parts to the law-giver. Let us look for a moment at Moses and his God.

This Jehovah at one time came down to see if the rumor about the Sodomites was true; at another time he proposed to perjure himself and violate his oath to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whom he had promised that their descendants should be a great nation and sealed it with an oath, and, as St. Paul says, swore by himself because there was no higher power to swear by, and afterward told Moses that he was going to destroy the whole outfit of Hebrews except Moses. Moses touched Jehovah on his honor and told him to "remember thine oath, O Lord, that thou swearest to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob." How is that for a God?

Think of the egotism of a race of priests constituting themselvs prophets telling the people what God wanted and what was in store for them. Would Talmage read for a morning lesson the story of Judah and his daughter-in-law? Could he find some great spiritual phosphorous pointing to Christ as the savior of the world in the cave scene of Lot, or could he become eloquent over the law of apostolic succession in the story of Onan? Will Talmage be so good as to tell us the difference between the inspiration of Ehud, who, dagger in hand, said to King Eglon, "I hav a message from God for you," and Guiteau, the modern prophet? The Bible says, "And he, Ehud, judged Israel forty years."

When Israel divided, and became Israel and Judah, Elijah was leading prophet of Judah, and he enticed over four hundred prophets of Baal or Israel to a worship, and then turned the soldiers loose on them and murdered all of them by divine command.

King David, the sweet singer of Israel, never sang so sweetly as he did when he was told by the prophet Nathan that his seduction of Bathsheba, and the murder of her husband, Uriah, were hidden and covered up by the Lord without even David's asking for the favor.

Time would fail me to tell you of Jonah and the whale, and Daniel in the lion's den, and the three Hebrew children in the fiery furnace; but I come to the boss act after Joshua had stopped the sun and moon in order that he might see to rip up a few more women with child to glorify Jehovah. I come to Ezekiel. I ask Mr. Beecher, Mr. Talmage, and Mr. Collyer to read to their congregations the fourth chapter of Ezekiel, and say whether they would like to take board, in the name of the Lord, a few months with the prophet, and what they think of a god that would order such a bill of fare.

But enough now of these ancient boss liars who played with the planetary system as a man plays with billiards to-day. Let us look, in closing, at the resurrection of Jesus again. While he was on the cross the Jews told him if he would come down they would believe him. If he rose from the dead and this stupendous miracle actually took place, why did he go sneaking about here and there, in upper rooms and out in the country, and two days after the resurrection pull out of Judea altogether and go seventy miles north into Galilee, and there go fishing with his disciples, and attend a fish-bake in daylight with them?

But Jesus never once appeared in Jerusalem after the crucifixion. Had he risen from the dead and gone to Pilate and said: "Here I am, Jesus whom you spiked to the cross. Here is my side where the spear entered my heart," that would forever hav settled the fact that a god had been crucified. Had he gone into the council chamber of the Sanhedrim and said, "You crucified me because I said I was the son of God; here I am, the risen God," the whole world would hav known it. All history would be full of it, instead of, as it is now, silent. He had nothing to fear; he had risen from the dead; but no, his disciples make him play the part of a sneak around the sea of Galilee for forty days, and then make Jesus suddenly appear at Bethany and ascend into heaven. And now all must be damned who do not believe that Jesus arose from the dead.

I ceased reading the Bible six years ago, and hope never to read it again. When I look around me and see a land full of churches, and controled by two hundred thousand preachers and priests, who are non-producers, who take up collections from the poor twice every Sunday, and for which offense a poor man at Washington, D. C., was sent to the workhouse ninety days a short time ago; when I see these fellows leading dress parade every Sunday, riding in their liveried rigs, while the poor are crying for bread; when I see all this done in the name of him who had not where to lay his head, I say the only difference between a preacher and a saloon keeper is, one sells his wind for one, two, up to twenty-five thousand dollars per year, while the other sells his fire-water for what he can get. When I see a land full of cripples, a land full of insane asylums, full of workhouses, jails, and prisons, I ask, Is this the result of two thousand years of the preaching of the meek and lowly Jesus, and the fulfilling of his text, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to me?"

If there is a God he never ordered that Bible or any other written. If there is a God he would not permit that Bible to exist. If there is a God he would not permit such a world as ours to exist as it now is. He would not permit a few men to own all the gold and reduce fifty millions of people to tribute, for a man who is worth one hundred million dollars keeps two hundred thousand men poor. If man were immortal it would not be necessary to kill him in order that he might liv always. If there is a life beyond the grave, no mortal knows it, and the dead know it not. So said Solomon, and I believe him. I look upon Christianity and all religions as the low lies of all ages. GEORGE H. BETHARD.

A Land Reformer.

There's no free thought without free land,
And no land free men buy.
Free men and land together stand,
Or both together die.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On looking over a past number of THE TRUTH SEEKER my eye meets a letter which interests me exceedingly, signed "A Workingman." In this communication he touches on a subject in which I am above all other issues of the day most interested—free lands. We all know that the kind of land cows are pastured on makes both the quality of butter, and in the end, shapes, molds, and even determins the breed of the cow or fixes her type. And 'tis just so with free land and the people sustained thereon. In proportion as the land is free (and consequently in that proportion are wages high or low) so men become mentally free. A poor slave to a landlord or to an employer will be a slave to superstition and tradition. Poor, distracted Ireland can never become priest free till she becomes land free, therefore the first basic principle with me is free land. By this I mean that our brave old knight-errant, D. M. Bennett, has a right to as much land as he can build a house on, or farm on, wherever such land is not occupied; that every man and woman who is a citizen has as much right to free land as he or she has to the rain or sunshine of the heavens.

I heard George Stuart, of Philadelphia, deliver a lecture in Manchester, England, in which he said that "there is as much land in the Mississippi valley alone as would support all the people in the world were it cultivated as England is." And yet though hundreds of millions of acres of the same are not in use, no one can build or farm on a single acre of suitable land without first paying the "dogs in the mangers" their monopoly prices. It is this state of affairs that builds up Fifth avenues and palatial mansions, and on the other hand creates the wretched hovels of the poor, the debt, the law bond, the mental bond, the mortgage, the stock gambling, and the ten thousand ways by which the non-producers liv off the producers. This truth is self-evident to true philanthropists and real friends of humanity—that land should no more be bought and sold than a human being. Let then everyone advocate to hav whatever land he or she can make use of free, as long as it lasts, and when these United States are all in use and under cultivation, those who want farms and land to build on can go (when this country shall hav become one immense Garden of Eden) to South America or Africa. Why should we monopolize land and thus bring a curse on our children, and children's children in their being obliged to buy on time that land, their own by right of birth or citizenship? See here, in Oregon there are 6,466 farms. Of these 2,416 are rented from landlords, and the balance almost all mortgaged to the railway company, bankers, note-shavers, monopolists, etc. Can truth seeking make any headway under such a state of affairs? Think of it!—about 60,000,000 acres given away by the United States government to the Northern Pacific Railway Co.! The government has no right to giv away an acre except for actual settlement thereon, and when this settlement is not made the land should be forfeited or lapse back for the use of whoever will make it productiv, as in the mines. This is the law of right and justice. Thwart it, war, bloodshed, ruin will follow. Support it and make it a fact, happy homes, an activ people, Freethinkers and truth seekers follow—workers, instead of preachers, lawyers, note-shavers, land grabbers, and human leeches in general who liv off the workman, the widow, and orphan. I, too, could almost worship Patrick Ford for his support of free lands, and for his advocacy of labor emancipation, and forgiv, too, his worship of a fetich—God, Christ, Holy Mary, and the saints. What is this superstition after all to the vital questions of bread and butter, and who knows but that he may be a Liberal at heart but has to be a Catholic in outward appearance? If a child believes in "Mother Hubbard," why undeceive it? The little child is first, in childhood, a little pagan; second, when older, Christian, and finally, when mature, an Infidel, reformer, evolutionist, truth seeker, postivist, German philosopher, Freethinker, Theosophist, scientist, Liberal, or an anti-fetich Christian of some kind.

All honor to D. M. Bennett in the field of truth seeking, and all honor to Ford, I say again, in the field of free land. With both these reformers I am an ardent co-worker.

My wife tells me I hav three hobbies. First, free land; second, all men producers of some kind—workers; third, equal rights of the sexes in all things. I could add others. The sin of going into any kind of debt whatever—this, Mr. Editor, I know you will not gainsay as regards your subscribers—co-operation, etc. HENRY GEORGE GORDON.

Christianity Reinforced.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: From the Kansas City Journal I cut the inclosed account of an interview with the notorious and infamous Frank James, now incarcerated in the jail of Jackson county, Missouri, and shortly to be tried for several murders and any number of highway robberies.

It will, no doubt, delight our Christian friends to learn that so exemplary and holy a man as this colossal murderer and thief is not in sympathy with Mr. Ingersoll, and will doubtless greatly distress the latter to know that his great and noble efforts in the work of releasing the minds of mankind from the thraldom of superstition do not meet with the approval of such a lover of the Bible, such a firm believer in God, as Mr. Frank James, murderer, etc.

R. H. MORTON.

FRANK JAMES ON INGERSOLL.

Scores of persons visited the illustrious prisoner, Frank James, in his cell at Independence yesterday, many of his old friends being among the number, together with the usual crowd who go to see him through curiosity. The morning he reserved for his personal wants, going to the barber shop to get a shave. Late in the evening a Journal representativ called at the jail. The usual formality of sending a card to him was omitted, and the scribe was ushered in to the prisoner unannounced.

The prisoner was not so well as a few days since. The reporter intimated that the confinement did not admit of sufficient exercise for health, when Frank said that that was not the reason, but that he had been talked almost to death by the crowds that were coming in constantly. Though a large number visited him yesterday, when approached by the Journal man he was as cheerful as ever, and was seated in a cane rocking chair in the upper corridor. He was smoking a Havana—he smokes a great number of cigars, and eats celery to offset the nervousness that otherwise would prostrate him on account of incessant smoking.

The criminal, in speaking of news, said that a reply to Ingersoll would appear in the Globe-Democrat of some issue during the week. He requested that a copy of the Globe be secured for him. Referring to Ingersoll, he denounced him as a blasphemer and hypocrit.

"Ingersoll," continued Frank, "goes abroad denouncing the Bible, the most sacred of all books. He ridicules its teachings and the savior, and yet amid all this he has hearers to the number of two thousand, while a man for using an indecent word while drunk, will be confined thirty days. My God, how can such a state of affairs be?"

His reference was made to the interview with Bob Ingersoll, as published in the Journal, by a visitor who said that it was exaggerated, and that Bob had not said so much against the prisoner as was reported. James replied that "any man who would assail the sacred book would dare do anything," adding: "The Lord is my helper. I care not what men shall do or say against me. Ingersoll is doing unspeakable injury to this nation. He is sowing the seeds of iniquity in the minds of our youth."

A visitor replied: "He is having a good influence upon all. He is causing them to think. He advocates adherence to no doctrin. He is a lover and a helper of his fellow-man."

James then said, speaking to the visitor, "Even in you we hav an illustration of his evil influence upon the youth, who are a young man, and one, I suppose, whose mother endeavored to rear in the light of Christian truth, but in your advocacy of Ingersoll you are on the downward path, and unless you turn from its evil way you will go to hell."

The visitor, endeavoring to retrieve, said that he did not indorse Ingersoll, but believed in free thinking, that God never made man to put him here and giv him freedom, yet bind him by laws which would compel him to pay his allegiance to the Almighty.

To this Mr. James replied: "In man there is an intuition which tells him there is a God, and any man who says to the contrary is a hypocrit. He deceives himself. God does liv, and it seems that he will sometime strike Ingersoll to earth for his blasphemy. How any man can liv and hav his being in this universe and say there is no God, I don't know." Turning to the visitor, who said he would hav to retire, he said: "If you follow Ingersoll you some day may be where I am now, in jail, and I know finally will be in hell, so turn aside. There is no one more lenient than the creator, and you yet may escape the torments of hades."

THE warriors who manage the interests of the Salvation Army in this city claim that they have secured three thousand converts here. They say, however, that the converts "are so afraid of being chaffed" that not one-twentieth of them are willing to appear in public. The army announces its intention to wage war against the hosts of sin in meetings on the steps of the City Hall every Tuesday afternoon until further notice. The pleasure of holding these meetings and of attending them is hardly as great as it might be if the bootblacks and other somewhat irreverent young persons would refrain from chaffing the speakers.

The New Era.

ANOTHER OPEN LETTER TO T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ.

From the Boston Investigator.

FRIEND WAKEMAN: I hav just read your letters, extracts from lectures, etc., to Messrs. Mendum and Seaver, and begin to think that I hav wronged you in my last two cards in the Investigator, and that it was more your words than Dr. Draper's that started me to proclaim the 282 Freethought Calendar last January, and also that you first conceived the idea of basing a calendar on Bruno and 1600.

I hav disliked you and Mr. Courtlandt Palmer cordially for a few weeks, thinking that through you two I was being more wronged than I perhaps really am, for if you can prove to me that your article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 15, 1881, contained the words that you say immediately followed your reference there to Dr. Draper's idea of a monument to Bruno in St. Peter's at Rome, viz.: "But would it not be a surer and nobler monument than any 'enduring bronze' could ever be, to date the calendar of this new era of science and man from the year 1600 as the year one?" I will more than willingly acknowledge that I hav been wronging you instead of you me, for I as strongly object to robbing others as to being robbed myself, and accordingly, I hereby withdraw my last two cards in the Investigator.

Our mutual friend, Josh Billings, says, "It is human to error," and although I now cherish no ill will toward you, I yet feel somewhat pleased to see that your humanity is as evident as my own, for your letter in to-day's TRUTH SEEKER contains more errors than any document of its size in North America. But in view of the fact that the adoption of this calendar by even yourself, as well as all other persons, is due to me, it does seem as though your remark, that other folks hav "done more for the new calendar idea than Mr. Hill," is "thin" enough to defeat itself. Very truly yours, GEO. N. HILL.

Petrified Trees.

Stone forests are in many parts of the world. A number of stony trees hav been recently received at the Smithsonian Institute from the West. In many cases they are hardened by the peculiar atmosphere as they stand, and in others they are buried, the parts being replaced by mineral matter. The little Colorado River in Arizona has long been a famous locality for such finds. At one place more than 1,500 cords of trunks and sections of logs were found by government surveyors. Most of them were silicified. Many are 7 feet or more in diameter and from 20 to 70 feet in hight. The greater part of them hav probably been covered in the marl that originally was 1,000 feet thick. Some of the trees are changed to jasper, assuming numerous hues, while others resemble opal and when broken open the core is found lined with crystals of the most beautiful tints. Louisiana and Ohio are noted localities for fossil trees. In the former state, several years ago, in turning up the ground, an ancient forest layer was unearthed, and in succession two others below it, and scientists judge from the size of the trees that from the time of the first layer to the last 50,000 years must hav elapsed. In the remains of the glacial drift in Ohio old forests are often discovered. Some hav been buried beneath the water by the sinking of the land. Some of the Ohio trees are not entirely changed into stone, being yet soft, while others are found in all stages from rock to porous sponge matter.

In some parts of the island of Antigua, one of the British leeward group, there are most remarkable examples of stone forests. The trees are in many instances of great size, presenting a curious sight with living birds perched upon their leafless and stony limbs.

The fossil palms are the most remarkable of all these stony forms. They generally hav a cylindrical stem, rising to a great hight, crowned with a canopy of foliage that stands upon the rock in high relief.

Some wonderful stone forests have been unearthed by the workers in the building-stone quarries of the Isle of Portland, from which comes the famous building stone. The workmen had cut down to what they termed a dirt bed, and suddenly came to the stony forest standing upright. There were hundreds of trees a few feet apart. The tops appeared to hav been wrenched off, but many were forty feet in hight. On some of the limbs were the delicate stems, and here and there leaves and twigs. In Van Diemen's Land similar forests are known, the great trunks being calcified and partly silicified, while others are changed into chalcedony. They were found, in most cases erect, with the branches and limbs scattered about their roots. So natural were many of these that a newly arrived laborer sent out to collect wood brought in a load, complaining of its heaviness. They are used, however, being burnt for lime.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent three months to new subscribers for 50 cents.

MR. EDITOR: I hav this day received the third volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." The engravings alone are worth the price of the book.

I like your reply to T. Winter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 18th. It does you credit. Keep out the slang of all kinds if you can. Sunderland is not very clear. He has some truths, and a multitude of errors. I hav had manifestations he says never did and never could occur. ELLA E. GIBSON.

NEW YORK, Dec. 9, 1882.

MY DEAR MRS. BENNETT: In this your hour of bereavement let me extend to you my heartfelt sympathy for the loss of your good husband—a loss not only to yourself, but irreparable to the whole thinking community, and while we lay him away to his rest let us be consoled with the thought that his good words and deeds can never die, but serve as a beacon-light to all who come within the pale of their influence.

Please accept the accompanying design of flowers emblematic of the life of one who has reaped his reward by daring to liv in his highest consciousness of right. Very truly and sincerely,

HARRIET M. ALLYN.

CYNTHIANA, KY.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you for publication a communication from George O. Barnes. It is a singular production, coming, as it does, from a popular evangelist. But it shows how even fanatics are drifting away from the superstitions of the past:

Allow me to do a thing I seldom venture upon, viz., correct a report of my utterances. Once and again I am reported as calling Colonel Robert Ingersoll "Bob Ingersoll." Allow me to say that if I am a "crank" I am a gentleman born and bred. No one has a right to degrade me, as above, by putting a false utterance in my mouth. Colonel Ingersoll is a man whom, personally, I respect. He is a noble type of manhood. That makes his teachings so dangerous. If he were blackguard "Bob" he could never do the awful work he is accomplishing. But gentleman as he is, scholar as he is, intellectual giant as he is, and, above all, attacking a theological God, who is wholly indefensible by Dr. Talmage, Judge Black, or any one else, he stands upon such a vantage ground that I do not wonder he is "sweeping the decks" by his oratory and making Infidels of thousands upon thousands of the best thinkers of our nation, old and young. And I frankly confess here, as I hav often said from the platform, that if I had no other God than the God whom Col. Ingersoll so fiercely, justly, and successfully assails, I would gladly take refuge, as he does, in the only comforting thought left—that there is no God. Oh, if he only knew my God, and the God and our father of our Lord, Jesus Christ! I believe he would trust and love and preach him as I do, while abating not a whit of his opposition to the devil enthroned, whom so many thousands in and out of the church are trying to worship and serve. How unsuccessfully, let the dead churches and deader church-goers witness. "The stream rises not higher than its source."

Thinking as above, you see how impossible it is for me to speak of Col. Ingersoll as "Bob." May I ask you to insert this as early as possible, and oblige, Yours truly,

GEO. O. BARNES, Evangelist,

Yours for truth always and forever,

H. A. BEAMER.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Can it be true that the great and good man, D. M. Bennett, no longer livs? It is hard for one to realize the fact who has been so recently cheered and encouraged in a lonely prison cell by kind words penned by one who seemed to liv only to make others happy and bring to the greatest number the greatest good. Words cannot express the regret and deep sorrow I feel at reading the sad lines announcing his death, which I received only an hour ago. Every true Liberal and Freethinker throughout the world, around which he has so recently journeyed, must feel as if a member of his or her own household is being laid to rest. Dead! But his spirit still livs, and his deeds and works will ever liv, as will his memory, sacred in the hearts of all Liberals. I speak from personal experience when I say I know he was the friend of the poor and those in distress—held down under the iron hand of despotism and oppression. The first number of my paper, issued yesterday, has testimony to this fact. It is with feelings of much regret that circumstances will prevent me from attending the funeral next Sunday. Please convey to Mrs. Bennett my heartfelt sympathy in this her hour of greatest sorrow. In the loss to the world of D. M. Bennett, humanity has lost one of its greatest, best, and truest friends. The sad news of his sudden death will cause a shock and the deepest sorrow in more than a hundred thousand homes in his own beloved and native land.

Yours in sorrow, SYLVESTER F. WILSON.

BERHAMPUR, BENGAL, INDIA, Oct. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Thank you for your kind donation of tracts and pamphlets, which are of immense value to me in exposing the false system of Christianity. I hav translated some of the tracts and leaflets in the Bengali language, adapting them to Bengali notions and ideas, and I hope you and other Liberal authors will not hav any objections in my translating their works in Bengali for the benefit of the masses. I shall be very glad to be your agent for the sale of anti-Christian and Liberal books, pamphlets, tracts, etc., here in Bengal, for I am given to understand there are no agents here in Bengal for the sale of Liberal and Freethought works. Anti-Christian, Liberal books, etc., are in great demand here in this country to strike the Christian clergy in the face with. I hope you will send me a small consignment of the "Self-contradictions of the Bible" for sale.

The Salvation Army has arrived at Bombay, and some of the "soldiers" were put in jail for rioting in the streets of Bombay. The whole people of India are crying them down and cracking jokes at their expense. I am of opinion that they will soon be routed out of India with hisses. I will send you newspaper reports of their doings in India by the next mail. They are a ridiculous sect of people after all.

I hope you gave my last letter an insertion in your widely-circulated journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope that the American Liberal brothers and sisters will take note of that letter and help me in my way to expose the false system of Christianity in this part of the world, where so-called "reverend" missionaries are practicing pious frauds pretty unmolested.

I wish to keep a copy of your photographic portrait in my album, and hope you will kindly take a little trouble to send me one.

I remain fraternally yours, KEDAMATH BADU.

FARLEY, IOWA, Dec. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: If the people, or the majority of the people, in any state may by constitutional amendment prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors merely because the use, or abuse, of them sometimes leads to drunkenness and crime, what is there to hinder the same majority from prohibiting the importation or breeding of horses in the state, as their presence often leads to stealing? Could we not, also, prohibit the preaching of supernatural religion, as thousands of people become insane through religious excitement? Are we children, that we need a parental law thrown about us, guarding our every act lest we be led off into crime? Prohibition means that we, as individuals, are unable to govern ourselvs. If that is a fact, we cannot expect to long participate in the government of others. If unable to govern ourselvs, we ought not participate in the government of our neighbors. Minors and prison convicts are not considered able to govern themselvs, neither are they allowed to vote, hold office, nor execute the laws. Prohibition undermines the basic principles of our free institutions—the principles of self-government.

Every source of human happiness may be rendered an evil through abuse, but it does not follow that we hav the right to inflict a penalty on those who do not abuse their liberties. This is too much like the scheme of salvation, with this difference: it punishes the innocent for crimes which others may commit, instead of what they hav committed.

"Liberalism Run Mad" is where a Liberal gets so smart that he knows better than myself what I should eat, drink, or wear. Until my neighbor becomes fully possessed of this great intelligence, I beg of him not to vote away my liberty. If he does, he should at once join the church; that is where he belongs. Few real Liberals feel competent to dictate in these matters. H. GILMORE.

NEW YORK, N. Y., NOV. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Rev. R. Heber Newton, in a sermon a while ago, says: "The story of Abraham is that of a magnificent manhood; he was courageous, pious, and of fine qualities."

I deny it.

Did Abraham show magnificent manhood in pawning off his wife as his sister? Was it magnificent manhood in him to sell her person to a rich king? Did he prove his magnificent manhood when he received sheep, oxen, asses, camels, and servants as compensation for his wife's shame?

Did he not doubly assassinate his magnificent manhood when he repeated the whole transaction with a second king? Did Abraham exhibit magnificent manhood when he became the father of a child by his wife's servant girl? Did he prove magnificent manhood in allowing this girl (Miss Hagar), with babe in arms, to be driven from his house into the wilderness to perish? Was it the climax of magnificent manhood in him when he deliberately sharpened a knife with which to butcher his son?

It will not do for Rev. Newton to say Abraham's wife was taken from him by force. He was strong enough to hav fought for her. A magnificent manhood would hav fought to victory or death.

Will Mr. Newton deny this?

Not one objection did Abraham make, according to holy writ. His accepting pay, not once, but twice, proves that it was a sale. Gain he wanted; gain he received. Such was the magnificent manhood of Abraham upon earth. He carried it with him to heaven; there he again showed it, by refusing a drop of water to an unfortunate in hell. Here let us leave him.

Rev. R. Heber Newton is an Episcopalian. He preaches a creed that came from the brain of the seducer, adulterer, and murderer, Henry the Eighth. This monarch had six wives, and murdered two.

I respectfully challenge Rev. Mr. Newton to a discussion of the merits of Abraham.

WILLIAM W. FOSTER.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Oct. 31, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The undersigned is one of your subscribers, and has followed you on your Round-the-World trip with the greatest interest. I hav read letters and descriptions from other men and tourists, but their panorama fell far short of your live, all-observing, all-eyed pictures. I rejoice that you returned sound and safe, for it was not altogether a pleasure trip, nor without many dangers. I was one of them who did not like to see you undertaking that trip, while I very much favor a trip through the states, for I was afraid you could not stand the hardships. Now that you hav got through so well I rejoice. I hav been a Freethinker for thirty years, and decisivly outspoken. When I joined the Freemasons I was told I must quit advocating Freethought, but I rather quit them and hav my liberty. But that was not all. Through my whole life I hav been more or less persecuted for opinion's sake, even by friends and brother Masons, who I know were just as free in their belief as I was, but they say you can think what you please, but must keep shut up. They were afraid to deal with me lest they might be set down as Freethinkers. And this has followed me more or less through all my life. In proportion the society of this country is as bad as Spain was in the time of the Inquisition. A few days ago the reverend reformers stuck their heads together to find out how they could get God in the Constitution, arguing that said God was everywhere except in our Constitution, and he ought to be let in. I say keep him in your lunatic brains. We hav no use for him anywhere, far less in our politics or in our great national charter. An intelligent preacher some time ago told me when a preacher has had charge of a church congregation ten years he will feel convinced that he has not a half dozen Christians among them. I told told him that they hav none at all. I hav five sons and one daughter, none of whom are Christians or ever went to church. The two eldest sons graduated at college and hold fine positions. The third is a machinist, and does very well. The fourth and fifth attend high school. I think I gave them something in place of religion.

Yours truly, C. R. LEONHAEUSER.

LONG LAKE, MINN., NOV. 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I would mildly inquire who the poetry man of THE TRUTH SEEKER is, or the individual on whose discretion and responsibility some of the alleged poetry appears in THE TRUTH SEEKER'S columns? The readers of your paper are mostly charitable, patient, and long-suffering, but there is a limit to even their patience, and some day, if this thing continues, will appear in New York in their war paint, surround your office, and demand that the party be delivered in their hands for instant execution. Seriously, I think we should be spared the infliction of such horrible doggerel in your columns, even at the expense of gently snubbing a few correspondents who frequently, like Mr. Megg, "relapse into poetry" or rhyme that would put the song of Captain Kidd or any old love and murder song of the last century to the blush. I do not think I am very hard to suit, but I would like to see the poetry at least approach to the excellence exhibited in the other departments of your paper.

I indorse what J. N. Hiller has to say in regard to Heywood. Any person who will make a sort of a moral scavenger of themselvs, who are on the hunt for dirt, and, when they find it, insist on sending it to some one else, let them take the consequences. It is no quarrel of ours, and his cheap and contemptible effort to be considered a martyr will fail. I am relying on the account given of it in THE TRUTH SEEKER as correct.

I hav read E. C. Walker's labored attempt to defend free rum. It has the same rancor, the same arguments, and sounds very much like the pamphlets that the different liquor dealers' associations are flooding the country with now. You can find them on the bar of most any rum-hole in the country for free distribution—arguments paid for by the blood-money of intemperance. What reform or improvement does Mr. Walker propose with this thing, admitted by all thoughtful people to be the great overshadowing curse of this country? None. His arguments consist in a mere dead negation. His perceptions of liberty are so very fine that he cannot think of interfering in the least with the monster, but will stand back splitting hairs about personal liberty and trying to cripple those who are at least honestly seeking some way of throttling it. What if the churches are moving in the matter? If we cannot wish the church or any other organization success in any movement calculated to better mankind, we do not deserve the name of Liberals.

I admire very much the calm, dispassionate, and rational course you pursue in the article entitled "Materialism versus Spiritualism," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 4th, and also on the same subject in your issue of November 18th. There is just one thing to be regretted in the matter, and that is, it brings this man Winter into undue prominence—far more than his ability warrants. A man who cannot write without exposing such lack of intelligence and such brutal egotism does not deserve to be replied to with any philosophic arguments, and is really not worth the notice of those who hav deigned to reply to his ebullitions. J. H. LYDIARD.

KIOTA, IOWA, Dec. 1, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5, which please use as directed. I guess that is the right tune to commence my song with. Yes, you need money, for war is costly, and the arrows hav been flying pretty thick lately. And you neglected to search for the ashes of the golden calf when in Sinai's neighborhood, also forgot to hav the golden animal reproduced by the occult power of Madam Blavatsky, for if she produces brooches, rings, letters, etc., why not calves also? but I guess it takes more than occult power to release a golden bovine from the grip of the priesthood; it takes revolution.

Since you took that long walk you are convinced that nine-tenths of the population of this globe liv in ignorance and misery, downtrodden by the one-tenth that rule, govern, and devour the wealth produced by the nine-tenths. Will not the ignorant hav to begin yon life in the summer-land as they leave this? Will they not consequently be the downtrodden, the dupes there as well as here? Circumstances made us what we are, but to see from the realms of the summer-land the same torment and misery, pain and sorrow, starvation and ill-treatment among our children and descendants, established for eternity, and not hav the power to help and assist them, is about equal to the Christian hell. To claim eternal consciousness as a reward to balance the misery of this life looks to me like curing disease by making it permanent. Would not a settlement between producer and devourer, between labor and capital, muscle and stomach, be more effectiv this side of the tomb? I shall gladly giv my atoms back to the universe to enter into new combinations—would gladly light my own funeral pile if possible. I am happy to know that the functions of the brain end, that the lightning photographs called thought, mind, spirit, must cease when the circulation and warmth of the blood discontinue. Our individual electricity and magnetism which in combination with the same powers of the universe produced all pictures in our brain, from the first impression of our mother's eye to the reading of the last TRUTH SEEKER, must immutably vanish away with the last beat of the heart. Let us look at some arguments of the haunted-house brotherhood. Could not these raps at the door be produced by any civilized cat, as well as Mohammed's white dove played Holy-Ghost rappings on the the table—may be still closer; may be inside the skull, caused by a rush of blood there? I nailed some shingles on my barn lately. Suddenly that barn delighted in a dance. Now, if human spirits delight in muscular actions, as swinging chairs and tables with men on top of them, why could not Caligula's horse's spirit enter one of my horses and swing a barn? In the ordeals of the middle age the monks produced writing, invisible at the beginning of a trial, while covered by some oily liquid, but when the vapors disappeared the judgment of God, always in favor of the church, was there. As to the vision of a London mother and her dying son, an officer in India, allow me to say that my mother had like visions—to hear me call her name, see me wounded and dying, when I did the best I could with the hard crackers and tough beef, and I think that a majority of mothers who had sons in the combat had like visions. These visions are brought on by continued disturbance of sleep, disease, irritation of the nerves, use of opium, etc.

When a boy, I went to an old lady's room who lived on the second of our house to prepare a lunch, the old lady being absent on a visit. I kindled a fire and tiptoed about; but, as it goes, upset a board that leaned against the wall. The old lady suddenly died, twenty miles away, precisely the same hour when I upset that board; and at her funeral the congregation thought it strange that the good old cook departed with the report of a gun.

Hav not thousands, nay millions, distinctly heard the cries and groans of their beloved in the purgatory fire? Hav they not, with trembling hands, given all their possessions to the church to escape the terrible conflagration? till later centuries discovered that wind was blowing on tubes in a hollow wall; but there is a good deal of wind yet blowing in our days. Hav not millions been spent to soothe and quench the tears of the holy virgin? till the laymen learned that some gay and happy fishes caused those tears to flow; and yet how many hollow heads could be made useful as fish-ponds in our days?

You say that, however this eternal existence, this individual consciousness after death, turns up, it must be founded on natural force or power; and three-fourths of the spiritual clan are of the same philosophy, whilst church-member Spiritualists take root in supernatural divinity." A world-wide difference. It may be someway cold where I, Winter and Co. stand, but whoever saw the truth cannot go back to the folds of eternal, conscious, individual existence to warm.

Your TRUTH SEEKER is now, and has always been, very interesting, and I owe thanks to Torquemada Comstock, for by his efforts to crush you I became acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER. May it shine forever to enlighten the dark corners of superstition.

CHAS. NAUMANN.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., NOV. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Of late I read in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER several articles for and against prohibition. While I do not claim to take sides with either, from a general observation of the effects of intemperance during my life of fifty years, my commom sense teaches me that could we remove it entirely from our country we would rid ourselvs of a scorching, demoralizing curse. This no reasoning, observing person can truthfully deny; and, as a Freethinking class, what are we going to do about it?

Our aim, as Liberals, should be to improve and advance ourselvs and our fellow-men to a higher plane of civilization—to a nobler and better life than it is possible to liv under the superstitious teachings and examples of the leaders of the Christian religion. If, then, we see about us every day indications leading in a contrary direction to what we consider right and their result end only in disaster, is it wise, is it human, are we acting well our part and doing justice to our fellow-men when we stand idly by and see them drifting slowly, but drifting surely, into this whirlpool of destruction without putting forth an effort to save them from what we know, from the experience of a lifetime, will deprive them of every motiv tending toward the result to which we as humanitarians aspire?

In THE TRUTH SEEKER, No. 43, E. C. Walker makes use of arguments, which carried further convey quite a different impression than they do at the point where he leaves them.

One is led to the conclusion that he considers a man a free, moral agent; free to eat what he likes; free to drink what and as much as he likes, and do precisely what his pleasure or inclination dictates, without let or hindrance, so long as he keeps within the limits of the law. This is the argument used by a majority of his class, if not by him.

No sensible person will deny to Mr. Walker "the right to his apples;" but any community would most determinedly deny to him the right to destroy them if through the process of their destruction he liberates therefrom any qualities detrimental to the welfare of his neighbors, by which their lives or liberties are endangered, or that would cause them expenses which they would not otherwise hav to incur.

This is just what Mr. Walker's "freedom" does for the people. It deprives them of their liberty through the drunken brawlers frequenting our streets and places of amusements, compelling our female population to either remain at home or to venture out only in company with some burly escort. The drunken rows of almost daily occurrence endangers the lives of the people; and through this same cause we are deprived of our equal rights, when from our honest earnings we are compelled to contribute toward defraying the expenses attending the prosecutions, the outgrowth of this "liberty;" to assist the neglected wives and children of these liberty-loving people and educate their offspring, which the exercise of this liberty makes impossible or of little import to them—otherwise, defeating one of the grandest and most cherished aspirations of Freethought for the coming generations; for instead of aiding civilization this liberty blocks the wheels of progress, and givs us instead naught but ignorance, poverty, and degradation.

Mr. Walker says, "Each man's liberty ends where that of another begins." Very true; but will my friend define the point at which the drinker's liberty should end in order not to infringe upon that of another who does not drink. It strikes me that when investigated critically and justly, with a view to get at the truth, these champions for liberty of action will be compelled to stop far short of the point at which they hav heretofore been stopping. Let me illustrate:

On the mountain side of this city a few years ago a mining company for the cheaper treatment of their ores erected a stamp-mill over their mine. To operate a stamp-mill successfully a certain quantity of water is required. When the supply of fresh water is inadequate it is used over and over from settling tanks, and when too thick with sediment it is turned loose, and, just like friend Walker advocates, is at liberty to go wherever the laws of gravitation carried it. Prior to this mill—we will assume it was a gin-mill—being placed there, the clear water flowed on in its natural channel, interfering with no one; but as soon as the dirty, slimy water began to take the place of the previous stream, it filled up the natural channel, changing the appearance of everything with which it came in contact, and also changing its previous course, taking its way through the streets of our town until they were flooded and overrun with drunkenness—beg pardon, with filth and slime—to such an extent that we could not travel them without having the filthy stuff adhering to us, and which we could not avoid carrying to our homes with us; while our wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters, try ever so much, could not avoid its obnoxious presence whenever they ventured upon the streets. What was the result? Notwithstanding the mine owners, like friend Walker, insisted that that was a natural water course, and the city authorities had no right to interfere with the liberty of the water, they did interfere, and stopped it, too, because it had become an injury to the people through the change which had been brought about through the operations of their (gin) mill. It is all well enough to talk and preach liberty and the rights of individuals to perform certain things, but when such acts seriously interfere with the liberties of others, we should consider both sides carefully, and if our better judgment and experience teach us that these liberties not only injure us but tend to debase, impoverish, and lead into the lowest degradation those who avail themselvs of it, we should strain this flimsy cord of imaginary liberty to breaking, if necessary, in order to do away with this monster, intemerance.

I would ask Mr. Walker were he a farmer, and here and there would find growing in his field a Canada thistle, would he destroy it that his farm might not be overrun, or would he argue that it had as much right to grow there as the grain. The grain brought to himself and his family comforts and luxuries of life, but as the thistles began to take possession of the ground the luxuries disappear, and by and by the comforts, until finally even the necessaries of life are gone—nothing left save the satisfaction of having demonstrated his theory of equal "liberty." Would it not be better for us not only to pluck from out our own fields these liberty-demanding thistles, but see to it that our neighbor's fields are equally well kept, that we may not be called upon to contribute from our honest toil, depriving our families of the comforts to which they rightfully belong, in order to minister to the wants of our neighbor's starving family, because he believes thistles should hav the same liberty as wheat and corn?

None but a fool will knowingly giv something for nothing, and he is an idiot of the highest order who pays out his hard-earned money for that which is far worse than the biggest piece of nothing the world ever saw.

When the drinking of liquor tends to debase and lower a person in every possible manner, how can you on the silly plea of liberty of action stand up for it when you must know, if you know anything, that the result is all bad and nothing good—no, nothing? When you see the bad results in thousand of cases, and find not one good one, I ask you, in all candor, to sit down and earnestly ponder this matter over, and change the ending of your article so as to read, "The question before us is, is the advocacy of whisky-drinking, with its almost inevitable result—drunkenness—in harmony with the principles of Freethought? I answer, No." If I am not as good a writer as friend Walker I am as honest in my convictions, and think I hav the best interests of humanity in my favor.

Address to the King of Great Britain.

BY THOMAS PAINE.

[Written on a gloomy day during the Revolution.]

Go round the tombs and single out the place,
Where earth itself will suffer a disgrace.
Go spell the letters on some moldering urn,
And ask if he who sleeps there can return.
Go round the numbers that in silence lie,
And learn by study what it is to die.
For sure that heart, if any heart you own,
Conceits that man expires without a groan.
That he who livs, receives from you a grace,
Or death is nothing, but a change of place,
That peace is dull, that joy from sorrow springs,
And war's the royal raree show of kings.
Else why these scenes that wound the feeling mind,
This sport of Death, this cockpit of mankind?
Why sobs the widow, in perpetual pain?
Why cries the orphan, Oh, my father's slain?
Why hangs the sire his paralytic head?
And nods with manly grief, My son is dead?
Why shrieks the maiden, robbed of ease and sense;
He's gone, he's killed. O heaven take me hence?
Why drops the tear from off the sister's cheek?
And sweetly tells the sorrows it would speak?
Why lisps the infant on its mother's lap?
And looking round the parlor, "Where is pap?"
Why weeps the mother when the question's asked?
And kiss an answer as the easiest task?
Or why with lonely step does pensiv John,
To all the neighbors tell, "Poor master's gone?"
Oh, could I paint the passions I can feel,
Or point a horror that would wound like steel,
To that unfeeling, unrelenting mind,
I'd send a torture, and relieve mankind.
Thou, thou art husband, father, brother, all
The tender names that kindred learn to call.
Yet like an image, carved in massy stone,
Thou bearest the shape, but sentiment has none.
Allied by dust and figures not by mind,
Thou only herd'st, but livest not with mankind,
And prone to liv like some outrageous ape,
Thou knowest each class of beings by their shape:
Since then no hopes to civilize remain,
And all petitions hav gone forth in vain.
One prayer is left, which dreads no proud reply,
That he who made you liv would bid you die.

No Time Like the Present.

If you're told to do a thing,
And mean to do it really,
Never let it be by halves:
Do it fully, freely.

Do not make a poor excuse,
Waiting, weak, unsteady;
All obedience, worth the name,
Must be prompt and ready.

When father calls, though pleasant be
The play you are pursuing,
Do not say, "I'll come when I
Hav finished what I'm doing."

If you are told to learn a task,
And you should begin it,
Do not tell your teacher, "Yes,
I'm coming in a minute."

Waste not moments nor your words
In telling what you could do
Some other time; the present is
For doing what you should do.

Don't do right unwillingly,
And stop to plan and measure;
'Tis working with the heart and soul
That makes our duty pleasure.

—Phœbe Cary.

Contrasts.

A short June night, now brightening fast to dawn,
A house with doors and windows open wide;
A silent sick room, where a dying man
Lies prostrate in his youth and manhood's pride

A bird's sweet carol, entering glad and shrill—
A bird that sings of hope, when hope has fled;
And the sound smites the watcher with a thrill
Of agony, as if some voice had said:

"Weep on—and watch! but I shall sing as sweet
Among the roses—though thy dear ones die;
And all the world shall pass with careless feet,
Although thy heart be broken utterly!"

O little bird! how tuneful was that lay,
That fell so bitterly on mourner's ears;
Yet it was summer, and what tongue will say,
"'Twere well if nature too could share our tears?"

—Chambers's Journal.

Life.

Our life is nothing but a winter's day;
Some only break their fast and go away;
Others stay dinner, and depart full fed;
The deepest age but sups and goes to bed:
He's most in debt that lingers out the day;
Who dies by times, has less and less to pay.

Scriptural Catechism.

Question.—Is God omnipotent, or able to do all things?

Answer.—Yes, except to commit sin.

Proof.—"And the Lord was with Judah; but COULD NOT drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron!" Judges i, 19.

Q. Is God omnipresent? that is, equally present everywhere at the same time?

A. Certainly; consequently he cannot be a locomotiv being, moving from place to place.

Proof.—"And it came to pass, at the INN, the Lord MET him and SOUGHT to kill him!" Ex. iv, 24. "And the LORD WENT his way." Gen. xviii, 33.

Q. Is God omniscient, or all-seeing?

A. Certainly; he sees all things in all places and at all times.

Proof.—"Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel and removed them OUT OF HIS SIGHT." 2 Kings xvii, 18. "And the Lord LOOKED THROUGH the pillar of fire." Ex. xvi, 24.

Q. Is God subject to grief or pain?

A. No; as this would imply that he had not sufficient power to make himself happy.

Proof.—"And it REPENTED the Lord that he made man on the earth; and it GRIEVED him in his heart." Gen. vi, 6.

Q. Is God subject to fear?

A. No; as this would imply the existence of a power superior to his own.

Proof.—"And the Lord God said, Behold the man is become as one of us. And now LEST he eat of the tree of life, and liv fore/er; therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden." Gen. iii, 22, 23.

Q. Is God unchangeable?

A. Yes; "for I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are ye not consumed." Malachi iii, 6.

Proof.—"And God came to Balaam at night, and said unto him, if the men come to call thee rise up and go WITH THEM." "And God's anger was kindled because HE WENT!" Num. xxii, 20.

Q. Is God the author of sin or evil?

A. No; "God is of purer eyes than to behold evil and cannot (even) look on iniquity." Habak. i, 13.

Proof.—"I form the light and create darkness. I made peace and CREATED EVIL. I the Lord do all these things." Isa. xlv, 7.

Q. Can any evil proceed from God?

A. Certainly not; as all evil is said to proceed from the devil.

Proof.—"And the EVIL SPIRIT FROM GOD came upon Saul; and there was a javelin in Saul's hand, and Saul cast the javelin; for he said, I will smite David with it even to the wall." Sam. xviii, 10, 11.

Q. Does God ever repent, or experience emotion of sorrow in consequence of his own acts?

A. "God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent." Numbers xxiii, 19. "And also the strength of Israel will not lie or repent, for he is not a man that he should repent." 1 Sam. xv, 29.

Proof.—"And it REPENTED the Lord that he had made man on the earth." Gen. vi, 6. "And the Lord REPENTED of the EVIL he thought to do unto his people." Ex. xxxii, 14. "And the Lord REPENTED that he had made Saul king over Israel." 1 Sam. xv, 35.

Q. Has God ever been seen by man?

A. No; the scripture is positiv in this point: "No man hath seen God at any time." John i, 18, "And the Lord said, that thou canst not see my face; for there shall be no man see me and liv." Ex. xxxiii, 20. "And thou shall see my back parts, but my face shall not be seen." Ex. xxxiii, 22.

Proof.—"And Adam and his wife hid themselvs from the PRESENCE of the Lord." Gen. iii, 8. "And the Lord spoke unto MOSES, FACE TO FACE, as a man speaketh unto his friend." Ex. xxxiii, 11. "The Lord talked to you FACE TO FACE." Deut v. 4. "Therefore, hear the word of the Lord; I saw the Lord, sitting upon his throne." 2 Chron. xviii, 18. "And SAW the God of Israel." Ex. xxiv, 10. "Also they saw God, and did eat and drink." Ex. xxvi, 11.

Q. Does God ever command people to rob or steal?

A. No; as all that kind of business, we must suppose, belongs alone to the devil. Besides, the commandment says, "Thou shall not steal."

Proof.—"And the Lord said unto Moses speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbor, and every woman of her neighbor, jewels of silver and jewels of gold. And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they borrowed from the Egyptians, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment. And the Lord gave the people favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent unto them such things as they required; and they spoiled the Egyptians." Ex. xi, 2. Ex. xii, 35, 36. "And Jacob set the rods he had peeled in the gutters before the flocks; and the flocks conceived and brought forth cattle, ring-streaked, spotted, and speckled. Thus God took away Laban's cattle and gave them to Jacob." Gen. xxx, 38, 39. Gen. xxxi, 9.

Q. Does God ever put lies in the mouths of his prophets?

A. No, never.

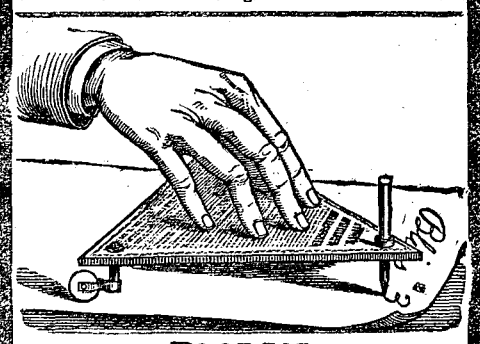
Proof.—"And the Lord said, who shall entice Ahab, king of Israel, that he may go up and fall at Ramath Gilead?" Then came out a SPIRIT and stood before the Lord (an impudent one, we presume), and said, I will entice him. And the Lord said unto him, Wherewith? And he said I will go out, and be a LYING SPIRIT in the mouth of all his prophets. And the Lord said thou shalt entice him and shall prevail; go out and do even so. Now therefore, the Lord hath put a lying spirit into the mouth of these thy prophets." 2 Chron. xviii, 19, 20, 21, 22.

Q. Does the Lord ever deceive his prophets, and then punish them because they are deceived.

A. No; "Surely God will not do wickedly, neither the Almighty pervert judgment," Job. xxxv, 12.

Proof.—"And if the prophet be deceived, I, the Lord, hav deceived that prophet; and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him in the midst of my people Israel. And they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity, the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him." Ezek. xiv, 9, 10.

Q. Did God ever giv to mankind laws or statutes that were not good?



A. No, never.

Proof.—"Wherefore I gave them statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not liv; and I polluted in their own gifts." Ezek. xxv, 36.

Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Gems of Thought.

PAUSE, O friend, ere thou doest wrong! Remember that it is not only the deed itself that will be thy condemnation, but the long train of events that may grow out of it. We are all living examples to others. We must lead those we influence either toward the good or the evil. We hav it in our power to go right or wrong before we start, but we can never retrace a step after it is once taken.—Elmina D. Slenker.

To send an uneducated child into the world is injurious to the rest of mankind; it is little better than to turn out a mad dog or a wild beast into the streets. . . . A man of fortune who permits his son to consume the season of education in hunting, shooting, or in frequenting horse-races, assemblies, or other unedifying, if not vicious, diversions, defrauds the community of a benefactor, and bequeaths them a nuisance.—Paley.

THE disciplin of slavery is unknown
Amongst us, hence the more do we require
The disciplin of virtue; order else
Cannot subsist, nor confidence, nor peace.
Thus duties rising out of good possessed,
And prudent caution needful to avert
Impending evil, equally require
That the whole people should be taught and trained.
So shall licentiousness and black resolve
Be rooted out, and virtuous habits take
Their place, and genuin piety descend,
Like an inheritance, from age to age.
—Wordsworth.

THE Bramanas are barely readable. The Avesta is far from attractiv. The Bible, though vastly superior in this respect to all the rest of its class, is yet not easy to read for any length of time without fatigue. Doubtless, if taken as a separate study, with a view to something which we desire to ascertain from it, we may, without difficulty, read large portions at a time; yet we see that Christians who read it for edification invariably choose, in their public assemblies, to confine themselvs to very moderate sections of it indeed, while they will listen to sermons of many times the length. There can be little doubt that a similar practice is pursued in private devotion. Single chapters, or at most a few chapters, are selected: these are pursued, and perhaps made the object of meditation; but even the most fervent admirers of the Bible would probably find it difficult to read through its larger books without pausing. They do not, so to speak, "carry us on." It was essential to dwell on this tediousness of sacred books, because it proves one of their most marked characteristics.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

SCIENCE is penetrating everywhere and slowly changing men's conception of the world and of man's destiny. Doctrins which once were damnable are now fashionable, and heresies are appropriated as aids to faith. Arises no longer the age described by Carlyle—"Destitute of faith, yet terrified by skepticism." It is an age clamorous for faith, and only dissatisfied when skepticism is a resting-place instead of a starting point—a result instead of a preliminary caution. The purely negativ attitude of unbelief, once regarded as philosophical, is now generally understood to be only lauded in the face of the demonstrably incredible.—George Henry Lewis.

AND never yet was growth save when it broke
The letter of the dead scholastic form.
The bark drops off and leaves the expanding oak
To stretch his giant arms through sun and storm
The idols that upon his breast lay warm
The sage throws down and breaks their hallowed shrine,
And follows the great hand that points to light divine. —The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

WITH what face can you Christians attempt to make us Infidels converts to your faith when you hav not yet decided among yourselvs what Christianity is? Surely it will be time enough to make proselytes of others when you yourselvs are agreed, for Calvin damns the pope, and the pope damns Calvin, and the only thing in which they agree is in damning Socinus, while Socinus, in his turn, laughs at both and believes neither.—Colton's Lacon.

ALMS-GIVING—that is, the giving of money to the idle hangers-on of popery—is among the private duties that the church inculcates, we know for what ends. Let us consider with what arguments and incentivs. She assures the alms-giver that he will be richly repaid, and indeed that he can nowhere else find such interest for his money. When he hath given it he not only is quit of old sins in an exact ratio to the sum deposited, but he may run up a fresh account and always stand on the credit side.—Lander.

ON every side Sabbath laws are becoming less stringent, or are less and less regarded. Public libraries are being opened, travel is being less curtailed, there is more out-of-door exercise and enjoyment. Is this as it should be, or is it all wrong and must it be opposed by legislativ enactment that has its roots in constitutional law? If the appeal to the past were final or specially significant it might be shown that the Puritan Sabbath is itself an innovation, and that the Christian Sunday and the Jewish Sabbath are two entirely distinct institutions; that for hundreds of years after the birth of Christianity work was continued on the seventh day, and that for long after the discontinuance of work amusement shared with worship the privileges of the day. But our appeal is not to the customs of the past but to the needs of the present.—J. W. Chadwick.

THOSE who seek the truth only, and desire to own and propagate nothing else, freely expose their principles to the task, and are pleased to hav them examined. They giv men leave to reject them if they can, are willing to hav it detected, that they themselvs, as well as others, may not lay any stress upon any received proposition beyond what the evidence of its truth will warrant and allow.—Locke.

Odds and Ends.

A DEVOUT little boy, living inside the corporation, was heard to say, in solemn attitude, the following: "Lord, I've got a cold, awful one, too; I want you to come and cure me—cure me quick, too. I can't see you, but guess you can see me. Wake me up soon in the morning. Don't care whether you wake Henry up or not. Amen."

AN old colored man, with his legs twisted about like corkscrews from rheumatism, and also partly paralyzed, sits on the steps of the Austin Court House and solicits alms. "You must hav a pretty hard time of it, uncle," remarked a sympathetic stranger, handing him a nickel. "Yes, boss, dat's a fact. Dar's six ob us in de family, and I's de only one able to get about an' earn a libin'."—Texas Siftings.

AN EPISODE.

A maiden fair livs over the way,
The gutter is muddy, the steps are steep.
Oh, where is the young man, stylish and gay,
That maiden's comp'ny who used to keep?
Hath he sailed or the seas and fickle proved,
Or hath he been shook by his own beloved?

Ah! a sadder fate 'twas his to meet—
The gutter is muddy, the stairs are steep.
The old man booted him out in the street,
And laid him away in the gutter to sleep.
The maiden mourneth over the way,
And the young man buyeth arnicay.

A DOCTOR'S SUBSTITUTE.

He was a young man with a wild, disordered look. He rushed into the office of a prominent city physician yesterday, placed a small cup on the desk, took off his coat and bared his right arm and whispered, "Stick me!"

"Do you want to be bled?"

"I do! Open a vein and let me catch the blood in this cup!"

"Too full in the head?"

"Alas! too full in the heart! My affianced will not believe me when I tell her that I love her better than my life. I will write my love. I will write it in my own blood! Proceed!"

"Is that all you want?"

"All? Is not that sufficient?"

"Young man, you are a dodo! Put on your coat! I keep a red ink here for the very purpose you desire, and I will sell you a whole gill for a quarter."

And the young man was not stuck.—Detroit Free Press.

A MAN from North Billerica, Mass., bought a piece of wild land near Lake Hickpochee because of a wonderful natural curiosity which the land agent pointed out to him. It was a palmetto log wedged into the branches of a water oak twenty feet from the ground. The purchaser moved upon the place and spent his time between meals and grubbing roots in wondering at the log in the tree. One day last week he solved the problem. It rained as it rains only in the Everglades, turning a flood of water from the saw grass region down into Lake Hickpochee, and his neighbors heard him shouting three miles away. He hallooed all night long, and the next morning they went over in a boat and brought him out. He was sitting in the top of the tree with his feet in the water, and, with a long pole, was keeping off floating palmetto logs that were endangering his seat by wedging themselvs in among the branches. The land agent thinks he can sell the place for him at a profit when the water goes down if the flood does not ruin the curiosity.

TEN LITTLE BIGOTS.

Ten little Bigots, chalking out a line,
One couldn't toe it, then there were nine.

Nine little Bigots, full of zeal and hate,
One asked time to think, then there were eight.

Eight little Bigots, fencing roads to heaven,
One cut across lots, then there were seven.

Seven little Bigots, at each other shying bricks,
One's pet creed was smashed, then there were six.

Six little Bigots, fighting who should drive,
One got down and walked, then there were five.

Five little Bigots, wrangling more and more,
One heard of Darwin, then there were four.

Four little Bigots, still could not agree,
One kicked his catechism, then there were three,

Three little Bigots, madder yet they grew,
One cried, "Damn it all!" then there were two.

Two little Bigots, each with loaded gun
Aimed at the other, left was only one.

One little Bigot, crowing all alone,
Tackled Bob Ingersoll, then there was none.

THE "CHIGGER."

And it came to pass that when Noah opened the ark and turned the pig loose on the ranch, that he saw the chigger as he sat upon a sprig of pusley in one corner of the pig-pen, and Noah said unto him, Behold, thou art even the smallest among insects, but because of thy exceeding energy thou shalt hav domain over the sons of men. And behold the pusley is given unto thee as a dwelling-place yet shalt thou inhabit every green herb of the field in its season, but the pusley shall be thine forever.

And it shall come to pass that when the husbandman goeth forth to the field to battle the pusley that cumbereth the soil thereof, then shalt thou pounce upon him and worry him, and poison him, and every man shall scratch, and he shall find no rest till frost comes.

And behold the daughters of the land shall wail in anguish of spirit, and despair shall fill the soul of lovely women, when thou shalt manifest thy lively self beneath the folds of the corset when she appeareth in crowded places and in public halls. And no man shall despise thee because of thy littleness, but all men shall hate thee because of thy exceeding cussedness.

And it shall come to pass that the sons of men shall fight thee with kerosene oil and carbolic soap, yet they shall fight in vain. And the dealers in kerosene oil and soap shall wax rich and become great in the land, yet thou shalt exist forever and the farmer shall not prevail against thee.

IMPORTANT.

There are several base and worthless imitations of Dr. Thayer's Magnetic goods upon the market. The only apparent merit they have is Cheapness. Cheap goods in this line, as in every other, are dear at any price, and cannot render as efficient service to the patient, because they DO NOT HOLD THEIR MAGNETIC CURRENTS OVER THIRTY DAYS.

"Magnets, whether Natural or Artificial, would soon Lose their Power if they were left to Themselves. They must therefore be Provided with Armatures." (See Ganot's Philosophy.)

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

EXTERNAL APPLICATION,

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. ☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. ☞ Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notices from the Press.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Times.]

We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician, who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of those who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

[From the Star Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.]

TO INVALIDS AND OTHERS: The Banner seldom indorses any doctor or medicin, but it is free to say to all interested that Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., is not only a skilful and reputable practitioner, but one of the most successful physicians in the United States.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 9. No. 51. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY M. W. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, December 23, 1882. { NO. 21 CLINTON PLACE, NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control has begun new efforts in London to influence opinion in favor of disestablishment.

THE Chemical Review says that recent analyses of water from the holy well at Mecca —where it is eagerly drunk by pilgrims—show it to be ten times stronger than the average London sewage.

THE Christian Intelligencer thinks "there is no more beautiful sight than a congregation assembled in families—father, mother, and children seated together in pews;" and, it might hav been added, all asleep.

THE Rev. Dr. Hicks, who was spiritual adviser to Guiteau, announces that the assassin is not in hell, because there is no such place. According to this doctrin, then, the slayer and his victim are both enjoying the advantages of celestial residence, regardless of the merits of either. There is very little room for consolation in the thought.

DR. VIRCHOW, the German naturalist, has shown at the Berlin Anthropological Society some ancient skulls found in the Caucasian district. They are believed to afford proof of the existence of the race called Macrocephali, described by Hippocrates. The heads are large and extremely long or high in form, an effect believed to be due to bandaging in early infancy.

BISHOP BORGESS has forbidden the Roman Catholic churches of Michigan to raise any money by raffles, fairs, excursions, or balls. The first consequence of this is the lessening of the incomes of several charitable institutions, and he has ordered an assessment on his diocese to make up a deficit of $1,300. Between the two evils of extortion and swindling, the bishop has apparently chosen the former as the least.

THE Abbe Prevost, the famous author of "Manon Lescaut," was not rich, and, like the authors of his time, resolved to be on the lookout for a rich patron. He accordingly addressed himself to the Prince of Conti, of whom he asked an appointment as chaplain. "As my chaplain!" exclaimed the prince in astonishment. "But, good heavens, sir, I never hear mass!" "That is precisely why I asked for the appointment," said the abbe; "I never say it!" The prince did not giv him the chaplaincy, but he gave him an allowance of 1,200 livres.

DR. WILD, of Toronto, who is apparently all that his name implies, announces that Adam was seven feet high. His reason for this conclusion is that the first man was perfect, and seven is a perfect number. "Three is the trinity number, and stands for the creator; four stands for the world; thus seven includes the creator and the created. Seven means completion. There are seven virtues that make a perfect man—virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity." The fact that a man will throw seven at dice oftener than any other number may also hav a significant bearing on this important subject.

THE Congregational Club of Boston has been discussing the question how to win young men to Christianity. The Rev. R. R. Meredith said: "The churches to-day do not get the best and sharpest young men. They get the goody-goody ones, easily enough; but those who do the thinking are not brought into the church in great numbers. You cannot reach them by the Bible. How many did Moody touch in this city during his revival days? You can count them on your fingers. The man who wants them cannot get them with the Bible under his arm. He must be like them, sharp. They cannot be gathered by sentimentality. If you say to them, 'Come to Jesus,' very likely they will reply, 'Go to thunder.'"

THE Rev. J. Fletcher Wilcox became pastor of the Christian church in Chicago, with the understanding that, in lieu of salary, he should be permitted to preach whatever doctrins he pleased. This arrangement proved a failure on the first trial. In his opening sermon he told the congregation that the righteous would literally inherit the earth for a thousand years, and that the wicked would be utterly destroyed at death. He was informed by a committee on the following day that the church could not listen to such a belief, and that his pastorate was ended. A hand organ that plays but one tune would suit that congregation.

WHY can't those religious and highly moral people be content with having selfishly secured front seats in the heavenly dress-circle for themselvs and leave us fellows alone to wrangle for our places in the red-hot fiery pit. But they won't. They want the pitites to feel their position, and to understand that they mustn't feel comfortable nor hav any fun in their warm quarters. Hence they pour the dregs of the celestial ambrosia on the heads of us poor groundlings. Now, we protest. Let these fellows sit in their celestial gallery and their heavenly dress-circle in peace; and let us hav our fights and our sports in the pit without being bombarded with religious invectiv and showered with moral slush.—Exchange.

PROF. LANGLEY'S discovery of a queer spot of light on the disk of Venus during the recent transit has excited a good deal of interest. The discoverer says he is unable to account for it, though he is convinced it was some phenomenon connected with the surface or the atmosphere of the planet, and not an optical illusion of any kind. Two other observers at Pittsburgh saw the light, and their descriptions of it accord closely with Prof. Langley's account. This discovery, following that made not long ago of a curious network of lines on Mars, which some hav imagined might be a system of gigantic canals, will probably lead to more careful telescopic study of the various members of the solar system. The improvements recently made in spectroscopic appliances and the great size and power of some of the telescopes which hav lately been constructed, or are in course of construction, render it probable that within a few years a great advance will be made in our knowledge of the physical condition of some of the nearer of the other worlds belonging to our system.—Sun.

THE Church Union does not seem to hav any very clear ideas in regard to the Sunday laws, but it has succeeded in getting off the following: "It has always been a question worth discussing at what point to begin the distinction between liberty and license. The new Penal Code under which New York has just now come furnishes a fresh occasion for considering this question in its provisions which refer to the keeping of the Sabbath. We are free to say that we regret the haste of religious people to present this as a religious question. No doubt it is so in some of its phases, but to so proclaim it on the whole is to foredoom to defeat the efforts of the better portion of the public to enforce the code. Whether good or bad, whether reasonable or reasonless, there is a firm conviction in this land that it is not the business of the state to legislate in the interests of religion. That may be a sword that cuts both ways—but unquestionably the public sentiment of this land is irrevocably committed to that principle. To demand the enforcement of any law on religious ground is in fact to antagonize that sentiment."

THE Toledo Blade notices the fact that Chicago has produced a great many heretics. Among the most prominent may be mentioned, Dr. Collyer, Bishop Cheney, Professor Swing, Dr. Thomas, Mr. Wilcox, and Mr. Miln. And in comment, the Blade makes this significant statement: "The fact of these ministers giving up orthodox views for what are termed heretical ones would not be so significant but for the truth that they are to-day more popular than ever before and draw larger audiences together. It will not do to put this down simply to their eloquence, but it goes to show a state of things that must be recognized and accepted by the churches and acted upon if they would preserve their influence for good. Go through those of Toledo to-day, and if the members spoke the truth, nine out of ten would express their disbelief in some of the cardinal doctrins, such as eternal punishment, burning in a literal lake of fire and brimstone, the everlasting damnation of unbaptized or non-elect infants, etc. It is a necessity that religious creeds be reconstructed or the churches will lose their hold upon the people more and more every year."

THE sacrifice by John Smith of his boy at Los Angeles, Cal., after the manner of Abraham's contemplated murder of Isaac, was an example of the evil effects of implicit belief in the plenary inspiration of the Bible, and the adopting of its barbarous teachings and examples as a rule of life. Smith had never read the Bible until within a year, but on becoming a Methodist spent most of his time poring over its pages. He not only convinced himself that he ought to make a human sacrifice, but brought his wife and son, aged 13, to accept that view. "When he talked to me," says the wife, "and persuaded me that a good woman ought to think as her husband did, I got so as to take whatever he said as the truth. He made us fast, and Ben asked him frequently if God had ordered us to starve. He said yes. When he announced that the boy must be killed, we both remonstrated, but finally thought it was all right. On the day appointed for the ceremony he called Ben out of the house, and told him that he had to die for our savior. The little fellow knelt down and I got on my knees by his side. John raised the knife, looked hard into the boy's face, and then drove the knife into his breast." The woman who is now in jail, still believes that the deed was justifiable, though she breaks down on recollecting the sight. "I am always thinking of Ben," she exclaims. "I can bear him all times in the night asking to be brought in and laid on his bed, and begging for a little water before he died."

IN the case of Dr. J. K. Alleon, convicted in the United States District Court of circulating improper matter through the mails, Judge Treat, in that court, on Dec. 15th, alluding to the case, gave the Society for the Suppression of Vice a severe rebuke. Commenting upon its method of securing convicts, he said that the conviction of Alleon rested upon a decoy letter sent by Mr. McAffee, the agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice. The question was whether the Federal statute had been violated, and then arose the questions, "Who caused the statute to be violated? What right under the statute had the society's agent to exploit in that manner and violate the statute? Did not this amount to manufacturing crime? It matters not how guilty the convicted man is, it matters not for the purposes of this branch of the inquiry whether the mails were used by quacks, humbugs, and worse people. The point is a violation of the federal statute touching the use of the mails for circulating obscene matter—who provoked the commission of the crime? The state courts were open for the punishment of evil-doers. Ought the federal court to be used to aid manufactured crime? The society, no doubt, was composed of excellent persons interested in the moral welfare of the people, but it did not know all the agencies employed to bring the persecutions about. The parties had gone to the wrong forum. The state courts dealt with quacks, specialists, etc. There was another question—whether printed matter that might be construed indecent when mailed to a school girl could be considered so when forwarded to a woman of mature age or professional men? The whole matter deserves careful consideration when such cases are brought to the federal court for treatment under federal statutes."

News of the Week.

TOLEDO, Ohio, has had a $650,000 fire.

PRINCE TARUHITO, of Japan, is in this city.

BISMARCK is suffering from neuralgia, and Emperor William is confined with a cold.

TWENTY-SIX lives were lost last week by the foundering of a British bark off the coast of Ireland.

AN explosion of a powder mill which occurred at Mountain View, N. J., last Monday, killed three workmen, and was felt ten miles away.

NEW proclamations hav been issued by Earl Spencer, lord-lieutenant, offering $25,000 reward for information leading to the conviction of the Phenix Park assassins.

A NEWSPAPER called the Moon is published on Ward's Island, near New York, and the matter printed in it is prepared entirely by the inmates of the insane asylum.

THE poet Whittier's 75th birthday was celebrated on the 17th inst. His health is good, with the exception of a slight cold, and his mental vigor seems unimpaired.

PREACHERS and Christians generally are protesting against the production of the Passion Play on the stage. They say that it is sacrilege for any man to endeavor to personate God.

MOUNTAIN EVANGELIST BARNES is still holding forth in this city, and preaching the gospel to what he denominates a "world run by the devil." He has not as yet succeeded in drawing large audiences to hear him.

THERE is a little boy in this city four years old who has smoked ever since he was weaned. He is as large as most boys of his age, healthy and bright. The only peculiarity about him is taciturnity, as he never talks while smoking.

THE porte, of Turkey, has issued a proclamation to the representativs of the foreign press to the effect that anything written against the government, and thrice repeated, will secure the expulsion of the writer from the country.

TALMAGE, last Sunday, preached a sermon of protest against the habit which other preachers hav of plagiarizing his utterances. He himself had been accused, he said, of plagiarism, but he wanted to wager $1,000 that it could not be proved.

BEECHER was before the Senate Committee last Saturday, and talked about speculativ trading, otherwise known as stock gambling. He believed in the righteousness of this kind of speculation, and by way of a joke said that it was part of his business to deal in "futures."

THE ten Brooklyn aldermen who were imprisoned for contempt of court were released last Sunday morning, having served out their terms. The last twenty-four hours of their stay in jail are said to hav been passed at a game called poker, at which one lucky alderman won more than enough to pay his fine.

THE attempt to enforce the new Blue laws in this city grows feebler with each succeeding Sunday. By a liberal construction of the law, ice cream is allowed to be sold as a necessity, railroads run their trains, ferry-boats ply the rivers, and ministers are permitted to earn their salaries without molestation from the police.

HERR MOST, editor of the Freiheit, of London, arrived on the 11th. His friends had prepared a reception for him, but the delay of the steamer prevented his attendance. Herr Most's notoriety among Socialists is mainly due to the fact that he suffered imprisonment a short time since for advocating their principles. A large meeting was held in his honor at Cooper Institute on the evening of the 18th.

A New English Reformation.

The free exercise of human reason has been so generally discouraged by the teachers of all systems of supernatural religion, and so often condemned as an act of positiv outrage against God, that the conscientious seeker after truth must be excused if at the very threshold of his spiritual inquiries he pauses to ask, By what authority and to what end is the fair use of my highest faculty thus denied me?

To this question the apologists of Christianity, of Buddhism, and of Mohammedanism respectivly return replies which are almost exactly similar. They all claim that their religions are, more or less directly, founded upon revelations from God to man, and they all agree that revelations of such a kind are necessarily obscure and mystical, and beyond ordinary human comprehension. Every difficulty which occurs to them, so they affirm, provides them with fresh proof of the divine origin of the religious system which they profess; and it is the evident will of God, so they say, that these mysteries should be accepted by the world in the light, not of reason, which is confessedly incapable of understanding them, but of faith. They assert, in fact, and in spite of the contradiction involved, that the essence of revelation is obscurity, and that it lies without the province of humanity either to prove or to disprove anything which they declare to be based upon divine revelation. Reason, they add, is fatally misleading. It may, and does, guide men aright in the ordinary affairs of business and daily life; but if we applied it to matters of religion, we should be forced to surrender the beliefs which we profess; and the faith in which our fathers lived and died would become meaningless, and even absurd, to our children.

But surely it is an unwarrantable assumption to suppose that the revelation of facts which are deliberately intended to teach men how to save their souls from perdition can be made by God in language so tangled and implicit as to be incomprehensible. It cannot be conceived that God would speak in double acrostics, or that doctrins of the gravest importance should be proclaimed by him in any but the clearest and most explicit words. What, indeed, is revelation if it be not something plain and precise? And if that which is said to be revelation presents any difficulties to the conscientious inquirer, what is there in any law, human or divine, to prevent his making diligent endeavor to try the truth of the claim advanced? The Bible, which has been so often misquoted as a supporter of passiv obedience and childish ingenuousness, expressly advises men to prove all things; and in the case of Thomas, Jesus is represented as having himself gone so far as to directly appeal to the disciples' reasoning faculties. For what purpose, too, were the miracles of the gospels if not to enforce belief upon the most incredulous? It seems, in fact, almost impossible for Christians to put forward any sound argument to show that man is ever expected, even by their own religion, to believe without proof; and yet Christian teachers are, of all men, the most exacting, and, it may be added, in many cases the most inconsistent in this matter. Protestantism is the result of an early skirmish between people who reasoned and people who did not; yet the reasoning party, which was victorious at the Reformation, now denies the exercise of reason to its own followers. A Protestant, it is true, is tolerably wide awake to the credulity of Roman Catholics, but it must be borne in mind that he discovered the weaknesses of the papacy three hundred years ago, and that nowadays he is quite as credulous—though in a slightly different direction—as any papist. He inveighs against popery as being a tissue of absurdities; yet his own spiritual digestiv powers hav proved capable of assimilating so many astonishing dogmas that unprejudiced observation fails to perceive in what respect his credulity falls short of that of his neighbor. It is scarcely fair to speak of the so-called faith of either as anything better than a superstition; for in both instances belief is avowedly founded upon something which would not be considered evidence in any court of justice. But while the church of England, which we may fairly consider to be the best and most representativ exponent of Protestantism as well as the most influential, is an inconsistent institution, that of Rome is at least thorough-going and, to a certain extent, logical. The former denies some improbabilities, yet sets the seal of its approval upon others which are equally startling. The latter, on the other hand, boldly lays claim to infallibility, and, instead of making any concessions to reason, continually advances its forces and increases its pretensions. Both, however, agree in denying to the individual the full and free exercise of his reasoning faculties; and what Christianity denies is also denied to humanity by the teachers of Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and all the other old religions of the world.

The grounds, therefore, upon which Christianity is based are no more explicable than the foundations upon which other religious systems are built; nor is it seriously pretended that they are so. If a doubting Moslem were to lay his difficulties before his Ulema, he would be told that the mysteries of Islamism were matters to be received not by reason but by faith; and a doubting Buddhist who sought his priest would be sent home with much the same answer. People are Christians, or Mohammedans, or Buddhists according to their place of birth rather than for any other reason; and no system of supernatural religion even claims to be logical, or to bear with it any proofs which are capable of carrying conviction to a healthy and deliberativ mind.

Reason, therefore, it is plain, must not be exercised by any who, for one purpose or cause or another, desire to hold fast by what is called supernatural religion. It is apparently the bounden duty of every Christian, for instance, to completely silence his own reasoning faculties, and to listen only to the voice of his church; for who can doubt that supernatural religion, if there be such a thing, has laws as immutable as those of nature, and that these laws demand a uniform and general obedience, such as can only be properly rendered by individuals who rule their lives according to some common and infallible interpretation of what is alleged to be revelation?

What, then, can be said for the so-called faith of Christians, when we find that the standard of their belief varies as time goes on? They hav gradually found that some of their tenets are so grossly improbable that it is impossible any longer seriously to defend them; and with an inconsistency, which would be charming were a subject less grave in question, they hav surreptitiously modified their creed so as to make it more nearly fit in with the hard and unyielding facts of practical experience. Fifty years ago orthodox churchmen in England professed to believe that the biblical account of the creation was literally and punctually correct, and that the world and all its contents were made within six ordinary days. That faith is now held by very few save those who are Roman Catholics, and by not all even of them. Geology demonstrated the untenability of the theory, and nine Englishmen out of ten thereupon unblushingly adapted their creed to circumstances, and surrendered their position at discretion. A further surrender had to be made when the question of the deluge came under discussion, although there is perhaps better reason for believing the story of a universal flood than for crediting the biblical account of the creation; and in time, too, the histories of Balaam and Jonah were explained away—so that if English Christianity proceeds upon the lines which it has followed for the last half-century, it will in another hundred years cease to possess a large proportion of its present supernatural elements. And yet it is only upon the supernatural that dogma, the very corner-stone of every system of so-called revealed religion, is founded.

It is not surprising that certain Christian dogmas hav been so easily relinquished by Protestants, when we reflect upon what weak bases many of them rested. Even the major dogmas of the religion are built upon foundations of the flimsiest and most precarious kind. Christians, for instance, believe in the trinity, yet they accept as divinely inspired the whole volume of the Old Testament which does not make the remotest allusion to a triune god; and they argue for the necessity of infant baptism, although it can by no means be proved that such baptism was practiced until long after all the apostles were dead. Is it a matter of faith with Christians that belief in the trinity and the practice of infant baptism are needful to salvation? and, if so, what authority can they adduce for these and a score of other dogmas? It would seem that they can bring forward little or none. Within living memory new dogmas hav been invented, and published as necessary to salvation, by the strictest and most consistent of all Christian communions, the Roman church; and during the last fifteen centuries dozens of other dogmas, many of them being professedly of the highest importance, hav been similarly manufactured and promulgated, certainly without even the most shadowy warrant from the Bible as it is interpreted by unprejudiced minds. The obvious conclusion is that the Christian claim that the religion is entirely based on divine revelation will not hold water, for religion is to dogma what proverbs are to vulgar wisdom—the embodiment and the essence.

Does not the shifting standard of Christian faith of itself prove that that faith, at least in its later developments, is "a fond thing vainly imagined?" If, however, the conscientious inquirer, having made these and similar reflections, be not so far convinced, let him consider the improbability, nay, the impossibility, of the bases of the Christian religion. To do so he must return once more to the subject of revelation.

And what is revelation? It is the demonstration to man of the laws and will of God, the poet of the universe, the unchangeable, the eternal. What is the process? According to Christians, revelation is made chiefly through the medium of inspiration; it is crystallized in the Bible; but according to a still more widely-received view, revelation is made through the operations and results of what are called natural causes. Does anyone who does not altogether deny God, deny that he works in nature? that by him the day and the night succeed each other? that by him the grass and the flowers grow? and that by him everything that is is guided and governed? Yet the views of the Christian and of the man of wider mind are incompatible. According to the Christian view, for instance, on a certain occasion, "the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day." According to the wider view, and it is susceptible of proof, the sun could never hav been, as the passage implies, above the horizon in Syria for something like twenty-four hours without causing the whole solar system to collapse. Can it be presumed that the unchangeable God has told one story in the Bible and has nevertheless informed the world by the voice of science that that story could not possibly be true? Can it be imputed to God that he ever thus trifled with those whom he intended should liv or die according to their obedience or disobedience to his laws? And can it, if we turn to other circumstances and considerations, be supposed that God, who claims to be just, gave his countenance to the deeds of blood and rapine which are narrated with such unmixed approval in the Old Testament?

It is unnecessary to dwell upon this point, for it is one which has been so often and so carefully dealt with that little or nothing remains to be said about it. The conscientious inquirer may, however, say, "God is all powerful; provided that I hav fair evidence upon which to believe these and other alleged interferences with the ordinary laws of nature and justice, I will believe them." The final question is, therefore, Is there fair evidence? Is there even any evidence at all?

Now it would be clearly unsafe to place implicit trust in any assertion contained in the Bible if it could be plainly demonstrated that other assertions of equal importance were of very doubtful veracity. It speaks much, therefore, for the honesty and fairness of the men who hav recently in England produced a revised version of the New Testament that they hav not hesitated to call the attention of their readers to some of the grosser instances of unwarrantable interpolation and omission in the texts from which the translation of 1611 was made. One of the chief dogmas which must suffer in the popular Christian estimate by the revision is that of the bodily ascension of Jesus into heaven. We may be excused if we briefly consider it, since it serves to illustrate the matter in hand. Matthew makes no historical mention of the ascension. Mark passes it over rather vaguely by saying that "the Lord Jesus, after he had spoken unto them, was received up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God;" and John, like Matthew, makes no allusion to the matter. Luke, in the version of 1611, is made to say, "And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he was parted from them and carried up into heaven. And they worshiped him," etc. But in the version of 1881, Luke's language takes a different turn, and states "it came to pass while he blessed them he parted from them, and was carried up into heaven. And they worshiped him," etc. And a marginal note says that "some ancient authorities" omit the words which we print in italics. The only other historical reference in the New Testament to the ascension is the passage in the Acts, which says, "And when he had said these things, as they were looking, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight." Upon these words, therefore, rests the whole dogma of the physical ascension of Jesus. Considering that the miraculous event, if it happened at all, is alleged to hav occurred in the presence of a number of the apostles, it is, to say the least, astonishing that the gospels of Matthew and John, who were apostles, pass it by in absolute silence, and that those only of Mark and Luke, who were not, make mention of it. And, if we take it that the Acts is also the work of Luke, we may sum up the matter generally by saying that no apostle makes direct mention of any kind of this wonderful thing which, if it ever occurred, must hav made an indelible impression upon all who witnessed it. As for Luke's version, part of it is, according to the revisers of 1881, of at least dubious authenticity; and, for aught that Mark says of the ascension, the alleged miracle may hav been no miracle at all, for his words, making due allowance for the extravagance of oriental language, will perfectly well bear the natural interpretation that Jesus died, and, in common with all good people, passed to a happier state. At all events, it is plain that the doctrin of the physical ascension of Jesus rests upon very shadowy foundations; and, this being so, is it safe, especially when the supernatural is in question, to place implicit trust in any other assertion contained, or supposed to be contained, in the Bible? Even supposing that the original authors of the New Testament wrote in perfect bona fides, it must be conceded that copyists and transcribers had thousands of motivs, in posse, if not in esse, for adding to or subtracting from the manuscripts as they first stood, and it must at the same time be remembered that there is no existing copy of even a single fragment of the New Testament which is of earlier date than the second century; that there is no existing original manuscript of the

New Testament which was written until after the end of the first three centuries; and that of the chief early manuscripts, aleph dates from the fourth century, A from the fifth, B possibly from the fourth, C from the fifth, D from the sixth, and L from the eighth. Surely, all things considered, such authority as this is not sufficient for the conscientious truth seeker.

And by a similar process it may be shown that other cardinal dogmas of Christianity are based upon evidence which cannot satisfy an unprejudiced mind. Still, however, behind all this doubt and disbelief, there is something certain which the inquirer may grasp by the true and unerring light of reason and science, which last is another name for experience. If God has not revealed himself to man by means of the miracles which the Bible professes to record, he has at least revealed himself, and is revealing himself daily, by methods which, although perhaps revolutionary of all preconceived ideas and aspirations, are utterly and completely convincing. Faith may be challenged and confounded, science cannot; and science is the only revelation. As we approach to perfect knowledge, so shall we approach to perfect wisdom, which is the wisdom of the Poet of the Universe; for the whole wisdom of man, actual and possible, is the eternal wisdom of God. Our knowledge is to-day far, very far, from complete. We are only on the threshold of the dawn, and all is still dark and mysterious about us. For years to come we must continue to raise altars "to the unknown God," and rest content to hope and long and work for the light; but the light of wisdom will come at last, and then, and then only, convinced by the irresistible miracles of the Eternal Wisdom, will all the nations be of one mind and of one faith. Reason is destructiv, but it is also constructiv. It has never yet overthrown a dogma of supernatural religion without demonstrating some new law of nature; and it has never taken away any man's faith without giving that man something truer and better in exchange for what he has been deprived of. What Jesus and Paul did is now being done by science. They asked for proof and found it not, when they encountered the apologists of the older religions. So does science. And according to their knowledge they set about reforming the faith of humanity. So do those who work with the new revelation in their hands. But now all things are growing clearer. The sun is mounting behind the distant hills, and when, in all its perfect splendor, it shall look over their summits, there will be no man so foolish as to deny that it is day.

This course of thought has been suggested by the perusal of a small and hitherto almost neglected volume which has recently been published in England by the author of "The Fight in Dame Europa's School," entitled "The Council of Canterbury." The writer, who is a priest of the Established church, and who relinquished a minor canonry at Salisbury in order to go as chaplain with the late British Arctic Expedition under Nares, appears to hav long been puzzled by the conflict of science with dogma, and to hav now determined to cast in his lot with the former; for his book is a bold and earnest appeal for the fair exercise of reason in the church of England. It is made up of an imaginary dialog between a scientific professor and a Liberal and enlighted archbishop of Canterbury, supported by a high-church archdeacon, an evangelical canon, and a broad-church dean; and the conversation which is chronicled is supposed to arise out of the fact that the archbishop, uneasy at being powerless to deal, to his own or any other reasonable person's satisfaction, with the increasing body of modern unbelief in Christianity, decides to call a council of representativ men of all parties, pledged to discuss the matter fairly in all its bearings, and to weigh and consider every view put forward, the ultimate object being to arrive at uniformity. Those things which can be proved the church of England is to hold and teach; those which cannot are to be relegated to the limbo inhabited by the myths of paganism; and, in an informal kind of way, the five friends rehearse the contemplated council of Canterbury.

The professor is the son of an English clergyman, and has passed through the usual phases of restlessness and doubt, until finally he has been obliged to relinquish the dogmas of Christianity and to reject the theory of the inspirstion of the Bible. The archbishop, who is, we fear, not of the stuff of which archbishops are generally made, says that he is heartily sick of the unreality of his position. He "is ashamed of the cowardice which keeps him and his party forever silent, when all the world is looking toward them and bidding them speak out in God's name," and he considers his position contemptible beyond all words. "Every day," he laments, "somebody is coming to me for help, and I hav nothing to tell him except that he had better leave hard questions alone." Difficulties perpetually evaded and never faced hav, he feels, put the clergy into an utterly false position, and he is bravely determined to do what he can to set matters right. He considers that all fair-minded men hav much the same object in view—the weeding out from among them of that which is false, and the more diligent culture of that which is true; and he asks his friends to join him in confessing their weak points and indefensible positions, and to giv up gracefully what they cannot maintain, owning, if need be, that here and there they hav been in error. The archdeacon, on the other hand, is implacable. He is not in error. "Christ's presence is with us," he asserts; "Christ's truth has been committed to our keeping; the word of God standeth fast forever; and the church cannot err." The canon, too, at once takes up an unreasonable and determined position, and is perpetually begging the question "by referring to holy scripture." He is indignant at the wickedness of the professor, and considers that "the Bible and the whole Bible, just as we hav it, is the full and perfect revelation of God's unutterable truth," and that "its so-called difficulties are such only as we should expect to find in language addressed by the infinit creator to the finite creature." The dean is a little more tolerant. He does not think it impossible that in the future some few passages in the Bible may be cited as curious legends of the past, and may provoke a decorous smile; nor does he "hesitate to confess that there are certain episodes of scripture history which he heartily wishes could be removed. But they involve no important principle of belief," and, if only Christ is left him, he does not mind what else is taken away.

The professor courteously states his difficulties and doubts. He shows that the study of nature forces him to disbelieve much that is in the Bible; he insists upon man's duty to ask a sound reason for all that he is required to believe, especially if it concerns his welfare either bodily or spiritual; he points out the absolute immorality of belief upon insufficient evidence; he laments Christian intolerance; he wonders at the infatuation which impels Christian teachers to profess to believe matters which they confess they cannot comprehend; he comments on the incompatibility of the god of science and the God of the Bible; he pleads that the Bible may be full of interpolations and textual inaccuracies, and that the clergy take no steps to sift these matters; he touches upon the credulity of humanity and its willingness to passivly accept any pleasant doctrin relativ to a savior or a future life; he disposes of the vulgar fallacy that Agnostics are necessarily men of corrupt lives and foul principles; he satirizes the quibbling propensities of theologians; he grieves that, after all, man knows and can expect to know so little; and in a bold and eloquent passage he declares his conviction that "if the archbishop of Canterbury, with the whole hierarchy of the English church, after calm and solemn debate in council, would come out to the people and say, 'We hav been mistaken'" in this or in that; we will henceforth ask you to believe nothing but what is capable of proof, "the flood of touching sympathy that would sustain them, the thunder of honest British cheering that would deafen them, would be something to make life worth living indeed." And he continues, speaking to his friends: "The entire nation would be at your feet, and you might mold every man and woman into any shape you pleased. Not Christ himself won a higher place in the hearts of men than he will win—the brave, clear-headed, lion hearted English priest—who shall dare to stand forth boldly between the church and the world, with plain, indisputable proof of every dogma in his hand, or the nerve to hurl away all dogma into the realm of myth and fable. Whatever value, therefore, you may attach to the moral influence of a supernatural creed, I think it quite conceivable that the abandonment of it might produce an effect more salutary still."

The archbishop, the dean, and the canon temporize with these difficulties as best they may, but they do not answer them. The summing up of the professor is worthy of quotation. "Suppose," asks the broad-church dean, "that you succeed in overturning revealed religion, and setting up science in its stead, what do you expect to gain by it?" "I might reply," he says, "though the answer would be, perhaps, a little bombastic and commonplace, Truth. But I will giv you a better answer. Among many substantial benefits, I expect to gain principally three—time, and thought, and energy. Hav you ever reflected upon the number of hours spent weekly in England alone, to say nothing of the continent, on devotional exercises and the acquisition of religious dogma? I should say that something like a fourth part of the time at every boy's and girl's disposal for purposes of study is thus directly or indirectly employed. Now, if the tremendous articles of your creed be literally true, not one-fourth part, but the whole, of everybody's day would be too little for their study and application. But if many of them should turn out, after careful scrutiny in council, to be pious myths and legends, useful, perhaps, in the baby ages of the past, but unneeded now, surely your church must be held responsible for a most pernicious waste of time. Think what an injury you would thus be guilty of inflicting upon the young! One modern language might be learned, one graceful accomplishment mastered, and one branch of science intelligently pursued, in half the number of years now spent by Christian children in learning diligently by heart what millions of God's children in other land's are taught to regard, by authority from the same God, as neither sacred nor history. Then look at the time and thought which a scholar will consume over a commentary on the Ephesians—energy well enough directed, no doubt, if all that you preach be true, but sadly misapplied if it should prove to be less than true. Your church has attracted to herself some of the grandest heads that ever sat upon men's shoulders. Who shall say what progress might hav been made in the field of science, what unspeakable blessings conferred upon the rich and poor, if such men would hav thrown the weight of their intellect into our cause, instead of thwarting us and teaching the people to mistrust us, and squandering their lives in writing philippics against Infidelity! How many discoveries of inestimable value might hav been treasured up, while half the Christian church was anathematizing the other half, because men could not agree about some technical distinction between the several persons of the godhead! And the innumerable social problems which surround us and which political economists toil scientifically to solve — think how much further we might now hav advanced toward their solution, and how infinitly happier and more prosperous the multitude might consequently be, if you clergy would hav helped these men in their noble efforts, instead of discountenancing their work as almost godless, because it concerns, or appears superficially to concern, this present life only! I think I hav given you quite a sufficient answer. And I expect to gain another benefit yet, which touches to the quick that sense of self-respect so dear to every Englishman. I expect to gain reality. At the present moment it is not too much to say that the general and ever-growing want of confidence in dogmas too big for sober use has made the whole Christian church unreal. Outwardly each man thinks it safe and decent to be orthodox, but in his own heart he appeals ever and again from orthodoxy to God. The consideration that five hundred teachers of equal piety and vehemence bring him five hundred contradictory messages from the same Jehovah, leaves him no choice but to smile respectfully on each, and pay no heed to any. God is better to him than all his messengers. He has taught him in silent moments of communion a pure and holy faith, which does not separate him from his fellows, as it is the loud boast or every other faith to do, but binds him in a sweet and noble brotherhood to all mankind. Faith in the supremacy of truth and order, faith in the final triumph of the fit and good, faith in patient labor and quiet waiting for the light that comes of toil, faith in humility and honesty and love, faith in the still voice within him and the conscience at whose bar he stands, faith also in the future, that it will be with him as he deserves it should be, and that the God who is his guide to-day will be his guide for evermore. I am sure I do not know what you want of a better faith than this; and practically, I take it, this or something not very unlike it, is already the faith of every reasonable man. Yet the professor of such a faith, in the opinion of the orthodox, would be pronounced an Infidel. I want you to reverse this harsh judgment, and to speak comfortably to such a man; I want you to absolve him from the unfair, unpalatable choice between an unreal profession of faith to save his orthodoxy, and a sense of whispered excommunication from the church to save his honesty. Nor is this evident mistrust of the old beliefs confined by any means to the intelligent laity. There are hundreds of parish parsons also who never mention a dogma if they can help it, who hav long since ceased to preach on any subject not purely practical, and who hav virtually expunged from their teaching almost the last remnant of supernaturalism. . . . And not in England only, but in Europe and America their names are known and loved, and their writings eagerly devoured; a clear and most instructiv proof that the whole Christian world mistrusts the old beliefs and is determined that they shall be modified—so thoroughly determined that any influential priest who consents to their modification is hailed by all men as a deliverer, though he lacks, alas! the courage to set his fellows free—is magnified as honest, though indeed he just stops short of being so—is held up as a pattern of liberality, though it must be confessed he has given away little else but doctrins which, as a minister of the church, were not his to giv. And yet such blemishes as these, involving principles of action so generally distasteful to the straightforward English mind, are all forgiven him. . . . If you wish your church to last another twenty years, if you would not bring upon yourselvs and your country the untold horrors of a religious revolution, if you would check, while but a streamlet murmuring in the distance, the flood of turbulent interrogation that must burst upon you ere long, be wise and far-seeing and brave, and take into your own hands a measure which may soon escape beyond control. . . . Here is your golden opportunity of proving your claim as shepherds of the people. . . . Take the long catalog of difficulties which hav been a stumbling-block to millions, and deal with them one by one; defend in heaven's name whatever is defensible, and what you cannot defend let go."

And why should there not be a council of Canter

bury? Is there anything wrong or shameful in honesty? And, on the other hand, are the teachers of the church of England able fairly to say that they are quite satisfied with their position? If Christian dogmas are defensible, it is the church of England which ought to defend them; and who doubts that at the present time some defense is needed? The world wants to know how many more doctrins may be silently let go in face of scientific necessity, and whether or not some tolerable modus vivendi can be arranged between science and dogma. Great and startling concession must undoubtedly be made; but under certain circumstances concession is a positiv duty. The honest man does not scruple to confess that he is wrong when his opponent proves him to be so. There are many who think that Christianity can be proved to be baseless and mistaken, and there are also, presumably, many who are as firmly convinced that the truth of Christianity is capable of demonstration. Is it possible that the latter lack the courage of their opinions? It is to be hoped that such is not the case, for, whether true or false, Christianity can never be, as she aspires to be, the religion of all humanity until, brave and confident, she takes her stand in the world and not apart from it, and submits to the same kind of sober and unprejudiced criticism as is leveled in England, as well as here in America, at other professedly revealed religions. And she may be sure of one thing: she will approach the ordeal with everything in her favor. In England, at all events, she has the immense advantage of being in possession; her pure and beautiful teaching is respected even by her most determined opponents, and her generally beneficent influence upon the nation will be readily acknowledged on all hands. It is certainly her duty to take up and deal with the burning problems of the hour, yet for years she has sat silent almost as the sphinx, and as careless, apparently, of the strife that is raging around her. Where is the clear and authoritativ voice with which the church of England ought to speak out to the world? Of what use is she to humanity in its spiritual difficulties? There is, in fact, the greatest possible need for the church and the world to join forces and to come to an understanding, for science has of late made such strides that all men who think must, perforce, ask themselvs whether it is the church or science that is to make the inevitable surrender. At present it is evident that the two cannot for long liv in even that most artificial and unreal kind of harmony in which, teste the English broad church party, they affect to exist. They flatly contract each other daily, and they are perpetually working counter to each other. If, therefore, the church of England has anything which she can say, let her speak in God's name while opportunity offers. Let her face reality and not flinch before facts. If she be true she must stand; and, at the worst, let her remember she has nothing against her save such arguments as may be drawn from the daily revelation of God's law in nature, and from the fair exercise by honest, earnest men of the wits wherewith God has dowered them. Sooner or later she must move. Why not now? The world, which is always increasing in knowledge and perspicacity, has now passed out of its infancy, and can never be brought to uniformity of opinion by the evangelization of any system of religion not based upon reason. But reason is as powerful as it ever was—aye, even more so. It is to day possible to appeal, through reason, to by far the greater part of the human race; and if England were to set a brave example by weeding out all superstition from her national creed the effect upon the rest of the world would be of incalculable importance.

The apostles of reason hav a great and beneficent future before them; but as long as great bodies of men continue to wrap themselvs up in contradictions the religious progress of both hemispheres must be seriously impeded. If the church of England, therefore, possesses any of its often boasted love for truth, and retains any trust in truth and in herself, let her stand up and declare herself ready to meet all comers, for he who has truth in his quiver need never fear the combat.

Let the English hierarchy, then, take to heart the suggestions of the Council of Canterbury. Centuries ago the fathers of the present race of Englishmen bravely purged themselvs of a certain number of irrational dogmas, and there can be nothing foreign to the spirit of justice, consistency, and truth in England's further rejection of the remainder. At the present day she may gracefully rid herself of them, and no one will be the loser, while millions will gain. But in years to come, circumstances must be different, and unless the new reformation be undertaken peacefully and in time the shock with which England will some day awake to true religious liberty will shake half her institutions to their foundations, and lead to results which all sober minds would regret to hear of. Let the English church at least adopt a reasonable attitude, and let her open her eyes and her ears. Objections in this fierce age cannot with impunity be shirked, for there is abroad among all people a questioning voice that insists upon an answer, and unless the answer comes soon and clearly the thunder of the demand will assuredly wrench from terror what it has not been able to obtain from common sense.

WILLIAM L. CLOWES.

Letters of Sympathy.

LINDSAY, ONT., Dec. 11, 1882.

MY DEAR MRS. BENNETT: The sudden news of the death of poor Mr. Bennett caused me great pain. The Liberal cause has lost one of its noblest advocates, and I deeply sympathize with you in your very sad bereavement.

Respectfully yours, W. MCDONNELL.

LOCUST VALLEY, N. Y., Dec. 7, 1882.

EUGENE MACDONALD, ESQ: In the death of D. M. Bennett the world will long grieve for the loss of an able friend—dear to those who personally knew him, and to all valuing knowledge, as the most honest truth seeker and voluminous, searching critic of religious shams ever presented to thoughtful and candid readers; who, for ages to come, will serve, more than any other writer, as an industrious and extensiv thinker, reasoner, and reliable critic—in his numerous published works—to emancipate his race from debasing superstitions of false theisms, cosmogonies, and the rule of priestcraft in all civilized countries. May his compensation be in continued usefulness—of which I hav no doubt—in another world, as the most congenial to his intelligent and philanthropic nature. Yours, in warm sympathy,

CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., Dec. 10, 1882.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Madam: The death of your husband has caused a sadness in my heart that words are powerless to express. My sympathies are now with you in your present great bereavement. D. M. Bennett was my friend, and his death I feel to be my loss.

Liberalism had no greater or nobler exponent. His life was one of devotion to the cause of humanity and the rights of man. He was indeed a martyr to the principles of justice and truth. He died as he lived, true to the highest and grandest ideas of human liberty. His name will go down to posterity as one of the saviors of the human race. Rising generations will revere his memory as one who lived and labored for the good of all. Let us be like him for whom you now so greatly mourn. Hope that

I remain most fraternally your friend,

W. H. LAMASTER.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., Dec. 10, 1882.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT: My Dear Madam: I know how feeble is the light of condolence in the midnight of grief. Yet words of sympathy bear the only balm that friendship can offer the broken heart.

Your bereavement must hav been as unexpected as it is irreparable. There seems to hav been no premonition of the peril—no forecast of the coming cloud, but the crash came like the thunder-clap that shivers the sturdy oak.

In the presence of your beloved dead, as you bow in uncontrolable grief before the broken idol of your family hearth, let the consolation come to your distracted faculties that a multitude of friends clear into the unfathomable depths of faithful hearts feel acutely the blow that falls upon you with most crushing effect.

Trusting that coming suns may soften the frigid atmosphere that now chills your aching heart and dispel the heavy clouds that now shut from your weeping eyes the prospect of future cheer, I beg to subscribe myself your humble friend,

J. R. MONROE.

153 CHERRY ST., CHELSEA, MASS., Dec. 8, 1882.

E. M. MACDONALD AND T. B. WAKEMAN, Brothers: Your invitation to meet with the friends of D. M. Bennett on the 10th inst., to commemorate his physical repose after a life of more than usual activity and success, has just reached me, and I hasten my acknowledgments, that you may know I will be near you in spirit and purpose on that honor-bestowing occasion, though I may not be permitted to join in bodily presence.

Could I mourn as some do, who mistake the silence of transitional repose for the nothingness of an eternal sleep, I should be sad indeed; knowing, as I hav been permitted to know, how many maturing thoughts and useful endeavors hav been interfered with by this sudden departure of our co-worker and friend—but I do not! For, so sure as I know he aspired to liv the life of the immortals, while physically he moved, toiled, and shared his being with us in search of the true and the good, so sure I am there will be no break in his ministry and no failure in the final outcome of his work, as his soul, like that of John Brown, "still goes marching on;" nature knowing no exception to the law that makes destiny proportionate to attraction.

Brothers, I join you in the bestowal of those affectionate regards and appropriate benedictions, which the toiler for humanity and the right has ever received from the appreciating few. May they be worthy of the man, and equal to the consecrating spirit of the hour.

Your brother, J. H. W. TOOHEY.

BOSTON, MASS., Dec. 9, 1882.

MY DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I cannot adequately express to you the pain I felt on learning of the death of your companion, and I am equally incapable of expressing my deep and heartfelt sympathy for you in this, your time of great grief. Be assured, my dear Mrs. Bennett, that you hav my very tenderest sympathy and the sympathy of many thousands of good people throughout the country. And as they hav loved your husband, and had to do with him, yet they hav all the time loved you, even though they did not make it known to you. But now the people will show you in many ways that they hav held you in their hearts, and they will, through ministrations of kindness, try to make your burden rest as lightly upon you as possible.

I regret very much that sickness prevents me from being present at the funeral. I am much disappointed, as I had made all arrangements to go on with Miss Tilton, Mrs. Colman, and Mr. Mendum. If I am well enough I shall be in New York in course of a few days, and will call and see you. Be as hopeful as you can. Yours fraternally,

W. S. BELL.

NASSAU, MICH., Dec. 11, 1882.

FRIEND MACDONALD: It was with feelings of unfeigned sorrow and regret that I read the announcement of the death of our beloved friend and brother, D. M. Bennett. It seems to me that his friends cannot better manifest their appreciation of his worth than to hav each patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER donate one dollar, to be presented as a New Year's present to his patient and heroic little wife. Now, friends, don't send pledges, but send the dollar at once. There must be at least five thousand subscribers that can respond, and only think how much good it will do her, and we will never feel it.

I sent the money some time ago for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and I hope it will be published up to his last instalment, as it contains the last words that he wrote while in the flesh.

I am not one of those death-ends-all fellows, and I feel that our friend and brother has only been transferred to a broader field of usefulness, and what is our loss is his gain.

Inclosed find one dollar for the New Year's Fund.

Fraternally yours, H. J. WILSON.

MERIDEN, IOWA, Dec. 14, 1882.

EUGENE MACDONALD, Dear Sir: It was with much sadness I learned of the death of D. M. Bennett. So unexpected was the sad news I could hardly realize it for a while; and while I desire to express my heartfelt sympathy to you for the bereaved wife of Brother Bennett, that true and heroic wife and lady, who bore with her husband the taunts and sneers and persecutions of a religious world, I will not attempt to express the pain it givs me at the loss of such a brave, noble, and useful advocate and champion of the principles of Liberalism. Though not personally acquainted with Brother Bennett, I still feel as one that was since subscribing for THE TRUTH SEEKER and reading so much of his writings.

I can but think what a brave, honest, and industrious man he was, and of what a grand work and glorious heroic record he has left behind; of how ceaselessly he pursued his labors of dealing death-blows to Christian superstitions and absurdities, even while suffering innocently in prison at the cruel hands of Christian persecutors. The name and works of D. M. Bennett will liv long after all his persecutors will hav been forgotten. How appropriate to the deceased, in the language of Shakspere, is the following:

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mixed in him that nature might stand up
> And say to the world, "This was a man!"

Yours truly, E. INGERSOLL.

GONE!

> Oh, what shall I hang on the chamber walls?
> And what shall the pictures be that I hang on the walls,
> To adorn the burial-house of him I love?

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I hav waited a little, till the first deep darkness of thy sorrow shall hav passed by, ere sending thee my great sympathy in this thy hour of trial—the greatest and saddest probably of thy whole life.

Thee is not alone in thy affliction. All over the land are thousands who mourn with thee the loss of a friend, a brother, a leader. Few men hav been so loved and so worshiped as our Bennett—alas! ours no longer. He has left us, and we hav now only his memory and the great works of his life remaining; but these are treasures inestimable. His well-won honors hav encircled his name with a lustrous halo that long ages will not dim or obliterate.

I hav never felt so bereft at the death of any one outside of family relativs as I do at the loss of him whom I hav so long looked up to with reverential affection and almost worshipful admiration.

We hav labored together for freedom and for humanity, and in every good cause our hearts hav beat in unison. If we differed now and then as to ways and means, it was always a loving and friendly difference.

This loss is the greatest one Liberalism has ever sustained. No other man has achieved so much in so little time as Mr. Bennett has. But "all that's bright must fade."

How hard it is for me to relinquish our idols! We know that time will take the very last by taking ourselvs from the few that remain. May we all depart leaving as clean, pure, and beautiful a record behind us as our dear friend has done. More and better we need not aspire to.

How shall I deck my song for the large, sweet soul that has gone?
And what shall my perfume be for the grave of him I love?
Sea winds blown from the east and west,
Blown from the eastern sea, and blown from the western sea, till there on the prairies meeting;
These and with these and the breath of my chant
I'll perfume the grave of him I love.

Thine, sorrowingly, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., Dec. 10, 282.

MY STRICKEN FRIEND: Can you imagin our surprise, and consternation even, when on opening our TRUTH SEEKER this morning (for we failed to get it yesterday as usual), at the very hour you were convening, to find the terrible news of your (and our) beloved's death. Words fail to express our sorrow, for was he not our dead also? The friend of humanity and champion of equal rights for all! Oh, my precious sister, how can we help you bear up under this heaviest of all blows? We hav ever felt the keenest sympathy for you in all the past, but this seems too grievous to be borne! Our League was meeting for the first time in more than a year, hav been dispossessed of our hall, and we spent the whole session of more than two hours in retrospection of our dead hero.

On motion a committee was appointed to draft the following resolutions expressiv of the feelings of the League:

WHEREAS, It has been the lot of our esteemed and honored friend, D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and martyr to the cause of Freethought, to pay the debt of nature at a time which, to us and the whole Liberal world, is very inopportune and unexpected, therefore be it

Resolved, That by his death we feel we hav lost the greatest and noblest martyr to principle, and one of the ablest champions of mental liberty the world has ever known.

We resolved we would "buckle on the armor" anew, and try one and all to do more for the spread of Liberalism than ever before, to try and take up the work in our small way where our beloved had dropped it when called so suddenly away. Can it be possible we ne'er shall see him more? We had hoped to hav him again with us ere long in a public capacity of lecturer, with his views, and we all regretted not doing more when he was with us July last. But regrets are useless now, and all we can do is to stay up your hands and heart as best we may. Will inclose a copy of resolutions passed by the League, also our mite, personally, to you, individually, as at such times aid in that direction is acceptable. Mr. Knapp joins us in deepest sympathy and tenderest regards in this great bereavement, as your dead belonged to the nation when alive.

Most thoroughly your friends, ABBIE AND AMOS.

[Mrs. Bennett returns her heartfelt thanks for the kindly sympathy expressed for her, and also for the material aid extended. With the assistance of such friends, and above all, knowing that so many helping hands will be extended, she feels that the work so grandly begun by Mr. Bennett will be continued by her. The burden, so heavy for one to bear, will be lighter if shared by loving and zealous friends.]

AMHERST, Dec. 13, 1882.

MY DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I can never express to you in words the deep sympathy and sorrow I feel in this the darkest hour of your life. To your poor, lonely, breaking heart language must seem cold and inexpressiv, yet through the written words we may sometimes convey the sweet love and sympathy of our souls that will reach the stricken heart, and help to soothe and soften its voiceless anguish. And I would thus come to you, dear friend, as a sister tried and true, and from out my own spirit weave for you a golden mantle of hope and trust that shall ever rest upon your loving heart as a sweet and holy blessing from the angel life. You are not alone, for the dear, kind husband still livs, still loves and watches over you. The beautiful passage of the spirit into a higher life, which is the second birth, has only brought him still nearer to you in that love that alone makes life bright and glorious. In the great hereafter we shall know as we are known, nevermore to walk alone, and to-day your loved one, with the precious child that passed out of your arms so long ago, is with you striving to soothe your aching heart, and with all the affection of his intensified nature endeavoring to impress upon your mind the knowledge that he still livs, and that he will watch over and guard you faithfully until the angel of life shall bid you, too, come up higher, into the the beautiful land of souls. My dear friend, I know this to be true—this life of personal activity, of usefulness, and love beyond the grave. I know it, so far as we can hav a knowledge of that which we hav not actually experienced ourselvs; and I know that dear Brother Bennett will never cease his efforts until you are fully satisfied that he still livs, and can and does communicate with you. I feel like saying to you, as the dear spirit guiding my hand and my heart to-day impels me, that you shall never want for the comforts of life, and that the love and earthly protection you feel is taken away from you shall be renewed tenfold, not only by the one love of your life who is waiting just over the way, but by many dear and true friends, who will gather around and sustain you. It is only a little while that you will hav to remain here; the months and years will glide rapidly away while you are growing strong in spiritual knowledge and preparing yourself for the glorious reunion, for the joyful welcome of husband and child—all the more yours then than to-day, because in the spiritual growth and unfoldment of both you will hav learned to know and love each other better.

Be assured, dear sister, the loved one is with you each day, with his beloved paper and the faithful ones who hav it in charge. He can work for them now, and for you, just as well, and even better in many directions than when he was here. I feel that this spirit of hope, of truth, and knowledge will gradually infil your whole life, and convince you beyond all question of the life beyond. Often when you are alone he, your loved husband, will manifest himself to you in a manner that you will really feel and know that he is by your side. Through the mists and shadows of material life look upward and beyond with your spiritual vision, and your heart shall be satisfied.

I know that your thoughts and your time must be wholly occupied with yourself and immediate surroundings, yet when you hav leisure I should be glad to hear from you, and anything that you may feel like writing to me.

I shall call and see you when I come to the city. Until then, believe me your loving friend and sister,

LESSIE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., Dec. 10, 1882.

E. M. MACDONALD AND T. B. WAKEMAN: I thank you for the invitation to attend the funeral of our mutual friend and co-worker, D. M. Bennett, and regret the circumstance that prevents my being present on the sad and sorrowful occasion; but, while necessarily absent, I shall no less mingle my sympathies and regrets with his family and numerous friends who mourn the loss of a dear friend and noble champion of human rights and human liberties.

The tidings of Mr. Bennett's death came to me, as to many another, like a sudden shock, for he had been so much alive—if I may use the expression—and we had followed him so faithfully in his journeyings, as revealed from week to week in THE TRUTH SEEKER, that it hardly seemed possible he could so soon be laid low. But such is life, and we know not how, or when, or where the swift arrow shall overtake us; yet, when it does come, may it find us, each and all, with armor on and ready for work, as was our friend who has preceded us to the land of shadows.

I had great respect for our friend as an earnest and untiring worker, who has done, in a few years, probably more than any other one person toward destroying the myths and superstitions that hav been so long the bane of our civilization. For that which he considered to be right he was willing to endure and brave all—contumely, imprisonment, martyrdom itself if necessary. I admired greatly his energy, his indomitable will, and that most remarkable industry that so distinguished him from others.

If he had faults (and who has not?) they are now buried, I am sure, with his dissolving dust; but his virtues remain to be considered, honored, emulated.

I am glad he made the journey around the world; it was a satisfaction to him and to his friends, and his most enduring monument is in the works he has left behind.

I subjoin the following lines, from a full heart, to his memory:

D. M. BENNETT.

Rest thee, unconscious sleeper, rest;
Thy labors now are done;
On braver, truer work than thine
The bright sun never shone.

To loose the shackles from the mind,
To set the prisoner free—
This was the task that early won
Thy immortality.

Thy sturdy blows at wrong and crime,
Thy helpful, steady hand,
Ceased from thy grand and noble work
Only at Death's command.

With armor on, thou gently passed
Into thy dreamless sleep;
Yet left a world-wide host of friends
Thy memory to keep.

Around the world thy star shall shine,
While ages take their flight—
A guide, through superstition's gloom,
Into the morning light.

The victor's crown of roses fair
Rests on thy ashen brow,
And friends for thee weave ivy wreaths,
While tears of sorrow flow.

With trembling lips we softly speak
That last sad word, "Farewell!"
How much of grief is in that word
No human speech may tell!

But while we bid the last farewell
To thy dissolving dust,
We feel thy spirit still goes on
In hope and tender trust.

In persevering work and faith
Still doth thy light appear;
In fearless honesty and truth,
Thou seemest ever near.

And listening ears may surely hear,
Like notes of evening bell,
The hopeful words, "Be of good cheer,
For with him all is well!"

Your sincere friend, SUSAN H. WIXON.

D. M. Bennett on Heywood

From the League Man.

Some of the would-be especial friends of Mr. Heywood are just now very bitter upon Mr. Bennett, because he does not see the propriety of all of Mr. Heywood's doings and sayings in the realm of morals. This is all wrong. Mr. Bennett deserves respectful instead of abusiv consideration, and when his three articles on this subject are taken together they show that he takes the same position Man does and that Liberals generally hav done. That is, free discussion and opinion in the realm of religion and morals; no Comstockism, state or national, on the subject; and resistence thereto to the uttermost in vindication of free speech, press, and mails. Must those who want to keep Comstock law off from Heywood in the interest of liberty, morally approve of all he may do or say? Certainly not.

Of all men, Mr Bennett has earned the right to speak and hav his views respectfully considered by all friends of liberty the world over. It makes the "judicious grieve" to see how men who hav not borne the heat and burden of the day start up with their flippant wit in reproof of the veteran truth seeker, from whose experience and wisdom they hav much yet to learn.

When Mr. Bennett's articles are read together, they are sound Liberalism and common sense. Those who try to make the people believe otherwise injure him and disgrace themselves.

"Three Measures of Meal."

The Kingdom of Heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened (Mat. xiii, 33).

1. Why was Heaven then called a Kingdom?

Because of the barbarism of the age.

2. Why, in this enlightened age, is Heaven spoken of as a Kingdom?

It is not, except by the slow-coaches, who hope to king it there, or to fatten at the crib of royalty.

3. What is leaven?

Leaven, may it please ye, is pure, Heaven-born Democracy—Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, Love, and good will.

4. Why did the Woman take the leaven and hide it in the meal?

Simply because no other hand could, or ever can, do that thing. The Hes hav, for thousands of years, been tugging away, with might and main, trying to evangelize the world, and—and—and—

We never can enter the Democracy of Heaven except we be born again. Were it possible for any "What is it" to be born either the first or second time, of He critters, possibly Barnum might, by that possibility, reach the tip-top of his monstrous ambition—hav the tip-top monster.

5. What are the three measures of meal?

The three measures of meal are all there is of Humanity that is worth a —— bless, if you please.

When humanity is so elevated that all can do as they'v a mind to, all do right, none interfering with the rights of others—nothing indelicate find access to their souls—the morning stars may sing and the little stars dance for joy.

That day must surely come. We may as well be getting ourselvs in shape for it. 'Tis a much better way of amusing ourselvs—looking aloft—than to be digging among the dry bones of the past, or to be stirring up the putrefactions of the present. If they must be stir'd, let somebody else stir them up. We don't want to.

To Mary, DeRobigne, Angie, Loren, and Willie, Love—pure Gospel Love. PRENTISS.

The Christ of Paul.

BY ANTICHRIST.

Three years before we suspected that Paul did not liv in the time of Pontius Pilate, we wrote and published in the Investigator the following:

The Christ of Christendom is the Pauline Christ, the historical existence of whom depends upon what Paul believed and taught. Now, Paul was a mystic. He preached "Christ crucified"—implying that others preached Christ not crucified. He (or rather some other writer assuming his name) says, in 2 Tim. ii, 8, Christ "was raised from the dead according to my gospel"—implying that according to some other gospel he was not raised from the dead. Paul never saw Jesus except in imagination (1 Cor. xv, 8), and never met but two or three of the so-called apostles, namely, Peter (or rather Cephas), James, and John (Gal. i, 18, 19, and ii, 9). Query: Who was this Cephas mentioned by Paul many years before the evangelists wrote their gospels? And who was this James, brother of the Lord, and what kind of a brother was he to the son of God? And who was the Lord Jesus Christ that appeared to Paul in an abnormal state, or as to "one born out of due time"—that is, prematurely born? Rejecting as pure fiction his miraculous conversion, with all its accompaniments, as recorded in Acts—but not at all corroborated by Paul himself in his epistles—and making due allowance for interpolations and mystifications in his writings, may not all he wrote concerning Christ apply as well to the ancient Hindoo Christna as to the Jesus whose fabulous biography was afterward composed as a fiction, but after the lapse of a century or two came to be credited by the multitude as fact? (Rev. of Ant., ch. vi.)

We saw then that the testimony of Paul was a formidable difficulty—indeed, the only one of any magnitude—in the way of proving the gospel Jesus a myth. But so strong was the evidence of his nonexistence, and so different was Paul's Christ from the gospel Jesus, that we intended before concluding our work to devote a chapter to the Christ of Paul, making the best argument we could, inconclusiv as it might seem to be. Fortunately, the timely discovery that Paul flourished before the Christian era rendered the discussion of his Christ unnecessary until now.

In the Greek testament the word "cross" is always stauros; Latin, vallus, palus, ligneus, crux; English, stake, wooden post, cross, gibbet, gallows. From stauros comes the verb stauroo—to fix pales or palisades, to crucify. The Hebrews first killed the culprit, and then hung him on a stake or tree; the Romans tied or nailed him alive. Sometimes the stake had a cross-bar for the arms; it then became a crux, and the culprit was crucifixus. The crucifix is a Roman institution. Paul's Christ was doubtless first stoned to death, and then hanged on a stake (stauros), or tree (xulon), according to the Jewish mode of execution (Rev. of Ant., pp. 18, 19).

Paul's account of the death and resurrection of Christ (1 Cor. xv, 1–8) is as follows:

And I make known to you, my brethren, the gospel which I preached to you, and which ye received, and in which ye stand, and by which ye hav life. In what terms I preached to you ye remember, unless ye hav believed in vain. For I delivered to you from the first, as I had received it: that the Messiah died on account of our sins, as it is written; and that he was buried and arose the third day, as it is written; and that he was seen by Kepha, and after him by the twelve; and after that he was seen by more than five hundred brethren at once, many of whom survive at the present, and some of them sleep. And subsequently to this he was seen by James, and after him by all the legates. And last of them all, he was seen by me, as it were by an abortion. I am the least of the legates, and am not worthy to be called a legate, because I persecuted the church of God."

The contradictions and discrepancies of the four gospels in regard to the resurrection are set forth in the seventh chapter of our Revelations. Let us now compare Paul's six appearances of the risen Christ with the gospel accounts:

First appearance:

To Kepha (Paul).
To two Marys (Matthew).
To Mary Magdalene (Mark, John).
To Simon (Luke xxiv, 34).

Second appearance:

To the twelve (Paul).
To the disciples in Galilee (Matthew).
To two disciples in the country (Mark).
To two disciples going to Emmaus (Luke).
To ten disciples in the evening (John)

Third appearance:

To more than five hundred brethren (Paul).
To nobody (Matthew, Mark).
To the eleven in the evening (Luke).
To the eleven eight days later (John).

Fourth appearance:

To James (Paul).
To nobody (Matthew, Mark).
To the eleven after forty days (Luke, in Acts).
To a few disciples at the sea of Tiberias (John).

Fifth appearance:

To all the legates (Paul).
To nobody (Matthew, Mark, Luke, John).

Sixth or last appearance:

To Paul as to an abortion (Paul).
To nobody (Matthew, Mark, John).
To Paul near Damascus (Luke, in Acts).

Is it not evident that Paul knew nothing of any of our four gospels? How else could he hav omitted the appearances to Mary Magdalen, to the two Marys, to the disciples going to Emmaus, to the ten or eleven disciples in the evening, to the eleven eight days later, to the disciples in Galilee, to the apostolic fishermen at the sea of Tiberias, or to the eleven forty days after the resurrection? And even admitting a possible parallel between the appearance to Kepha (1 Cor. xv, 5) and to Simon (Luke xxiv, 34), likewise between the appearance to Paul (1 Cor. xv, 8) and to the same sinner as described in Acts, ix, what shall we do with Paul's statement about the appearance to the twelve? Did he ever hear of Judas Iscariot? And how can we reconcile the appearance to more than five hundred brethren at once with the evangelist's account prior to the ascension? Was it not the ascended Christ that these five hundred thought they saw? And if so, was any other Christ seen by anybody? Paul himself never saw Jesus Christ in the flesh; and though his language may imply that others saw him alive, yet he speaks ambiguously and only from hearsay. And while he seems to hav believed in a Christ who was not a mere phantom, but a man born of the seed of David, and personally known to surviving brethren, yet he appeals not so much to human testimony for proof of the death and resurrection of the Messiah as to the scriptures. Hence he says "that the Messiah died on account of our sins, as it is written; and that he was buried and arose on the third day, as it is written." And lest his brethren should still doubt the fact of the resurrection, he argues thus:

And if the Messiah is proclaimed as rising from the dead, how is it that there are some among you who say, There is no reviviscence of the dead? [Sadducees?] And if there is no reviviscence of the dead, the Messiah also hath not risen [!] And if the Messiah hath not risen, our preaching is vain, and your faith also is vain [!] And we too are found false witnesses of God, for we hav testified concerning God that he hath raised up the Messiah, when he did not raise him up [!!] For if the dead will not rise, the Messiah also hath not risen. And if the Messiah rose not, your faith is inane, and ye are yet in your sins; and also doubtless they who hav fallen asleep in the Messiah hav perished [!!!]

And so he goes on through the whole chapter, staking the hope of immortality solely on the death and reported resurrection of the alleged Messiah. It is not our purpose, however, to discuss Paul's theology—only to show that his Messiah lived a hundred years before Pontius Pilate. For, since it is conceded that the Talmud makes no reference to the gospel Jesus, but repeatedly mentions a Jesus who was put to death for sorcery, about 75 B C. (see "Lost and Hostil Gospels," chap. iv, by Rev. S. Baring-Gould), is it not altogether probable that that Jesus was the Christ of Paul?

By the Way.

After the close of the St. Louis Congress I retured to Iowa, stopping first at Burlington, remaining a few days. In previous letters I hav mentioned most of the activ workers here, and will now name only Joseph Traxiel and George Batchelor, good Liberals, whom I had not previously met. Here, as elsewhere, the chief obstacle in the way of activ organization is the apathetic indifference of the great mass of anti-Christians. The few ever hav to bear the heat and burden of the day.

Next, to LeClaire, where resides that enthusiastic worker, Maria L. Follett. My friend, H. Hodson, of Clinton, came down and remained over Sunday, and together we roamed over the hills and through the entrancing vales lying about classic LeClaire.

Returning to Norway, I remained there several days, making preparations for my winter trip. October 21st I started for the West, stopping at Blairstown, Belle Plaine, Tama, and Marshalltown, on the Chicago & Northwestern Railway. At Blairstown I met Mrs. B. M. Lee and Webster Ellyson. Belle Plaine gave me, as is its wont, a cordial reception, for though outspoken secularists here are few, they are the genuin article. C. P. Hesser, J. B. Marston, F. E. Zalesky, Jos. Schuthart, and J. B. Filkin are all known to the world as Infidels.

At Tama the beneficent effects of the September camp-meeting are yet plainly discernible. Orthodoxy has learnt a lesson which it will not soon forget. I met this time E. S. Beckley, E. R. Bowe, L. S. and W. B. Brown, J. B. Tims, and Mr. Skinner and lady. Went out into the country and remained over Sunday with friend Beckley and his interesting family.

In Marshalltown I found Messrs. Gingrich, Woodbury, Lawrence, Marvin, Turner, and Williams, also Rev. C. J. Adams of the Universalist church, a very radical minister, though not likely to remain a minister very long. He was one of the very few preachers who had a sufficiently clear comprehension of fundamental principles to enable him to work against the prohibitory amendment.

Gilman was my next halting-place. Met there L. G. Seager, John Johnson, and one or two other Liberals.

T. J. Morgan and Mr. Sanger at Leasboro, and E. M. Stanton at New Sharon are the most outspoken heretics of their respectiv towns.

Grinnell, the unhappy town upon which God, borne upon the wings of the cyclone, descended last June, has quite a number of activ Liberals, chief among whom are Charles Porter, Linden Hambledon, Chas. Proctor, Dr. Howig, Horace Wood, Edward Moore, and A. W. Babcock. To Mr. Porter I am indebted for many favors and kind hospitality. I understand that there is considerable Freethinking done by the students of Iowa College, a Congregational institution which, by the way, was badly wrecked by the cyclone. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth.,'

At Newton I remained for four days, making in company with Mr. Hugh Searcy several excursions into the country, visiting A. T. Hinshaw, Alexander Brown, H. L. Moffit, and Aaron Wadsworth. In the town I met D. Sturdevant, Dr. Gorrell, David Watts, F. C. Ehlers, Mrs. Belle Watts, Mrs. Caroline Ehlers, Alva Mershon, Perry Engle, Fred Olleff, and others. Also F. R. Phelps, of Metz. There is abundant material here for a League, but so many secularists seem to attach much more importance to doctrinal points than they do the organization of the new order and the practicalization of the principles of liberty and justice.

Stopped over one day at Colfax, now much noted for its mineral springs, and met Dr. A. B. S. Turner, F. L. Pease, Mrs. Gertie Pease, M. L. Wheat, and Mrs. Mary Wheat. These friends are all Spiritualists, but of the Liberal school. Had a very pleasant visit here. Met at Mitchelville Mrs. S. C. H. Sutherland, and Dr. Seems.

Remaining over Sunday at Des Moines, I proceeded on Sunday to Carlisle, Warren county. I found some number are secularists in this little burg. Was the guest of hearty, genial Matt Farley, who did all possible to make my stay pleasant and promote the sale of Liberal literature. Spoke in the old school-house on the evening of election day to a fair audience. Other Freethinkers are, Mr. Guisinger, Dr. Hull, and Isaac Reynolds.

From Carlisle to Winterset, where I canvassed for one week, lecturing in the court-house Sunday evening to a fine audience. I look for the formation of a strong Leauge here ere long. Among the live Infidels whom I found here are, H. W. and Mrs. E. C. Mercer, Burns Seevers, Geo. W. Seevers, Henry Evans, E. B. Thompson, J. M. Flannagan, S. F Hopkins, Andrew Bennett, A. Gaekle, Mrs. E. Nollrey, W. W. Nollrey, and Messrs. West Bates, Rogers, and Sefford. I am under many obligations to my friends, the Mercers, for the hospitalities of their cheerful home, and efficient aid rendered in the prosecution of my work. My first visit to Winterset will long be remembered with feelings of the keenest pleasure.

After nearly a day of tedious waiting in a box-car station at a railroad crossing, and slow progression ever a narrow gauge road, I reached Osceola, Clark county. Our principal workers here are, J. G. Watts, F. J. Emary, C. W. Dibble, H. W. Becket, J. R. E. Doss, and H. M. Chamberlin. Here the extremes of positiv scientific Monism and positiv Spiritualism meet in the persons of J. G. Watts and H. W. Becket, each of whom is dead sure that the other is wholly wrong. But they are both good men, nevertheless.

At Muncey I received cordial welcome, and found that preparations had been made for lectures Saturday and Sunday evenings. My subject Saturday evening was, "Why We Work for Freethought," and I was honored by the presence of Rev. Leland, pastor of the Baptist church at Corning. In response to my general invitation for criticism he spoke about fifteen minutes, saying, among other equally peculiar things, that he could read and understand "Tom" Paine; that one hundred thousand other men would read the same book, and they would arrive at substantial agreement in their interpretation of the author's meaning. But how was it when he took up that "precious book," the Bible? Why, he could not understand it, and no two men would agree in their readings thereof. By this he knew that the book was divinely inspired—that it is God's word! I pointed out to him that if obscurity of meaning is a proof of God's authorship, then, by his own reasoning, he must admit that his "benificent father" is directly responsible for the millions of Christians slain by their fellow-Christians because of their inability to agree in their interpretation of the scriptures. But it was no use—he could not see it.

To Mr. and Mrs. Wiek, my host and hostess, I render thanks for kind favors received; also to Paul Cheney and S. L. Shreves, my other Liberal friends at Muncey.

Creston has a few good Freethinkers, chief among them being Henry Breitenstein, Dr. Wilson, and Mr. Keith.

Prescott has quite a Liberal leaven in her lump of orthodoxy. J. B. Blackburn, E. Clarke, E. E. Clarke, Mrs. E. Clarke, and G. S. Farnham are the most pronounced.

I remained in Corning and vicinity for nearly nine days, making my home with Mr. A. M. Coff, whose roof shelters some sterling Freethinkers. There is no taint of Christianity here, Mrs. Coff, W. B. McGlaughlin, county clerk, and Miss Ida M. Hopper, the adopted daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Coff, being squarely upon the secularist platform. I am requested to say that Miss Hopper, who is eleven years of age, desires to correspond with other Liberal girls. Let such good social educational work receive the encouragement it deserves. While writing to Miss Hopper do not forget Miss Jennie Hollgate, Quincy, Adams county, Ia., another promising young Freethinker.

Through the kindness of Mr. McGlaughlin, who placed his horse and buggy at my disposal, I drove out one day to Mr. Leon M. Humbert's, who is one of the most activ of the Freethinkers of Adams county. Mrs. Humbert is a thorough-going Infidel woman, of which there are several in this part of Iowa.

The next day I went out to see Capt. Ankeny; from thence on to Quincy, remaining over night with those sturdy English Atheists, Mr. and Mrs. T. D. Holgate. They lower their flag of secularism not an inch, and take no part in the Christian idolatries of their neighbors.

Returning to Corning the next morning, I had the pleasure of meeting "Dan" Seward, one of Taylor county's best Liberals, a man who looks you squarely in the eye, and says just what he thinks.

John Bixby, Mr. Sherwood, and A. S. Wells are other Freethinkers of Corning.

From Corning to Bedford, and thence to Valley Falls, Kansas.

Having become associated with Mr. M. Harman in the publication and editorial management of the Kansas Liberal, my correspondents will please direct to me at Valley Falls, Kansas, for the present.

Fraternally, E. C. WALKER.

Things Certain and Things Uncertain.

I hav read with reawakened interest the lucubrations of Mr. Whitehead, and Mr. Bennett's reply thereto. Some forty years ago I attended the ministrations of an ordained "God's man" whilst he laboriously delivered himself of just such solid sophisms as Mr. Whitehead advances now. I thought then and think still that it is not by any means the fair thing for a God, omnipotent, omniscient, infinit in love, justice, truth, etc., who created all things, and minutely controls all events, who molds man as the potter does the clay, to giv particular hell to any of his children, who, earnestly seeking and honestly trying to speak and act the truth, doubt the testimony of a notorious liar like Eusebius and others of that ilk. Sir, we need no elaborate, incomprehensible divine revelation, with a howling, rapacious host of expounders, to tell us to preserve, enjoy, and perpetuate life. If there is another life of more importance than this, in the proportion that the infinit bears to the finite, why did not God make our knowledge thereof infinitly more explicit and unmistakable, or provide us with an unerring instinct for the certain accomplishment of his supreme desire—man's salvation? They manage things better in hell.

If the eternal weal or woe of the whole human race depends upon their faith in improbable events said to hav occured eighteen hundred years ago, in sprinkling or dipping in water, and unreasoning belief in the slaughter-house scheme of salvation (for without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin), where is the wisdom, love, or justice in making the eternal fate of untold millions of human beings depend upon the testimony or opinions of ancient or modern Joe Cooks or Talmages? A knowledge of the average modern priest does not increase reflecting men's esteem for, or confidence in, the ancient manufacturers of Christianity's missing links. Of what value is the testimony or opinion of men regarding extraordinary or incredible events said to hav happened years before they were born, more especially of people in an age when ignorance and credulity were universal and unbounded; when the the most absurd, improbable statements received ready credence if prefaced by "thus saith the Lord," uttered by some lazy, lousy saint; when devils, demons, supernaturals, were as plentiful and popular as pigs at Chicago; when even the proverbial difficulty of a child's knowing its own father was aggravated by occasional visits of God's sons, angels, and Holy Ghosts?

In this age of newspapers, ubiquitous item-hunters, writers, readers, observers, how many notorious things happen amongst and around us of which we cannot get positiv knowledge of the truth? Law courts abound with such cases. Was H. W. Beecher breachy or blameless in the Tilton matter? Was Hayes or Tilden president-elect, and so forth?

Permit me, by way of illustration, to refer to a famous event of our own time that came somewhat under my own observation, and made a strong impression on my mind. I refer to the famous charge of the Light Brigade in the Crimean war. Captain Nolan rode up to the brigade, crying that he carried orders for them to ride into the valley and charge the Russians. He was destroyed by a shell, and Lord Raglan denied having given such an order. The five hundred charged up the valley, and a shattered fragment returned. The accusation was openly made that their commander, Earl Cardigan, did not lead them to battle, but played coward. Such an accusation against such a conspicuous man attracted public attention so much that the British government, shortly after the event, sent Colonels Neill and Tulloch to the Crimea to take evidence on the spot and report. Their report was unfavorable to the Earl, as no man could be found who saw him enter or return from the valley. At the conclusion of the war, with a friendly tory government in power, the Earl applied for a commission to try his case again. The then minister of war, General Peell, appointed a commission to investigate. It sat at Chelsea, England, took evidence, and their report exonerated the Earl from blame or shame. And there the matter rests; and no man knoweth to this day whether the Earl Cardigan was a brave soldier or the other thing. If we cannot get at the truth of actual events that happen in our own day, in view of men of education and observation, is it right or reasonable to blame or damn us if we doubt or disbelieve sayings of proved untruthful men, of interested enthusiasts or ignorant men, regarding unusual, incredible events said to hav happened long before they were born? Is it a fatherly correction for a necessitated unbelief to be eternally damned and doomed to suffer unending, excruciating torments in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone?

Only those with the instincts of savages could or would entertain or avow such ideas. That creed is tottering to its fall that in this age can giv no better reason for its existence than that at some far-distant day some unknown individuals professed a belief in some of its obscure dogmas. It is humiliating to think that professedly educated men will, for self-interest, power, pelf, thrust down our throats, by means fair or foul, a costly creed that has no tangible foundation; that in the heyday of its power, defended itself by unparalleled cruelties, by wholesale butcheries, by almost extinguishing intellect and liberty in the Old World; but now, face to face with a young antagonist, science, that is buttressed on fact and armed with truth, the priests of the bloody faith whine, "Let us alone," or try to stave off their evil day by falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition on the young, ignorant, and unreasoning.

Yours truly, ELIJAH A. SCHURMAN.

Teach the Children.

The durability of first impressions on the minds of children is universally acknowledged. The Jesuit fathers used to say that if they could only control the first ten years of a child's life they felt sure that individual would never escape from the influence of their order. It is time for Liberals to recognize the fact that until they systematically educate their children in the religion of science—that is, teach them to look to science for the basis of their spiritual aspirations—they can never make headway against Christianity. For the latter begins its work with children even in their infancy, and lodges its formulas in the child's memory long before the reasoning powers are developed.

Liberal parents are sometimes so foolish as to send their children to orthodox Sunday-schools, saying that what their children learn at the Sunday-school can soon be dislodged from their minds when they are grown and learn to reason. But this is a great mistake. First impressions are seldom if ever entirely effaced. Liberals should see to it that they keep their children from imbibing orthodox superstition, and be on the alert when they hav been exposed to it in order to counteract by rational explanations the false impressions the little ones may hav received. Not content with this, they should directly inculcate rational ideas on all subjects which come within the domain of religion and Christian preaching. No better way of fixing ideas on the mind of a child can be found than that of causing it to learn hymns or poems. These ought always to be such as teach truth and virtue and high aspirations. Christian parents and teachers hav their children to learn hymns and passages of scripture which remain, often for life, fixed in the memory; each one a casket containing some dogma or fossil conception of duty. The "Divine Songs" of Dr. Watts are many of them as fresh in my memory now as on the day I learnt them. Some of them were committed to my memory as a task and sum for the sake of a promised reward. But once learnt they were often repeated and sung, and hence remained unforgotten. Till my dying day I think I shall be able to repeat:

There is a dreadful hell,
And everlasting pains,
Where sinners must with devils dwell
In darkness, fire, and chains.

Can such a wretch as I
Escape this cursed end?
Ane may I hope whene'er I die
I shall to heaven ascend?

Then let me read and pray
While I hav life and breath;
Lest I should be cut off to-day.
And sent to eternal death.

The hymns of the church, learnt and sung by the children and young people of families in the home circle, hav fixed and perpetuated its doctrins; and if Liberals desire to hav their opinions take root in the hearts of their children, and spread abroad and become a power in the land, they must bring the same means into use. There are now at least two books which are full of choice Liberal songs adapted for recitation and music; one is the "Truth Seeker Collection," price 75 cents; and the other, the "Liberal Hymn Book," price 25 cents half bound, or 40 cents in cloth and gilt. Either of these would make a most appropriate Christmas or New-Year's gift to a young person of any age. Send on your orders, and then "Sing with the spirit and with the understanding also."

ELIZA B. BURNZ.

No Union of State and Church.

From the New York Sun.

"Europeans coming to America, as to an asylum from oppression," said the Rev. Dr. King, a Methodist minister, on Sunday, "must not be allowed to bring in the continental Sabbath, and destroy the foundations of liberties secured for them, but without their assistance."

Substantially that remark is often made in our pulpits. The assumption is that by law we hav here an established and characteristic Sabbath which everybody ought to be made to respect. But at the very foundation of this republic lies the separation of state and church. Consequently in the state of New York the first day of the week can only be regarded by the law as a day of rest, as a holiday. Legally it is that, and not a Sabbath which there is any religious obligation to keep. The state has nothing to do with its religious character, except so far as to protect citizens in their right to worship on Sunday without disturbance. Such other regulations as are justifiable are those only which are necessary because of its peculiar character as a weekly holiday.

Moreover, the majority of voters must decide what restrictions shall be put about Sunday; and both in this state and many other states foreigners and the descendants of foreigners who hav come to this country within fifty years are getting to be the majority, or are already the majority. Their ideas as to Sunday, whether it shall be what the Methodist preacher calls a continental Sabbath or otherwise, must inevitably prevail in the long run.

It is true that formerly it was not easy for the lawmakers to stick to their theory, and carry it to its logical conclusion, in their treatment of Sunday. They slipped in restrictions which would only be justifiable if the state undertook religious control. But the laws wherein they so offended became a dead letter, of course, as soon as popular opinion refused to sustain them. And if now they are revived and so enforced as to become troublesome, they will speedily be abolished once for all, for only a small portion of the community, nativ and of foreign birth, would tolerate them as laws to which obedience was actually compelled.

Nor has anybody a right to complain of foreigners because they come here, qualify themselvs as voters, and undertake to make our laws and customs to suit themselvs. That is their right. They were invited to come to this republic on that understanding. They were to hav a share in making the laws when they became citizens. They emigrated from countries where kings and state churches oppressed and hampered them, to come to one where there was liberty of conscience, where religion was an individual matter, and not one of government regulation. To force them to keep Sunday as a Sabbath in accordance with the notions of this Methodist preacher and the small minority he represents in New York, would, therefore, be "to destroy the foundations of the liberties secured for them." It would be to upset our whole republican theory.

THE North American Review for December commands attention no less by the eminence of its contributors than by the value and timeliness of its table of contents. First, there is a symposium on "The Health of American Women," regarded from three distinct points of view; Dr. Dio Lewis considers the question as it is affected by the prevailing style of feminin attire, especially by the practice of tight-lacing; Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton points out the many injurious influences of social environment; and Dr. James Read Chadwick sets forth the effects of education, climate, and food, and finally discusses the question whether the modification produced in the European human type by transfer to America lessens the fertility of women. Gov. Buren R. Sherman, of Iowa, writes of the "Constitutional Prohibition" of the liquor traffic in that state, and maintains that the measure is in entire accord with the traditions of the original settlers, and approved by men of all political parties and all nationalities. General Grant, in an article entitled "An Undeserved Stigma," states the facts of Gen. Fitz John Porter's case, and argues that the sentence of the court martial that cashiered him was based on a misconception of the essential circumstances. Richard A. Proctor writes of "The Influence of Food on Civilization," discussing with much learning and force some of the most interesting sociological problems of the present day and of the near future. Prof. Fisher, of Yale College, in defining the causes of "The Decline of Clerical Authority," holds that this decline, which affects the status of church and minister only as a part or function of the secular state, is by no means to be regretted. Finally, there is a symposium upon the conditions of "Success on the Stage," the contributors being six of our most prominent actors—John McCullough, Joseph Jefferson, Madame Modjeska, Lawrence Barrett, Maggie Mitchell, and William Warren.

The Future of The Truth Seeker.

Friends all over the country are awaiting anxiously to know what will become of THE TRUTH SEEKER, now that its founder, editor, and publisher is gone from us; and we must make it known, though it is with the keenest regret that we place other names than that of D. M. Bennett at the head of its columns as conductors of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The future of the paper rests with its old friends and patrons.

Before Mr. Bennett left on his tour around the world he made his Will, leaving everything he possessed, with the exception of a few mementos, to his faithful wife. That Will stands now, exactly as he wrote it, and Mrs. Bennett, instead of Mr. Bennett, is the proprietor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The editorship will be undertaken by the same person that Mr. Bennett confided it to when he was absent in Albany, in Europe, and on his journey around the world. This is in accordance with the wish of Mr. Bennett, often expressed. He used to say that the paper must liv as long as there was a priestly fraud or churchly wrong to fight, and when he fell some one else must seize the standard and bear it on. Though we know we are all unworthy to undertake to finish the work begun so bravely by so grand a man, yet circumstances hav put us forward, and we shall not shirk what seems a plain duty. We hav been associated with the paper since the first, and we owe it to the honored dead to keep green his memory, to finish, so far as we are able, his struggle for freedom for the mind of man, and to force at last from the lips of the church an abject apology for the great wrong done him. The rest of the world will render its tribute as it knows him better, and it shall be our grateful duty to spread that knowledge. And we owe it to his lonely wife to do all that can be done to help her bear the great burden imposed upon her by this death—a burden heavy for the strong man to bear, yet now resting upon a woman's weaker shoulders.

To his friends and patrons it is due that all contracts he made be carried out faithfully. They will miss him, but they shall not miss his soul—THE TRUTH SEEKER. For with him the paper was above life. It is a strong weapon with which to do battle for the right, and to see it broken would hav grieved him worse than death. If there is an immortality, or another life, from whence he watches, it would, for him, turn a shining heaven into bitter night to see his paper weaken and die.

And so we of New York will put our shoulders to the wheel. If Mr. Bennett's former friends and the friends of Liberalism all over the country will do but a tithe as much, the paper can be made strong to do the work needed now as much as ever. We shall hav help from wise heads; men eminent in Liberalism and science will aid us, so far as in their power, with contributions and counsel; we shall look to the friends all over the country to furnish the necessary means by getting new subscribers and paying their own subscriptions promptly. If they do this THE TRUTH SEEKER will be a perpetual monument to its founder; if they are indifferent and apathetic the paper will die.

Friends, it rests with you all. On our part the publisher and editor pledge themselvs anew to the work of enlightening the people regarding the fallacies of superstition and the fraudulent character of the church. As this paper has been in the past, so it will be in the future—a fearless exponent of truth and the outspoken foe of ecclesiasticism. It will oppose all efforts to enslave the mind, made on whatever pretense. The pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER will still be open to all, and opinions, however diverse, may find expression therein.

It is not an entirely new experience to the readers or to us. Though the call is sudden, yet we hav been more or less prepared for it by reason of Mr. Bennett's many and long absences. When the Christians took him to prison, when the Freethinkers sent him to Europe, and when his friends asked him to go around the world, the paper was continued and the business managed satisfactorily to all concerned. We shall not be less activ and zealous, now that he has left us again to enter upon the long journey that all must make sooner or later.

Liberal ideas are fast gaining a hold upon the people of this country, and every year makes it easier to spread the truth. Let THE TRUTH SEEKER be sustained for a few years, and no change which can occur to it will jeopard its existence. We ask its friends to make an extra effort for that time. The paper is larger than any other Liberal journal, and its expenses consequently are greater; and now that the price is reduced, it is by far the cheapest, and should hav a larger circulation to make its income commensurate with the cost of publication. We want to impress these facts upon the minds of Liberals, because we think if they understand them they will make a little extra effort in its behalf.

Let us assure all that the paper will go on, and we hope that all its friends will unite with us in making it a speaking and living monument to the memory of its founder, D. M. Bennett.

A Mournful Coincidence.

The fact that the date of the present number of THE TRUTH SEEKER falls upon the birthday of its founder will recall to many the little incident mentioned in Mr. Bennett's letter from Egypt (vol. ii, p. 620, A Truth Seeker Around the World). He describes it as follows:

A BIRTHDAY BATH.

Dec. 23, 1881.—This is my birthday, and I spent a portion of it in writing my letters to you, to let you know what I am seeing in this far-off part of the world. In the afternoon, as the sun was shining down brightly like that of June, I thought that I would celebrate the day by taking a bath in the Nile. You see, I had never bathed in the Nile on my birthday, and never before been sixty-three years of age. Perhaps I ought to do something unusual on such an occasion as this, and possibly, too, it is my duty to bathe in all the "holy rivers" I meet on my journey around the world. So with these pious thoughts running through my mind, I walked up by the side of the river for nearly a mile, soap and towel in hand, looking for a place where I could safely descend to the water; but not having altogether forgotten my swim in the holy Jordan, and remembering there are still crocodiles in the Nile, I must confess that I viewed with some degree of apprehension the surging, boiling current, making whirlpools as it rushed along, giving proof that the banks were not only very steep and high—quite perpendicular—but that the stream was very deep. I also fancied that the naked farmers working in the fields cast unfriendly eyes at me, and I knew not but that if I should lay my garments off, though they needed them not, they might appropriate them or do me other injury. I cast my eyes over to the west side of the river, and there saw the shore low and gradual, with the appearance of a moderate current. But it was quite a job to get over there, and, whatever my final destiny is to be, I do not quite relish the idea of being chewed up by a crocodile; not but that my meat would taste as sweet to his holiness as that of a Christian, but I cannot someway divest myself of the idea that an unpleasant sensation would for a moment run over a person when he felt the jaws of a crocodile closing upon him. I think I prefer to die of old age. So, with all these thoughts running through my mind, I sort of compromised with myself with regard to the bathing enterprise, and returned down near the steamboat landing, where the bank had been graded down. Here I took off but part of my clothing, and took a partial bath. The water, however, recently from the mountain springs of Central Africa, was not as warm as were the waters of the Dead Sea and the river Jordan. This, too, may be the last time I will bathe in any river on my birthday.

THE fourth volume of Mr. Bennett's travels will be finished as speedily as possible and sent to all who subscribe for it. Many hav already sent in the $1.50, but there are many more yet to hear from. Mr. Bennett was engaged up to the last moment on this work, and the last words he wrote were for its pages. His sad death necessarily causes delay, but in January we hope to hav it completed from his notes and the already published accounts of the receptions given him. It will also contain the account of his death and funeral and the splendid tribute of T. B. Wakeman.

The Bennett Monument.

TO THE LIBERALS OF THE WORLD: A committee to hav a fitting monument erected to the memory of D. M. Bennett having been appointed at the meeting of the "Lodge of Sorrow," it herewith addresses you to set forth its plans and purposes, and to ask your assistance and co-operation in making the enterprise a Liberal and an early success.

It is proposed that all Liberals contribute a dollar each at least, that the monument may thus be a tribute in which all may feel an interest; but a greater amount from any one may be subscribed where the means of the subscriber warrant a larger sum.

It is intended to place as fine a momument over Mr. Bennett as the amount contributed will permit; and we hope to make it an imposing memorial of the love and esteem which will worthily mark the resting-place of one of the greatest Liberals of the age.

That all who subscribe may possess a constant memento of the monument and its surroundings it is proposed to issue to all who subscribe one dollar a fine engraving of it; and to all who subscribe five dollars there will be presented a memorial volume, bound in morocco, being a biography of Mr. Bennett, containing extracts from his most important and valuable writings, an account of his death and funeral, and a list of the names of those who contribute. The book will contain also a splendid likeness of Mr. Bennett and an engraving of the monument. It must be understood that by this plan we are not offering a premium for subscriptions. It is adopted only so that every Liberal may be enabled to possess a highly-prized souvenir of the spot where he lies, which entombs the body, and will be an enduring record of the life of our honored friend and leader.

All subscriptions should be sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and designate the amount for the Bennett Monument Fund Committee.

Plans and progress will be communicated from time to time to the subscribers by THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Let this be a "labor of love," by which you will perpetuate Bennett's memory and sustain the cause he nobly served. Yours fraternally,

DANIEL EDWARD RYAN, Chairman,

Resolutions of the Bennett League.

At a meeting on Sunday evening, Dec. 17th, the following resolutions were passed by the Bennett (formerly the Fourth New York) Liberal League:

WHEREAS, D. M. Bennett, the beloved president of this League, and the proprietor and editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has departed this life, and

WHEREAS, His high character, his grand purpose, his fidelity to the right, his patriotism in breaking what he deemed to be an unconstitutional law, his risking his life and sacrificing his liberty to vindicate the rights of others, his unflinching courage in passing through the outrage and ordeal of an unjust imprisonment, his grand battle against the numerous curses of superstition, his masterly exposure of the crimes, the persecutions, the errors, the bigotry, and the hypocrisy of Christian teachers; his thorough love of humanity, his constant effort to elevate the ignorant and down-trodden to intelligence and independence, his never-ceasing effort and hard work to spread light, truth, honor, manly self-reliance, and loving, fraternal principles; his splendid business talent in founding through poverty and trial one of the most successful Freethought journals in the world, THE TRUTH SEEKER, all stamp him as one of the most remarkable men of the century, and one whose honor and good work it becomes our sacred duty to aid in perpetuating; therefore be it

Resolved, That in the death of D. M. Bennett America has lost a citizen and the world a man whose career and life were an honor to our country and its democratic principles.

Resolved, That his public life and deeds were in accord with those of the founders of the republic whose sturdy "rebel" spirit in defying their divinely appointed kings and unjust laws gave him a noble and inspiring precedent for resisting in our day legal conspiracies against the liberties of our people.

Resolved, That we, his friends, bear witness to the worth and integrity of his life, to his thorough honesty in meeting all of his obligations, to his lifelong strictly temperate and industrious habits, to his love and devotion for his faithful wife, and to the practice of all those good qualities which stamped him as one of nature's noblemen, and insure the continuance for good of his labors and influence.

Resolved, That we also bear witness to the manner of his death, that he died as he lived, a Liberal, relying up to his last moment of consciousness on only nature and nature's laws for the final solution of life and death, and that he utterly repudiated Christianity.

Resolved, That we herewith take up the trust that he laid down only with his life, and that we consecrate ourselvs to the carrying out of his good work by sustaining and perpetuating THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that we call on all true Liberals to aid energetically in the good work.

Resolved, That this League be hereafter known as the Bennett Liberal League, and that it takes on itself the duty of erecting a monument to D. M. Bennett, the monument to be paid for by popular subscription.

Resolved, That we herewith tender our deepest sympathy to his afflicted widow, and we trust that the great sorrow in which it is our privilege to share may be lightened by constant tributes of love from many sustaining friends.

AT a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Liberal League of Pittsburgh the following resolutions were passed:

Resolved, That in the death of D. M. Bennett we recognize, not a divine providence, but a natural event; nevertheless an unfortunate one, not only for the Liberals of the United States, but throughout the world.

Resolved, That while we grieve for our and their loss we are gratified that his work was done—and so well done that we may profit by his example.

Resolved, That we heartily sympathize with his bereaved widow and business associates.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication.

Brother Bell Appreciated.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEKKER, Sir: We are very glad to learn through THE TRUTH SEEKER that W. S Bell is coming West again. We like him as a lecturer, but we like him still more for his genial, pleasant, and entertaining manners. We do hope that the Liberals of Iowa will wake up and giv him plenty of work in this state. His little pamphlet, "Liberty and Morality," is just splendid.

MRS. FLORA DUTTON.

W. S. BELL made us a call last week on his way to Kansas. He lectured last Sunday at Pittsburgh, Pa. He proposes to locate in the growing West, and his address is Paola, Kansas. He is a logical and fluent speaker, and should be kept busy by the Liberals. He is also going to act as agent of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We hope he will meet with a generous reception.—ED. T. S.

The Death of D. M. Bennett.

From the Liberal.

On reading the notice of Mr. Bennett's death, our first impulse said, "Can it be true? Why did not death claim some one else and spare Bennett, the noblest man of all?" We can scarcely yet reconcile ourself to the thought of his death. Can it be that we will never hear his mild, calm voice again? Is it true that his pen will be still forever? Will the emotions of all that is good, grand, and noble within us never be stimulated and set aglow by his noble appeals again? Shall the eastern star of our hope go down forever? Our impulses say no; our senses say yes. Yet Bennett, whom we all loved, honored, and esteemed, has gone to that echoless hereafter, and will never lead us to victory again. Though he is dead, his work will liv, and man for generations to come will be better, happier, and freer for Bennett's having lived.

A meeting will be held at the hall next Sunday evening to express our sorrow at the death of this great man.

From the Chenango Tribune.

D. M. Bennett, one of the foremost Liberals and Freethought promoters and editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, died at his home in New York city, on Wednesday morning (6th), at the age of 64 years. His death resulted from gastric fever coupled with an affection of the heart. His name will long be remembered by Liberals throughout the world and will forever shine with that of Thomas Paine and Giordano Bruno.

Editor of The Truth Seeker Dead.

From the Kansas Blade.

The death of no person within our memory was so unexpected to us as that of Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor and proprietor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, which sad event occurred at his home in New York city Dec. 6, 1882, and after a brief illness, in which he was confined to his bed only one week. Mr. Bennett having survived his tour of the world, and returning in apparent good health, strong hopes were entertained by his thousands of friends that he would liv many years to uphold the right and combat error.

Mr. Bennett's early life was full of discouragements, but being favored with an indomitable will, he persevered over all difficulties and reached the age of manhood well schooled for the struggles and trials that awaited him. There is no school like adversity to bring out the nobler qualities of manhood, if there is any in the man, and Mr. Bennett had plenty of that.

Mr. Bennett died a martyr to truth. There can be no doubt that the course pursued by the villain Comstock shortened his days. His cruel and unjust imprisonment injured his health. That also led to his trip around the world, a stupendous undertaking for a man of his age. The malaria of Egypt and India impaired his health beyond his power of recuperation. Mr. Bennett was an extraordinary man; he was more than that—he was GREAT. He has left behind works that will endure as long as man survives.

There should be no relaxation in the support of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the part of Liberals. That paper has become a necessity to the Liberal cause and must be sustained. Able hands will control it and keep it up to its present standard of ability and interest.

The funeral of Mr. Bennett occurred last Sunday, Mr. T. B. Wakeman delivering the address. The particulars we hav not had, as the daily papers hav made no mention of either his death or funeral. This is greatly to their shame, as it shows them to be in mortal fear of the aristocratic church.

D. M. Bennett.

From the Spiritual Offering.

No sadder news ever came to us, none ever took us more by suprise or caused a greater shock, than that announced in the following words, under date of New York, Dec. 7th, but not received until this morning, Dec. 11th:

DEAR FRIEND: It is with feelings of profoundest sorrow that we are called upon to inform you of the death of D. M. Bennett, so dear to all, which occurred on Wednesday, the 6th instant.

The funeral will be held on Sunday, the 10th, at 10:30 A.M., at the German Masonic Temple, 220 East 15th street. All friends of the deceased are invited to be present.

E. M. MACDONALD,
T. B. WAKEMAN.

In silence we handed it to the editress; the sorrow pictured upon her pallid face and her tear-dimmed eye, with the three words, "Is it possible!" told more of the deep, heartfelt grief than we can picture in words. Our aged assistant editor, M. K. Wilson, with hand trembling with emotion and with feelings too deep for utterance, returned the sad message without a word. Silence in such a moment was far more expressiv than words.

We hav no words at command to express the intensity of our grief, our deep sorrow for the irreparable loss sustained by the cause of Liberalism and Freethought not for this country alone but the world; for events of the last few years hav brought him for whom we mourn, into world-wide notoriety as one of earth's prominent leaders in the great work of emancipating the minds of men from superstition's bondage, more degrading than was ever mere bodily servitude.

To this grand work Mr. Bennett's life was devoted; and more especially for the last ten years has every power of this wonderfully earnest man been consecrated to it. We doubt if the world has ever known one in whom was blended more earnestness, sincerity, indomitable courage, persistency, vigor, and activity of mental powers and physical endurance, than was combined in the person of D. M. Bennett. Because of this, he was able to accomplish the gigantic work he has with the pen, so great that it has astonished the world, and yet comparatively few know of its vastness.

During the summer of 1880, in the city of New York, we had for several months, just previous to his departure for his trip around the world, many personal interviews with Mr. Bennett, and learned more of him, of his honesty of purpose, inflexible adherence to what he believed to be right whatever the sacrifice, than we could hav obtained in any other way.

In view of all he had suffered from Christian persecution, and the slander and abuse of men identified with the Liberal movement, before we met the first time after his return from prison, we expected to find him soured in disposition and extremely bitter toward his maligners; we were mistaken; in calmness of spirit, with the gravity and wisdom of a sage, he reviewed the whole history, its bearings upon individuals, and the cause.

Of his labors, of his voluminous works, of his recent tour around the world, and the vast amount of knowledge obtained, it is not our purpose to speak. He has, in bodily presence, left us; but the products of his vigorous and varied mental endowments are left, from which the world will largely profit. Oh! how much we regret that we could not hav had one year added to his valuable earth life, that more of the gems of truth recently gathered could hav been scattered among the people. But we do rejoice that D. M. Bennett has lived to bless the world. His memory will be cherished, and his earth work be remembered and honored, when the pigmies in body and mind, both East and West, who hav maligned him and unsuccessfully plotted his ruin, shall hav been forgotten.

To Mrs. Bennett, to Mrs. Allen, his only sister, ladies whom we know and esteem, we tender our deepest sympathy.

To all Liberalists and Spiritualists we appeal for renewed activity in the cause for which our friend so zealously labored up to almost the last day of his life. In our next number we shall doubtless be able to giv something more of his closing hours of earth life and of the obsequies. We know that D. M. Bennett livs. In that great fact we rejoice as we fully believe he did. Without this knowledge we should exclaim with Southey:

What a world were this,
How unendurable its weight, if they
Whom death had sundered did not meet again!

The Case of Heywood.

The trial of E. H. Heywood for the mailing and advertising of alleged unlawful matter has been set down for Jan. 1, 1883. The following appeal is being circulated:

MEDFORD, MASS., Dec. 13, 1882.

To the National Liberal League and all friends of toleration and fair play:

The trial of Mr. E. H. Heywood, of Princeton, Mass., in the U. S. District Court in Boston, will commence on Monday, Jan. 1st.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers are already apprised of the circumstances which hav led to this trial. Anthony Comstock alone is practically the plaintiff. The counts of the indictment are:

1. That Mr. Heywood has used the U. S. mails for the transmission (upon admitted request) of his pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes."

2. Also for the transmission of certain extracts from Whitman's poems.

3 and 4. And of advertisments of a syringe.

If Mr. Heywood did these things he did them solely as an exercise and vindication of the right of free thought and speech and private personal liberty.

These are charges upon which no one without a sinister and malicious motiv, or having suffered demonstrable injury thereby, would seek to convict any person, knowing that the prescribed penalties in imprisonment and fine would be outrageously severe. I am told that the penalties which may be imposed upon Mr. Heywood, if convicted, are ten years imprisonment and five thousand dollars fine! The statutes on which Comstock relies for Mr. Heywood's conviction are most unfair and dangerous, in that they do not duly recognize degrees of crime in matters in which degrees and motivs are all-important, and call for no proof of harm. They were enacted through the instigation, at least partly underhanded, of Comstock and his coadjutors.

I believe the real motiv of their enactment was to serve the ends of establishing an inquisition on American soil, with Comstock as prime inquisitor. Their ostensible object of suppressing obscenity is mainly a sham to deceive the general public, while wholly ex-parte prosecutions of those whose opinions are opposed to Comstock & Co. may be speedily and noiselessly put through, and the victims stealthily removed from public sight. Liberals, will you tamely permit this? Will you allow bigots to form and fill bastiles in free America with convicts whose only crimes are their opinions? The wicked flee when none pursues. The work of real obscenists has always been done by stealth. But the victims of Comstock, like D. M. Bennett, Dr. Foote, and others, hav done nothing underhandedly. Yet I myself heard Comstock testify before Commissioner Hallett that he only uses "fictitious addresses when necessary." He so addressed Mr. Heywood by his own confession in my hearing. Do any believe it was necessary?

Fortunately the Comstock laws are believed by most able minds to be unconstitutional. To prove them so at this trial would completely frustrate Comstock and his coadjutors. Let Mr. Heywood, therefore, hav all possible aid in his defense! Whether fanatical or not, he has every appearance of being a sincere, true man, and he is certainly a true Liberal, believing in permitting to others every right he claims for himself.

All hints of his general character in the ordinary relations of life, as far as I learn, are that it is good. You can therefore safely act from sympathy as well as policy in aiding to defend him in this attack upon his liberty. His defense involves a principle precious to you all, and is your interest, no matter how widely your tastes or opinions may differ from his, and no matter if he is a bad character instead of what I suppose him—at the very worst a most eccentric but well-meaning man. No just, pure, and benevolent person needs a better excuse for aiding his defense than the fact that his trial is a clear case of persecution for opinion's sake.

I will take charge of any money forwarded to me for the purpose of Mr. Heywood's defense. He is almost wholly without any available pecuniary means of his own. I will report the receipt and disbursement of all money sent me in the columns of Man from time to time. There is no danger of sending too much, and on the other hand every dollar will help. Certainly one thousand dollars may be needed, and two or three hundred are needed at once.

HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL REVIEW OF THE SUNDAY QUESTION. With Replies to an Objector. By George W. Brown, D.D. Rockford, Ill. Price fifteen cents.

Our friend Brown has made a valuable addition to the few works in existence on the Jewish Sabbath question. He clearly shows it to be a Jewish institution, and that there is nothing Christian about it. He shows that Jesus and his apostles had no more regard for the Sabbath than any other day of the seven. He also examins early and later Christian authorities, thereby showing that the day has no Christian basis to support it. His Reply to Critics and his Appeal to History are important portions of the little work. Those interested in the Sunday question will very naturally wish to see what our friend has to say upon the subject. We expect to make arrangements to hav the work for sale.

A WORK entitled "Diana, a Psyco-fiziological Essay on Sexual Relations," was issued last year for private circulation. We hav just received a copy of the new edition, revised and enlarged, and published by Burnz & Co., 24 Clinton Place, N. Y. The work can be ordered of them. Price 25 cts.

Darwin as a "Theological Expert."

From the League Man.

In the New York Independent of November 19th may be found an article from the pen of Prof. E. D. Morris, D.D., upon the "Unfaith of Charles Darwin." The text from which the reverend doctor's article was produced was a brief letter written by Darwin to a German student, and as it is a letter that should be given the widest circulation possible, the writer is happy to hav an appropriate occasion for reproducing it into the columns of Man. It reads as follows:

SIR: I am very busy, and am an old man in delicate health, and hav not time to answer your questions fully, even assuming that they are capable of being answered at all. Science and Christ hav nothing to do with each other, except in so far as the habit of scientific investigation makes a man cautious about accepting any proofs. As far as I am concerned, I do not believe that any revelation has ever been made. With regard to a future life, every one must draw his own conclusions from vague and contradictory probabilities. Wishing you well, I remain, Your obedient servant,

Downs, June 5, 1879. CHARLES DARWIN.

Now, as I cannot giv space to quote from the professor's epistle, I will briefly state his troubles to the reader. His communication bears evidence that he wrote under a painful state of fear and anxiety lest the influence of Mr. Darwin's name should sway mankind toward discarding theology. The principal point in the reverend doctor's argument seems to be to prove that Mr. Darwin was not a theological expert, consequently "not competent," he says, "to speak upon religious matters."

Now, let me say right here that I agree with the learned professor in his opinion that Mr. Darwin was not a theological expert, and, as I think that he has not made out the case quite as clear as it should be made, I propose helping him in the matter. Does the reader fully realize what it is to be a theological expert? I am inclined to think that the idea of an expert in theology would strike most men at first thought as it did myself, that it is as a sort of excrescence or useless appendage, having no legitimate place in society. I confess, furthermore, that until I had read much of the Christian scriptures and compared their varied teachings, even theological seminaries and colleges had always been a sort of riddle to me, as I could never quite fathom their use. To my stupid mind it had appeared that if the creator had revealed to his creatures his manner of creation, his laws, his commands, a knowledge of the future state, all, in short, that was requisit for their guidance in this world, and, having had this revelation placed before them in a book printed in languages familiar to all, that it would hardly be expected that this revealed word should contain anything so difficult that the most simple mind could not read and fully comprehend it.

These, I would say, were the conceived notions of my boyhood, and consequently I could not discover the necessity for theological institutions, for the purpose of fitting a class of finite beings for teaching their fellows what the infinit had already inspired his prophets and evangelists to write out and place before all in a language which they could read. And I confess that I cannot as yet fully understand why it should not hav been according to my early conceived notions, that is, why the creator, omnipotent and all-wise as he is, had not, in preparing a book of guidance for his creatures, made it so plain, so lucid, that the most ordinary mind might hav comprehended it, that he who ran, in fact, might read. But God's ways, we are told, differ from our ways, and we must not question the wisdom of this book, even though it may addle the brain of the most astute, except he be a theological expert! My early notions of these matters hav long ago vanished, however, and I hav finally arrived at the conclusion that if theological institutions and theological experts are what is needed to ferret out the mysteries, and harmonize the jumble of incongruities which the ordinary man finds in this book, which it is claimed the creator has had prepared for his creatures, then, by all means, let us hav a bountiful supply of theological institutions and theological experts.

But, reader, I want to say to you here that this idea of a theological expert is ever connected in my mind with very strange associations.

I cannot, for the life of me, think of such a character, but my mind associates him directly with some dancing-jack, some figure that I hav at some time seen at a Punch and Judy show, some acrobat or tumbler that I hav seen at the circus, or some wizard or sleight-of-hand performer whose wonderful exploits I hav somewhere witnessed.

The reason, no doubt, why these several figures chase each other pell-mell through my brain whenever I think of the "theological expert," is that such an expert is to my mind a sort of peculiar phenomenon embracing mentally the characteristics and addicting himself in a mental way to many unusual, but similar usages to those performed in a physical way by the several personages mentioned above.

To illustrate: in my mind's eye I behold the theological expert endeavoring to solve the problem and harmonize the variance between the theological dogma of the creation of the earth and the time of its existence, and the rather generally accepted scientific hypothesis of the same; and in his attempt to harmonize these conflicting theories he certainly performs mentally some as wonderful feats of wire-dancing, tumbling, and juggling as any physical performer in these arts that has ever exhibited himself to the gaze of a wondering world.

When the manner of the earth's creation, or formation, as well as the probable period of its existence, was first broached by scientific men, the course of the theological expert was to pounce down upon his scientific opponent and brush him away with a whack, much as we see one figure in a Punch and Judy show brush out of sight another; but now, since the scientific hypotheses of these matters, like the ghost of Banquo, will not down at his bidding, he adopts a milder course and shows us by a peculiar method of theological reasoning that there is really no difference between the scientific theory and his own ancient dogma.

For instance, the little difference between 4,000 to 5,000 years since the creation of the earth according to theology, and several millions of years according to geology, the theological expert accounts for very easily by making a Bible year equal a thousand, ten thousand, or a hundred thousand of our present years, according as it may suit his purpose. Such a manner of disposing of these differences may not be altogether acceptable, at first thought, to the ordinary individual, and here is where the imperativ necessity for the theological expert comes in, in order that our dull heads may become enlightened. The theological expert, we must remember, has had a long and very thorough schooling in this sort of mystery solving, and to harmonize such little discrepancies is a very easy matter for him. He has long been able to discover how three can be one and one three, which men like Mr. Beecher can comprehend, though he cannot quite accept the theological creation, proving quite conclusivly that he, too, is not a skilful theological expert. Why, it is the easiest thing imaginable for a theological expert to set up, side by side, the figures 1 and 3 or 4,000 and 400,000, and then by merely crying out "presto change!" the 1 and the 4,000 vanish, leaving the 3 and the 400,000 still standing and in bold relief, and then by the same method he can as quickly change the 3 into 1 or the 400,000 into 4,000. He not only does this and comprehends it all himself, but he has the faculty also of making it all quite clear to a vast number of his fellow-beings. Such is the transcendent ability and wonderful power of the theological expert, and shall we still say that the day of miracles has past, or that the theological expert has no legitimate place among mankind? Moreover, leaving aside the art of harmonizing theology and science, the great necessity for, and the wonderful juggling exploits performed by, the theological expert in harmonizing the various readings of the Bible, it would be impossible to over-estimate.

To illustrate again: the Bible tells us that the creator is omnipotent and omniscient—that is, all-powerful and all-wise—and further, that he is loving and merciful, loving his creatures even better than earthly parents love their children; and then, on the contrary, it attaches a character to him more malignant, cruel, vindictiv, and fiendish than that which could be rightfully attached, I think, to any human being that ever walked the earth—Nero and Caligula not accepted.

How could we ever harmonize such matters except for the wonderful theological expert? Then the necessity for his wisdom and skill comes in again in explaining the immaculate conception, as well as the ten thousand discrepancies, incongruities, inconsistencies, and downright contradictions that constantly stare the ordinary reader in the face, from Genesis to Revelation.

No, much as we may hav learned to esteem and admire Charles Darwin, we are obliged to acknowledge that he was not a theological expert, for he could do none of the mountebank tricks so easy to the skilled theologian. He was not a prestidigitator, having the skill for turning one into three or 4,000 into 400,000; he could not furnish his admirers with a God the most diabolical and fiendish, and then by a method of skilful juggling make him appear a God of love and mercy, worthy of being reverenced and adored above all else that the universe contains; nor could he ride at one time a thousand donkeys of scripture passages, each going in different directions at break-neck speed, and all rearing, plunging, and kicking in regular donkey order, determined to throw his rider. Moreover, he could not, or would not, quarrel with those who differed with him upon religious or other matters, calling them Infidels and fools, and all the vile epithets his vocabulary could furnish; and even when he himself was defamed, ridiculed, and insulted in a measure which few hav ever been, he kept straight on, without turning to the right or left, in the accomplishment of the great object to which his life was devoted.

No, it becomes evident enough upon examination of the matter that Charles Darwin was not a theological expert, and possessed few, if any, of the requisits that would hav fitted him for such a calling.

But now, while I most cheerfully coincide with the reverend doctor's opinion that Mr. Darwin was not a theological expert, I cannot quite so readily yield my assent to the thesis which the professor's article is written principally to show, namely, that because Mr. Darwin was not an "expert" in theology, therefore his opinions in religious matters are not entitled to that weight that one of his ability would naturally command.

Now the professor does not claim that Mr. Darwin had never read, and read thoroughly, the Jewish Christian Bible, but on the contrary the doctor givs it as his opinion that he (Mr. Darwin) had read and weighed deeply the Christian scriptures. After quoting the sentence in which Mr. Darwin says that he does not believe that any revelation has been made, the professor goes on to say that "here he (Darwin) speaks as if he had examined the question, considered evidences, weighed probabilities, and reached finally a negativ conclusion."

Now, admitting as the professor does, that Mr. Darwin had read thoroughly and digested well the Christian scriptures (and who believes that such a man as Charles Darwin had not?) why, then, let me ask, are not his opinions in regard to revelation or any other matter of fact entitled to all the weight which the opinions of so able a man naturally and rightfully carry with them?

Treating this matter a little more seriously than we hav done before, let us ask here what sort of teachers are really needed by mankind to instruct them in religious matters? Should they be such as take for granted the sacredness and verity in every particular of a book that had its origin in an ignorant, superstitious, and semi-barbarous age, and then attempt to harmonize, in the sort of dancing-jack or juggling way above described, a jumble of contradictions, crushing common sense and reason to the dust in the futil attempt, or should they be those whose utmost endeavor it is to ascertain and point out to their fellow-men what is true, whatever past theories or teachings may be demolished by actual facts? It seems to me that the latter class are our true and proper instructors, and taking this view of the matter, where is the man that has lived in this or any other age of the world whose opinions upon religious matters are entitled to a higher respect, and should rightfully bear greater weight than the opinions of Charles Darwin? I do not know that Mr. Darwin ever read the Christian scriptures in Hebrew or Greek, nor do I consider it all necessary for a full understanding of them that he should hav done so (he probably did at his college), but he certainly understood English, and as these writings all are sufficiently translated into our languages to be compared with the facts of the world, what more is required for a full understanding and comprehension of them than the reading and studying of them in our language?

Will it be claimed that there are still fatal errors in the translation of these writings? If so, then it were better that the theological experts go at it and translate them two or three times more, rather than spend their and our time in attempting to solve knots and tangles of their own bad translations.

The great trouble with our professor plainly is that no matter how able one may be, no matter how much he may hav read and thought over the teachings of the Jewish Christian scriptures, if he dares express an opinion upon any important dogma claimed to be contained in these writings averse to the commonly accepted theological belief and teachings, then he is regarded and disposed of at once by our wise professor as incompetent to express an opinion upon the subject at all! All adverse critics are to be ruled out. Well now, my dear professor, if a correct understanding of the Bible be really as difficult as you endeavor to make out, then I respectfully submit that it would be better for you and all other Protestants to hop right back to the Roman Catholic church. If the Bible is such a book of crookedness and mysteries that it is given only to a few to understand it, and these fortunate few can really understand and fully comprehend it, then it is clear that the Catholics are quite right in their method of interpreting it through their pope and priests, and that the Christian world should all follow their example. They can rule out dissenters at least consistently.

But the time is past when any attempt of a theologian to rule out or to lessen the influence, or to throw dirt at such a personage as Charles Darwin, will hav any effect upon the more sensible portion of our race.

Read the signs of the times and learn that the "theological expert" and theologians in general are taken, if regarded at all, at a large discount by the present age. Any attempt by such to belittle or weaken the influence of one of the greatest of modern scientists, makes their own littleness in our modern world appear the more apparent. The numbers at present are not few, and they are growing rapidly day by day, who believe in their innermost souls that if all theology, all which "theological experts," from time immemorial hav been thrusting into the Christian scriptures was expunged therefrom, thrust out root and branch, leaving only that morality and humanity which hav been the very life-blood that has sustained all the life of these writings to this day, the so-called Christian scriptures would be vastly improved. For one, I am willing to go further than this, and to say that with all theology expunged from the New Testament the human sentiments of this book in this revised form might become a beacon-light and a suitable guide of life to the present age, and possibly for all ages to come,

But, to conclude, contrast this man with these theological experts. The spectacle presented of this grand old man, Darwin, commencing at a time when the popular sentiment of the age regard as sacrilegious any attempt to show the true origin of species, and in spite of long established theological and scientific dogmas, patiently studying, experimenting and toiling on, kicked, cuffed, ridiculed, insulted, and vilified at every step in his progress, without an unkind word in return, until at last at a ripe old age, with head whitened for the grave, his theories in the main are accepted by all of the most eminent and learned of his time, is a spectacle of human sacrifice, of life-long devotion to the cause of truth in the interest of his fellow-men, the grandest, the most sublime, and most successful the world has ever witnessed. And now the feeble attempt of this embittered theologian to kick the dead lion, to belittle and to destroy the influence of this grand old man's deliberate opinion as to the fact of a "revelation," will hav the reverse of the effect intended, except among that class who regard a doctor of divinity as an oracle of God. To a far greater class the effect will be just the opposit from that intended, causing no small degree of indignation, if not of disgust. But whatever may be the present effect of this labored attempt by a doctor of divinity to escape the influence of Charles Darwin, one thing may not be doubted, and that is, that the name and authority of this prince among men will liv while the earth exists, growing brighter as time rolls on, while it is even now certain that the name and influence of his detractors, of our wise professor for instance, will soon pass into that oblivion which will kindly shield them from the contempt of the generations to come.

ALONZO VAN DEUSEN.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

rom the Springfield Ill., Morning Monitor.

Outside of his political or Infidel notions but few men occupy a higher plane in the esteem of his countrymen than the genial, kind-hearted gentleman who will to-night stand before the largest audience ever assembled in the opera house. We remember him when a young man, unknown to fame, making his first appearance upon the stage of action with such gentlemen as Chief Justice John Scholfield, of our supreme court, and others who hav since distinguished themselvs as lawyers and jurists, and not only made names for themselvs, but reflected the highest credit upon the great state in which they made reputations which hav long since leaped over the state boundary and become world wide. For many years we drank in with pleasure the wine of the feast served up in the court room by such as Ingersoll, Browning, Grimshaw, Bushnell, Logan, Knapp, Haynie, Baker, and others, who hav, like many of those named, gone to lay their life-briefs before the Judge of all. With many now living we remember his younger days as a laywer, and among them all—Infidel and Republican though he be—Col. "Bob" looms up with a pleasure unsurpassed, and in the light of personal regard is eclipsed by none. He is one of America's great, big-hearted, high-toned, elegant gentleman, whom men love to look upon with pleasure as a close approach to the god-like in the dignified attributes of manhood. Among the sweetest pleasures of our checkered life the hours spent in the court-room where "Bob" Ingersoll was a practicing attorney, are the most cherished. We admire his manhood, his independence, his honesty with his own conscience, his reverence for reason, and the grandeur of a mind with the moral courage to face the world with his sentiments regardless of the millions from whom he may differ. It is not necessary to acquiesce in his notions, sing peans of praise to his Infidelity, or to sacrifice cherished beliefs contrary to those of Mr. Ingersoll in order to "mark well this model man among men" that he is, as an orator and scholar. The world could acknowledge his genius, eloquence, and intellect in no more marked manner than by the crowding thousands jostling each other and paying extravagant sums to hear his utterances, when the modern lace-curtained clergy of the church are greeted only with a miserable account of empty benches or the luxurious rest-inviting upholstery of the house of the Lord. He is, beyond doubt, America's greatest orator, because the most original. One of the world's most advanced thinkers. His bravery is unquestioned, his honor untarnished, and is more Christ-like in exemplifying the work of the world's Redeemer in his practical life preaching of the gospel of universal brotherhood, faith in man, and charity for the world's weaklings, than any man of the nineteenth century.

"In Memoriam."

DEATH OF D. M. BENNETT.

From the Boston Investigator.

We deeply regret to make an announcement like this, as it will not only be sad news to all our readers, but it also denotes the great loss to the Liberal movement of a very able, devoted, and successful advocate of its principles and measures. Mr. Bennett died at his residence in New York last Wednesday forenoon, after a few days' illness of inflammation of the stomach. His age was 64. On another page of this paper will be found some notice of the meeting held by his Boston friends in Investigator Hall on Thursday, to manifest their respect for his memory and their sympathy for the loss which his family and friends hav sustained by his death.

Mr. Bennett was a man of much ability, and one of the most industrious, energetic, and persevering workers that Liberalism ever had. Besides editing THE TRUTH SEEKER very acceptably, he wrote quite a number of large books—some of them containing eight or nine hundred pages—and in addition to these he managed to write a great many pamphlets; yet with all this remarkable fluency he wrote well, whether his subjects were theology, history, travels, Freethought, or political and social reform. A full review of his literary work for the past twelve years would show that he accomplished an amount of labor hardly ever excelled if equaled. Probably it was his excessiv toil that at last broke him down and shortened his days.

Mr. Bennett was in manners very modest, quiet, and unassuming, but always in earnest in whatever he undertook, and truly sincere, honest, and brave in the advocacy of what he deemed right and just, no matter what or how many obstacles confronted him in his path. We bid him farewell with regret, for he was a most valuable laborer in the Liberal movement, and he will be long and kindly remembered by his many friends. To his afflicted companion, in this hour of her sorrow and bereavement, we fraternally offer our sincere sympathy and condolence.

The Freethinker's Society at Investigator Hall held a discussion on Sunday forenoon last upon "Free Banking." Remarks were offered by Prof. Wetherell, and Messrs. Spooner, Devine, King, Cooper, and Dr. Wright. The question for next Sunday is, "What is the true value of money?" Opened by Mr. Sumner.

Mr. George N. Hill alluded to the death of Mr. D. M. Bennett, and offered the following resolution of respect and sympathy:

Resolved, That in the death of the late editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. D. M. Bennett, we deplore the loss to humanity of a friend, and to Liberalism of a leader; and while we extend to the bereaved family our deepest sympathy and condolence, we feel that we and all Freethinkers the world over also stand in need of human consolation on this occasion.

The resolution was unanimously adopted and voted to be published in the Investigator.

The Transit of Venus.

From the Scientific American.

The sky was overcast throughout a great part of the United States on the morning of December 6th; and, as a rule, the atmospheric conditions during the time of the transit were not favorable for continuous and exact observation. Yet there were but few places at which no observations of value were possible, while at most of the stations enough was accomplished to make the watching astronomers fairly well pleased with the result of their day's work.

In this city the observations were fairly good after the first contact, which was missed, until toward the end of the transit, when the sky became overcast again.

At the Naval Observatory, Washington, all four contacts were observed with the twenty-six equatorial, the first and last contacts through thin clouds. The sun was obscured during the middle of the day, yet a number of good measurements of the diameter of Venus were secured. No black drop or other extraordinary phenomenon was observed, except by Superintendent Sampson at the last contact. Some fifty photographs were secured.

At Princeton, Professor Young observed all four contacts, partly through thin clouds, but on the whole satisfactorily, and took one hundred and eighty-eight photographs, mostly excellent; some were affected by clouds. Complete measures of the diameter of Venus were obtained by both filar and double image micrometers. Spectroscopic examination of the planet's atmosphere showed lines of water vapor conspicuous, and some unknown lines.

At the Allegheny Observatory, Pittsburgh, Professor Langley's observations were only partially successful. Clouds prevented exact determinations of contacts and all photometric and spectroscopical work. He noticed a curious and novel phenomenon as the planet was entering upon the solar disk. When Venus had about one-half entered on the sun's face, a tolerably bright point of light was seen near the circumference of the dark body of the planet outside the sun, and where no direct ray of sunlight could reach it. The position angle of the center of the bright spot was about 172 degrees, and it extended for something like 30 degrees along the planet's limb. It was luminous and distinct, and, Professor Langley thinks, was certainly not a phenomenon of irradiation, nor due to any instrumental cause, but what its physical signification is he could not conjecture. It was observed with the great equatorial and a magnifying power of 244, used with the polarizing eyepiece by Professor Langley, but was seen also and quite independently by his assistant, Mr. J. E. Keeler, with a very much smaller telscope and a power of 80.

Observers in other places noticed light spots in the surface of Venus, some suspecting them to be snow-fields.

The observations of Professor Eastman, at Cedar Keys, Florida, were quite successful, though the first contact was lost by the intervention of a cloud. The second contact was obtained very well; no black drop or ligament was seen, and the limbs of Venus and the sun were very steady. The sky was mostly clear from 11 o'clock to 1h. 40m. One hundred and fifty photographs were taken with dry plates and thirty with wet plates, all good. The third and fourth contacts were very well seen, with no black drop.

The observations made at Yale College were much impaired by clouds. Professor Waldo reports over one hundred and fifty photographs, showing the full sun with a reference line from a horizontal mercurial surface photographed at the same time. The heliometer observations were particularly successful, and the definition of the sun in spite of the clouds was such as enabled the atmosphere of Venus to be clearly visible in the heliometer, and the silvery aspect which this atmosphere assumed between the third and fourth contacts was clearly discerned.

Considerable good work was done at Cambridge Observatory. The German astronomers at Hartford, Conn., secured eight sets of observations with the heliometer. The German party at Aiken, S. C., were less fortunate. The French observers at St. Augustine, Fla., had a clear day. All the contacts were perfectly taken, two hundred photographs were secured, and many micrometrical observations were made. Professor Asaph Hall and the Belgian party at San Antonio, Texas, missed the first two contacts, owing to clouds. The last pair were taken perfectly, no black drop or point of any kind being seen. Professor Houzeau obtained, in addition to these contacts, one hundred and twenty-five measurements. Professors Hall and Woodward got over two hundred good photographs.

At the Lick Observatory, Mount Hamilton, Cal., the day was splendidly clear, and many photographs were taken.

The European observers were generally thwarted by bad weather. Favorable observations are reported from Cape Town and Durban, South Africa.

Professor Davidson's party in New Mexico were favored with a clear sky and steady atmosphere. The contacts were clearly observed. Two hundred and sixteen excellent photographs were obtained, and a large number of measurements were made with great precision. Indeed, not a single item in the long program of the day's work was missed. At nearly all the Mexican stations the weather was good. The observations of the French Commission in Puebla were entirely satisfactory.

Favorable reports are also made by observers in the West Indies and Central America. At Melbourne, Australia, successful observations were made, but observers in Queensland and Sydney were disappointed. The American party at Wellington, New Zealand, took two hundred and thirty-six photographs.

The Freethought Directory.

Persons sending me their names and post-office addresses for the second edition of the Freethought Directory are requested to write the name and address very plain, and inclose printed cards when convenient, to prevent errors. I desire to add at least fifteen hundred names to the present list by next issue.

Book Notice.

THE FIGURES OF HELL; OR, THE TEMPLES OF BACCHUS. Dedicated to Licensers and Manufacturers of Beer and Whisky. By Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson. Published by the author. A neat little volume of between two and three hundred pages. Price $1.

This is decidedly one of the most activ and aggressiv publications on the temperance question we hav seen. It abounds in statistics, showing the amount of alcoholic liquors imported into the United States, the amount manufactured clearly showing that these poisonous liquors and their effects cost the people of the country more than all the expenses of the government.

This is a very convenient and useful little volume for those who take a deep interest in the temperance cause. We hav it for sale.

Letters from Friends.

ZANESVILLE, O., Dec. 12, 282.

DEAR FRIEND MACDONALD: I hav just read in the Ohio State Journal of Mr. D. M. Bennett's death. Is it really so? Can it be possible, and only home so short a time? I feel that I hav lost a dear friend. I am an old subscriber and a firm friend of Mr. Bennett, as well as yourself, for you sustained your part when he was away. Yours, J. BURGESS.

STONE CREEK, OHIO, Dec. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am extremely sorry to hear of the death of our brave and noble Bennett, and I deeply sympathize with his friends and relations in their sore affliction. It now becomes our duty to go to work with renewed energy to fight superstition and to uphold the glorious cause which he so ably defended. Bennett is dead, but not forgotten.

Fraternally yours, D. HOCHSTETLER.

KEEP THE BANNER WAVING STILL.

ANN ARBOR, MICH., Dec. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Within the walls of this orthodox roost—as S. B. McCracken calls it—we are not all dead to the cause of humanity and truth. And it was with pain and sorrow we received the news of the death of D. M. Bennett—that noble and honored American citizen whose name and fame will become nearer and dearer "to the people of this world" as time rolls on. LAW DEP'T MICH. UNIVERSITY.

SOUTH OTSELIC, N. Y., Dec. 10, 1882.

MR. MACDONALD: My TRUTH SEEKER dressed in mourning struck me like a thunderbolt. I could scarcely believe my own senses when I read of the death of our noble standard-bearer. The Freethought army has looked to him so long, how can we spare him now? I rejoice that I had the privilege of shaking hands with him at the Watkins Convention. I feel deeply for his lonely wife whom I never met.

Yours in sympathy, MARY PECK.

NEW HAVEN, Dec. 11, 1882.

BROTHER MACDONALD—DEAR SIR: The notice sent with the paper of the death of our well-beloved brother, D. M. Bennett, came to hand. We were very much grieved to learn the sad news, and sincerely sympathize with Mrs. Bennett in the loss of her dear husband. Thousands of people will mourn the loss of one who has done so much for humanity. We hope you will take the helm and keep the old ship going, and we will help her to keep afloat.

Respectfully, E. B. JONES.

JOPLIN, Dec. 11, 1882.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: The tidings reach me that your beloved one has passed away—has laid down the staff. All I can do is to weep with you for the fallen great. Yet we must reconcile our minds to such change. 'Tis the eternal law; hence the chastisment. Kind Mother Nature I know is with you to close the flood-gates of sorrow at the best time. Weep on, until the volcano of grief has been emptied, then the calm peace will wrap around you the mantle of reconciliation. J. E. BALL.

EMBREVILLE, PA., Dec. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: While writing these words the obsequies of dear old D. M. Bennett are taking place. How sad and unfortunate that a life so useful should be so brief! In his demise Liberalism loses an able exponent and all mankind a friend. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER may be continued with unabated interest. The world is moving in the line of progress. Though some of our best men are dropping along the wayside, it is hoped that their places will be filled by those equally good, W. I. HARVEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav heard with great sorrow that Mr. D. M. Bennett is dead. He was an able, upright, and Liberal man, who has done a heap of good by striking heavy blows against that biggest shame, worst curse, and greatest fraud of American life, namely, against bigotry. It is very much to be regretted that he has been taken off comparativly early in life, and not been allowed to continue his noble, excellent, and praiseworthy work a great many years longer, Respectfully, JOHN GEO. HERTWIG.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., Dec. 11, 1882.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Permit me to address you this note of sympathy. D. M. Bennett—your husband, my friend, the friend of humanity—I knew to be a grand, noble, pure man, with a heart full of sympathy and love. Every act of his life was prompted by the best motiv. But he is at rest; the warm heart that beat so freely for suffering humanity, that suffered so deeply and felt so keenly the wrongs heaped upon him by men professing to be free, to be liberal, beats no more. Libeled, slandered, abused, imprisoned; but he is at rest, and D. M. Bennett will liv, liv forever. He has built for himself a monument that will liv and "speak" when his enemies are forgotten. Rest, dear brother, rest; no storm can hurt you now. Your words and works will liv to bless the world. I shall hold as dear mementoes his letters to me from different parts of the world, and the many tokens of esteem from time to time. My husband joins me in this expression of sympathy to you, and we breathe a prayer that the work begun by your dear husband will never flag, but continue to grow; that THE TRUTH SEEKER will liv on and be retained as a monument to the life-work of D. M. Bennett.

Yours in sympathy, MAGGIE E. CLARK.

BANGOR, ME., Dec. 10, 282.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: We, the undersigned, Liberals of Bangor, wish to extend to you our sympathy for the great loss you hav just sustained in the death of your dear husband. We feel, too, that we hav met with an irreparable loss. Where shall we look for another great captain?

BURTON, MICH., Dec. 11, E. M., 282.

DEAR FRIENDS: Please accept our condolence in this hour of affliction. Mr. Bennett has closed up his struggle with life's stormy scenes. He has passed to his happiness and reward. He has done a great work for the world. He knows now of the facts of spirit life. And, like an honest seeker after truth, he gave his hearty evidence of what he has critically observed. He will now work for us behind the scenes, where he can't be seized and unjustly condemned and thrust behind penitentiary and prison walls. Ever yours, D. HIGBIE, M.D.

BELLEVILLE, CAN., Dec. 13, 1882.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: It is with the most sincere regret that I feel impelled to write a letter of condolence with you on the sad loss you hav sustained by the very sudden death of your husband—a loss felt by us all, and one that cannot be replaced. I am sincerely sorry for you in your deep distress, and can only hope that time, the great healer, will do the same for you that it does for us all—gradually wear away the rough edges of your grief. We are all born to hav our share of grief and trouble in this world, but in your case it has been especially trying. Believe me your faithful friend,

J. IRBY ILES.

CONCORD, KY., Dec. 12, 282.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT; Our home, like thousands of others, to-day is filled with mourning. If sorrow for the lost, if sympathy with the bereaved, can giv consolation, that consolation is yours.

The skies, late rife with golden glow,
No more effulgence shed,
For Nature chants in notes of woe,
"Our champion is dead."

As in the casket rests the form,
By fond affection placed,
In sacred memory we enshrine
The life by death effaced.

Sorrowfully yours, VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

VINELAND, N. J., Dec. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read the notice you were so kind as to send me of the death of our esteemed friend D. M. Bennett, the fearless champion of free speech and a free press. For trying to exercise these rights he suffered imprisonment, which impaired his health; and now his personal labors are done, but his writings will be read after his bigoted persecutors are buried in oblivion, or remembered to be execrated. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from its first number to the present, and would gladly be at his funeral if consistent, and, with others, drop a sympathetic tear at our great loss, but age (72) and other circumstances prevent.

Respectfully yours, J. S. SHEPARD.

THREE RIVERS, MICH., Dec. 12, 1882.

MRS. MARY BENNETT—DEAR FRIEND: We were surprised and shocked last evening by receiving intelligence of the sudden departure from this life of your good husband—my dear, old-time acquaintance of youthful days and fond remembrance. We deeply sympathize with and condole you in your great bereavement. May the good angels be with you and comfort and bless you in the decline of life, and may you feel sure, as we do, that you will again join him in the land of souls when you, too, shall cast off this rudimentary coil of body, to rise in spirit and soar away to the bright summer-land. I hope you will manage to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER running. Please put down my name for the forthcoming, or last, volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." We are well. Love.

H. AND L. D. BLAKEMAN.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Dec. 9, 1882.

DEAR FRIEND: On receipt of THE TRUTH SEEKER today, the sad news of the death of your husband reaches me. Thousands of his warm, devoted friends truly sympathize with you in your bereavement. Oh, how great is our disappointment here in the Great West! Only a few days ago we had hopes of seeing him amongst us again. Where shall we find another D. M. Bennett? The history of his travels around the world should be in every household, as no other writer on the subject has ever given such brilliant descriptions as those contained in this work.

Dear Friend, bear up under this great affliction. You hav laid his earthly form away, but D. M. Bennett has not forsaken you; his beautiful spirit will visit you, and his love and affection know no bounds.

Truly your friend, H. WILLIS.

LYNN, MASS., Dec. 9, 1882.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD: I hav just received your message of sorrow informing me of Brother Bennett's death. It is dreadful bad news indeed. What can I say in reply? I am at a loss, it is so sudden and unexpected. I can assure you that words fail me in attempting to express my deep grief and sorrow at hearing such sad and cruel news.

My wife joins me in sending our sympathy, pity, and regards to poor Mrs. Bennett in her present great affliction, sorrow, and loss. Our hope is that she may hav strength to bear up under this great and terrible trial. Surely Mr. Bennett's Liberal friends will help her bear her present trouble, suffering, and loss.

In conclusion let me say that ill health alone prevents my coming to the funeral. My desire is to go, but my wife, friends, and poor health say no.

Yours respectfully, J. S. VERITY.

READING, PA., Dec. 11, 1882.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD: It is impossible to portray my feelings on receipt of my paper last week. I had not seen any account of Mr. Bennett's death, and the first information flashed upon me as I opened my paper. You can better imagin than I can describe. He was always so strong, always so activ, that we had been led to expect long life for the brave old man. If it would not seem too forward or too presuming please represent my deepest sympathy with Mrs. Bennett, and say that the Liberals all in this part weep with her. She has the consolation of knowing that he livs in the grand work done so well and so faithfully. But his work is not done. It is of such a nature it will go on and increase in force until it will be impossible to compute the work by him accomplished. THE TRUTH SEEKER must not be allowed to languish now; it must be kept aloft as the banner of progress. L. E. HUGGINS.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 10, 1882.

MRS. BENNETT: My pen cannot express the deep sorrow I feel for the loss of our dear, heroic brother, D. M. Bennett. Thousands will unite with me in this sad bereavement, and manifest a very sincere sympathy and condolence. Under this severe affliction, be brave, madam, and bear your trial with true womanly heroism. We all hav to depart this life, it is the decree of nature; therefore none are exempt.

Your husband, madam, will leave behind him a name and a character which will liv and resound to unborn millions. It will and must thunder down the ages, and become a household word.

May his grand life be the pattern for millions more to follow, so that the dark superstitions of crafty and designing priests might ere long cease to exist, and all people who dwell on this beautiful planet, earth, might be quite free from the degrading shackles imposed on humanity by arrogant assumption. Yours, dear madam, with best wishes for future cheer, T. WINTER.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Dec. 10, 1882.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: My heart goes out to you in this hour of your greatest grief on earth. I loved Mr. Bennett, and hav been so willing to overlook his shortcomings, if he had any.

He was so unassuming, so affable, so purely open and candid. His trip around the world, his travels put in book form, his safe return to family and friends, his stand taken as to Heywood's experience with "Leaves of Grass" (which was a grand position for him to take), the short sketch of his life, which will serve as well for his obituary, and his passing away with the transit of Venus, leads me to think no moment of his life so opportune as this to leave this world.

He has done his work, and done it so well; and if there was any superstition in my make up, how gladly would I say I could see the hand of God in this strange coincidence. I hope there is a future, and if there is, I fear not for D. M. Bennett.

Mrs. Bennett, accept my heartfelt sympathy in this moment of great grief. Believe me sincerely yours, with best wishes, IRVING C. TERRY.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Dec. 10, 282.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD: With profound sorrow I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 9th inst. of the death of our gallant captain, D. M. Bennett. Like a true soldier, "he died at his post," battling for human rights.

While we weep for our fallen chief, let us remember that bigotry and intolerance are even now singing praises to their fiendish God, and planning a new and more aggressiv campaign. Let us close up the gap in the ranks as best we can, and present a still undaunted front. To that end THE TRUTH SEEKER must liv.

It was a curious coincidence, that just as the greatest astronomical event of the age was about to take place, Mr. Bennett's lamp should go out. December 6, 282, will be as marked a day in the Liberal calendar as it will in the scientific one. I am glad that Mr. Wakeman speaks to-day at Mr. Bennett's funeral. I will leave it to him to voice my feelings. I close by repeating the words of D. M. Bennett at the funeral of Max Stein, Oct. 21, 1876: "Our friend was one by whose deeds and services the world was made better for his having lived in it. He leaves a memory behind that can be most fondly cherished."

Yours sincerely, HARRY HOOVER.

WELLSBORO, PA., Dec. 10, 282.

TO THE EDITOR: O mournful day! Through the columns of to-day's Elmira Telegram I learn that our worthy chieftain, D. M. Bennett, has departed this life. Can this be true? Can this be real? What a great loss to our great and noble cause, when he was most needed to pass from life unto death! He has fought a good fight; he has kept the faith. His name and services will never be forgotten. We all sympathize greatly with Mrs. Bennett in her bereavement. May her health and strength remain. May she be comforted, knowing that thousands of dear, sympathizing friends are remembering her in this great calamity.

While we are painfully mourning our unexpected loss, let us again remember THE TRUTH SEEKER, and resolve that, though its founder has departed, it shall not go down, but shall and must be supported. May it ever be edited with as much ability as before. I regret that I cannot be with my dear friends to take one last look upon our great, good, and beloved chieftain. My sincere regrets and remembrances to you all, one and inseparable. Peace to the ashes of D. M. Bennett. L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

ADRIAN, MICH., Dec. 12, 282.

MR. EDITOR: How sad was the news that came to us in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER—of the death of its editor in chief, D. M. Bennett! In commemoration of the greatness of the man, and the labor and sacrifice that he made in the cause of mental liberty, I sat down to write an article at some length, narrating some of the labors and trials that he endured at the hands of narrow-minded Christian bigots, and others from whom we would hav supposed better things.

But finally I concluded that there were other brains and other pens that would probably do this better and more fully than myself, and so I dropped my pen. But since getting your card yesterday I feel as though I would not be satisfied without just dropping one word through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in reference to his faithfulness to what he felt was his duty. How nobly did he stand up for his and our rights when the prison doors were opened for him! Who of us that has been acquainted with Mr. Bennett's labors for the truth and the right through THE TRUTH SEEKER can help admire the greatness of the man whose face and voice we will see and hear no more. And here we will say to our aged and faithful friend of mental liberty, and stanch advocate of free press, free speech, and free mails, and of a repeal of all church laws—farewell!

S. D. MOORE.

IRWIN STATION, PA., Dec. 10, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Our beloved benefactor, who burst the shackles of superstition which we had been bound with for many years, and set our minds at liberty to think for ourselvs and seek happiness by making others happy—one of the grandest ideas that ever emanated from the human mind—is dead! We hav followed the hero for over four years; when he suffered, we suffered; when he rejoiced, we rejoiced; when he received honors, our heart was made glad. He defended our liberties, even to depriving himself of his own liberty. When he journeyed to foreign lands our love and good wishes followed him, and he rewarded us with a grand description of what he saw. How glad we were when we heard he had safely landed again upon our shore! How glad we would hav been to hav kept him with us!

All that is left for us to do is to cherish his memory and feel thankful for what he has done. We can do him no greater honor than to keep his beloved old TRUTH SEEKER alive for many years to come, till every foe lays down his arms and peace and unity are proclaimed in our land, and light shines in all minds blinded by the teachings of superstition. We cannot find words to express our sorrow at receiving information of the death of one esteemed so highly, and fully sympathize with you all who were more intimate with the good old gentleman. I will close by sending my warmest sympathy for the bereaved widow. WM. N. RIDINGER.

HAMMONTON, N. J., Dec. 10, 282.

DEAR FRIEND MACDONALD: Your notice of the 7th came to hand last evening. We cannot but feel sorrowful at the departure of our dear Brother Bennett (feeling at liberty to call him and Mrs. Bennett brother and sister, since they had much the same experience as ourselvs in our youthful days—judging from the recently published biographical sketch). When I called at his office about two months ago and left some money to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER, I took him by the hand and we had a little chat as to our early experiences. He said he did not regret his experience, and thought it had been of use to him through life. When this conversation occurred there was little in his physical appearance to indicate the change that has taken place.

We are very sorry circumstances will not permit of our presence at the funeral. He has left a good and lasting record. There is no doubt that his writings hav been instrumental in bringing about the change in society machinery that appears to me to be at hand. Old systems and usages are passing away and the glorious truth being substituted. We feel much sympathy for sister Bennett and all who hav been bereft of so noble a companion. We hope the cause may not falter, nor THE TRUTH SEEKER fail, because of this, to us, seeming calamity. The ways of Providence seem not to be ours. It may be he had done his work here, and can do more on the other side to lift mortals out of the slough of superstition and ignorance—the first maintained solely by the prevalence of the latter.

Yours truly, D. R. WOLLISON.

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 11, 1882.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD: I hav this day received the startling news of our friend and brother's death—our noble worker—our fearless advocate for Freethought—our D. M. Bennett.

Truly he has fallen face to the foe, and working to the last. I am sorry for us who remain that he has preceded us. I am sorry for Freethought that one of our standard-bearers has left this department of life. But how glad and proud we shall be to know that

He sowed the golden seeds to-day,
The harvest comes to-morrow.

He has borne much. I wonder the strong heart and untiring brain hav not failed before. We must keep his memory sacred by our activity in his work, and do what we can for the redemption of humanity from ignorance before we join the innumerable caravan. I cannot say what or half I wish; words fail me. Be assured I should hav been present at the funeral had I been where I could. Brave man, noble heart, I believe that his work will still continue where he will be known and valued, and not tortured or persecuted by those who did not know him. I am glad that he has left a golden line of thought "around the world" before he passed on. Remember me as one who esteemed him, and will do what I can to carry on the work he loved.

Yours, C. FANNIE ALLYN.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., Dec. 18, 282.

MR. EDITOR: When I received my paper of the 9th inst. this morning I was much surprised to see the reversed column rules and other emblems of mourning, and hastily turned to the editorial page, and was shocked to read the notice of the death of its able editor. I had not heard that he was ill, and as I from time to time perused his letters and vigorous editorials in his journal it seemed as if he would liv many years yet to battle in the cause of truth; but he has been stricken down just when we seemed to need his services the most. No words can express the deep and sincere sympathy I feel for his afflicted family at his sudden death. Mr. Bennett was certainly the boldest, the most outspoken, uncompromising champion of Freethought in America, and by his great ability and untiring industry did more for the cause than any other man in the country. The friends of liberty and reform throughout the land will miss him, but while his body may return to Mother Earth his thoughts and deeds recorded in the pages of his journal and numerous books he has written and published will liv for ages to come, and furnish material to fight the hosts of superstition as long as there is a priest or preacher left.

I regret very much I could not be present in New York to-day to testify my respect for him by attending the funeral.

I trust that the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be continued, that the friends of the cause of liberty and Freethought will rally to its support throughout the land and make its influence more widely and effectually felt than ever before. Hoping that Mrs. Bennett's health is good, and that she may long be spared to further the cause her lamented husband had so much at heart, I am,

Very truly yours, JAMES HUTCHINSON.

AUGUSTA, GA., Dec. 9, 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: How very sad I am to-night! I had but a few days ago read your note informing me of the sickness of our worthy friend and brother, D. M. Bennett, and was at the time strongly impressed that he might not recover. Ere the wrapper was fully removed from THE TRUTH SEEKER its draped columns told me too plainly that my worst fears were realized. How very sad to contemplate the great loss to the world of such a life of marked usefulness! The Liberal world is now in deep mourning, and can illy spare him from the great work of Liberal and social reform he was so well adapted to. His large, generous, philanthropic nature made him warm friends everywhere, and few could claim a larger number. His editorials and interesting letters which hav for so long appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, making its weekly visits to thousands of readers, will be missed. You, dear friend, are again at the helm; not this time temporarily, but perhaps to pilot her through the mighty ocean of Freethought. From past experience we doubt not your ability, though unlike then, the entire responsibility now rests upon you. He has long served as a balance-wheel, and now you'll feel his loss greatly, yet the dear TRUTH SEEKER must liv; and having already called to its aid so many able competent contributors, and a world of earnest thinkers and readers, the most of whom are good paying subscribers, I feel assured it will liv, and your efforts be sustained in conducting it. Yes, dear friend, all will miss him, will sadly mourn his loss. He has done his work, and nobly, too, and it will ever stand as a proud monument to his honor, his industry, and his superior intellect. Few hav been his equal as a writer and editor, and none perhaps hav done so much toward liberating the mind from superstition and advancing the cause of Freethought.

Dear Mrs. Bennett and you hav my deepest sympathy in your sad bereavement. as I know you also hav of thousands of others. Indeed, we all mourn with you, oh, so deeply. J. S. LYON, M.D.

WELLAND, ONT., CAN., Dec. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: When the sad news of the decease of our dear and highly esteemed friend, D. M. Bennett, came to this place, the sad intelligence was conveyed from one to another, and we all felt that we had lost a near and dear friend, and could see no way in which our great loss could be made up. We all (I mean the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER, about sixteen in number), felt like dropping a tear. And we feel a real sympathy for others who, like ourselvs, hav lost a friend in whom their hopes were largely centered, and we fail to see how or by whom his place can be supplied.

His writings hav done much to help emancipate the human mind from ignorance and superstition. He has left us the benefit of his labors, and it now devolves more upon us who hav got some light upon the true science of life to keep the car of progress moving. Do not let us think that because we can do so little we will not do anything. The very least of us all (and I am one of them) has an influence. Even a word spoken is often like seed sown, and has been known to take root and bear fruit years afterward. THE TRUTH SEEKER must be supported and its circulation largely extended, and if it continues to be as good a missionary as it has been its circulation will soon double. But as that rests entirely with its readers, let each one not sit down satisfied until we hav each added at least one more name to its list of subscribers.

I wish to make this communication as short as I can, but must say that whatever monument we may erect to the memory of our dear departed friend, let it be something useful. Instead of an obelisk or a pillar, rather let it be a building, that can be utilized, with a statue worthy of the man at or near its entrance. Whenever this undertaken call upon me, if living, and I will contribute to the best of my ability. I close with feelings of deep sympathy, not only to Mrs. Bennett, but to the thousands of friends who, like ourselvs, hav suffered what appears to be an irreparable loss. Many of Mr. Bennett's friends here unite with me in these expressions. Yours truly, JOHN RAY.

ELKLAND, PA., Dec. 10, 282.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD AND MRS. BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER containing the announcement of the sad, sad event of the death of our beloved Bennett came to hand last evening. Words cannot express our grief, our dismay! The shock disarms normal consciousness! Darkness overshadows! A beacon-light of hope is extinguished! Our heart mourns! Our tears flow in nearest sympathy and love! We honored, loved him as foremost representativ of the principles of liberty, equality, fraternity! If in his "taking off" our heart so sorrows, what intense grief, inconsolable loneliness, must be yours, who shared his dearest love, the sunshine, and radiance of his daily life! Oh, mourn not like those without hope! there is no death, but transition.

"The friends we mourn as lost hav not departed,
They hav but lain aside earth's frail disguise,
And on our dark way shed the light of loving eyes."

He wrote me of his sickness, occasioned by cold from exposure at the time of moving into his new home and office, and inhaling poisoned air from a defectiv and leaking drainage pipe. I did not entertain alarm for his safety, but replied jocosely, nor thought that death could smite him upon whom rested so much to be wrought out for the deliverance of humanity. True, his life was ripe in good works, vast achievements, royal honors won. He had won the highest plaudits of the world, and modestly bore the crown, bejeweled with the unfailing, steadfast love of tens of thousands of loyal, loving hearts.

Now that he has "gone before" we can best prove our devotion, our love, by loyalty to the maintenance of those principles to which he consecrated his life's endeavors. When the hand of oppression was upon him we learned his worth, and loved him more. The cause he championed and for which he endured was the oppressed of the world. Then was renewed our consecration to the truth and right for which he was assailed. The great wave of fraternal sympathy rolled up from around the world, entered the prison doors, defying tyranny and tyrants, demanded his restoration to freedom; this heart-loyalty turned the odium upon the oppressors, welcomed the victor back with honored greetings, sent him forth on a world circuit, during which his matchless achievements stand unparalleled. Now that his banner can no longer lead, may we, a loyal, loving, but stricken band of disciples, bear the regimental standard on to victory. In loving sympathy yours,

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

What Is the Soul?

BY FREDERIC C. COOPER.

What is the soul? So late the question ran,
What is't we designate "the soul" in man?
'Tis thought, intelligence, sensation, will,
Existence manifest, and activ still;
An aptitude to feeling, pleasure, pain,
The sum of all, the motion of the brain.

When the soft zephyr waves her viewless wings
O'er harp Eolian, from the voiceless strings
Sweet sounds arise, that else had silent lain,
So unseen forces stimulate the brain.
Whence is this music? Shall that harp exclaim?
From thine own essence, tuneful sprite, it came.
But whither gone? again the anxious cry,
Such heavenly harmonies can never die!
Ask the dull flint and cold, unyielding steel,
Whose hasty union fiery sparks reveal,
Where the bright offspring of that senseless pair;
Hark, the response from answering echo—Where?

"But human souls shall liv." What tells thee so?
Can the stream higher than its fountain flow?
O foolish mortals, heed the truth I sing,
All human souls from human nature spring;
'Neath cold mortality's resistless blight
Souls, sounds, and sparks are lost in endless night.

My Own Four Walls.

The storm and night is on the waste;
Wild through the wind the herdsman calls,
And fast on willing way I haste
Home to my own four walls.

Black tossing clouds, with scarce a glimmer,
Envelop earth like sevenfold palls;
But wifekin watches, coffee-pot doth simmer,
Home in my own four walls?

A home and wife I too hav got,
A hearth to blaze, whate'er befalls;
What needs a man that I hav not
Within my own four walls?

King George has palaces of pride,
And armed grooms must ward those halls;
With one stout bolt I safe abide
Within my own four walls.

Not all his men may sever this—
It yields to friends', not monarchs' calls;
My Whinstone house my castle is—
I hav my own four walls.

When fools or knaves do make a rout
With gigmen, dinners, balls, cabals,
I turn my back and shut them out,
Out from my own four walls.

The moorland house, though rude it be,
May stand the brunt when prouder falls;
'Twill screen my wife, my books, and me,
All in my own four walls.

—Thomas Carlyle (1825).

My Choice.

Dear Sam, who the camp and the pulpit has tried,
You ask me what system of life I should choose;
To manage my own little farm in my pride,
And to lounge where I like in my dirty old shoes.

In a patron's chill vestibule why should I freeze,
Why dance up and down at the dens of the great,
When to warm my own hearth I can fell my own trees,
And pursue my own game on my own small estate?

Who would angle for meals that can catch his own fish?
As honey unbought, what dessert half so sweet?
Giv me eggs of my own in a clean wooden dish,
And my hind's lusty daughter to cook up the treat.

While for health I can plow, and for exercise dig.
May the wretch who dislikes me my system forbear;
May he veil his grey locks in an alderman's wig,
Grow gouty while sheriff, and die when lord mayor.
—Anon.

M. J. Savage on "Liberty and Morality."

While Mr. Savage undoubtedly ranks among the most talented ministers of Boston, he outranks them all in liberality and in the scientific character of his discourses, for it would be quite improper to call them "sermons." But the reply which I am about to make to his restrictions upon "Liberty and Morality" will appear to flatly contradict these complimentary statements; I must let the reader draw his own conclusions. Mr. Savage alluded to my lecture in the following language:

I had a pamphlet sent to me the other day containing the address of a gentleman given before a large body of people during the last summer, in which he takes his conception of morality from the old Latin word from which the name is derived, as meaning custom; and he givs you the impression that morality means nothing more nor less than social custom; that whatever people agree to approve is all right, and whatever they agree to disaprove is all right, too, if you can manage to do it without incurring punishment; that is, that there is no eternal principle of right and wrong.

How the gentleman could hav received such impressions I am quite unable to understand, as the object of the writer was to make impressions just the reverse of these. If Mr. Savage had taken the pains to read the pamphlet carefully he would not hav fallen into the grave errors he has; and if he had taken the precaution to hav quoted any sentence containing the ideas which left such impressions upon his mind, he would hav seen my thought more definitly, and perhaps expressed his own more correctly. Now, to show that my pamphlet not only does not giv grounds for any such impressions as Mr. Savage received, but that the very aim of the lecture is to leave impressions the very reverse of those, and to avoid falling into error as he did, I shall quote my own words. After affirming that morality cannot be narrowly defined, I say: "To show how imperfect even the best definitions of the word are, we will take Webster's. He defines 'moral' as derived from mos moris, custom, habit, way of life."

Now the reader will observe that this is not my definition. I cite it only to refute it. "In other words, custom makes laws, and the law is moral, simply because it is custom. This definition, though loose, sufficiently describes the actual morality of mankind. It is palpable as daylight that public opinion, which is but the voice of custom, is the practical standard of morality as the world goes."

My lecture teems with expressions which repudiate this practical standard. It was the very central thought of the writer to expose the immorality of this standard. I will quote a few passages to substantiate this: "It becomes evident then that custom is necessarily immoral, or the supporter of a low morality in opposition to a higher morality, as it clings to the lower standard of the past and rejects the new and better methods of the present" (p. 4) "The moral tone of society has no leaven of improvement in it; it is to the individual unit contending against society that we must look for new truth and new life" (p. 6).

Nothing can be clearer than the fact that I repudiate public opinion as a standard of practical morality. And as for making the impression that whatever people "agree to disapprove is all right, too, if you can manage to do it without incurring punishment," nothing was farther from my mind. The practical standard of custom will bear such definition, but I maintain that it is man's highest duty to openly and defiantly violate a wicked law. And here is what I say on that point: "There is a dread in the popular mind against violating the statutes, as such violation would place the transgressor in the category of criminals. To violate the spirit and evade the letter of the law is not usually attended with compunctions of conscience. Thousands are doing this daily, who pass for moral people. Their neighbors who discover these "irregularities" in business pass them by as "tricks of the trade." But should some honest and brave man openly disregard and disobey some such despotic enactment as the Fugitiv Slave bill, or the Comstock law, he is immediately branded as an infamous criminal. The simple word criminal fills some minds with holy terror" (p. 12).

"The majority of men submissivly relinquish their rights if the robber comes to them in the name of the 'law.' . . . But liberty and morality demand that every law shall pass the test of reason and justice. If it cannot be shown that the law is founded upon the grounds of equal rights and justice, then it cannot be law; it is simply despotic outrage" (p. 12).

What grounds are there in these quotations for the "impressions" which the gentleman received? I do not take custom as the highest standard of morality, yet I insist that it is the practical standard, and as such must be repudiated. I should be pleased to hav Mr. Savage point out the passages in my pamphlet which justify him in making what seem to me to be reckless statements.

Gems of Thought.

CEASE to worship the gods, and become thyself a god. Cultivate in thy own nature all the perfections, the virtues, and the gracious attributes with which thou wouldst invest thy God; and then thou wilt realize that in man himself is found the sum of all good and the acme of happiness.—Elmina D. Slenker.

HOWEVER it be accounted for, the criminal converse of the sexes corrupts and depraves the mind and moral character more than any single species of vice whatsoever. That ready perception of guilt, that prompt and decisiv resolution against it, which constitutes a virtuous character, is seldom found in persons addicted to these indulgences. They prepare an easy admission for every sin that seeks it; are, in low life, usually the first stage in men's progress to the most desperate villanies; and, in high life, to that lamented dissoluteness of principle, which manifests itself in a profligacy of public conduct, and a contempt of the obligations of religion and moral probity. Add to this, that habits of libertinism incapacitate and indispose the mind for all intellectual, moral, and religious pleasures, which is a great loss to any man's happiness.—Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy.

THE sacred lowe [flame] o' weel-placed love,
Luxuriantly indulge it;
But never tempt th' illicit rove,
Though naething may divulge it.

I wane the quantum o' the sin,
The hazzard o' concealing;
But, Och! it hardens a' within,
And petrifies the feeling! —Burns.

WHILE the Bible contains many valuable precepts and much that men could heed with profit, the good is so intermixed with chaff and rubbish, with so much that does violence to our reason and common sense, that it is not possible that the whole could hav emanated from a being to whom we ascribe divine perfection. . . . It is an undeniable fact that Infidels are more constant and inquiring Bible-readers than Christians. The Christian, believing that it is unpardonable to doubt, never grapples with Bible contradictions and inconsistencies, but passes them by as mysteries not to be inquired into; and, taking his faith, accepts them as God's word, without proof or effort of reason, whilst the Infidel examins for himself, accepting nothing that does violence to his reason, or that is inconsistent with the perfections of the [supposed ?] Supreme Being.—Dr. Arter's "The Bible: Is it divinely Inspired."

RELIGIOUS beliefs must be founded on evidence. If they are not so founded, it is wrong to hold them. The rule of right conduct in this matter is exactly the opposit of that inspired in the two famous texts: "He that believeth not shall be damned," and "Blessed are they that hav not seen and yet hav believed." For a man who clearly felt and recognized the duty of intellectual honesty, of carefully testing every belief before he received it, and especially before he recommended it to others, it would be impossible to ascribe the profoundly immoral teaching of these texts to a true prophet or worthy teacher of humanity. It will comfort those who wish to preserve their reverence for the character of a great teacher to remember that one of these sayings is in the well-known forged passage at the end of the sacred gospel, and that the other occurs only in the late and legendary fourth gospel; both being described as spoken under utterly impossible circumstances. —Clifford's Ethics of Religion.

THIS is not the liberty that we can hope that no grievance ever should arise in the commonwealth —that let no man in this world expect; but when complaints are freely heard, deeply considered, and speedily reformed, then is the utmost bound of civil liberty attained that wise men look for. . . . If it be true that a wise man, like a good refiner, can gather gold out of the drossiest volume, and that a fool will be a fool with the best book, yea, or without books, there is no reason that we should deprive a wise man of any advantage to his wisdom, while we seek to restrain from a fool that which being restrained will be no hindrance to his folly. . . . Giv me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely, according to conscience, above all liberties.—Milton's Areopagitica.

MEN are told, indeed, to inquire for themselvs; but they are also told at what points inquiry must arrive; and the sentence of exclusion hangs over them if they happen to stray, with some of the best and wisest men, into forbidden paths. Now this "Protestant liberty" is, in one respect, more irritating than papal bondage. It mocks as well as enslaves us. It talks to us courteously as friends or brethren, whilst it rivets our chains. It invites and even charges us to look with our own eyes, but with the same breatb warns us against seeing anything which orthodox eyes hav not seen before us. Is this a state of things favorable to serious inquiry into the truths of the gospel? Yet how long has the church been groaning under this cruel yoke.—Dr. Channing.

THE temporal power of the pope, so long misused, has finally been taken from him. The Roman populace can do honor to their dead Mazzini and no one shall say them nay. For political purposes the pope is twice as dead as Mazzini, who, being dead, yet speaketh, and all Europe hears his voice.—J. W. Chadwick.

THE most important doctrin of a moral character dwelt upon by Mang is that of the essential goodness of human nature, on which he lays considerable stress. According to him, "the tendency of man's nature to good is like the tendency of water to flow downward," and it is shared by all, as all water flows downward. You may, indeed, force water to go upward, but the movement is unnatural, and it is equally contrary to the nature of men to be made to do what is not good."—Amberley.

FRIEND: "Madder, what is the matter with your nose?" Madder: "The only chance for an artist now is to paint quickly and cheap. I work with both hands, and blend with my nose."

A little boy went out to swim,
And took a cake of soap with him,
And slimed each supple little limb.

And when he on the bank arove
One long, last downward look he gove,
And then into the water dove.

And trying to regain the top,
In vain, alas, he tried to flop—
He went so fast he couldn't stop!

His limbs were soaped from heel to hip—
He couldn't get a half-way grip—
For every time he tried he'd slip.

The water no resistance gave.
And so, beneath the murky wave,
He found a wet, untimely grave.

With thrilling, thundering, thumping thud
He struck the misty, moisty mud—
And turkles fattened on his blood.

We dedicate this little hymn
To little boys of supple limb
Who soap themselvs before they swim.

LIVING AND DYING.

John Smith was eke a goodly man
As ever lived on earth—
The world admired and loudly praised
His truly pious worth;
His life was full of charity
And free from sinful pride—
But scarce had lived to thirty-four,
When one calm eventide
A mule kicked at him playfully,
And Smith soon after died.

John Brown, a knave of deepest hue,
Dwelt in the selfsame town—
A grosser, meaner, viler scamp
There never lived than Brown.
He cursed, he swore, he smoked, he chewed,
He even keno played,
And down in Texas years ago
They say a man he slayed.
Yet he lived on contentedly
And lots of money made,
Till, finally, a gray-haired man,
John Brown lay down to die.
His wife and children gathered round,
A preacher lingering nigh—
The only token of his death
A quiet, gentle sigh.

We'd like to liv as did John Smith,
Revered by all the town—
But when it comes to dying, we'd
Prefer to die like Brown.

SWEET ARE THE USES OF ADVERSITY.

A boy of twelve stood leaning against a fence on Duffield street, hat pulled down, feet crossed, and his right hand going up occasionally to wipe his nose, when along came another anatomy about his size and asked:

"Sick?"

"No."

"Any the family dead?"

"No."

"Going to run away?"

"I dunno. I've just been licked."

"Who dun it?"

"Dad."

"Did your ma ask him to?"

"Yes. She told him I had been aching for it more than a month."

"Say," said the new arrival, "you are in luck I'm trying my best to git dad to whale me. I'd giv fifty cents if he had tanned me this noon and it was all through hurting."

"Why?"

"Why! Hae'nt I got three dollars saved up to buy pap and marm Christmas presents, and if I can git 'em to whale me before Christmas won't I spend every cent of that money on myself? How much you got?"

"Two dollars."

"Bully. You are all right! You'v been licked. and they won't expect even a stick of gum from their pounded son. I'll go home and slam the baby around and steal sugar and kick the cat and sass mother, and if I can git walloped to-night I'll meet you here to-morrow, and we'll pool in and buy more pistols and scalping-knives, and rock candy and nuts and raisins than you ever saw before! Yip! Peel me down, dear father! hang my hide on the fence, mother darling!"—Detroit Free Press.

KNOW THYSELF.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase and read the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, entitled the Science of Life: or, Self Preservation. It is not only a complete and perfect treatise on Manhood, Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in man, Errors of Youth, etc., but it contains one hundred and twenty-five prescriptions for acute and chronic diseases, each one of which is invaluable, as proved by the author, whose experience for 21 years is such as probably never before fell to the lot of any physician. It contains 300 pages, bound in beautiful embossed covers, full gilt, embellished with the very finest steel engravings, guaranteed to be a finer work in every sense—mechanical, literary, or professional—than any other work retailed in this country for $2.50, or the money will be refunded in every instance. Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin, or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

THE Osservatore Romano, jubilant over recent English secessions from Protestantism, says, "Thus is being verified the prophecy of the Holy Confessor King that in three hundred years the united kingdom would be Roman Catholic."

A GOOD deal of matrimonial tribulation was brought to light in the last census returns of Great Britain. Several husbands returned their wives as the heads of the families, and one describes himself as an idiot for having married his literal better half. "Married, and I'm heartily sorry for it," was returned in two cases; and in quite a number of instances, "temper" was entered under the head of infirmities opposit the name of the wife.

WHEN the body of a man was taken into Christ church, at Hillier, Ontario, the Rev. John Halliwell, who had been deprived of the right to officiate by his bishop, was found there with his surplice on and book in hand. The Rev. Mr. Loucks, the rector of a neighboring village, had been brought over to read the burial service, and he met the procession at the foot of the aisle in the usual manner. So did Mr. Halliwell Both ministers began to read. Then Mr. Loucks stopped, led the mourners to the grave, and there completed the service, leaving Mr. Halliwell in possession of the church.

ONE of the timely papers in the Antiquary for December is Mr. G. B. Leathon's historical article on Christmas, in which he quotes from the Harleian MS. an omen applicable to this year:

If Christmas on a Monday be,
A great winter that year you'll see,
And full of winds both loud and shrill;
But in the summer truth to tell,
Stern winds shall then be and strong,
Full of tempests lasting long;
While battles they shall multiply,
And great plenty of beasts shall die.
They that be born on that day I ween,
They shall be strong each one and keen;
He shall be found that stealeth ought;
Though thou be sick thou diest not.

EVANGELIST BARNES writes to the Journal of Stanford, Ky., which is his home, that his experience in Waterford, N. Y., was not pleasant. "I may say," he explains, "that Waterford kicked us out—bowed and frowned at us, and then kicked us out. The bow, the frown, the kick, all came from the church powers that be. The pastors and officials are our bete noirs. The officers of the Waterford church passed a decree that, unless there was a break among the sinners before the close of the week, the further expenses of the meetings could not be borne. The pastor finally announced, at the close of the services one evening, that the expenses of boarding me and my family were too great to be paid without greater results. This last straw broke the camel's back, for our board was only $4 a week each. 'Business is business,' that is all I say. The next morning I left for New York."

AT the request of Prof. Brooks, of the Phelphs, N. Y., Observatory, prayers were generally offered in all the churches of the country for a fair day on Dec. 6th, for taking observations of the transit of Venus—an event of great scientific importance. In Milwaukee, however, the clergy were interviewed on the subject by the Republican-Sentinel, and declined to comply with the request of Prof. Brooks, giving as one reason that the astronomers and scientists of the world were generally Darwinian Infidels, and did not believe in the efficacy of prayer. And, as Milwaukee was about the only place in the United States reported by telegraph where they got a good view, one of the professors of the Jennings Observatory in this city—where all due preparations had been made and a failure occurred—suggests that at the next transit of Venus, which takes place 122 years hence, the clergy be respectfully requested not to interfere in the matter.

IN an Episcopal boarding-school the scholars and teachers were assembled for morning prayer. The reading and singing were over, and all were resuming their seats, when one of the young ladies, of a very short and thick stature, missing her chair, seated herself with a "thud" on the floor. Nobody smiled; all were too decorous for that. The fallen one, embarrassed into the momentary loss of common sense, retained her lowly seat, opened her prayer-book, and appeared to be earnestly engaged in examining its contents. This was almost too much for her companions, and a smile began to struggle on many a fair countenance, when the rector rose and commenced reading the first morning lesson. He chanced to read from the fifth chapter of Amos, as follows: "The virgin of Israel has fallen; she shall rise no more; she is forsaken upon her land; there is none to raise her up." This caused a general titter; the voice of the rector trembled as he looked up and saw the fallen virgin; the scholars turned red in their faces, and the exercises were brought to a hasty close.

AN interviewer asked Col. Ingersoll the other day, "Colonel, what is your opinion on the prohibition?" and to this was made the following characteristic reply: "I can giv you my opinion by telling you this story: A strong prohibitionist was discussing this question with a gentleman who had not much confidence in making people virtuous by law. The anti-prohibitionist said: 'How would you like to liv in a community where nobody drank any intoxicating liquors—where everybody was perfectly sober?' 'I would be delighted with such a community,' said the prohibitionist. 'And how would you like to liv where everyone was industrious, where they rose early and went to their work and retired in season, where everybody was at home in the evening, and where no one used profane language?' 'Oh, that would be perfectly splendid,' said the prohibitionist. 'And,' continued the questioner, 'how would you like to liv in a community where everybody attended divine service every Sabbath?' 'Why,' said the prohibitionist, 'such a community would make almost a heaven; but there is no such commnnity.' 'Oh, yes,' said the anti-prohibitionist, 'I know several such communities.' 'Where can I find one?' said the temperance gentleman. And the other replied, 'In any well-regulated penitentiary.'"

THE press and the people generally are gradually dropping to the true insignificance of the "Rev." Jo Cook. The New York World, the most orthodox of the daily papers of this city, says: "All reasonable persons must regret to see that the Rev. Joseph Cook has returned from New Zealand not only unroasted, but quite as raw as when he left his nativ shore. Humboldt's reported and unkind mention of Bayard Taylor as a 'man who had traveled further and seen less than any one he had ever met' exactly fits the Rev. Joseph Cook. No one expected to find that Mr. Cook had made any acquaintance with the principles of science, or had arrived at an appreciation of his own intellectual unfitness for any task which requires sound knowledge and a respect for truth, during his voyage around the world; but it was not too much to hope that he might hav acquired, by contact with polished races and by the sight of a larger horizon than he had been accustomed to, some sense of his own insignificance, and a corresponding measure of respect for names honored in all lands. But the homely proverb is justified once more. A silken purse is not to be made out of certain kinds of material, and no sooner does the Rev. Joseph Cook feel himself on solid ground within sight of his nativ heath than he takes up his parable against Herbert Spencer, whom he calls a charlatan, and against Professor Fiske, whom he reviles as but the echo of a charlatan. Mr. Cook must not misunderstand this brief notice. The World notices him, not because his opinions on anv subject are of the slightest importance to serious people, but because, being a harlequin, he is tolerable only when he is ridiculous, and needs to be corrected when he becomes impertinent."

HERE is a story of a bad boy's revised version of the sacred scriptures: You see pa has been reading out of an old back-number Bible, and ma and me argued with him about getting a new revised edition. We told him that the old one was all out of style, and that all the neighbors had the newest cut in Bibles, with dolman sleeves and gathered in the back, and they put on style over us, and we could not hold up our heads in society when it was known that we were wearing the old last year's Bible. Pa kicked against it, but finally got one. I thought I had as much right to change things in the revised Bible as the other fellows had a right to change the old one, so I pasted some mottoes and patent-medicin advertisments in it, after the verses. Pa never reads a whole chapter, but reads a verse or two and skips around. Before breakfast the other morning pa got the new Bible and started to read the Ten Commandments, and some other things. The first thing pa struck was, "Verily I say unto you, try St. Jacob's Oil for rheumatism." Pa looked over his specks at ma, and then looked at me. but I had my face covered with my hands, sort of pious. Pa said he didn't think it was just the thing to put advertisments in the Bible, but ma said she didn't know as it was any worse than to hav a patent-medicin notice next to Beecher's sermon in the religious paper. Pa sighed and turned over a few leaves, and read, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighor's wife, nor his ox, if you love me as I love you no knife can cut our love in two." That last part was a motto that I got out of a paper of candy. Pa said that the sentiment was good, but he didn't think the revisers had improved the old commandment very much. Then pa turned over and read, "Take a little wine for the stomach's sake, and keep a bottle of Reed's gilt-edged tonic on your side-board, and you can defy malaria and chills and fever." Pa was hot. He looked at it again, and noticed that the tonic commandment was on yellow paper and the corner turned up, and pa took hold of it, and the paste that I stuck it on with was not good, and it come off; and when I saw pa lay down the Bible, and put his spectacles in the case, and reach for the fire-power, I knew he was not going to pray, and I looked out the window and yelled dog-fight, and lit out, and pa followed me as far as the sidewalk, and it was that morning when it was so slippery, and pa's feet slipped out from under him, and he stood on his neck and slid around on his ear, and the special providence of sleet on the sidewalk saved me. Say, do you believe in special providence? What was the use of that sleet on the sidewalk if it was not to save sinners?—Peck's Sun.

Mrs. Foster, one of the actresses, seated herself at breakfast at the same table with the clergyman and his family. The minister with an offensiv remark requested the waiter to remove her. The lady burst into tears. Mr. McCullough appeared and said to the Rev. Mr. Hyde that he was a miserable dog, and threatened him with personal chastisment. The clergyman apologized abjectly. The lady would not receive his apology, but left him with the remark that the stage was more beneficent and instructiv to the public than the pulpit. If every parson who slanders the profession were to receive as prompt and just a rebuke as has the Rev. F. S. Hyde, we should hear less of it.

A Great Scriptural Difficulty.—Old Things Revived.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 6, 1882, the first part of an article, written by an able lawyer in the West, was printed under this head. That article, of which the present one is a continuation, dealt with the difficulties met with by translators and revisers of the Bible in regard to the points, accents, and punctuation of the Hebrew scriptures. The author claimed that the Hebrew was probably never a spoken language, but one invented by the Jewish priesthood in which to preserve their mysteries; that the Septuagint (the Greek version of the Old Testament) was written in the Chaldee language; that Abraham was a Chaldean and used the Chaldee dialect, and that the Ten Commandments were in the same tongue; that the impossible and contradictory stories connected with the Exodus were the result of blunders growing out of the defects of Chaldee characters used in writing, and that the Old Testament was probably compiled in the time of Ezra (500 B C). This brings the writer to the points which he takes up in the following:

Ezra says the whole law was destroyed. In what language did he restore it? We must remember that the priests had their own language and books.

It was miraculously restored by him. (See 2d Esdras, xiv.) We know that if the Jews had any book it was destroyed during some of the terrible calamities that befel them about the period of the captivity. When they were captivs at Babylon no doubt they acquired some literature and taste among a superior people. It is plain much of the prophecies and psalms, etc., were written after the captivity. The idea of David composing psalms describing the captivity is absurd. So Isaiah speaks of Cyrus rebuilding the temple. This was done in Cyrus's day to influence the king. As a prophecy it fails, for the temple was not rebuilt till long after Cyrus. There has been some work done just here to make the prophecies fulfil. But it does not square well. Ezra and David are made to liv too long. Some cunning hand of Jew or Christian during the early ages of the church has doctored here. We, however, know that the Jews kept up their colleges and priestly system. Some date between Ezra's time and later, the priesthood, finding that all knowledge of that peculiar dialect in which the scriptures were kept likely to die out, resorted to some plan of holding it as a perfect written language; for, as it was, it conveyed no sense to the readers. It was a sort of language that required a key. That key was kept separate from the books. It is notorious how secretly all the ancient priesthoods kept their mysteries and creeds, as did all professions and trades. We hav shown now that the Jews, in all probability, never for any time spoke that language called Hebrew, in which the Old Testament was written.

Abraham was a Chaldee, Moses an Egyptian, and so were all his followers, in language. The Egyptian was a Chaldaic dialect. All the people of Palestine used similar dialects. Before the Jews had a literature, or more than one small book of their law, they were carried off by the leading Chaldee nation, and there kept a century or more, only a few ever returning. Coming back, they used the Chaldee of Babylon. Indeed, nearly all of Daniel is in that Babylonic language. What, then, was this Bible Hebrew? It is nothing in the world but a lot of Chaldee consonants strung along without sense or meaning to any one who looked at it who had not the key to the mystery. That key was kept separate by the priests till some date after the captivity, when they applied it to the book, and made sense out of it for common readers. The key is, the shapes of the points, the vowels, and the accents.

Now the reader will see what a fearful charge was that which alleged that this key was first "invented by a school of accursed Christ-murdering Jews of Tiberias, blind and hardened," to quote from the Christian Protestants of the sixteenth century; for it really said that they made that Old Testament. The other party contended that Tiberians had all along remembered these sounds and points and their places. The others said it was not in the power of mortal mind, but that God gave these points, sounds, etc., to Moses, and that he and his successors miraculously remembered them to Ezra's time, when he, Ezra, invented and applied them because then the vision and the prophecy ended, and miracles ceased till Christ should come.

So that readers may see the significance of this controversy, a more especial illustration of the Hebrew must be given. To do this, I quote from perhaps the most exhaustiv review of the question by a learned man, who published it in the first magazine ever printed in the English language, entitled "The Students' Library," being extracts, arguments, and reviews of the most valuable works printed in England or in foreign journals from A D. 65 up to this time (A D. 1692). I hav the original work before me, published in 1692. The article is entitled "A Discourse on the Points, Accents, and Vowels of the Hebrew Language—Their Antiquity." The skeptical reader will see its importance before he gets to the end of this. Says the writer: "This great and mighty subject is of no less consequence than the receiving or rejecting the Bible itself. For without points the Bible is either mute or speaketh whatever men please to hav it say, or is most dubious, having divers and contrary senses. Hence the Jews say of it the points are to the letters what the soul is to the body; and as are vowels to consonants. With them, they may sound and signify; without them they cannot; for the vowels E, H, E, V, I are omitted in innumerable places where they are indispensable if there were no points. The like is in no language or book; besides, in many places they are to signify quite contrary to what they impart. To say they were invented as alleged, givs them such an origin as leaves them fitter to be blotted from the Bible, as being the work of 'blind, hardened, unbelieving Jews,' 500 A.D.; for it is impossible that the whole should hav been retained in the memory of men for a thousand years, from Ezra's date till 500 A.D., under that calamitous state of the Jews whilst the tongue ceased to be vulgarly pronounced or known amongst them. The rabbis themselvs complain they had so lost it in that time they could not even explain the apex legomena, or words but once used in the scriptures. For instance, where the prophet speaketh of 'sweeping with the beesom of destruction,' no one knew what beesom meant until by chance one of the rabbis heard an Arab woman say to her girl, 'Take up the beesom and sweep the floor.' How, then, was it possible to keep the true sound of all the points, vowels, and accents without shapes when multitudes of them cannot be distinguished by the sound at all? And no memory of man is able so much as once to receive the very pauses and notes of distinction, nor yet the very anomalies of punctuation; nor can the greatest rabbi, by all his skill, learning, and custom to read by points, be able to point an unpointed Bible truly without a copy before him. Therefore, to suppose that for a thousand years, before they had the shapes and points, they could infallibly and perfectly preserve all the pronunciation by oral tradition or use is to build castles in the air."

Such is the statement of the writer. He quotes at length from the writers on his side, who all concur that without these shapes the Bible is nothing, has no sense or meaning in a single line of it, and that to remember the pointing was impossible. They concur in the statement that whoever invented the points, etc., really gave us the Old Testament. They contend that God gave them to Moses, and that by a continued miracle the priests were enabled to remember them down to Ezra's day, when Ezra, knowing that miracles had ceased with him, miraculously invented the present pointing, accents, and vowels. This, to take their own words for it, is equal to saying that Ezra invented the whole Old Bible; for, if it be nothing without this system, then the inventor of it created the Bible, which was a mere jumble of consonants before his day. Had the Infidels alleged that Ezra made their Bible, how scornfully would our Protestants hav denied it! Nay, hav they not taken the greater part of Ezra's book from the scriptures and included it in the apochrypha merely because in his second book he tells us how he made the Bible? (See 2 Esdras, xiv.) This was about the first year of the ruin of the city, when he was at Babylon, this being near 550 B.C. He says: "For thy law is burned, therefore no man knoweth of the things concerning thee." He proceeds to tell us here that he was inspired by the Holy Ghost, and wrote all the things that had happened in the world down to his time. He must hav lived to a very great age, as we find him recording affairs that happened a century later, unless we apply the words "ruin of the city" to the date when the rebuilding of the temple was stayed.

A few quotations from some writers will make the condition of the scriptures without the points somewhat clearer. The author of "Tsak Sephataim" says: "We must know the Pentateuch was given at Sinai. Not that the tables were pointed, but as God spake the holy tongue, those that heard did understand all the motions and sounds, little and great, exactly as they were pronounced. So they could discern between the A Kamets and A Patheck, between E Tsere and E Segol, between the different O's and the U with Van, and U without, J with Jod and without, etc. Nothing less than the spirit of God could giv to them the sense of the obscure difficult parts."

To get a glimps of the difficulty we will examin the subject called Keri U Ketib, i. e., "genuin writing and reading." There are 848 places in scripture under this head. Of these are seven kinds.

1. Letters that are read in words, but not written, being mostly the letters A, h, u, J. Here the letter is pointed without writing it.

2. Letters changed from one to another: 52 are written with Jod (J) at the beginning, but read as Van; thus Jachedal is read Vachedal, etc.; 56 are written contrary, viz., V is read J; 70 with J in the middle are read as V, and so at the end are 14 such. Also many letters are changed into others of like shape or like sound. "Not" is read for to him often, and similar confusions.

3. Letters are transposed—thus, letters written out of place out of rule, are read in place in rule. Of these there are 62.

4. Whole words are written, not read, or read but not written.

5. Words written as one are read as two words, and words written as two are read as one.

6. Words used for modesty's sake.

7. Many words called full or defectiv.

Now, besides all this, the punctuation consists of three parts: (1) vowels, (2) points called Dagesh and Mappek, and (3) the accents, which are endless to mention. There are irregularities in the vowels; sometimes Shem is written with an S called Segol; at other times with one called Tsere. Also there are irregularities in the points, and numberless ones in the accents.

Now, all admit that the copy kept in the sanctuary was unpointed. One party claims it as proof the pointing was not done prior to Ezra's day; the other claims that it only shows the original Mosaic copy was unpointed. Let anyone read the scriptures and see if the Pentateuch was delivered on Sinai. That idea is one of the stupid blunders we fall into by accepting the first assertion of some one for fact. To go no farther, just consider that the delivery from Sinai was in the beginning of Exodus, whereas the Pentateuch records all the wanderings for forty years after. Yet ninety-nine-hundredths of Christians always think of the Pentateuch as having been thundered from Mount Sinai with the Ten Commandments.

Bitterly and long as the controversy raged, finally bringing within the battle-field Jews, Christians of all denominations and nations, we may note that no copy of the scriptures in Hebrew of a date prior to A. D. 500 was brought to disprove the allegations of those who favored the Tiberian school as the inventors of the points. This could hav settled the question. The so-called original copy of the Jerusalem synagog, what was it? Destroyed so often, proven by scripture itself to hav been a small or insignificant affair in Josiah's day, restored by Ezra (or Esdras, as was his Chaldaic name), it was no doubt destroyed when the temple was taken on several other occasions. We may suppose more than one copy existed after Ezra, seeing the Jews had become more cultured and lettered during the captivity. Yet so late as 270 B.C., when the Septuagint was translated, there seems to hav been but one accessible to the high priest, as he sent but the one with such express directions to return it. Various copies in some scattered form may hav existed. How different from each other we may infer from the difference between the one Josephus had and our own, as shown wherever he quotes scripture; yea, how very different, as may be seen from the New Testament itself where Matthew, xxvii, 9, speaks of a prophecy of Jeremiah, when no such words can be found in that prophet. In Numbers xxiv, "the star out of Jacob shall destroy all the world," seeing Noah was of Sheth's posterity, evidently an error, as are ten thousand like cases. When I stated the Bible was a growth I alleged what is self-evident. The Ten Commandments and Mosaic ordinances must hav been in the sacred language of the priests of Egypt or in the common tongue of Egypt. Whatever was written later must hav been in the sacred language or in the common language of the day. Thus the book found in Josiah's day. When Ezra came up from Chaldee captivity the language used by Jews was the common Chaldaic. Thus nearly all of Daniel was in Chaldaic of the day. Later the New Testament was in Syrio-Chaldaic and Greek.

Concerning this "copy of the law of Moses" that is so often spoken of in the Pentateuch, and in Joshua and other parts of the Bible, it may be as well to call the reader's attention to the fact that it must hav been a very small, tersely-written affair; yet it is constantly confounded by commentators and others with the Pentateuch, while the words "Book of the Law" are often confused with the Old Testament itself. Let any one read in Deuteronomy, chap. xxvii, and in Joshua, chap. viii, and consider what it must hav been. Joshua raised an altar and plastered some stones, and put this copy on those stones. Certainly there could hav been no more of it than is contained in the chapters of Deuteronomy that express certain commands, and the probability is that reference is had only to the ten commandments placed upon the two tables of stone, and the cursings mentioned in Deut., chap. xxvii, in the last twelve verses. The Book of the Law is Deuteronomy, and the Copy of the Law itself is the Ten Commandments, with probably those twelve cursings. Probably no book is ever less critically read than the Bible. Were it any other book no person would ever read it without declaring at once several writers had a hand in almost every book in it. It is a fact known to those who are posted that the division of the Bible into books is as arbitrary as the division into verses and chapters. The Jews originally divided the Old Testament into three parts only: The Law, The Prophets, and The Hagiographa. I hav said the Bible was a growth; better to say it is a growth, for changes, additions, alterations, and amendments are even yet being made; and in all probability, if it exists a thousand years longer, no one could recognize the then holy Bible as the one of to-day—new translation and all. 'Tis much to be regretted that sects hav so misconstrued the Bible that thereby a prejudice against the book has risen in the minds of the more intelligent and liberal classes. The work itself, aside from where it has been interfered with, is the most naïve, honest affair in literature. Evidently many generations and various religions hav had a hand in its creation. There are the codes of that darkest, most demoniac religion (save Thugism) that human nature in its most fearful mood ever developed—a religion that sacrificed to its horrible God human victims by millions (see Leviticus, last chapter, verses 28, 29; also the story of Jephthah's daughter; also 2 Sam., xxi, where seven men were sacrificed to God; also whole cities devoted). There also are the expressions of a creed as different as holy light from outer darkness (see Jeremiah vii, and elsewhere).

In truth, the work itself is an epitome of human history. And yet such is the stultifying influence of creeds, the same educated gentlemen who would smile derisivly at whomsoever declares Homer wrote Homer will grandly allege that Moses wrote the Pentateuch. Scholars who reject from the dialogs of Plato certain ones, simply because they mention facts occurring later than Plato's day, overlook hundreds of like references in various biblical books, if they assert Moses, Joshua, Samuel, or David wrote them.

Whiston, who edited Josephus's works and was evidently a very pious Christian, often speaks contemptuously of our copy of the Bible, and contrasts it with the one Josephus quotes from to the great advantage of the latter. To illustrate the extreme difference between the two, read chapter xi, book ix, of "Antiquities of Jews," where Josephus quotes several verses from Nahum, ii, 8–13, and then read the same in our present copy. Josephus's copy reads thus:

Nineveh shall be a pool of water in motion; so shall all her people be troubled and tossed, and go away by flight, while they say one to another, Stand, stand still; seize their gold and silver, for no one shall wish them well; for they will rather save their lives than their money.

For a terrible contention shall possess them, one with another, and lamentation and losing of their members, and their faces shall be black with fear. And there will be the den of lions and mother of young lions.

God says to thee, Nineveh, that they shall deface thee, and the lion shall no more go out from thee to giv laws to the world.

Now take the same from our copy of the Bible, and see how it reads:

8. But Nineveh if of old like a pool of water; yet shall they flee away. Stand, stand, shall they cry; but none shall look back.

9. Take ye the spoil of the silver, take the spoil of gold; for there is no end of the store and glory out of all the pleasant furniture.

10. She is empty, void, and waste; and the heart melteth and knees smite together, and much pain is in all the loins, and the faces of them all gather blackness.

11. Where is the dwelling of the lions and the feeding-place of the young lions, where the lion, even the old lion, walketh, and the lion's whelp, and none made them afraid?

12. The lion did tear in pieces enough for his whelps, and strangled for his lionesses, and filled his holes with prey and his den with raven.

13. Behold I am against thee, saith the Lord of Hosts. . . . And I will cut off thy prey from the earth, and the voice of thy messenger shall no more be heard.

Truly, our version is by far the most sublime and perfect as a literary composition. But when we find such differences between our own and that of the ancient people whose record it is a part of, and are told it is the very word of God, to doubt which is damnable, it leaves us in a strait that is nothing less than damnable. A.D. versus A.C.

It may next be asserted that Moses was the author of the Declaration, and that Jonah wrote the Letters of Junius. When men get a theory to cling to they seem blind to everything that disproves it. The assertion that Paul was born long before Christ is most remarkable. It is like asserting that Isaiah lived before Moses. The assertion about Paul is based on a verse or two in the New Testament.

Did such a person as Paul ever exist? The only evidence is in Acts and Epistles, which are a continuation of the gospel story after Christ's death. If Paul was before Christ one would look for some mention of it in one of the four gospels. But in fact the whole life and conduct of Paul, as given to us, is as an apostle of Christ, "born out of due time," as he says. He himself speaks of the death and resurrection of Christ, who, by such resurrection, "became the first fruits" (a little mistaken there, for Lazarus and the widow's son and some others arose before him). The history shows that Paul consorted with Peter and James, and a great many others who must hav lived 65 B C, if "Antichrist" be right. Moreover, there are Felix, Agrippa, Drusilla & Co., with Claudius. So there are Gamaliel and in fact Paul himself to be disposed of, together with whole chapters of Acts and Romans and Corinthians; and there is Paul's appeal to Cæsar, made long before there was ever a Cæsar to appeal to, if this nest be anything more than a mare's. ANNO DOMINI.

In Memoriam.—D. M. Bennett.

From the Boston Investigator.

The Liberalists and Spiritualists of Boston held a meeting last Sunday evening in Paine Hall, to do honor to the name and memory of the late D. M. Bennett. Mr. Seaver presided, and brief addresses were made by the chairman and Dr. Swain, Messrs. Babcock, Verity, and Mrs. Amelia H. Colby and Mrs. Lucy N. Colman. These addresses consisted of a review of Mr. Bennett's eventful life and useful labors in the Liberal cause. We hav not time to report them, and can only say while going to press that they were interesting, candid, and just, and listened to with marked attention and with deserved applause.

Letters were sent from the Hon. Elizur Wright (read by his son, Walter C. Wright), and from Messrs. James Parton and W. S. Bell. Excellent singing was furnished by Mrs. Smith, who sang appropriate hymns. The following resolutions were read by the chairman and adopted:

Resolved, That in the death of D. M. Bennett, the editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, and author of a number of Liberal publications, we lament the loss of one of the most able, devoted, industrious, and successful advocates of free thought, free speech, and a free press.

Resolved, That his earnest and persevering labors in this field of reform, in connection with the great service that he rendered to the cause of universal mental liberty by maintaining the unlimited right of opinion and opposing every species of bigotry, superstition, intolerance, and persecution that conflicts with the exercise of that inalienable right, will entitle his name and memory to be held in grateful remembrance as long as freedom and humanity need a champion, or mental slavery and injustice require an opponent and a reformer.

Resolved, That as in the life and history of D. M. Bennett we recogoize a self-taught man whose remarkable industry and studious habits enabled him to conquer the disadvantages of his early years and rise to eminence, usefulness, respect, and honor, we approve his manly example, and recommend it to the young to follow.

Resolved, That his persecution and long imprisonment for maintaining the freedom of the press and the mails, and his firmness and independence in refusing to make any compromise with his oppressors in order to evade the rigor of an unjust law, fully prove that he had the rare moral courage which always maintains its convictions, and never under any circumstances surrenders to the dictates of policy or fear or self-interest.

Resolved, That in bidding farewell to D. M. Bennett, we will not allow his memory to molder with his ashes, but will retain with pride and pleasure the recollection of his unswerving fidelity to our "common cause," and hold up his good example as a cheering incentiv to Liberals to persevere in their struggle for liberty and equal rights.

Resolved, That we sincerely sympathize with the family and relativs of our departed brother in their great affliction and irreparable loss, and though words at such a time are unavailing, yet we hope it may be some mitigation of their grief to know that in his life he was honest and useful, and that his death is deeply regretted by the Liberals of the whole country.

RESLUTIONS OF THE ELGIN, ILL., LEAGUE.

WHEREAS, By death's inevitable claim our loved and faithful champion of liberty, and martyr for truth, D. M. Bennett, editor, proprietor, and founder of that dauntless advocate of human rights, THE TRUTH SEEKER, has been taken from the joys and vicissitudes of this life to the dreamless sleep of the brave; and

WHEREAS, He was ever faithful, untiring, and zealous in seeking to advance the principles of the National Liberal League, sacrificing health and suffering imprisonment in his endeavors to exercise the liberties guaranteed by the founders of this republic, and proclaimed as inalienable rights, therefore be it

Resolved, That the world has lost a most worthy citizen, humanity an unselfish friend, and hypocrisy a foeman, before the sword of whose spirit it has been driven from a thousand fields; that to him more than any other man we are indebted for the rapid increase of Freethought during the last ten years, and to him let gratitude ascribe the honor. Be it also

Resolved, That we tender to his bereaved family our heartfelt sympathy in the loss of a loyal protector and a loving husband, whose name shall rise above the mortal wreck of human inconsistency, and be held always sacred in the hearts of the members of the Elgin Liberal League. Be it also

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication, and that these be placed on the records of our society. FRANK FELT, Sec.

RESOLUTIONS BY THE CHICAGO LEAGUE.

At the meeting of the Chicago Liberal League, Sunday evening last, Mr. W. F. Peck alluded to the death of D. M. Bennett, and offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted and voted to be sent, together with a tribute of respect, also read by Mr. Peck, to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Man for publication.

President James K. Magie made a few glowing remarks on the life of the deceased, as also did Prof. P. Baumgras and Mr. E. A. Stevens.

C. A. FRAENKEL,
Sec'y Chicago Liberal League.

WHEREAS, We learn, with feelings of deep regret, that D. M. Bennett, editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, has lately paid the last debt of nature; therefore, by the members of the Chicago Liberal League, be it

Resolved, That in the death of this able and devoted man Freethought has lost one of its most powerful advocates, humanity one of its stanchest friends, and the cause of liberty one of its most distinguished defenders.

Resolved, That we tender to Mrs. Bennett, his faithful and devoted wife, our most heartfelt sympathies in her afflictions, and to his immediate friends and associates our cordial regret, for this common bereavement of a kind and genial companion.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT TO D. M. BENNETT, BY W. F. PECK.

The intelligence of the death of this earnest truth seeker falls upon the Liberal heart with a suddenness and power almost benumbing.

Dead! He whom the Liberals of our city met to honor after his return from a long and dangerous journey, in apparently rugged health and spirits, a few short months ago.

Dead! The valiant defender of Liberalism, the brave and earnest seeker after truth, the powerful enemy of priestcraft and superstition, the champion who proved his devotion to liberty by becoming a martyr in her sacred cause.

Dead! Can it be that his trenchant pen is laid aside forever? That his keen logic and clear reasoning shall pierce the myths of theology no more? Shall the genial face and gentle words never again make bright the associations of friends and companions?

Dead! It seems hard to realize that this can be. Whether the immortality in which Mr. Bennett strongly believed be a fact or not; whether he will awaken from the sleep of death to the joys and sorrows, the pleasures and labors, of another life or not, yet his works liv after him, the monuments of his wonderful and almost miraculous industry still exist, and his spirit livs in them, breathing in every word and line an immortality of which any one might be proud, and which the ablest of the earth might sacrifice their all to gain.

Yet he is gone from our midst. The activ hands lie cold and nerveless. The toiling feet that bore him around the globe will carry their earnest master in search of truth never again. The tireless brain will throb no more with thoughts that liv and burn.

Perfection is not vouchsafed to man. The best and wisest hav failings, and the positiv mind that bravely speaks the truth as he sees it becomes the target for all the shafts that malice and envy can hurl. We firmly believe that no human being can lay his hand on his heart and testify that this man ever did him an intentional injury.

Yet his weaknesses hav been magnified, his very virtues condemned as vices, until life may well hav become a burden almost too great to be borne.

But for the credit of humanity let us trust that calumny will stop at the grave—that the tomb will be a shield to blunt the arrows of hate—that the whisper of malice will be hushed in the sighing winds that fan his lonely mound. And tenderly as the drooping branches bend their protecting arms above his last resting-place will the great heart of the people spread its tendrils about his memory. And in the years to come, when time and science will hav confirmed his utterances and emphasized his great services, the wayfarer will pause beside his tomb and with uncovered head pronounce the verdict, "Here lies a hero."

A BRAVE MAN PASSED ON.

From Pomeroy's Democrat.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, dated December 9th, just at hand, we read that D. M. Bennett, well and world-wide known editor of that paper, passed from this life into the next, at his home, 27 Clinton place, New York, on the morning of Wednesday, December 6th, in the 64th year of his age. He had been in sufficient health to attend to the business of his office up to Friday, the 1st inst. For some days previous he had been suffering from malaria, but on the morning of the 1st inst. was obliged to take to his bed. His disease, which so affected his physical man as to release the mental, was gastric fever coupled with an affection of the heart. Probably no man in the world has done more to encourage free thought, and thus to strengthen man in his efforts to individuality, than has D. M. Bennett, who, in his passing away, leaves tens of thousands of hearts, not only in this but other countries, to mourn his departure from a field of great usefulness, and to sympathize with friends and relativs who are in grief at this event. The paper of the 9th contains one of his very interesting letters, describing his trip around the world, said letter being dated Denver, July 3, 1882, at the close of which he announces that his health is not at present such as to admit of close application to work, and that he draws his letter-writing to a close for the present.

THE DEATH OF D. M. BENNETT.

From the League Man.

The sudden announcement of the death of the venerable editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER was a shock through all Liberal circles, and far beyond; for he had many friends beyond them. He had been quite ill for a week or two, but that his decease would be so sudden was expected by none. The immediate cause of his death was gastric fever and its complications; the remote but real cause was a heart broken by the persecutions of the enemies of secular liberty and the detractions and betrayals of its pretended friends. They hav done their work, but let them not rejoice. The lion is dead, but he has left a lot of whelps who will continue his work and fight in the cause of mental, moral, and civil liberty until victory appears, if it takes a century or more. "THE TRUTH SEEKER shall liv," was the voice of every one of the large assembly that gathered around his prostrate form.

His funeral was one of the most remarkable events of a Liberal character that has ever occurred in this city. The hall room at the German Masonic Temple, on Fifteenth street, where the Liberal Club usually meets, was crowded at an early hour. Beautiful music and flowers were there to testify to the love and esteem of thousands who never felt how large a space this man filled in their lives and hearts until he was gone. Mr. Wakeman's funeral address of an hour was one that the occasion demanded. All phases of Liberal thought—Materialists, Spiritualists, and Positivists—united in expressions of the highest satisfaction in regard to it, and a regret that it cannot be reported exactly as delivered. But THE TRUTH SEEKER has done its best, and it appears there in the issue of the 16th inst., in the best form now possible.

The address was concluded at the grave by a few grand sentences that seemed to all to rightly close and crown the hero's life. Mrs. Bennett has expressed herself as greatly pleased with these final words. They will be found in another column.

In the evening the Fourth Liberal League, of which he was president, held a Lodge of Sorrow at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. The attendance was as large as could be accommodated. Many touching addresses were delivered, and a committee was appointed to prepare the appropriate resolutions and to see that a proper monument and inscription should be placed over his grave at his beautiful resting-place in Greenwood Cemetery, and perhaps for a building also to be founded for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

About this man much more remains to be said, but not now. He died without fear or a thought of change in his views or opinions. His last thoughts were on his work, his last words were how that fourth volume of his voyage around the world could ever be completed. Then he became unconscious, and on the 6th inst., at 11 A.M., he fell asleep like a child with his head in the arms of his beloved wife. It was hard to tell the exact moment when his life ceased.

The man is dead, but THE TRUTH SEEKER will still liv. Under his Will Mrs. Bennett, who was and is thoroughly in sympathy with his views, becomes its proprietor. She, and his friends T. B. Wakeman and Daniel E. Ryan are the executrix and executors of his Will, which was drawn by his own hand, and upon them, with his able assistant, Mr. Eugene Macdonald, he has enjoined the continuance of his life work. Our readers will need no other assurance that it will be effectivly done.

From the Orange City Index.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, the distinguished editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, died at his residence on Sunday, the 10th inst. Mr. Bennett was one of the most profound scholars in the United States, a man of strong convictions, and earnest in the advocacy of what he deemed to be right. He was persecuted and imprisoned for upholding his principles, but he passed through the fiery ordeal without flinching, and won golden opinions from every man and woman whose good will is worth the having.

From the Worthington Advance.

WE regret his death. He was one of the victims, along with Lant, Heywood, and others, of the devilish Comstock gang, organized in New York to suppress free thought and a free press. We had hoped to see Bennett liv long enough to turn the tables on the devilish Comstock, who entrapped him, and land that infamous spy and bloodhound of the church in the penitentiary. Bennett was undoubtedly a purer man than the bulk of the clergy, and we hav never been able to overcome our horror of the fact that it is possible, in free America, for the church to do, in another way, just what it always did in the dark ages in Europe. It can imprison men for expressing free opinions, it can suppress the publication of free thought, it can still clog and block the wheels of progress. We never saw D. M. Bennett, and had no more interest in him than in any fellow-mortal, yet we hav lain awake many a night thinking over his case and the infernal outrage done upon him. John A. Lant we know personally, and a more upright young man never went out of the city of Toledo, yet the infernal Comstock gang, through their devil of a bloodhound, sent Lant to the penitentiary for two years for publishing a Liberal newspaper!

All this has been going on under our noses, and the American people hav become so besotted with crime, with bloodshed and murder, with high-handed exercise of power by the government, with a system of espionage secret service, with sending men to prison on flimsy pretenses, that a hundred men can be hanged or imprisoned and the people actually not remember it the next day. Before the war, one such case would hav filled the newspapers and startled the country from end to end.

But we suppose it must run its course. After that the new liberty party must come into power, and we hope that thereafter the days of bigotry, and persecution, and churchianity as distinguished from Christianity will be over forever, on this continent, at least. May the god of nature and of humanity move out at last and forever overthrow the cruel, bloody, and demoniac god of priestcraft and churchcraft.

THE following beautiful song was sung at the Bennett Memorial Service held in Paine Hall Sunday, Dec. 24th, by Mrs. Olive K. Smith:

GONE BEFORE.

Gone where the shadows of life cannot come,
Where every stranger may find a sweet home;
Severed the chain that has bound him to earth,
Gone to the land where the soul has new birth,
Where there are treasures of beauty untold—
Home where our loved ones never grow old.

CHORUS:—Weep not to miss one from earth's dreary shore,
Earth has an angel less, heaven one more.

Gone where the angels are chanting in praise,
Freed from the tumult of earth's weary ways;
Gone from the darkness of life's bitter night
Into the stillness of heaven's sweet light.

Only a brief while before we must go
From life's mixed chalice, its joys and its woe.

CHORUS:—Weep not, etc.

Gone where the battle is over and won,
And the true life of the spirit begun;
Gone where the anthems are full and complete,
Sung by the angels in heavenly street;
Gone where the harvest is gathered to God,
Soul to its maker and dust to its sod.

CHORUS:—Weep not to miss one from earth's dreary shore,
Earth has an angel less, heaven one more,
Earth has an angel less, heaven one more.

THE LATE D. M. BENNETT.

Leaves hav their time to fall,
And flowers to fade
At the north wind's breath;
But all—all seasons are thine own,
O Death!

D. M. Bennett, the seeker of truth, the finder of much truth, the lover of all truth when found, is dead. Let not the bigots who but recently tried to murder him slowly by mock trial and imprisonment—let them not rejoice unduly. Bennett has scattered his counterparts all over the land. "His soul goes marching on" for truth, as the soul of Brown for liberty. I firmly believe his constitution was impaired by the incarceration, and that belief alone made me wish him to go so long a journey, with the hope of recuperation. To my mind, his mute form now appeals against his murderers, as did the open wounds on Cæsar's body. But Cæsar died in upholding tyranny; Bennett and Brown in defense of liberty.

You bigots of to-day who ostracize and imprison the good and true; you assassins of character; you who practice slow murder for an opinion—your day of dominion is passing away, and the degradation intended for Bennett and the heroes of life will descend on you.

If, as some say, the spirits of the dead revisit this earth, Bennett will learn that a well-spent life has not been in vain, and the regret of friends at his departure is widespread, real, and lasting. Peace to his ashes. His epitaph should be: "D. M. Bennett, the Truth Seeker." F. J. EMARY.

The Truth Seeker's Spelling.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The system of spelling adopted in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER attracted my attention some time ago; but, as the matter did not then concern me, I refrained from writing to you upon the subject. In your issue of December 23d, however, you did me the honor of publishing an article of mine, entitled "A New English Reformation;" and as, in spite of my protests, you printed that communication according to your ordinary method, you will, I hav no doubt, allow me a little space in your columns to remonstrate with you upon the, to me, apparently inconsistent system which you pursue.

I notice that you spell the words "respective," "give," "passive," "live," "doctrine," and "infinite," without the final e, which common usage demands. In the words "there," "are," "borne," "something," "agree," "free," "therefore," "collapse," "die," "rapine," "finite," "nerve," "three," "deserve," "absolve," and "see," however, you retain the letter which from a phonetic point of view is redundant. Does not this prove your system to be at least an inconsistent one? But I would go further: Etymologically speaking, your system does harm. "Finite" and "infinite" are co-derivativs, and therefore they ought to be spelt upon one and the same principle. I am aware that Dr. Noah Webster givs the last i in "finite" as long, and the last i in "infinite" as short, but any difference in the plan of spelling the two words dissociates them unnecessarily, and is therefore, I venture to think, inadvisable. On the other hand, I see that you use the form "borne" as well as "born." This is utterly illogical on your part. If you are justified in any circumstances in dispensing with the customary final e, it is in the case of the word "borne;" for both it and "born" are past participles of the same verb—to bear—which is derived from the Anglo-Saxon beran, meaning to bring forth as well as to carry. By the same token you ought to print "therfor" instead of "therefore," the Anglo-Saxon progenitors of the word being thær and for, and the two ees being consequently not only redundant, but etymologically misleading. The word "some," too, ought etymologically to be spelt without the final e, for it is derived from the Anglo-Saxon sum, and the u sound of the English o is common enough in such words as "done," "London," etc. "Live," on the other hand, you, as I think, wrongly deprive of its final letter. The word represents the old English lyve, libbe, or leve. As for "respective," "passive," "doctrine," and similar words, all I wish to say about them is, that if you elect to deprive them of their last letter, you cannot logically leave "collapse," "rapine," "nerve," "deserve," and "absolve" their final ees.

You print "honor," "splendor," "rigor," "vigor," etc., and you are undoubtedly right in doing so; but why "neighbor?" The Latin derivativs never had any u in their last syllables, and are not entitled to any; but "neighbour" is not a Latin derivativ, though by spelling it as "neighbor" you make it look like one. It is the Anglo-Saxon neahbur, or nehebur, and the u has a distinct philological value. And why "endeavor?" "Endeavour" is not a Latin derivativ; it comes to us from the French phrase, se mettre en devoir de faire quelquechose; and the word devoir—meaning "act of respect"—occurs in Chaucer, and, as "devour," was commonly used in the last century. The elision of the u spoils the look of the modern word "endeavour," and disguises its etymology. You would be acting more logically if you printed "endeavour." In conclusion, I wish to express a humble opinion that any system of phonetics which leaves the words "three," "free," and "tree" their final letters, and dispenses with the unsounded ees in "live" and "give" is both inconsistent and misleading.

Yours faithfully, WILLIAM L. CLOWES.

[The strictures of Mr. Clowes are undoubtedly just, in the main, from an etymological point of view; but the tendency of modern English orthography seems to be more and more toward conformity with pronunciation, hence the abbreviations adopted by THE TRUTH SEEKER, and which hav been recommended by the American Spelling Reform Association. If Mr. Clowes feels critically inclined on the subject of orthography at large, he will find sufficient scope for his pen without trenching on the limited number of reforms instituted by THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Home Journal, and a few other papers. The practice of printing "endeavor" with a u ought to hav gone out of style when "music" and "physic" dispensed with their final k. It is evident to all that the silent letters of our language are destined to eventually disappear, as their uselessness becomes more and more apparent. A glance backward at the English literature of a few hundred years ago will illustrate this growth. Take the following, for instance, from Webster's Dictionary, and credited to the beginning of the Ormulum:

Annd whase wilenn shall this boc
efft other sithe writenn,
himm bidde icc thatt het write rihht,
swa summ thiss boc himm tæchethth,
all thwerrt ut affterr thatt itt iss

withth all swillc rime alls her iss sett, withth all se fele wordess;
annd tatt he loke wel thatt he an bocstaff write twiyyess, eyywhær thær itt uppo thiss boc

loke he well thatt het write swa, forr he ne mayy nohht elless

Translation.—And whoso shall wish this book again *an*other time to-write, him bid I that he-it write right, so as this book him teacheth, all throughout after that [i. e., according as] it is upon this first exemplar, with all such metre [rhyme] as here is set, with all so many words; and that he look well that he a letter write twice, everywhere where it upon this book is written on that wise; look he well that he-it write so, for he may not else in English write right the word, that wit he well to sooth [i. e., let him know that well for truth].

Any one who learned to spell at the time the foregoing was written would probably hav more fault to find with THE TRUTH SEEKER's spelling than Mr. Clowes does. In regard to the words "rapine" and "collapse," the e should be dropped, according to our rule, as Mr. Clowes suggests. Some other cases which he mentions do not come under that rule, which is to omit silent e after a short vowel. Further reform in this direction will be undertaken so soon as the advanced state of things in general shall seem to render it advisable.—ED. T. S.]

The Murder of Little Smith.

From Truth.

TRUTH: Anyone who reads the account of the murder by John Smith of Los Angeles, Cal., of his son, "after the manner of Abraham's proposed killing of Isaac," will see an illustration of one of the most beautiful effects of Christianity and the Bible. Mr. Smith had never read the Bible until within a year, and consequently had never murdered anybody; on becoming a Christian, however, he "spent most of his time poring over its pages." He then began to starve his family, because he thought God ordered it; and, finally recognizing in the "light of the gospel" his neglect of due reverence to Jesus, shown by his never having sacrificed anyone to him, he decided, after prayer, no doubt, to kill his son. The murder took place in this way: "He called Ben out of the house and told him that he had to die for our savior. The little fellow knelt down. . . . John raised the knife, looked hard into the boy's face, and then drove the knife into his breast." The foregoing account is in the words used by the mother of the boy, who must hav been a sincere Christian, because she approved of the transaction. She adds, "I can hear him all times in the night, asking to be brought in and laid on his bed, and begging for a little water before he died." To hav complied with his request for water would doubtless hav enraged the savior, so the water seems to hav been withheld.

As long as any man who believes in a god cares as much about pleasing that god as he cares about doing his duty to his fellow-beings, just so long will these atrocious acts of devotion occur. Atheism is almost infinitly superior, as a moral force, to Christianity or almost any other religion. "By their fruits ye shall know them." PHILIP G. PEABODY.

Freethinkers' Association in Welland.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Seventeen persons here who hav become members of the New York Freethinkers' Association held their first meeting on the evening of the 8th inst, when the following address was delivered by one of the members. JOHN RAY.

Welland, Ont., Dec. 18, 1882.

MY FRIENDS: It is gratifying to me, and I hav no doubt is to all of you, to meet here to-night for the first time in the capacity of a Freethinkers' meeting. We are the beginning, as far as I know, of a new organization in this country, and if I am not much mistaken we shall be very much misrepresented by those who do not clearly comprehend our aim and object. It is not likely that we shall be credited with being investigators into the true sciences of the laws of nature and truth, but by the church people we are more likely to be styled a few God-denying Infidels who hav for our object the abolition of the Christian religion, by introducing views and doctrins directly opposed to it, and it is safe to count upon the priesthood of the different churches using all their ingenuity to oppose and misrepresent us, nor can we really blame them, for they hav a heavy self-interest at stake, their profession at present is looked upon (in general) as respectable and necessary to the welfare of the Christian religion; they hav many privileges that the merchant, the mechanic or farmer hav not, besides a good, fat living for doing very little, only keeping the people deluded in the greatest of all delusions, a religion founded upon prophecy, mystery, miracle, and inspiration, and of which they know no more than I do—and not as much—for I know it is all founded upon a false basis, and what makes them fear and dread the Freethought movement is, they are jealous that we hav more truth on our side of the question, and if we succeed in removing the wool of ignorance from the eyes of some of their devotees their trade and calling is in danger.

We are met here to-night as a brotherhood of men claiming the right to think for ourselvs instead of having it done by a superstitious and selfish priest.

We are here upon equal terms, recognizing no priest or superior amongst us, only as some may hav got more light upon the true science of life and of nature's laws, and it is from such that we all hope to derive some profit.

For, as I apprehend, we hav all of us been brought up and trained in the belief of Christian theology, and having had this creed so forcibly impressed upon our minds in our babyhood and youth, it is no easy matter to rid ourselvs of it. We hav each one of us been endowed with a capacity for thinking and investigating for ourselvs, and if we would arrive at right conclusions we must use our own thinkers in order to satisfy ourselvs whether the doctrins taught us in youth and up to the present time are founded on fact. So far as we are acquainted with the laws of nature we know of no instance where nature has departed from or violated her own laws, and any doctrin that is at variance with these laws ought to be received with suspicion. For my own part I don't believe that the established laws of nature were ever suspended for the accommodation of anybody; and if that is so, then all the miraculous events we read and are told of are simply not true.

And although there are many good and conscientious people who believe in and preach up this doctrin, it is not surprising, for they, like ourselvs, were taught it in their infancy by their dear parents, whom they loved, and these parents had been taught the same by their dear parents, and so on for generations.

And now these same believers in what we consider myths are much more to be pitied and sympathized with than to be blamed; though I would not be so charitable toward some of them, who, I believe, are infidel to their own honest convictions of the truth, and particularly some of the priests. But many of these zealous Christian professors hav not had the same opportunities for investigation or hav not dared to investigate like ourselvs.

There are but few of the Christian church people who would dare to read such a work as Paine's "Age of Reason," or one of Ingersoll's lectures, or even THE TRUTH SEEKER.

In their present ignorant, priest-ridden, and darkened condition, it would seem to them that ignorance was bliss where it would be folly to be wise, only they don't see how ignorant they are, and as the old saying is, "There is none so blind as those who will not see." At the present time the light of science and truth is making faster progress throughout the world than at any former period, and it is my opinion that it is only a question of time when the principles of truth as revealed by science and good common sense will become the principal religion of the day. That old and ignorant theology has stood it long, having had the support of church and priests, kings and parliament, all having had a selfish interest in its support and propagation. Even now the church is trying to get its God in the Constitution of the United States, and if they do not succeed it will be because the spirit of Liberalism is too strong for the church there. And now, my friends, we are a small band exercising the right to think for ourselvs. Let us show to the world that it does not require to belong to a Christian church to enable us to be upright, honest, truthful, and good citizens, and by making a good showing in these respects, instead of being looked down upon as low, vulgar, God-denying Infidels, we shall be looked up to as reliable, trustworthy citizens, and even the church folks will hav to admit that we are pretty upright people, but that we hav got an awful bad religion.

Jo Cook Rightly Measured.

From the Winsted Press.

We regret that we last week intimated to our readers that we would this week hav something more to say regarding Joseph Cook, his disingenuous ways, etc., for our columns are crowded, and we ought, we confess, to devote space to more important matter. Mr. Cook commands notice only as he is pressed forward by the pulpits in their defense; but we find he is getting more notice than we were aware of. So general is the unfavorable comment of the press in the West as well as the East upon this loud-mouthed incarnation of arrogance and scholarly pretense, as to hav attracted the attention of the journals of Boston, Cook's place of residence. They are evidently indignant that he is regarded in other parts of the country as a representativ Bostonian, and spurn the "soft impeachment." Perhaps the most compact and pungent thing which any of the Boston papers has had to say of Jo is this by the Boston Post: "What we object to in the things said about Joseph Cook is that they make Boston responsible for him!" This cleverness of sarcasm could not well be excelled; it nearly tells the whole story of how Cook is regarded where he is best known. Boston cherishes beyond almost any other city in the world its really able men, its Emersons, Phillipses, Lowells, Holmses, Walkers, Fields, Hales, etc., to say nothing of Longfellows, Alcotts, and others whose great names are written in her scroll of honor. If she could possibly find anything in the blatant Cook worthy her regard she would not be slow to proclaim it.

But we must waste as little space as possible upon Jo and will confine ourselvs to a point or two. Last week we charged that Jo in his Friday-night lecture of the week before "abused the sweet confidence of his audience," in respects which we did not detail, but hinted at. As an instance of what we call outrageous lying, because it involved the meanest kind of calumny, but which nevertheless has an apparent basis of truth, we cite the fact which the few who heard him will all remember that Cook referred to a wretched editor, whose name he did not proclaim, but whom he painted in loathsome colors, and at whose trial by the courts for sending obscene literature through the mails he was present, etc.

There was an editor, the late Mr. Bennett, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who was indicted, tried, declared guilty, and imprisoned under the technical charge of sending such literature through the mails. So in one sense what Jo said was true; but in another sense, and the way he meant it, he knew that it was black as night with meanness, malice, and false pretense, which no man knows how better or more delightedly to utter than Jo Cook. Mr. Bennett was the editor of the most widely disseminated journal of Freethought in the country, doing a vast amount of good in spreading the light of reason and exposing the wretched tricks, craft, and cloaked villainy of the churches and superstitious fanaticism. It was a point to be gained if possible by the Young Men's Christian Association to silence Bennett's batteries. He was therefore charged with sending through the mails a little pamphlet entitled "Cupid's Yokes," which was said to be "obscene;" and a weak jury, under the control of a Christian judge, convicted him. So astonished was the bar of New York at the result that a great lawyer present exclaimed, "When the innocent are convicted the judge and law are condemned!" And again referring to the case, "I am sorry for the honor of American jurisprudence."

Now what are the facts? Attorney-General Devens carefully read the phamphlet and declared it in no wise obscene. Hosts of literary men and women who had read this work were ready to testify their opinion that it was not obscene, but their testimony was unjustly, if not illegally, ruled out, on the score that their opinions were not admissible because the jury were the judges of the facts in the case. The then acting president, Hayes, read the book and declared it not obscenee and yet though over two hundred thousand people petitioned him to pardon Bennett, the miserable minion of the churches (to whose wife, not him, a number of vengeful Christians had sent a petition protesting against the pardon) kept the matter in abeyance for a while and then denied the petition on the flimsy ground that Judge Benedict, who sat in the case, was a United States judge, and he didn't wish to seem to disfavor such a judge!

Thus it was that that "dreadful man," whom Cook covered with loathsome words, was convicted—his conviction a disgrace to our jurisprudence. Cook, who well knew all these facts, kept them from his audience on Friday night. He also knew that Mr. Bennett, who was reared in the strict school of the Shakers, and till middle life had been a very devoted dupe of the Christian false theology, was held in the highest esteem by all his acquaintances as an upright, earnest, truthful man and public citizen, benevolent, gentle, sweet spirited in all the minor relations of life, indeed beloved by all, and there were many in his employ, etc. In short, there are but few men in the world of whom so much can be truthfully said in their favor and so little to their discredit as honorable and noble characters as there was said of Mr. Bennett when living—and Jo Cook, on Friday night, well knew all this. This is enough to say for the present, we judge. Mr. Bennett died three days before Jo Cook lectured here. It is charitable to suppose that Cook did not know of his death, though the New York papers had heradled it over the land. Had Cook known the fact we presume we would hav been treated to a picture of "Bennett in hell," and yet the contrast between the latter's daily life and deeds and those of the slanderous Cook, from Mr. Bennett's boyhood to his death, is not a picture which Cook would be apt to be willing to hav drawn by artist's hand—say that of Prof. John Fiske.

I am more than grateful to generous Liberals who hav responded to my appeal for Mr. Tuttle, and hope each month will show an increase over the last. Hacker and Tuttle are both old, crippled, and needy; hav no income or means only as it is sent in by Liberals. Both hav sick wives, and need a good girl or woman to keep house for them.

Both hav spent a long life in work for Liberalism. Both published Liberal papers, and both hav claims on every Liberal who can spare a few dollars, or even a few postage-stamps.

I shall not report again for two months, but hope each one of you will remember and do.

It takes a great many dollars to barely liv when one has no income or even strength to cut a stick of wood. We, too, will wear out by and by. But let us try and do the little good we can now, and then we shall not hav to mourn wasted opportunities. ELMINA.

Snowville, Va., Dec. 20, 282.

IT is useless to any longer ask more thoughtful men to believe in a God who is the best, and at the same time ask them to believe in a theory of his government that makes evil stronger than good, and punishes forever the souls he has brought into being. When we ask men to believe in God we should show them the works worthy of a God. Evil may indeed, and does appear in the process, or in the evolution of morals toward the perfect; but that is a very different thing from evil appearing as permanent and ineradicable in the last result. And mankind are asking for a new meaning in the atonement. They can no longer believe in the old doctrin that Christ died to reconcile God; for they naturally ask if God needed such reconciliation, why, if Christ were divine, did he not need to be reconciled? Is Christ less just than God? If God be the best, could Christ be better, or love the world more than God? And the moral judgment of the age is rising up against the injustice that could be propitiated by punishing the innocent instead of the guilty; and it shrinks equally from the sham of imputing the sins of one to another, and then making a show or pretense of punishing.—H. W. Thomas in the North American Review.

The Basis of Christian Faith.

If through the carelessness, ignorance, or self-interest of a certain person or persons a house is built upon a sandy instead of a solid foundation, can it reasonably be expected to last long?

The basis of Christian faith is founded on the sentence: "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but hav everlasting life."

Suppose a certain candidate for the presidency, being cheated out of his rights to the presidential chair, spoke thus to the American nation:

"Citizens, you hav wronged, deeply wronged me, but I love my country too well to bear it any malice. I am forgiving. Here is my son, my only begotten; make him suffer those tortures which your ingenuity may invent, and afterward crucify him, for only in that way will my anger be pacified, and only his blood can wash off the wrongs you hav done me."

What would the American nation—yes, the whole thinking, intellectual world—say of such an unnatural father, and what would the nation think of themselvs for having nominated such a man as a candidate? First, of course, they would politely decline the generous offer; but the matter would not rest there, and the most probable and most natural thing would be that his own family would object to such a charitable action and place the donator as quickly as possible in a lunatic asylum. And yet on such a tyrannical, capricious, and bloodthirsty act of the supreme being, the supposed almighty God, the most loving and charitable father of all fathers, or at least supposed to be so, if we think for a moment the existence of a god, is based the foundation of our beautiful Christian faith for the holy Bible, that most sacred of books, though containing passages which would make sailors, miners, and soldiers blush—that most sacred of books, which teaches us that only the blood and the sufferings of this innocent man could redeem the world, and that was God's will.

Verily, verily, I tell thee there is true religion in not believing such an act of cruelty committed by a father on his son.

His son! Who and what is God's son?

Joseph and Mary enjoyed a poor but happy domestic life, he being industrious, and she virtuous. This happiness had to be destroyed to suit God's mysterious and capricious purposes, to benefit a wicked world; for the Holy Ghost came, and the rest is known. Joseph acted as every other husband would hav acted; he intended to "sue for a divorce," and to expel his wife, and his first impulse was the most natural, but before "the papers were taken out" the Holy Ghost came in time; and let us giv credit where credit is due, for he acted like a square and sensible gentleman, after the wrong was once committed. Square, as it saved Mary's honor in Joseph's eyes; sensible, as it saved him (the Holy Ghost) many an annoyance.

But how did Joseph and Mary liv after this honor had been bestowed upon them? Was their happy home broken up, and was it as Byron says?—

> "Both did liv, but every morrow
> Woke them from a widowed bed."

Had Mr. Joseph been an American citizen, and had this affair happened in this country and in this age, I guess some enlightened and eminent lawyer would hav advised the gentleman to sue the Holy Ghost & Co. for damages, for breaking up his once happy home and for destroying his domestic happiness, and the verdict of a just and impartial jury would hav been in Mr. Joseph's favor.

Indeed God's ways and notions to save this "wicked world" are mysterious—too mysterious to be any longer accepted by an enlightened and matter-of-fact people.

Further the sentence of this donatiom says that "whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but shall hav everlasting life." So to believe in both father and son secures us everlasting life.

I guess a good many will not accept it in this way, taking in consideration with what blood-money it was bought. Besides, it is hard for a good many to accept it at that price, viz., of deliberately imprisoning their brains.

But in order to make this difficult task a little easier, we see Jesus afterwards perform some miracles to prove that he is worth believing in, and that we are not required to believe in one who does not show his proper credentials.

Let us analyze one of those miracles, for instance, the one done at the wedding. Strictly spoken, analyzing is not allowed, and forfeits the claim to everlasting life, but we'll risk it. We see Jesus at a wedding, a feast where wine was served, as the holy Bible tells us, and where, as a matter of fact, all who had drunk of it were more or less under its influence. Did Jesus drink of it? In the middle of the feast the lady of the house perceives that the wine, the most essential article to keep the ball running, is getting short. Now how did this happen? Did they take in an insufficient supply for the occasion? Did more guests come than were expected, or did those present indulge too freely in it? Anyhow, no matter what caused the shortcomings, the fact was very aggravating to the lady of the house, especially on the occasion of a wedding. What could she do, in such a critical moment? The guests would perhaps ask for more wine, and what a disgrace it would be to let the deficiency be known to such a distinguished company! Woman's mind in such perplexing situations is more inventiv than man's. Necessity is the mother of invention; and besides, was not Mary the mother of Jesus? The conclusion is easily to be drawn. Of course Mary has faith in the divine power of her son, and to him she addresses herself for advice. Here was a chance for both to show to those who did not know it yet that she and her son were more than ordinary people. When a great artist is invited to a dinner or a party, it is generally expected from him to favor the company with one of his masterpieces; firstly, to flatter the vanity of the artist; secondly, to please and entertain the company; and thirdly—and let this not be forgotten—to satisfy the pride and the ambition of the host, but especially the hostess, for entertaining such famous persons as guests. Here was a chance, and Jesus did not fall short of his mother's expectations, for, as the holy Bible tells us, he ordered water to be brought, and at his word and command it changed into wine. Now this is what is called a coup de théatre; Jesus humble as usual, even after the glory of performing such a difficult feat; his mother prouder than before of such a great and useful son, the guests dumbstruck, some more practical ones delighted. But still it must hav been humiliating for the lady of the house to hav the fact of her want be known, even if afterwards the supply surpassed the demands.

Now let us analyze this feat at the risk again of being excluded from everlasting life; but the desire of inquiry is too tempting.

Was it the place of Jesus, the son of a God, to assist at such a feast, where wine was served, and which, as an undeniable mattér of fact, created intoxication, or did God or Jesus himself change for this solemn occasion the law of nature in Jesus's behalf, by making wine as harmless as water in order to save Jesus the humiliation of getting intoxicated and so discredit the father?

Had the Commandeur de Gazeneuve or "the Great Hermann" performed the same feat it would hav been to their credit; but was it not below the dignity of God's son to lower himself to such an extent in order to prove his godly mission.

PARVATULI.

The Salvation Army in India.

> Tired of sin, I so long hav been!
> Tired of bearing its burden!
> Tired of woe I hav felt and seen!
> Tired of the course I hav trodden!
> CHORUS—Come, Lord, and set me free—
> Thou art the great burden bearer;
> Jesus has died for me,
> That I might be a crown wearer.
> —The Indian War Cry, Nov. 1, 1882.

And well might Jesus be a burden bearer! The sin that our Indian salvation corps is tired of is their missionary undertaking in a land where the rock of heathen faith defies all the salvation tomfoolery. The burden they are tired of bearing is the honor of Jesus, whose very existence stands on the quicksands of doubt, if not of forgery. The woes of which they justly complain are their recent experiences in the jail to which a heathen magistrate had condemned them, and of which the high court of Bombay and the Christian viceroy, Lord Ripon, approved. The course they hav trodden has been the one foolishly chalked out by General Booth. Indeed, Jesus did set them free, just when it pleased the court to release them. Jesus is the great burden bearer; but the rebellious Salvationists being unwelcome guests here, both to the British government and its loyal subjects, they are a burden to India. And Jesus died in order that his favorit Salvationists should wear the mock crown of a rioter.

The Indian salvation regiment consists of Major Tucker, Captain Bullard, Lieutenant Thompson, Cadets Lane and Carroll, and Mrs. Tucker.

Mr. Tucker was, before joining these fanatics, a deputy commissioner in the northern provinces and an influential officer in India, with good prospects before him. Poor man! he thought it better to accept the title of major in the salvation ranks, and lost all honor and influence. Now both he and his wife, having fallen into the snares of Booth, drink of the bitter cup that the devil has served them.

They erected a tent in the fort of Bombay, and are acting a farce. Their theater is every night crowded by a motley group of sneering Hindoos, Mohammedans, and Parsees. The Christians of this place consider it a shame to co-operate with the actors, who hav made themselvs the laughing-stock of the public. They hav not hitherto made one convert. When challenged by the nativs to discuss upon religion, they politely decline, and refer them to the reverend missionaries. "Our province is," say they, "to fight against the devil." The captain and the major waste their lungs in vain, and cry: "Be prepared to die this night, ye pack of unhallowed pagans, and meet Jesus. Join us in our league against the devil, and let us march on in martial array." Echo alone has, ever since faithful to them, responded to their appeal. One good has this movement done to India. It has pulled down the little regard that the nativs had for Europeans, and succeeded in so short a time in bringing down to the same level the rulers and the ruled. It has alike fooled Christianity well enough. We are not therefore hard upon the poor deluded soldiers of the cross. If they had disturbed the peace of the country by their noisy processions, they hav been interdicted by the government from making riot. Against this order of the presidency, magistrate, and of the Bombay high court, Bahn Keshub Chunder Sen, the thirteenth apostle of Christ, and his followers appealed to the governor-general, who, however, wisely refused to interfere with local judicial government in consideration of public safety. The Christianized Bahn Keshub Chunder Sen little dreams that Hindooism is too perfect and true a philosophy to justify his borrowing any graceless plumes from Christianity.

Infidel Philosophy.

Christians never weary in calling Thomas Paine a drunkard, forgetting that in his day there were no teetotalers, even among the clergy, and that they turned out as many drunkards according to their numbers as any other class of people.

I here submit a portion of an account given by a landlord for the entertainment of ministers who met at his house. The occasion was the ordination of a pastor of "The South Society," in Hartford, in the year 1784. The account is taken from the record of the church, and is given upon the authority of Rev. Lyman Beecher, D.D.

2 mugs tody,	5 segars,	1 pint wine,
3 bitters,	15 boles punch,	11 bottles wine,
5 mugs flip,	3 boles punch,	3 boles tody.

Creature comforts pretty well enjoyed, one would think, by a lot of ministers at one ordination.

Mr. Beecher further says of an ordination at Plymouth: "When the ministers had done eating and drinking, and taken pipes and tobacco, in less than fifteen minutes there was such a smoke you could not see, and the noise I cannot describe. It was the maximum of hilarity." Now does anybody believe that Thomas Paine ever descended so far below the dignity of a man as to participate in such rowdyisms as are here described by Dr. Beecher, and are known to hav been indulged in by these clerical Bacchanalians?

But suppose he was drunk every day, was his drunk any worse than that of the ministers? It ill becomes the clergy to be wiping their polluted feet upon his spotless garments. Besides, if he did get drunk, it does not dull the point of his reasoning. Suppose it should be ascertained that Euclid or Copernicus or Kepler got drunk, would that do away with the eternal principles which they enunciated? Everything goes to show that it is the damaging arguments against the Christian religion and not the big drunks of Thomas Paine which has so long stuck in the throats of the clergy.

The money spent on church edifices and paid to the clergy and otherwise expended to keep the Christian juggernaut rolling, would make every poor family comfortable, and educate all the poor children in the country. The poor are neglected, the children grow up in ignorance, while seventy thousand ministers are petted and feasted, and liv upon the unpaid toil of those whom they enslave. The scriptures should be treated like a witness on the stand. No credit should be given to them after the first lie or contradiction is detected.

The goddess of liberty has been hunted down by the priesthood the world over. Voltaire and Paine received her with open arms, and the Liberals alone can be trusted to defend her. Priestcraft and kingcraft hav gone hand in hand and dealt out their double curses to human kind. Priests hav kept the people in ignorance. Kings hav robbed them, and the spoils hav been mutually divided between the two.

Woman is the natural equal of man, and in some respects his superior. Her flesh and bone and brain are of a finer texture, and her manners susceptible of a finer polish. The Bible makes her the slave of man, and she can never assume her natural position in the human family until she learns to put her foot upon her enslaver. God has called tens of thousands of lazy men to preach the gospel. They hav lived upon the unpaid labor of their slavish dupes, and died in debt to the world for their living; and all experience proves that the laziest man always received the loudest call. A designing priesthood has chained the world down in ignorance. The chains are none the less galling because priests fast and pray. Their fasts and prayers are like patches of gold-leaf—laid on to hide defects in the rotten material.

Is it possible that a god of wisdom and mercy would leave a revelation upon which hangs the happiness of the whole human family to the chances of printing or writing? Search your best printed Bibles and see how many words are blotted or obliterated, materially changing the sense, or destroying it altogether. Frequently a fold in the paper, under the press, will obliterate one or two lines; with all our improvements in printing many books are still very imperfect. The difficulty must hav been augmented a hundredfold before the art of printing was known. I read in one Bible "Thou shalt commit adultery;" in another, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." Now, which is the true word of God I am at a loss to know. Judging from the practice of the clergy, I should think the former. Kings David and Solomon evidently understood it in that light. If God would leave the everlasting happiness or misery of one single individual hanging upon a book which anyone could change or alter, and which has been changed and altered in hundreds of instances, he would be too careless for a man, and too contemptible for a god. The strong presumption is that God has never been engaged in the book business to any very great extent.

We hear one man preach, and we know by his ignorance that he believes what he preaches. We hear another preach, and judge from his intelligence that he means to impose upon his hearers. The one excites our pity, the other our contempt.

All that is good, true, pure, and noble in religion no Liberal would wish to destroy. All that is selfish, mean, wicked, and untrue no Christian should wish to preserve. JOHN PECK.

Pre-existence: Evolution.

The immense hosts of spirits who hav separated and left the physical body are always anxious to continue their particular faiths and opinions among their successors on earth. They spare no pains or disguises to effect their purpose. We find no fully trance lecturers who are not controled by such spirits, very little, if any, advanced from when they were in the physical body.

The Greeks and Romans accepted these spirits as their gods; they delivered oracles to them and were accepted by them. Roman Catholics accept them as saints and saintesses. And those who think themselvs philosophical may be deceived by personations, as Socrates, Bacon, Shakspere, Franklin, and the like, with no evidence of the progressiv, advancing intellect of those great souls. How often has Thomas Paine been personated by some ranting medium, instead of his firm, candid, reasoning thought.

The Romans believed that at the battles their soldiers, and those of their opponents, still continued in the conflict after they were slain. Mr. Mouson says, in his life of St. Bernard: "Miracles, ghostly apparitions, divine and demoniac interference with sublunary affairs, were matters which a man in the twelfth century would less doubt of than his own existence."

Seneca compares the birth of man into this life to his birth from the womb of nature into another beginning, into another state that expects us.

"It will be just as natural for you," says a spirit, "to become conscious when entering into the spirit world—you would experience just about the same surprise that a child does when coming into this world or existence.

"A form which vanishes," says Gustave, "is the creation of a new form, or of a being. What we call death is a movement in advance, a progressiv evolution in life."

The past furnishes us proof of this assertion, for it is through the change of anterior forms that we arrive at our present state in life. Suppose that the ovule which is to be some time a man had sensibility and intelligence, would it not take premonitory symptoms of its ovulary organization—that is to say, passing from inferior life to superior? The fœtus has an organization and life distinct from the ovule and the infant. Suppose the sensitiv and the intelligent, approaching the end of life, began to experience the sufferings of childbirth, would not it, or intelligence, believe that the convulsiv embrace to what is termed death is only the death-rattle of agony, and its last adieu to existence? Is not the first wailing of a new-born child its entrance into a new and higher life? And so the end of one life is the commencement of another life more perfect.

It is beyond a doubt that at the endless series of evolutions we shall realize more and more the laws of human destiny, which are revealed to man by our inspirations and infinit desires.

Unless man is eternal in his mental, immortal in personality, infinit in his desires, then there is no immortality, nor omnipotent goodness, nor infinit love, nor eternal justice.

Among the Spiritualists who accept the pure, platonic doctrin of pre-existence we find a Bronson Alcott, a veritable sage. He says "every creature assists in its own formation," souls being creativ and craving form, and through the spirit existence desire creates substance, wherein all creaturs seek conjunction in nature. There is not anything in nature except desire which holds substances together; as all things sway occult forces, or spirit forces, we gain preternatural inspiration, and hav access to sources of information not open to us at all times, and not in our waking hours. For never is the sleep so profound as to obliterate all sense of personality; some sense or idea of ancient consciousness revives, calling previous experience. We hardly are able to believe that our souls are no older than our bodies, and date our nativity from the family register. Time and space cannot chronicle the immortal mind; none of us remember when we did not remember, nor when we were unborn. The poets often avail themselvs of the theory of pre-existence. Virgil, in the sixth book of his Æneid, teaches distinctly the transmigration of souls. "These souls," says Anchisis, "destined for other bodies, drink in the waters of Lethe a long oblivion of things past." Robert Southey remarks, "I hav a strong and lively faith in a continued existence, and that we shall recover the consciousness of other stages through which we hav passed seems to me the most benevolent, wise, and probable idea or conclusion." Plato, Socrates, Pythagoras, Herodotus, all include pre-existence as well as post-existence—a perpetual succession of temporary lives, each in distinct bodies, each terminating in what is termed death, and each followed by renewed life in another body.

Porphyry conceives that it is to expiate evils in a pre-existent state that we are now clothed with material bodies; and by fulfilling exactly the duties imposed upon us, with resignation, we return to the state of heroes, angels, and archangels. He also says, "There is also a descending scale of diabolical life."

Lord Lytton observes, in his novel of "Lucretia:" "What we call eternity may be but a series of transitions which men call death, abandoning home after home, ever to fairer scenes and loftier hights. Age after age the spirit, that glorious-named life-force, may change its tent, fated not to rest in the dull Elysium of the heathen, but carrying with it ever its elements, activity, and desire. Why should the soul repose? Labor is the purgatory of the erring, and none the less the heaven of the good."

Walter Scott, in his diary, says (Feb. 17, 1828): "I cannot tell if it is worth marking down, that yesterday I was strongly haunted by what I would call the sense of pre-existence, in a conformed idea that nothing which passed was said for the first time."

Tennyson repeatedly refers to this mood, and in Wordsworth we find the following:

> Our childhood sits upon a throne
> That hath more power than all the elements.
> I guess not what this tells of beings past,
> Nor what it augurs of the life to come.
> Our birth is but a sleep, and a forgetting;
> The soul that rises with us, our life-star,
> Hath had elsewhere its setting,
> And cometh from afar.
> Not in entire forgetfulness,
> And not in utter nakedness,
> But in hailing clouds of glory, do
> We come, from our past home.

The Archbishop Purcell Defalcation.

It will be remembered that a few years ago considerable excitement was caused by the discovery that Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, was a defaulter; that as almoner he had received large sums, amounting to millions, from the Catholics of Ohio, and that he was utterly unable to repay them. His creditors, many of whom hav been reduced to poverty by the mismanagement of the archbishop, hav recently addressed a petition to his so-called holiness, the pope at Rome, praying that something may be done toward refunding their squandered earnings. The following reply to this petition has just been received through Bishop Elder, of Ohio:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Nov. 30, 1882.

PATRICK DWYER, ESQ., Dear Sir: His eminence, Cardinal Simeoni, prefect of the congregation of the propaganda at Rome, has written to me to the following effect:

"Some of the creditors of your diocese hav sent to the holy father and to me a printed petition, of which I send you a copy. As they request me to giv them an answer and address it to Mr. Patrick Dwyer, I beg you to inform them that I hav received the petition. As for the matter set forth in it, you are much better acquainted than I am with the state of the business, and you will please answer them according to your prudence and discretion."

Consequently, I take leave to say to you that to the chief matters contained in the petition I hav already given an answer, which was published in the Commercial of Aug. 19th, and I respectfully refer you to it. If you hav not a copy of it I can furnish you with one. I hav the honor to remain, dear sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

† WILLIAM HENRY ELDER,
Coad. to the Archbishop of Cincinnati.

This is all the consolation the creditors get as the result of their petition. The probable truth in the matter is that Purcell gave the money to the pope and to the church, and the pope and the church intend to keep it. In the Cleveland Leader the creditors publish the following card:

In view of the petition sent to Rome, that is a very singular reply. The creditors accuse Bishop Elder with a do-nothing policy, and his advisers with an open attempt to defend them, and the boss at Rome sends back the petition to him to deal with them at his pleasure and to answer them "according to his prudence and discretion." That is the satisfaction they get from the infallible head of the church, to whom they appeal against the action of their own bishop. The great sympathy of the holy father for the poor and afflicted is well illustrated by that cold and heartless reply of his chief of staff. That is likely to be the last the creditors will ever hear from their petition, praying justice be done them by the head of the church.

No one who knew the Purcells believes that a single cent of the people's money ever stuck to their fingers, and it is a gratuitous insult to their memory for Bishop Elder and satellites to proclaim them as personal defaulters when the world is cognizant of the fact that they spent every dollar of the deposits on what they called religion. The archbishop visited Rome on several occasions, and it is well known that he never approached the "holy father" empty-handed. He considered it a part of his religious duty to fee the infallible, and had the people's money handy for the purpose. All that was not given the pope was spent on churches, school-houses, and other religious institutions in the diocese, and it comes with a very bad grace from the priests he fed, clothed, and educated with the depositors' money to come in at this late hour with the plea that his financial agent was simply a personal banker.

A Great Man has Fallen.

From an address by Sereno Edwards Todd, Sr.

> The chamber where the good man meets his fate
> Is privileged above the common walks
> Of virtuous life, quite on the verge of heaven.

The old spelling-book of my young years taught its readers one of the most useful and sublime lessons that finite beings can learn, namely: "To be truly great one must be truly good." This elevating sentiment chimes most beautifully and harmoniously with every noble faculty of our nature. Good, noble, and generous thoughts and corresponding actions constitute the great and good man. Search the record of the long life of our departed friend and co-laborer; read critically the voluminous writings which emanated from his facil and graphic pen; and point, if any one is able, to a single disfiguring blotch in his character, from the days of thoughtless boyhood to hoary age. When beset by bloodthirsty persecutors who ought to hav extended to him a friendly hand and words of cheer; when driven relentlessly to the wall by those who were invested with authority in the court-room, to judge him according to the law, but who condemned him contrary to the law; when dragged to the penitentiary where he was doomed to penal servitude, simply for cherishing an opinion! yes only an opinion different from the erroneous opinions of his mortal enemies, we see nothing in his looks, actions, or words but gentle patience, meekness, and lamb-like submission. In reason's ear, he was an illustrious hero. He was a noble martyr in the glorious cause of science, reason, and Freethought. He was a profound thinker. The immense manual drudgery incident to giving expression to his thoughts, through the medium of the pen and press, proved to be his executioner. But the ingenuous record of his industrious and virtuous life will mold the characters of unborn nations, ages upon ages to come, while his mortal remains, and all there may be of us, will be sleeping in the dust. We do not always appreciate the immense value of the golden moments of life, until the fleeting hours are gone forever from us. We never hav half realized what a true, faithful, and generous friend we had in him whose sudden departure we mourn. If there is a blessed clime formed for the good and the truthful, where life is not a breath, may we not rest confidingly in the thought that the spirit of our departed friend, when he drew the drapery of his dying couch about him, was greeted and welcomed to the free and perfect occupancy of some glorious realm where sorrow and mourning, sickness and death, can never enter?

> O deep, enchanting prelude to repose!
> The dawn of bliss, the twilight of our woes!
> Yet half I hear the parting spirit sigh:
> It is a dread and awful thing to die.
> Mysterious worlds, untraveled by the sun,
> Where time's far-wandering tide has never run;
> From your unfathomed depths, your viewless spheres,
> A warning comes, unheard by other ears.
> Soul of the just, companion of the dead,
> Where is thy home, and whither art thou fled?

The Resurrection.

The following inquiry from an esteemed friend is sent us for enlightenment:

CISNE, ILL, Dec. 16, 282.

MR. EDITOR: While in argument with a minister a few days ago he said that no leading Infidel denied the resurrection of Christ. If there is one please name him. I could not answer it satisfactorily. Respectfully, W. HOGG.

Mr. Hogg would hav been perfectly safe in saying that every leading Infidel not only doubted the resurrection, but positivly denied it. The thing is so manifestly absurd and impossible that unless a person is prepared to believe all that the priests and ministers say regarding Christianity, he must disbelieve this story. The evidence regarding it is contradictory and of such a character as to be of no value. As Amberley, in his "Analysis of Religious Belief," says, "Upon this momentous question every one of the Christian writers is at variance with every other." And the writers of the gospels, who might be supposed to know something about it, disagree with each other as radically as clergymen of different sects regarding their little tenets of belief.

We know of no Freethinker who does not deny the resurrection, and many who would not so term themselvs deny the bodily resurrection. Greg, in his "Creed of Christendom," says: "It will be seen that we make no scruple in negativing a doctrin held verbally by the church, viz.: the resurrection of the body," and in a spiritual resurrection Mr. Greg has as little faith. Voltaire—and the minister will hardly dispute that he was a leading Infidel—did not believe in it and ridiculed it without mercy. After a long and thorough examination of the alleged resurrection and ascension of Jesus, Thomas Paine wrote his opinion of the farce, which we will quote for the benefit of Mr. Hogg's minister. We presume he will not deny that Paine was a leading Infidel. He says:

I hav now gone through the examination of the four books ascribed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; and when it is considered that the whole space of time from the crucifixion to what is called the ascension is but a few days, apparently not more than three or four, and that all the circumstances are said to hav happened nearly about the same spot, Jerusalem, it is, I believe, impossible to find, in any story upon record, so many and such glaring absurdities, contradictions, and falsehoods, as are in those books. They are more numerous and striking than I had any expectation of finding, when I began this examination, and far more so than I had any idea of when I wrote the former part of the "Age of Reason." I had then neither Bible nor Testament to refer to, nor could I procure any. My own situation, even as to existence, was becoming every day more precarious; and, as I was willing to leave something behind me upon the subject, I was obliged to be quick and concise. The quotations I then made were from memory only, but they are correct; and the opinions I hav advanced in that work are the effect of the most clear and long-established conviction that the Bible and the Testament are impositions upon the world; that the fall of man, the account of Jesus Christ being the son of God, and of his dying to appease the wrath of God, and of salvation by that strange means, are all fabulous inventions, dishonorable to the wisdom and power of the Almighty.

Though it is impossible, at this distance of time, to ascertain as a fact who were the writers of those four books (and this alone is sufficient to hold them in doubt, and where we doubt we do not believe), it is not difficult to ascertain negativly that they were not written by the persons to whom they are ascribed.

The story of Jesus Christ appearing after he was dead is the story of an apparition, such as timid imaginations can always create in vision, and credulity believe. Stories of this kind had been told of the assassination of Julius Cæsar, not many years before, and they generally hav their origin in violent deaths, or in the execution of innocent persons. In cases of this kind compassion lends its aid, and benevolently stretches the story. It goes on a little and a little further, till it becomes a most certain truth. Once start a ghost, and credulity fills up the history of its life and assigns the cause of its appearance! One tells it one way, another another way, till there are as many stories about the ghost, and about the proprietor of the ghost, as there are about Jesus Christ in these four books.

Christmas is a good time to drive another nail in the coffin of this story, for on that day from thousands of pulpits was told the tale of Christ's birth, and his birth is nothing to the world without the resurrection, and thousands of credulous dupes will believe that a dead man really came to life and ascended bodily up to heaven, when there is no proof of any kind for it, while there is the clearest and most undisputed evidence and experience that the whole story is an impossibility; and we may, with Mr. Bennett, conclude that "the remarkable statements of the resurrection and ascension belong to the realm of fiction and absurdity, intelligent people of the present day having but little belief in the dead returning to life, or in physical bodies ascending into and living in the ethereal regions above."

The Infamous Cook Again.

We knew that from the moment Jo Cook left India he never let an opportunity pass to lie about and slander Mr. Bennett. We knew also that at Boston on the 8th inst. he repeated his lies, and we supposed he had not heard of Mr. Bennett's death. But now he comes to New York, and in the church of the "Divine Paternity" again tells the lies so often exposed. A man who talks of "obscenity" in a church of the "divine paternity" must hav a strange sense of the proprieties.

Words cannot measure the meanness of him who tears open the grave to attack an enemy. Slander is the weapon of the coward, and lies his ammunition, and Jo Cook is both a liar and coward when he defames the memory of one whose shoes he was not worthy to unloose. He tells what he knows to be false, and what can easily be proved to be false by the Indian public before whom Mr. Bennett lectured. The trouble with him is that Mr. Bennett's audiences numbered thousands, while but paltry hundreds were humbugged into hearing him. Well may he say that the greatest danger to Christianity in India was "from the attacks of imported Infidels." Mr. Bennett's visit produced more good than Cook and the missionaries can overcome in years by their harmful labors. That is the secret of Jo Cook's rancor and spiteful animosity.

"A jackass once kicked a lion. The lion was dead."

Tax the Churches.

The American Sentry, a Greenback paper, says:

"To tax productiv property yielding an uncertain income and not to tax unproductiv property yielding a certain income, is one phase of modern American statesmanship that is not in harmony with the best interests of free government."

This statesmanship is the secret of the influence of our legislators upon the clergy. A priest can make his people vote as he pleases, and a minister's influence is nearly as great over his congregation. To win votes the so-called "statesmen" of our times hav exempted the churches from taxation and allowed the clericals to draw subsidies from state and national treasuries. The way to stop such injustice is to refuse to support the ministers and send men to the legislatures who cannot be scared by hell nor bribed by heaven. We are glad to see the National Liberal League is circulating petitions to force these priestly robbers from the State House at Albany. Let every Liberal in the state send to Man for a petition, and get it signed by all in favor of equal rights.

Truly Christian.

Thankful indeed are we that we are not a Christian! The work which Christians do is so repugnant to every sense of decency that none but the lowest and most depraved could find enjoyment in doing it. To be a consistent Christian necessitates being a coward, a liar, a hypocrit, a defamer of dead men, a despoiler of graves, an assassin of reputations, a slinking cur living on garbage picked from ash boxes and cesspools. This impression of what a true Christian is we get from perusing the Christian Advocate, which has an editorial on the death of Mr. Bennett, in which it accuses him of being everything bad, and quotes as authority the Index and R.-P. Journal.

We wish it were possible to proceed criminally against all the journals who are slandering Mr. Bennett since his death, but it would take an army of lawyers to fight this horde of liars, and it is impossible. It has been the fate of all the world's benefactors to be persecuted in their lives and slandered in their deaths by the church and its hireling preachers, priests, and editors. A list would fill columns, and include the world's grandest minds. It is an honor to be slandered by the church, rather than praised, since the men whom she hates are the ones most to be loved, and the smile of her approbation has been given only to those who deserve and receive execration from the rest of the world.

What shocks the Methodistical Advocate most is that Mr. Bennett should hav seen fit to write an open letter to Jesus Christ, in which he asked the questions which naturally occur to an honest man on reading the account of his life as given in the Bible. These questions, it is needless to say, never occur to Christian editors, who call this letter immoral. Now, to us it seems absurd for any man who pins his faith to an illegitimate savior, to call any one immoral who merely disbelieves the story and seeks to remove the stigma of his savior's birth by giving him an honest father. The Advocate will do well to cease crying morality, when its own faith is founded on a transaction of the grossest immorality, and its own ministers are the most immoral men of our times.

Much for Little.

We hav on hand a goodly number of Volumes I. and II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, published in 1874 and 1875, the same securely bound in good paper covers. The first volume is a monthly, and the second a semi-monthly. Volume I. contains 160 pages, and Volume II. 256 pages.

We are disposed to send these out to friends who wish them at a trifle above the postage. We will send Vol. I. for 25 cents, and Vol. II. for 50 cents. They contain a large amount of reading matter, and are worth nearly ten times the amount asked for them. They also are worth not a little to show what THE TRUTH SEEKER was in the first and second year of its existence. Let those who wish to secure these volumes not fail to make their wants known.

A Little Symposium on Ingersoll.

From the Omaha Bee.

A number of local clergymen hav been interviewed as to the causes of Bob Ingersoll's popularity. The reasons they assign can be reduced to three—curiosity, desire to listen to eloquence and wit, and a sinfulness which seeks some escape from the consequences of guilt other than that offered by orthodoxy. It is a little singular that no one has suggested that a large measure of Col. Ingersoll's popularity might arise from the fact that many of the intelligent and thinking public are dissatisfied with the character of the pulpit itself. Not with the moral teachings of religion, but with the narrow and cramped and prejudiced interpretations of truth which are doled out to pew holders Sunday after Sunday in our pulpits. When the teacher is intellectually below the average of his hearers, when the exposition of theory takes the place of preaching whose object is to induce practice, when stale, trite, and slovenly methods of expressing thought on the most important of subjects usurps a clear, practical, and inspiriting teaching, the waning influence of clericalism is not to be wondered at, and the curiosity to listen to so well an advertised man as Ingersoll ought to be no cause for surprise. Col. Ingersoll himself attributes his success in attracting audiences to the fact that others are thinking what he dares to assert. In a limited sense this is so. The tendency of thought for over a century has been toward the assertion of the idea that religion is conduct, not speculation, and that no belief which does not go out into action has any efficacy either in improving the morals of the holder or in ameliorating the condition of society. Of the thousands who listen to the mingled sarcasm and wit, combined often with logic joined to burning eloquence, which pours from the lips of the brilliant orator, a very small proportion accept his conclusions in their entirety. They may laugh heartily at his denunciations of the bigotry, intolerance, and intellectual stagnation of the pulpit; they do not necessarily giv in their adhesion to the lecturer's aguments that the pulpit should be abolished or that good living and good clothes ought to be the chief end of life. They may applaud his biting satire directed against the incrustations with which dogma has surrounded great moral truths, but they do not deny those great truths themselvs. And while with Mr. Ingersoll they shake their sides in mocking criticism of what men hav said about the conduct of life, which after all is the one great aim of all religions, they utter no anathemas against those central ideas which the best men in all ages hav agreed upon as at once vital to the preservation of the highest type of humanity and civilization. It is something more than mere curiosity that draws together nightly thousands of men to listen to Mr. Ingersoll. It must be that he meets some want in his hearers' minds, or reflects, though in an exaggerated degree, opinions which they themselvs entertain. If the pulpit is losing its grip on the masses it is because of that inefficiency of those who occupy it, and the intolerance of men who seem determined to force from the rank of the clergy every man who dares to clothe his thoughts in a garb of originality or to arrray his interpretations of truth in the language of independent thought. The fault does not entirely lie with the people that Col. Ingersoll attracts two thousand persons every night that he cares to lecture, and vulgar curiosity is a shallow explanation of the success of the arch Infidel.

REV. W. J. HARSHA, PRESBYTERIAN MINISTER, IN REPLY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BEE: Your vigorous editorial in this evening's issue, in regard to the teachings of the pulpit, contains a mistake that I am much surprised to see you fall into. You assert that the pulpit is given up to "exposition of theory," rather than the "preaching whose object it is to induce practice." Shallow minds are apt to fall into this error, but a mind that could issue the editorial mentioned ought surely to hav escaped it. The writer, we must suppose, has formed his views by reading accounts of the preaching of one hundred years ago, rather than by a personal attendance upon the services of the day. Theological hair-splitting was the fashion in the times of the Puritans, but it has gone out of date with their pointed hats.

The truth is, the minister who fails to preach with the practical life of his congregation in view is grossly unfaithful to Christianity. By our commission we are required to preach honesty, truthfulness, temperance, virtue. With this you agree. But we go one step farther. We not only declare the duty but we also supply the motiv for performing it. We say, Be ye honest because there is a personal God in the heavens who will punish dishonesty. Be ye truthful because there is a future judgment when all hearts will be laid bare. Be ye temperate because no drunkard hath part in the kingdom of God. In defending, therefore, the personal existence of God and the reality of the judgment and the purity of God's kingdom, we are simply strengthening the motiv. Whether we can prove these things is aside from the question. The question is, Are we to be blamed because we not only advocate the duty but also supply the motiv? And in the enforcement of the latter are we not using the most effectual means of promoting the the former?

It is a mere quibble to say that the preaching of the day is engaged upon speculation. There is no sentence so frequent upon the lips of ministers as this, "You may believe all the doctrins of all creeds and never be saved; you must repose confidence in Christ as a person and reveal that confidence by taking love for him as the motiv of every action." What is the result? Whoever really follows out this direction becomes a law-abiding citizen, an honest dealer, a virtuous and temperate man. It is one thing to giv a catalog of virtues, it is quite another to inspire a man to practice them. This latter the Bible certainly does.

The editor of the Bee hits the nail on the head when he attributes Ingersoll's popularity to the fac that the pew is getting dissatisfied with the pulpit—in other words, the ministers are standing still while the laymen are progressing. It cannot be otherwise, when the clergy are bound to a paper idol, while the hearers are thrown in contact with the world of thought and must receive more or less impression therefrom. They begin to see that the dogmas weekly hurled at them are false, that there has been no revelation, that the scheme of salvation is a monstrous injustice in theory and has no foundation in fact, and that all that the minister says of heaven is mere guess-work.

People are not dissatisfied with true morality, but they are with that morality which is only sustained by the fear of hell, and which has for its foundation the grossest immorality. Flowers may grow from a cesspool, but no one would think of mistaking the cesspool for the flowers. Preachers prate of the morality of the Bible, and thoughtless editors echo them by attributing it to religion, which in their minds is synonymous with Christianity, when the fact is, the Bible is not a moral book, and Christianity is not a moral system. Morality has grown from man's needs. The man who raises a crop of grain is apt to think he has a better right to it than one who sits on the fence and watches him, and he would be very apt to regard it as immoral in the watcher to take it, and he would maintain his rights without reference to the Bible. The Ten Commandments are the result of mau's experience up to the time they were written, not the cause of his action. The Bible was manufactured in about the middle of recorded history, and it is a reflex of the morality of its time and of the people who got it up. But it is no more fit for the people of to-day than the plows or household goods of the Jews. Religion has no more to do with morality than Christ has with science. The Bee rightly says that it is more than curiosity that draws thousands to hear Ingersoll. It is an appreciation of facts. Ingersoll givs eloquent expression to their views. They believe he is right, and go to hear him. If the ministers taught the truths he does, they too might hav good audiences.

With the usual perversity of Presbyterians, the minister makes some assertions which would undoubtedly be new to his synod. The Roman Catholic and Presbyterian churches are about the only ones that hav not modified their creeds, although some Calvinistic preachers hav been compelled by their people to throw a few drops of cold water on the fires of hell, and now and then rescue some prominent man who may hav been supposed to hav gone there. What a man practices has but little influence on his future compared to his belief, according to that church. It is all theory, and that theory is most barbarous. A man might practice all the virtues in the world, and yet the church can offer him no certainty of getting to heaven—which is the great objectiv point of religion—unless he hold certain theories regarding the city of flowers and gold. In this the Rev. Mr. Harsha also differs from the Rev. Dr. Abbott, who says that church creeds "are for the most part statements, not of religious facts, but of religious theories; and our theological controversies are almost entirely about, not the facts, but the theories." Mr. Harsha givs what he is required to preach. But will simple honesty, or truthfulness, or temperance, or virtue open wide the gates according to the Presbyterian creed? Let us see. The confession says, "We cannot, by our best works, merit pardon of sin or eternal life at the hand of God." What can "practice" avail against such a dogma as that? And what are the motivs this minister says actuate him in living—if he does—a moral life? Is he honest because God will punish dishonesty? Does he tell his children that the only reason they must be honest is because he will beat them if they are not? It strikes us that the moment they became too large to thrash they would hardly be good citizens. And he says "be truthful" for the same reason—that you would "catch it" if you were not. Is that a creditable morality for a man of God to teach? Would it not be better to say be honest and truthful because if you are not you wrong your fellows, and no one has the right to injure another? It is better to be temperate because the intemperate man injures himself and all connected with him. If no drunkard has part in heaven, where are all the Bible worthies?—and Jesus was but casting souls into hell when he turned water into wine for the consumption of his fellow bacchanalians. Ministers are to blame for supplying such miserably inadequate motivs as they do—motivs which move but few, and which are founded on falsehood. As for love of Christ being the straight way to heaven, suppose there were no Christ, no crucifixion, and no resurrection? Suppose the whole scheme of salvation is a delusion and a snare; suppose the gospels are untrue, and the records fabrications of designing priests and ecclesiasts. Then where are you? And we hav only supposed what is amply proved by modern research and scholarship. Wouldn't it be better to hav based his hopes of immortality on good works here to his fellow-man, so that if heaven is an unrealized dream he would liv in the hearts of those that came after him as one who loved his fellow-man? If the Bible inspires the practice of virtues, why hav not the devotees of Christianity been more virtuous, more humane, and less inclined to imprison and torture men for their unbelief? Or is it considered a virtue to rack and burn heretics, to beat out the brains of babes, to rip open the bodies of women with the sword, and to commit the thousand other nameless horrors of which Christians hav been guilty? Let the minister ponder on these things, and he will, if he is honest, be less ready to ascribe to the Jewish Bible any saving qualities in the matter of virtue.

Book Notice.

THE BIBLE OF THE RELIGION OF SCIENCE. By H. S. BROWN, M.D. A book of over 400 pages. Just published. Price $1.50. Sold at this office.

This is one of the most remarkable productions of this remarkable age. If persons wish to know the practical value of inspiration and the true religious teachings of all the sciences, including the science of Spiritualism, they will find it more plainly and explicitly taught in this book than in any other extant.

1. The basic principle taught in this book is that spirit matter, force, and motion, and the laws of growth, maturity, and decay are external substances or principles, and that all of them make the law god, who is omniscient and omnipresent, and fills all space, and never gets tired.

> Or extends through all extent,
> And operates unspent.

2. That the law god rules by the laws of order and progress in exact time and by the laws, growth, maturity, and decay. Every sun, every planet, every satellite, and every insect, bird, beast, as well as man, is subject to these laws. All hav a small and rude beginning, and grow to their greatest maturity and splendor, and then decay. Mankind had a large beastly body at first and little mind, and in the laps of ages has slowly progressed until he has arrived at his present civilized, enlightened, and intellectual condition. And in this progress he has made and worshiped many gods, from reptils to man, from meteors to the sun, from idols of wood to idols of gold and diamonds, and from the spirits of devils to those of man and their god, and, last of all, the great mass of religionists worship a wood god, and are as ready to murder or maltreat all persons who call this the thinnest and most absurd god that man ever made, as the worshipers of any idols ever were. But never in any part of this progress hav they become sufficiently enlightened to adopt the true law god of nature and worship him according to the principles established by the spiritual and material sciences.

3. The science of Spiritualism is the basis of the religion of science, and persons who adopt this religion soon learn that they must obey the laws of order and harmony if they wish to get the best communications from the purest spirits of heaven.

4. The worshipers of these man-made gods hav always persecuted and abused the persons who sought to get a knowledge of the works and ways of the true god of nature, and they fought among themselvs for the mastery, the same as beasts do. Because all these religions were and are on the beast plane, and not on the reasoning human plane, they all demanded sacrifices as the way to salvation, instead of knowledge and reason.

5. Now comes the scientific religion which says to all people, "Settle your dispute by justice, as established by the highest reason of man, or they must be settled by the gage of battle the same as past religious people and beasts hav settled theirs.

All these subjects are treated in the most lucid manner, and the true principles upon which religious and political reforms should be conducted are shown more plainly than was ever shown before.

All these subjects are treated in such a manner in the book as to convince any candid reader that the writer only wants to know religious or scientific truth to state it, and only asks religious people to reason together as scientists do, to establish the religion of truth, justice, and humanity. Chinese Orthodoxy.

After several weeks' drouth, an abundant rainfall has at last refreshed the capital and its environs. All are happy and every one is asking every one else to whom do we owe the celestial blessing. According to what we learn from a well-authenticated source it is no other than our august lord and master who has brought us the rain. In fact, yesterday morning he commanded one of his sedan-chairs and went to make his devotions at the temple of the god of rains and snow (Ta-Nan-tien), in oder to get rain for his subjects. Hardly had our august sovereign knelt down before the image of this god, when the sky opened its flood-gates and sent down a fructifying shower on the earth. This fact is one more proof of the popularity of our emperor with the gods, and how anxious they are to accomplish all his wishes.

The above, from the Pepin (China) Gazette, sounds much like an orthodox editorial from the Observer or Catholic Review. Suppose there had been a Christian in Pepin who also prayed to his God at the same time the "august lord" prayed to his, and the rain had come (or had not, as the case be), which god would hav got the credit?

Affirmed by Mr. Thos. Williams, denied by Col. M. E. Billings. The chair will be taken by Dr. Wm. Ott. Meetings to commence at 7 P.M. and close at 9. Admission free. Everybody invited.

Good Advice.

Let Boston's Jo Cook go hang himself.

THERE was so much interest aroused by Mr. Jamieson's first course of lectures in Minier, Ill., that he was immediately engaged to giv three lectures more. His second course in Braidwood, Ill., is to commence Dec. 27th. His engagement in Gardner, Ill., is Jan. 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 8th. For lectures, address him at Gardner, Ill., until Jan. 10th. Permanent address, Lake City, Minn.

THE North American Review for January opens with a symposium in which three of the most prominent advocates in this country of the "Revision of Church Creeds," namely, Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, set forth the grounds upon which such revision is deemed necessary. They admit that modern science and skepticism hav overthrown the old-fashioned Christianity, and claim that it must be modified to meet the religious demands of modern times. But it doesn't seem to occur to them that constant revision and modification will in time entirely sweep away all that is vital in their system and leave nothing but some moral maxims common to all systems, and certainly not original with Christianity. "Universal Education for Women," a question that just now is being warmly agitated both here and in England, is discussed by Prof. W. Le Conte Stevens, who, though he zealously advocates the measure, commands the attention and respect of its opponents by the eminent fairness with which he states the adverse arguments. Prof. Isaac L. Rice givs a "Definition of Liberty," deduced from a profoundly philosophical study of the phases of political evolution, from the earliest Anglo-Saxon times to the present day. "American English," by Gilbert M. Tucker, is a spirited defense of our cis-Atlantic fashion of English speech against the aspersions of sundry British critics. The Rev. Dr. H. W. Thomas writes an article that can hardly fail to strike a sympathetic chord in many a mind, on "The Responsibilities of Progressiv Thinkers." "Bigotry in the Medical Profession," by Dr. David Hunt, is a protest from the pen of a respected member of the medical profession against the First Commandment of medical ethics, which forbids association with any but regular practitioners. Finally, Charles T. Congdon, under the singularly apt title of "Adulteration of Intelligence," exposes some of the grave evils to be apprehended from the monopolization of telegraph lines, press associations, and influential public journals.

THE Springfield Republican tells how a gentleman took from his pocket after dinner a pair of solitaires and passed them to his wife. "Humph," she said, "prize package, I suppose?" and passed them on to her son. "Dollar store, eh?" commented the youth. Papa smiled and silently replaced the card in his pocket. A few days later mamma said. "Where did you get those earrings you showed us?" "Well, a man submitted them to me at the store. They were only $950, but you are such a poor judge of gems that I thought it wasn't worth while to giv them to you."

Education.

It is in our country that we boast of our superior advantages of education. It is our pride to point with satisfaction to our many thousand public schools, seminaries, colleges, etc., and conclude that we hav reached the acme of perfection in regard to our methods of instruction. We know that the school-house has extended to the very capillaries of civilization, while in the great heart of our country the colleges beat and throb with a life that is creating many a warrior to battle successfully on the great highway of human existence. This we acknowledge to be true; but, while this is the truth, may we not look around us, and discover, if possible, an improvement in this vast machinery that it may run more smoothly, thereby be less crime and misery in the world?

We stand aghast at the fearful inroads that sin and disease are making on the vitals of our people as a nation. They not only permeate with their deadly miasm the abodes of the outcasts of society, but if we pursue our investigations, everywhere we find men and women dying by thousands, morally and physically, in the death valley of ignorance, corruption, and sin. There is too much suffering in not knowing how to liv in this world, to stand still, with arms folded, and look complacently on the struggling, seething mass of human beings not knowing the why or wherefore of their suffering.

In the first place, while we pride ourselvs on our glorious republican institutions of learning, hav we arrived at the standard by which we can boast in reality in regard to their superior merits? Let us turn the mental telescope to Europe; peradventure, we may advance our interests thereby, in the reflected light of her various galaxy of brilliant stars in the shape of schools of instruction.

While in our country the stress has been too much on the mental, in other countries the industries are taught with the text-books, which eminently qualify them to become useful citizens.

France took the lead, in which an organized training was given to girls. Madam Lemonnier commenced her school on a humble plan, and it now has four branches from the main one, teaching yearly six hundred to seven hundred pupils. They receive a good general education, having classes in wood-engraving, painting on porcelain and ivory fans and blinds; a commercial course fitting them to be clerks and book-keepers, drawing and industrial design, needlework and dress-making, and the manufacture of jewelry, etc. France was not content to let Paris enjoy the monopoly in this respect and we find other technical schools at Vitry-sur-Seine, Nautes, Lyons, St. Etienne, and another for printing at Puteaux, near Paris.

The Women's Industrial Union at Vienna enjoys the cordial sympathy of the emperor and empress, the imperial household, and many illustrious men and women. It has eleven schools, which teach the commercial course, drawing, dress-making, lace-making, stenography, etc.

In Prague there are two industrial schools for girls. These schools receive grants from the state. There are several good industrial schools in Munich, Calu, Stuttgard, Biberach, Hamburg, Hanover, and many other towns. Those at Darmstadt were under the special patronage of her royal highness Princess Alice. Another good phase that is peculiar to these institutions, they take the trouble to procure good situations for their pupils that hav passed a successful examination.

The success of the Lette Verein schools at Berlin has been the means of establishing many other similar institutions in other parts of Germany.

In Italy, Milan has been preëminent in these efforts. Turin also has a good industrial school for girls, which finds situations for its pupils all over Piedmont. Benighted Rome is in advance of the United States, for her one industrial school teaches more varieties in the industrial line than any one we hav in our country. Flower and glove making are also taught in a large government school in Naples, and a school of design has been opened in Florence.

Belgium possesses excellent industrial schools, also two or three professional schools for girls. There are housekeeping establishments founded by Prince Chimay, which are peculiar to Belgium. There are now thirteen of these schools, which hav achieved great success.

Industrial schools of a very high order are also found in Sweden. Denmark has a national school of this kind. If we turn our attention to Athens we there discover a school where labor is taught to perfection; then, pursuing our course, we shall be sure to meet with another at Corfu. Russian Finland is graced with a like institution; then again we are still more interested in the one founded at Kelsingfores, for it is there we see boys also learning how to work (scientifically) before they hav learned to form bad habits. In this school, besides teaching many useful arts and industries, sculpture is included in the program of studies.

In our own country some efforts are being put forth in this direction in one of our model seminaries. Miss Parloa's lessons in cookery, at Lasell Seminary, Auburndale, Mass., has also a well-taught dress-making class which does credit to this institution. The Women's Silk Culture Association established in Philadelphia is another organization tending eventually to an industrial school for the young.

All over the continent of Europe will be found these schools that are founded for practical purposes. Their tendency at a glance would show the great benefits derived from them. They are mostly sustained by their several municipalities, some national and some private institutions.

If in our country the national government should incorporate laws for the adoption of these schools of industry in the statutes for boys as well as for girls, it would be a great step toward reform in our land. Tramps, beggars, criminals, and drunkards would be less, and it would help to pave the way to a purer and better civilization than we can ever experience without such advantages.

There are many species of reform that could be mentioned that, if adopted, would greatly assist in the moral elevation of the coming generations. Much disease and its consequent untold suffering might be avoided if physiology and hygiene were properly taught in every school in our land. To "know thyself" is a thing of the past, not to be thought of in this age of reason and common sense. In the sixteenth century Francois de Saintonges wished to establish a school for girls in France. She was hooted in the streets, and her father called together four doctors of law for the purpose of examining her case, to find out whether she was possessed of a devil in harboring such wild schemes in her brain.

We hear now faint hootings in the distance occasionally when some avatar or reformer wishes to subvert some time-honored custom, but nevertheless the devil marches on doing his work well, for this kind of employment has long been ascribed to his majesty, viz., all manner of reformation that tends to the emancipation of mankind from error in any sense whatever. It is better to pay taxes for a higher order of teaching than to pay such a high tariff on crime. Better to buy largely charts portraying the different stages of a drunkard's diseased stomach than to pay the expenses he incurs sometimes for the crime he commits. Better for the child to see before he takes the fatal draught what effect such a course would hav on his system. His intelligence would direct him into a temperate life, while ignorance would lead him blindfolded to sure ruin.

Other charts should be seen by the young investigator for knowledge, and when properly instructed by a wise teacher that child has learned something of the human body that will be as a sign-board to him or her during the remainder of life in avoiding mistakes that would naturally follow through ignorance of the laws of the human system.

Many will think that a knowledge of all the functions of the human body and of the fearful consequences of the abuse of said body only belongs to the medical institution to instruct in such matters. How many brought forward the argument so very gravely that young ladies would lose all modesty if they recited their lessons in the same class with the young men students about the human form! What a libel on the purity of mankind in general! Those young women are intelligent, refined members of society, capable of doing an immense amount of good to humanity. It is ignorance that is obscene, and it is in constant conflict with all that is divine or holy in life, ever checking the car of progress in its attempt to move over the obstacles ignorance persistently throws in its onward march. Giv us an educated knowledge of the branches of the various industries that are useful, a loftier idea of selfhood, a higher conception of the laws that surround us and control us; then we shall be citizens of a greater republic than we hav to-day.

Keep Up the Refrain.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 9th appears an article, "Ever the Same," by E. C. Walker, decrying Prohibitionists with their "one dolorous chant, the never-ending monotonous refrain, the evils of intemperance." He bases his opposition on the ground that it is opposed to the self-sovereignty of man, and that it kills more than it cures. That is a large word; nothing dolorous about it. Can a self-sovereign ever be amenable to law? Do the self-sovereigns ever advocate a law for any purpose? E. C. Walker says, "Not one man in five thousand becomes a confirmed drunkard." Not one man in eight hundred thousand that rides on a railroad is killed, yet all legislation for preventing another recurrence hinges on the one killed. All law is prohibitory, but it makes a difference in dolor as to what is prohibited. If a man does not believe in prohibition for any purpose, will not allow a right to prohibit men from doing certain things, as a sanitary measure, I hav nothing to say to that man. A steamer comes to New York; small-pox breaks out and is epidemic; the law prohibits her from going to the wharf; must be held at quarantine. The self-sovereign has no disease, it may be has business in Chicago; cannot hav the inalienable right to liberty and the pursuit of happiness; must wait. Why not? Laws prohibit catching fish at certain seasons of the year. Why not let self-sovereigns fish? The fish need not bite. When a liquor saloon is opened the anti-prohibitionist often says, "A man is not obliged to go in and drink." They act by their talk as it reads in James i, 2, "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into temptation." Woodcock are prohibited from being killed at certain seasons; we are prohibited from counterfeiting money, from burning our own house, so as not to endanger another man's property; even prohibited from committing suicide, thus ignoring self-sovereignity at its foundation. E. C. Walker says: "I hav a civil right to sit up so late every night as to impair my health. Is it best for myself and just to others that I should thus undermine my strength? I answer no, but who is to decide at what time I shall seek rest, myself, John Smith, or a thousand John Smiths known as the state?" It is not the time a man may go to rest that is questioned, but his right to do with impunity what endangers my safety and life. Then I am interested and the state must decide. He says, "The use of stimulants is as old as the race." So is superstition. In India, in some conditions of life, the wife was burnt on a wood fire by the side of her dead husband. When the English obtained possession of the country, they prohibited it. Who says it was not right? Presume it was very dolorous to those prohibited. See the millions in India, only a few as to numbers were burnt. It is the one we object to; without the first there would be no second. Prohibition saved them all in India, and it will not kill more than it cures from liquor in this country. See the thousands who fill a drunkard's grave in this land, who, as they passed through the fires of liquor, endured almost an eternity as compared to burning on a wood fire in India; yet their sufferings bear no comparison to the unspeakable anguish of their own kith and kin who minister to their wants as they die daily, while the travesty of self-sovereignty is used as a shield, serving, it may be unintentionally, to protect the greatest crime of the age. E. C. Walker says, "Mr. Cook, like all other apostles of the gospel of force, is determined to confound actual crimes, such as murder, arson, and rape, with intemperance." Prohibitionists do not confound them, they blend together, coming from that first glass,

> Small habits well pursued betimes
> May reach the dignity of crimes.

You cannot tell when they become criminals, any more than you can tell when a pig changes to be a hog. Warden Haynes says of the Massachusetts state prison: "Since I hav been connected with it we hav had twenty-one here for killing their wives, two for killing their fathers, and one for killing his mother. Of these twenty-four all but one were not only habitual drunkards, but actually drunk when they committed the crime. They were not bad men, except when under the influence of liquor." Warden Haynes ought not to confound crimes with intemperance in such a manner. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 23d Walker says, "'Liberta' and J. A. Hallock cannot conceal their churchly parentage and education. With the priests of the dying faith, whose creed is the mother of prohibition, they imagin that abuse is argument. Being prohibitionists, it is next to impossible for them to treat fairly those who fight beneath the banner of individualism." Walker is not a prohibitionist, and of course ought to state things fairly, yet "the creed of the dying faith is the mother of prohibition" seems a little lexiphanic, not dolorous. We read that Noah was a just man and perfect in his generation and walked with God—the only one fit to save. Hudibras says of him:

> So Noah, when he anchored safe on
> The mountain's top, his lofty haven,
> And all the passengers he bore
> Were on the new world set ashore,
> He made it next his chief design
> To plant and propagate a vine,
> Which since has overwhelmed and drowned
> Far greater numbers, on dry ground,
> Of wretched mankind, one by one,
> Than all the flood before had done.

It does not read that God reproved him, but that he continued him in favor. Lot, the only righteous man in Sodom, confounded intemperance with crime—no reproof. David, the man after God's own heart, called Uriah to him before he was put in the front of the battle, and he did eat and drink before him, and he made him drunk—no reproof as to using liquor. Solomon said: "Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts." The first miracle claimed for Jesus was turning water into wine for those who had already drank too much. See Paul's epistle to the Corinthians about drinking the blood of Christ at communion to intoxication. He writes to Timothy that the bishops must not take too much wine, and tells him to drink water no longer, but use a little wine for the stomach's sake. To some petitioners in England in favor of unfermented wine at communion, Bishop Lincoln said that "in their present state of mind they are not fit to receive the sacrament at all, as in their Pharisaic self-conceit they set up their private opinions against the practice of eighteen hundred years." The bishop has faith, but no prohibition. Rev. Wm. Noble, of London, says, "Fully one-half of the Methodist churches in England are in the hands of rum-drinkers as preachers and rum-sellers as Sunday-school superintendents." Dr. Newman Hall says: "Thirty thousand church-members are slaughtered by rum in England every year. Christians hav always sold and drank rum since this country was settled." The Baptist General Banner said, "While we as a denomination tolerate dram-drinking, we advise the brethren to use it cautiously, and for God's sake let the sacred, holy ministers of God touch it lightly." No prohibition in that—the ring has the tone of a self-sovereign. The creed of such a showing the "mother of prohibition!" The Prohibitionist cannot make dolorous statements as to the evils of intemperance so wide of the truth as that about the "mother of prohibition." Some church-members want to abate the evil—the large number do not. John B. Gough says, "The churches hav no right to disciplin one member for getting drunk, if they do not disciplin another for drinking." That is good logic. Some Christians would try to relieve the land of its greatest curse. Shall we refuse to work with them because of their religious faith? If so, we are bigots in the full sense of the word. Will we join with men of all creeds to put out the fire that burns our neighbor's house? Then let us unite to quench the fires of alcohol that consume all that makes home pleasant. There is work for all.

Seize upon truth, where'er 'tis found,
Among our friends, among our foes;
On Christian or on heathen ground,
The flower's divine where'er it grows.

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

Milford, Mass., Dec. 13, 1882.

A Year's Missionary Work.

From the Sun,

In 1874 the American Missionary Association, a Congregational society, voted to transfer all of its foreign missions, except that of Western Africa, "and concentrate its efforts on the despised races of men—the negro, the Indian, and the Chinaman."

It seems that during the last year 156 Chinamen "hav ceased from idolatry under the teachings of the association." That is unquestionably a very small number of converts out of a race more numerous than any other in the world.

But of all people the Chinamen are perhaps the slowest to change from their old ways, either religious or social. They detest innovations; and while the Japanese are adopting the European dress and showing themselvs to be apt pupils of Western religious skepticism, the Chinese stick to their queues and their flowing garments, and are satisfied with their ancient religion. Even when converts to Christianity are made among them, it is always very doubtful whether they hav really experienced any change of heart. They are known in China as "rice converts;" that is, they assume the Christian livery in order to get the rations served out to them by the missionaries. At least, so Europeans resident in China report.

Missionary work among the Chinese must also be unusually difficult now, because we refuse to receive them in the public like other immigrants, converted or unconverted, and such harsh treatment cannot seem to them consistent with our Christian professions, with our doctins of the brotherhood of man. Nor hav we heard that the opponents of the Chinese on the Pacific coast were disposed to make any exception in favor of those "who hav ceased from idolatry." Probably the converts were so few that they were hardly worth counting. But if we are unable to so far Christianize the Chinamen who are already here as to make them tolerable neighbors, there does not seem to be much hope of converting them at home, where they are surrounded by heathen influences, instead of the Christian examples and Christian atmosphere of the United States.

For the above reasons we are not surprised at the small number of Chinese converts reported by the American Missionary Association. If, therefore, that body, husbanding its resources to spend them where they will produce the most effect, should abandon the stony field of China, it would at least be excusable. A total of only 156 converts for a whole year's work is a very poor showing.

Nor do we find that the result of its year's labor among the Indians has been much more encouraging. It is true that the Indians are as a mere handful in comparison with the Chinese, but they are at our doors, and it is of the highest necessity that they should be converted from savagism. They menace the peace of the vast regions at the far West, and, instead of softening their fierce hearts, from time immemorial we hav been exciting them to atrocities by infamous breaches of faith, by robbing them, and stimulating their vices. The American church spends tremendous efforts in the conversion of heathens in Asia and Africa, but where else are there people so much in need of the civilizing influences of true Christianity as our own Indians, still in the depths of savageness? Preliminary to that work, however, if success is to crown it, it will be necessary to convert the government to Christian methods of dealing with them.

So far, the American Missionary Association has done little among the Indians. The telegraphic summary of its year's work reports three Indian agents, three Indian missionaries, two churches, and one hundred and six Sunday-school scholars. Regarding the African mission, we are told only that "the survey presents six missionaries, ten nativ teachers and preachers, three churches, nine out-stations, and four schools at the Mendi Mission, and reports the explorations of the Rev. Dr. Ladd and Snow, who went 2,500 miles up the Nile." Among the colored people of our Southern states the work seems to hav been largely educational, where the number of students is given as 8,608, a gain over last year of 500. But the association at one time or another has also established eighty-three churches at the South. The negroes of the South generally, however, are either Baptists or Methodists.

The association received nearly three hundred thousand dollars during the year, which seems to be a great deal of money in comparison with the results accomplished. Perhaps we ought to add that this Cleveland meeting was expected to giv the Fraudulent Hayes an opportunity to temporarily emerge from his obscurity, he being announced as among the probable speakers.

Dreadful Effects of Bible Reading.

From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Josiah B. Smith, the father who killed his boy because, as he said, he had a revelation from the Lord to do so, is forty years old. He came to Westminster five years ago, and since then, with his wife and family, has been picking up a meager subsistence by odd jobs. Finally the family settled down to fishing, establishing their home on a desolate island off the coast, which could only be reached by a boat. It was seldom visited except by hunters and fishermen, who hired the boat which the murdered boy had charge of. The murder was committed on the 4th inst., but was not discovered until last Thursday, when a party of hunters who called out from the shore for the boy were told by old man Smith that the boy was dead, and that he had been inspired by the Lord to kill his child. The hunting party secured the services of a younger boy, and coolly went on with their sport, only reporting the crime to the authorities that night. A constable and doctor went out next day to the scene of the crime. They drove down to the beach and shouted to Smith, and he rowed over to them. On making the object of the visit known he gave himself up quietly. The mother and children were then brought from the island, and the entire family taken to Westminster Friday morning. Before the officers arrived the boy had been buried about thirty feet from the house.

On arrival of the prisoner and family at Westminster, an inquest was ordered, and Justice Aldridge, accompanied by Dr. James McCoy and others, Smith included, returned to the beach and rowed across to the island. Smith pointed out where the body was buried, the grave was opened, a rough box, which the father had made, was raised and the lid lifted. The sight is described as most sickening. Decomposition had set in to such a degree as to render the moving of the body a difficult and disagreeable task. The unnatural parent looked on complacently, and spoke of the murder with no feeling. Finally, in reply to a question as to how he struck the blow, he stooped over the corpse, thrust his knife into it, and drew it out of the cavity without a sign of emotion. The weapon was an eight-inch butcher-knife. Mr. McCoy carefully examined the body, but, aside from the fatal cut, found no sign of any violence. One death-dealing blow was struck just in the center of the chest, and with sufficient power to cut the breast-bone and enter to the full length of the blade, making a horrible gash, eight inches deep and four inches long.

A few weeks ago Smith gave up fishing, and, being asked why, replied that the Lord had commanded it, and had promised to hereafter provide for him. From that time on he has made, and has commanded his family to make, no effort to gain a livelihood. The boy, however, put no faith in his father's belief, and from time to time purchased tea, sugar, etc., with his own money. On the Wednesday before the murder the boy purchased and took home some sacks of flour, which angered his father, and this was found emptied upon the ground, together with some other provisions, close to the spot where the murder was committed. Except a few green apples, nothing eatable was found in the house.

The crime was committed about three hundred yards from the house. The boy was taken out behind a clump of bushes, both parents being present. They claim that he knew he was to be sacrified, and made no resistance whatever, but calmly knelt before them, ready to be offered up. Whilst in this position, the father struck the fatal blow.

One of the first questions asked, on the arrival of the family at Westminster, was whether they would make further sacrifices of their children, and both father and mother replied if the Lord called on them to sacrifice all, it would hav to be done. At the examination neither Smith nor his wife made any effort to conceal anything, but told the whole story in its horrible details. Smith pleaded guilty as charged, and was committed for trial on the charge of murder. He is now imprisoned in Los Angeles. From the first the murderer has shown no feeling whatever, and regards the crime no more than he would the killing of a hog. He has been quite a purchaser of Canada lottery tickets, and said the Lord was going to send him money from Canada to pay for burying the boy. The family are Mormons in good standing. They hav been considered eccentric, but not crazy. The mother begins to feel great remorse, and to doubt the divinity of their inspiration.

THE WIFE AND MOTHER'S STORY.

A reporter of the Los Angeles Herald has been interviewing Mrs. Josiah Smith (now confined in the jail) regarding the recent murder of her son. Following is the interview:

Reporter: Mrs. Smith, you are here to answer the charge of assisting in the murder of your son? Hav you any objections to stating to me what impelled you to this act?

Mrs. Smith: I had nothing to do with it, sir. If I could hav prevented it I would. My husband told me about an hour before he did it that the Lord demanded a sacrifice of us, and that our boy had to die. I begged him to spare my boy; I cried, and besought him to consider well what he was about to do, but all the answer he made me was that Jesus Christ had died for us, and the Lord had told him that our son had to die for his sake.

Reporter: What did your husband do after he had refused to yield to your request?

Mrs S.: He called my boy out of the house and told him that he had to die for our savior. The boy asked him if the Lord had commanded us to starve, and Josiah told him "Yes." Then the little fellow knelt down and I knelt down by his side, and his father stood up. He raised the knife, looked hard in the boy's face, and then drove the knife into his breast. Oh! It was awful, once it was done!

Reporter: What do you mean? Do you mean to say that the slaying of one of your children did not seem awful to you?

Mr. S.: No! I felt bad a little, but when he told me what he was going to do it did not seem to me so terrible. It was only when I saw the boy fall over and a great stream of blood come spurting from his body that I felt how terrible it all was.

[Here the woman went on to narrate the circumstances of the death and burial in almost the same words as her husband, which account was recently published.]

Reporter: Had your husband ever been a religious man? Had he ever shown any symptoms of religious insanity?

Mr. S.: No, sir. He was not a religious man. He believed in God, but did not follow any religion. He took to reading the Bible a great deal a few weeks before this all happened, and used often to read me all they say in the Bible about the sacrifices to the Lord. I begged him not to read them so much, but they seemed to hav a terrible fascination to him. He would read over and over again about the Lord commanding Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac, and how he sent a ram to be the victim. He got to talking to his old father, who is now 78 years old, and he said to him, "I am the Lord." His old father argued with him when he saw the way he was going, but it was no use, and my husband would go on saying that he had God in him.

Reporter: How long hav you been married to this man? Has he been a good husband to you?

Mrs. S.: This coming December will be sixteen years. I hav no complaint to make against him, for he has been as good a husband to me as a woman could want. He was always kind to all of us and did all that he could to keep us from want. But just before he did it he said we must all fast, and he would not let us eat anything. The boy asked him frequently if God had ordered us all to starve, and he always said he had. If it had not been that my head was sort of dazed, and if the boy had not given in at once, I might hav prevented the killing, though he was mighty bent on it.

Reporter: How did your husband's talk of this on this subject of sacrifice affect you?

Mrs. S.: Well, I used to feel that if the Lord commanded me to starve or kill people I would not do it. But when he would talk to me and persuade me that a good wife should think as her husband did, I got so as to think that what he said must be right.

Reporter: Do you never think of your murdered child?

Mrs. S.: Oh, yes, sir; I often do. I am always thinking of him, and I can hear him at all times asking to be brought in and laid on his bed, and begging for a little water before he died. I hav his face before me all the time, and I hear his voice in my ears day and night.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 9th inst. is just at hand, deeply draped in mourning, bringing the sad and mournful intelligence of the death of Bro. Bennett. Through his death the Liberal world loses its best, greatest, and most powerful coadjutor. Rest in peace. JOHN SHOCK.

DANBURY, CONN., Dec. 18, 282.

E. M. MACDONALD: Thank you for the invitation to attend Mr. Bennett's funeral. I should hav done so if I had been blessed with more money and less family. I will giv $1 for the monument and $2 for the Truth Seeker Hall, founded by D. M. Bennett.

With sincere sympathy for the bereaved, I am
Yours truly, G. W. SCOTT.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., Dec. 17, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2, for which send me Vol. IV. of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." The extra fifty cents is to pay postage on that and the other volumes, as far as it will go.

I cannot express my sorrow at the loss of our old friend, but it is a consolation to think that he has left that behind him which will outliv theology and all its hosts of believers. C. W. COREY.

LESLIE, MICH., Dec. 13, 282.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find $1.50 for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World."

I cannot express the sadness that comes over me when I think of the death of Mr. Bennett. I drove fifteen miles last summer to meet Mr. Bennett in Jackson, take him by the hand, and say, "Welcome, dear friend, to your home once more." Thousands will feel as we do, that his work was not completed, but we must submit, for such is life.

SARAH A. HAYNES.

JAMESPORT, MO., Dec. 16, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money order for $4, which please apply as below stated.

Dear Mrs. Bennett and Truth Seekers: Words can never express the grief that the death of our beloved brother and hero, D. M. Bennett, caused. One whose love has sparkled forth in words of cheering truths so often; one who had endeared himself to us by his usefulness. Many eyes hav been moistened by tears of sympathy for him; but, oh, that death has come, tears of sympathy would be a joy. We then had a hope and his kind words to cheer us, but now we must bid a long farewell.

W. D. SHULER.

JACKSON, MICH., Dec. 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The word of Mr. Bennett's death has reached us here. I received my mail at Marshall to-day, and came directly home by first train. My family—wife, sons, and daughters—thought a great deal of Mr. Bennett. We hav all wept at the news of his sudden death. Mr. Bennett, during his sojourn in Jackson, was well received, and he had many warm friends here. His visits at our house are remembered with interest and pleasure. Liberalism has lost one of its strongest defenders, and the American people hav lost a true and an intelligent friend. Sincerely yours, C. S. ROWLEY.

HURON, DAKOTA, Dec. 15, 1882.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT: It is with the deepest regret I hav just read of the passing away of the champion of our cause, D. M. Bennett; yet I can but feel that he has but entered a state of greater usefulness—a wider field of labor. Rest assured that, though unseen, he is with you still, and that he will still labor for the enlightenment of mankind.

I wish to convey to you my warmest sympathy in your bereavement, and hope that THE TRUTH SEEKER will still continue its mission to mankind. Time alone can tell how well his place may be filled. With kind regards, I am Very respectfully yours, A. H. RISDON.

CEDAR SPRINGS, MICH., Dec. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It's a sad heart that pens these few lines. The cause of truth has lost a most substantial friend. We mourn the loss of D. M. Bennett most sincerely. We feel that the great ship of progress has been severely wrecked by nature's most terrific storm. But we hope the builders will be called in to repair her and make her sail proudly on. In the economy of nature what she loses at one port she surely gains at another. We will suppose, as Spiritualists, while we hav lost a brilliant light here they hav had one added in the spirit world. So mote it be! Yours, A. S. CROXTON.

ELGIN, ILL., Dec. 17, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to add my heartfelt sympathy for Mrs. Bennett in this her great sorrow. I hope she may receive from the Liberal public not only the sympathy of the heart, but also the pocket, to enable her and you to carry on the good work so nobly begun by our beloved friend. I am proud to know that his last days were so honored. Why should we mourn departed friends who so peacefully drop to sleep, knowing that they hav done their duty to their fellow-man?

Hoping you will be able to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has become a household necessity to so many, I remain Truly yours,

I. W. ARCHIBALD.

ESCANABA, MICH., Dec. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to express my grief. In the death of Mr. Bennett the Liberals of America hav lost a grand and noble worker in the cause of Freethought. Thousands of his friends never saw him, but feel his loss as keenly as if they had been lifelong personal friends. May THE TRUTH SEEKER liv, and its influence never cease to be exerted for good. I want to see it liv until God and Christ, heaven and hell, and every phase of superstition shall be relegated to the dead and buried past, and women are free to express their honest thoughts without let or hindrance. May it liv until truth, knowledge, and intelligence shall be universally diffused over our land is the earnest wish of CALVIN HOWARD.

EARLVILLE, ILL., Dec. 15, 282.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT: I received THE TRUTH SEEKER last night that brought the sad news of your husband's death. Can it be he is gone, when he is so much needed to enlighten the world against superstition and priestcraft? But be assured I extend to you my deepest sympathy in your great bereavement, well knowing it can never be repaired; but I well realize we must soon follow, for my own age is 64. I hope Eugene or some one will take the helm of the old ship, and not let her falter in the least.

I must close, for words are inadequate to express my deep sympathy for you, and regret at the loss the cause of Freethought has met with. Please excuse the liberty I hav taken to write you, for you will ever hav my best wishes.

Yours fraternally, SARAH CLEVELAND HILTON.

ANCORA, N. J., Dec. 18, 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: I was very sick when your card of invitation to the funeral of our late chief was received. Even the paper was kept from my sight for some time. Only once before hav I ever been so affected with the news of one's death. I can scarcely write you now. Words are cheap; I truly lament and bewail. I shall only add a request to you to be so good as to convey my inmost sympathy to poor Mrs. Bennett.

Mr. Bennett still livs in a truer sense for you and me than ever. The truth seeker is dead—long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER! Let us keep his memory green. He has indeed attained the blest nirvana, and we shall soon be there, my boy; "after life's fitful fever, sleeping well."

Most sincerely, T. C. EDWARDS.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., Dec. 12, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for renewal of subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

When writing the familiar address in the beginning of this letter the saddening thought came that the noble old hero and defender of free thought, free speech, and free mails had gone to rest in the bosom of Mother Nature, to whom he ascribed the honor and glory of all we see and know. Close up the ranks, good friends; choose another leader and go right on editing the paper. Judging from correspondence given, the influence of THE TRUTH SEEKER must be very widespread. I like the paper under Brother Macdonald's management, and hope he will succeed to the chair and office of D. M. Bennett.

Yours truly, HENRY F. YOUNG.

LOCUST BAYOU, ARK., Dec. 15, 282.

DEAR EUGENE: Our beloved chief gone! I never was so shocked at a death. Say to Mrs. Bennett she has the sympathy of my whole being. Old Death had better sent his dart at me—I could hav been so much better spared.

I want to tell Brother E. C. Walker I love him for his article on prohibition. Dissipation has caused many crimes, but to force the thing on us in that way would be the greater evil of the two; they would want to force us into some other measure.

I hope you will continue the paper, and that its circulation may be increased. I inclose post-office order for $2.50 for the year 283.

Your friend, J. H. HASLAM.

P. S.—I like Brother Peck's Infidel philosophy: "An honest God will never damn an honest man on account of an honest belief," etc.

SHERIDAN, MICH., Dec. 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is with sorrow that we learn the sad news of the death of Mr. Bennett, and believing that I can show an appreciation of his work in no better way, I hav procured a few subscribers for the indispensable TRUTH SEEKER, and hope to send a few more names with my renewal of the same. Our family is the only Liberal one for many miles in this section, and when we began investigating we had no little trouble to find if there existed such fearless, outspoken papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We are Materialists, and there are others in this benighted locality who are coming to think on these subjects. The fact is, I want to get all the Liberal papers at this post-office possible, as our postmistress is quite religious, and when I got an order the other day to send for This World, she said: "Of all things! a woman working and talking against Christianity!" She had the worst of the argument, and waited until I was gone to finish her talking. Of a truth this is Christianity.

I inclose $3.50, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER as below. Yours very respectfully,

E. A. GLEASON.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Dec. 17, 1882.

MRS. BENNETT: I wish you to know of my heartfelt sympathy for you in your great sorrow at the loss of your dear husband. I, myself a widow for many years, know well how to feel for you. Ah! the deep ache that came to my heart on last Tuesday when I received my TRUTH SEEKER all in mourning, and found on opening it that its great editor, D. M. Bennett, was now numbered among the dead! O dear lady, your loss has been great. The world at large has sustained no greater loss since the great Voltaire's death.

And now my love and sympathy go out to Macdonald and the workers in the office, and to all of Mr. Bennett's friends in New York and over the whole world. My tears and stricken heart are with you, and I feel that you will giv comfort and aid to the widow of your lost friend.

ELIZABETH B. DILLON.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Dec. 18, 282.

MY DEAR MRS. BENNETT: It is with a heart overflowing with sympathy that I write you. The late expression of my feeling is due to the fact that until now I hav hardly felt equal to the task of recognizing so unmistakably to myself the sad fact that your good, brave, and kind husband was gone from among us. I know too well the sorrow you are called upon to bear, and that the sympathy and tenderness of friends is all there is to sustain you in the trial. This, I am glad to see, is most abundantly yours. Let it soften the pangs of your solitude, and cheer the future to remember how nobly and faithfully you hav stood by him whom so many enemies vainly sought to traduce.

We send to you from every part of this great country our tenderest sympathy, and all his friends will pledge themselvs anew to his beloved TRUTH SEEKER. It must be made a monument to his memory. This will be some consolation as the days go by.

With warm regards, MRS. H. S. LAKE.

SALIDA, COL., Dec. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a post-office order for $4, to be used as follows: $2.50 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $1.50 for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." I hav received three volumes, and am so well pleased with them that I must hav the fourth.

It is with much sorrow that I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the death of our dear brother, D. M. Bennett. It is but just to say that my pen cannot describe my feelings when I learned of the death of that great and good man, who has devoted so much of his life to the cause of Freethought. But as death is the last change that we are certain of in this world, and as we know that we must all meet it some time, we must console ourselvs with the thought that death is only a freak of nature, and nature, as I believe, is the beginning and end of all.

Hoping that the cause of Freethought will prosper in the future as in the past, I remain

Yours truly, OTIS WHITE.

FARLEY, IA., Dec. 13, E.M. 282.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER came yesterday, and with it the sad news of the death of my old friend, Mr. Bennett. I shall attempt no consolation. 'Tis vain in cases like this. But we can cherish the happy reflection that he has gone to the grave honored and respected by all lovers of the race who had the good fortune to know him or his works. Perhaps no man upon American soil to-day can boast of as many true and tried friends as Mr. Bennett has left behind him. His persecution claimed our sympathy; his square and honorable dealing secured our confidence, and his untiring zeal and labor in the cause we hold so dear has created a love that will be transmitted from age to age as long as man writes the history of man. The labors of his life are now over, but his name and his works are immortal. The unbiased verdict of the world must be, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." Yours with sympathy, H. GILMORE.

SHAKERS, N. Y., Dec. 17, 1882.

MY DEAR EUGENE: You hav an apparently good reason to deem me negligent in responding to your kind notice of the decease of our great and good friend, D. M. Bennett. Few knew him in prosperity and adversity as you and I did. I learned him best, and learned to love him most in the time "that tried men's souls," his soul in particular, behind the prison bars. It was my good fortune to be able to traverse the inner and favored circle of the penitentiary, and I was kindly permitted to solace the mind of that great man, and administer luxuries to his corporeal necessities. Each visit I made him he showed the stout heart, and only once while there in company with his noble wife was there any appearance of a breaking down. He bore his tortures like a hero. I never doubted that he received the first shock tending to his complete suspension of life at the prison to which he was consigned by the most despicable of men, Anthony Comstock.

It is needless to say that I, in common with so many, was quite unprepared for the fatal announcement, but living or dying, the world had in D. M. Bennett a most scrupulously honest, upright, and high principled man, and in the peculiar line of his work an unequaled agitator of the masses in his searches after truth. Extend to his wife the sweetest of condolence, and with high regards for yourself and hopes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, believe me,

Yours truly, G. A. LOMAS.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Dec. 13, 1882.

E. M. MACDONALD: With mute and heartfelt sorrow and grief do I write you. Not that I can say much, for I lack the words to express my feelings. Yes, it is truly a shock to me, and must be to all Mr. Bennett's friends and associates. I was fondling the delusion that I was to see him here this winter, but alas! such hope is dead now. Dead, like him we all loved for his clear, manly, and outspoken words and deeds, for his true patriotism and human rights. Dead! yes, still it is hard to realize of the hero, the martyr that lived and fought the forces of superstion and defied the imps of hell that persecuted him. Mr. Kingsley, the silver-haired, venerable, came to me yesterday and spoke a word, but his speech failed him, and he went his way too full for utterance. I hav no fears for the future of our departed friend, and thus we consign him back to the universe from which we all were born, not with pity, fear, and anguish, but with regrets that we feel when we hav irretrievably lost our dearest possessions. "But yesterday the word of Cæsar might hav stood against the world!"

I hope to know more from the next TRUTH SEEKER, and long may you and it liv to work out the problem friend Bennett left in your hands.

Respectfully yo urs, G. GUNNESON.

IRVINGTON, N. J., Dec. 17, 282.

FRIENDS MACDONALD, WAKEMAN, MRS. BENNENT, AND OTHERS: I was shocked when I received the notice of Mr. Bennett's death, on my way to meet an engagement at Bloomfield on Friday evening, Dec. 8th. My wife was quite sick at the time, and required every spare moment, or I should hav been at the funeral or answered your kind notice immediately. D. M. Bennett was a grand man, and I think that he was one of the greatest victors of modern times. A true friend of liberty has fallen. But who ever erected such monuments as he has for the past few years? They will outshine the pyramids of the past, and will stand and work while his body at least is at rest. I am glad to hav been personally acquainted with him, and hope to be able in some way to help continue the good work which he has helped on so mightily.

Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett! My wife and daughter had been with me to see Mr. Bennett. We gave him a photograph of the trio, and he gave us three varieties of his, one in prison garb. We want Mrs. Bennett's now. We unite in sending sympathy to you all. At the League at 202 Market street I saw Messrs. Frankel and Cool, who were at the funeral of Mr. Bennett. They said that it was a most beautiful service. I hav read the whole in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so has Mrs. Marshall, and we like it very much.

Mrs. Knight of Boston lectured before the League this evening on "The Influence of Mind upon Mind, and also upon Matter." She spoke very nobly, and to a fine audience. We hope to go to New York soon, and will call and see you. Very truly yours, for liberty and justice, C. A. MARSHALL.

ELKLAND, PA., Dec. 17, 282.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Hav just re-read the finished, touching, and beautiful tribute of T. B. Wakeman to our fallen hero, D. M. Bennett. Allow me to thank him for voicing so tenderly and truthfully the sentiments of all our hearts. Verily, the sacrifices and duties done insured his immortality. While reading I vowed a new consecration to make the purposes of his life a victory, and to the call for contributions with which to erect a monument and a Bennett Hall, I pledge as a seal to that vow $1 for the monument, and $5 for the hall or temple, with the promis of duplicating the same on the first anniversary of this sad, sacred event.

When the Round-the-World trip was proposed friends responded, knowing if life served a quadruple compensation was to be gained. A grander prize is now awarded to make the purposes, the sacrifices, the labors of his life a victory; to rear a hall or temple to his name, a home for THE TRUTH SEEKER, thus proclaiming to the world the triumph of truth over superstition, science over theology, and right over error and wrong. Thus we can back up the oath proposed by friend Wakeman, that "THE TRUTH SEEKER shall liv!"

Let us be mindful that by working early and late, and living on the merest pittance, the founder was able to conduct it to so marked a success. Who now will perform this arduous toil, impelled only from love of the cause and fidelity to conviction? Echo answers, "Who?" In no way can we so devoutly demonstrate our appreciation, devotion, and love for our fallen leader as in the consecration of life's endeavors to maintain the cause for which he lived, labored, sacrificed, endured, and suffered. Ah, too true, "the prison-door broke his heart!" His, indeed, was a vicarious atonement. "His childlike, tender, beautiful heart" was not formed for so rude a blast. When I greeted him at the late Watkins Convention I saw it all upon that truthful, pallid face, and when I said, "You are not well," the ever genial smile, accompanied by an earnest look, with the response, "I try to be well," foretold the fate that is now upon us! He is gone! Vain are our tears, bitter our regrets! May this irrevocable bereavement make our hearts more tender, our lives more beautiful. May fraternal ties be strengthened, and our life labor be for the triumphant victory of right, truth, justice, freedom, and humanity. "Light, more light." GRACE L. PARKHURST.

EL PASO, TEXAS, Dec. 13, 1882.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD: As a reader and subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER I desire to express my great surprise and deep regret at the sudden and unexpected death of D. M. Bennett. How sad that he should be thus stricken down in the midst of an activ and remarkably useful life, when thousands were waiting and watching for his weekly words of wisdom, deep thought, and calm reason! His influence, though great and wide extended, was rapidly on the increase, and his writings were eagerly sought by those who had and were emerging from the ranks of old theology. The foremost writer of our day on anti-theological subjects; a calm, dispassionate logician, who weighed well his words and spoke not without due forethought, all that he said or wrote was of the despest interest to those who are called Freethinkers. In this age of thought and mental activity, when inquiring minds are seeking truth and knowledge, the loss of such a guide and instructor is deeply felt. Never was his sphere of action more useful than when came the unexpected summons to "pay the debt of nature." He was a power in the Liberal movement, the absence of which will be keenly felt, and though the work he was engaged in will by others be pushed forward with earnestness and vigor, his pen, which is laid aside forever, will be greatly missed, and heartfelt regrets at his untimely death will be experienced by thousands. Though comparativly few of his subscribers could claim a personal acquaintance or ever saw him, he was endeared to all by his genial and friendly nature, his devotion to duty and principle, and his bold and manly warfare on error and falsehood, on superstition and mental tyranny. The name of D. M. Bennett is an honored one, and though religious bigots may seek to defame it, as is customary with them after a person's death who was opposed to their senseless creeds, their attempts will prove abortiv, and generations yet unborn will speak in his praise. His pen, like that of Paine, has made for him a monument, and such endure when marble has crumbled to dust. Whether he sleeps a dreamless sleep or has risen to a higher and better life, is a query that will cause diversity of opinions among his admirers, but as to his life work there will be but one; it was well and nobly done. With feelings of profound sympathy for Mrs. Bennett and his near kin, I am sincerely yours, C. SEVERANCE.

WYOMING, PA., Dec. 17, E.M. 282.

MR. EDITOR: We are called upon to mourn the loss of a great and noble man. The Infidel world will deeply feel the loss of so indefatigable a worker in the cause of truth and liberty as D. M. Bennett. In him the tottering structure of Christianity found one of its ablest and most influential antagonists. From the facts of science and the phenomena of nature he adduced what he thought to be sufficient evidence for belief in a future life. Whether he is permitted to realize the immortality for which he hoped, or whether the closing of his eyes upon this world was but the beginning of an everlasting sleep, we trust that the monument of untiring search for truth which he has left us is destined to endure forever.

There is a fact connected with the death of this great man which should be a source of consolation to all Liberals—he sank in the arms of death as calmly and peacefully as did ever the most ardent Christian.

It has ever been the disposition of the church to enshroud the death-bed of all great Infidels with the accursed pall of obloquy and slander. While the sparkling genius and profound intellect livs to hurl its unanswerable arguments into the face of superstition, the Christian world cowers and trembles with anxious fear behind the massiv shield of silence; but when death has once hushed that thoughtful mind, the cowardly church slinks from her hiding-place, and with her vile and slanderous touch places the deceptiv marks of anguish and remorse upon the calm and tranquil brow of the defenseless dead. Let us be proud, then, of the heroic calmness with which this great Infidel of Infidels resigned to his inevitable fate; and let us herald it to the world in such unmistakable language that the slanderous tongue of the church shall never dare to defame the peaceful death-scene of D. M. Bennett.

It has not been long since I heard a preacher refer with triumphant satisfaction to the dying hours of Thomas Paine. He said that Paine passed his last moments in bitter anguish, recantation, and remorse. To hear the name of one whom I honor above all others thus heartlessly reviled, and to see a thoughless, credulous congregation accepting the slander as truth, sent the hot blood of indignation through my veins; and I said, in an audible tone, "It's a lie!" Oh! how I longed for such complete and undeniable evidence from those who had attended the great Freethinker in his dying moments as would hav forever paralyzed that preacher's calumnious tongue!

I earnestly urge, then, that those who witnessed the peaceful demise of D. M. Bennett make the truth of his calm resignation known to the world in such plain language that it will endure forever as a weapon with which future generations may defend the name of our most noble hero against the slanders of the church. Hopefully yours, H. CLAY LUSE.

NORTHFIELD, MINN., Dec. 10, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Three of the four volumes that contain the pearls gathered by yourself while around the world were duly received, and I can assure you that I feel doubly recompensed, and could not hav made a better investment with the money. But a library is not complete with the missing volume of any work "Away down East." When complete, please send the missing volume away out northwest. The remuneration for the same and for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the year 283 please find inclosed.

Not long since, Col. Ingersoll was in Minnesota, and among the cities that were favored with his eloquence were St. Paul and Minneapolis. His lectures were well attended at both places by a large, intelligent audience. As a natural result under all such occasions the "Fort" of the Young Men's Christian Association trembled on its tottering basis, but the young men of the Association are always on picket duty at such times with guns leveled to discharge their Christian tracts along the stairway and into the hall, and thereby, if possible, retard the march of Freethought, and denounce Infidelity by false representation. But the increase of the audience night after night proved their design unsuccessful.

Among the daily journals of the two cities, the St. Paul Globe was the only one that gave a fair account of the Colonel's lectures. But since his departure the others hav opened their theological batteries upon him in good earnest and fired off the guns. Perhaps their intention was to frighten the "Soldiers of Christ" from leaving the gospel ranks and joining the Infidel army. But the dreaded Infidel monitor was allowed to get far enough at sea before any volleys were discharged, as a retaliation might prove disastrous. Tho editor of the Pioneer Press was the first to toot his horn and discharge his gun. It proved contagious, and many others fell into rank and file and assisted in the tooting and cannonading, calling upon all around to come and join them.

But, Mr. Editor, the lessons of experience hav long ago taught Infidels not to expect justice or a fair representation from the alliance of Comstock, for it is not in the "calendar" of their master and leader to be either true, just, or fair, as has been repeatedly proven, especially by the late outrage perpetrated by that infamous villain against the editor of the Word. Oh, what a shocking affair, to drag any man or woman from business, home, and loved ones, hurry them off to prison, and cast them into a felon's cell, for simply doing that which they hav a perfect right to do against the whole world.

I see some hav denounced Mr. Heywood as having "violated good taste" in selecting certain passages from "Leaves of Grass" and sending the same through the mail. I wonder who are the infallibles who can draw the dividing line as to good taste. What I might consider in good taste might be very obnoxious to any neighbor, and vice versa. "To the pure in heart all things are pure," and there is nothing obscene but to the obscene heart, and nothing nasty but to the nasty heart.

Reading of the enforcement of the Sunday laws, or rather the long-ago "blue law," in various cities of this free land of ours, and of the arrests of those who hav committed no offense, I feel like exclaiming: "The age of the Inquisition is returning! Superstition and bigotry prevail! Look out for the burning of heretics at the stake, if Comstock is allowed to hold the reins of this government. Well might Herbert Spencer say the American people are losing their freedom.

And must the young, fair, and intelligent era o man be sacrificed on the altar of superstition, by barbarous era of Comstock? Every lover of liberty must prepare for the coming struggle, for it is surely coming, the battle between right and might, between reason and superstition, between liberty and slavery. Yours in the battle for freedom,

MRS. S. J. LENONT.

P. S.—Since the above was written this morning's mail brought the sad, sad intelligence of the death of our beloved editor. The shock was painful. We mourn his loss. We shall miss from the pages of the dear old TRUTH SEEKER the able, eloquent production of the heart and brain that hav forever ceased to beat and think. Mrs. Bennett has my sincere sympathy in her sad bereavement. Words cannot express my grief.

The Deluge.

BY J. W. WELTON.

And every living substance was destroyed which was upon the face of the ground, and the creeping things, and the fowl of the heaven (Gen. vii, 23).

Hav you heard how once the rain fell,
Fell for many a day and night,
Till it covered all the valleys,
All the little hills from sight?
How it drove out all the people
From their homes upon the plain,
Drove them back unto the mountains,
While they wept and prayed in vain?

All the birds came to the mountains,
All the beasts, from far and near,
Lions, tigers, fierce hyenas,
Buffalo, and timid deer;
For the waters, they had covered
All the plains and fields below,
Covered all the green earth over,
Save the mountains capped with snow.

Here they watched for ray of sunshine,
All the people watched and prayed
That this world-destroying deluge
By the father might be stayed.
Still the never-ceasing torrent
Fell by night and fell by day,
And the angry flood kept rising
Upward, upward on its way.

Round them laughed the wild hyena,
Laughed in mockery at their prayer,
Cries and shrieks of deadly combat
Rent again the midnight air.
Fell the fierce, destroying eagle
On the dove's defenseless brood,
And the tender little children
Freezing, starving, cried for food.

Higher up the people clambered.
Higher still the waters rose,
Till they reached the barren region,
Reached the limit of the snows.
Here, despairing, they resisted,
Clung to life while yet they could;
And, around the throne in heaven,
Angels murmured, "God is good."

Every day they died by thousands,
Every night by thousands more,
Till the mountains all were covered,
And the work of death was o'er.
All the beauty of creation,
All of life and love were gone;
Naught but silent waste of waters
For the sun to look upon.

And it was the loving father,
Who his creatures thus did doom—
Doomed the innocent, the guilty,
To the silence of the tomb,
Thus he satisfied his vengeance—
Now and ever he's the same;
Round the throne the angels shouted,
"Hallelujah, praise his name!"

A Freethought Psalm.

From the London Freethinker Christmas Number.

Brothers, your hands,
The dark clouds drift away!
Lo, in the night grown gray
The angel of the morning stands.
Brothers, your hands.

I, the singer, heard a singing circled round the circling world,
Like a haze about it clinging ere in cloud caught up and furled,
Hymn lethargic, rising, falling, with a measured pulse and roll,
Land with land united calling to the silent Over-soul!

Shout, ye lands, and be it rolled louder on from sphere to sphere;
Lift your hands, O priests white stoled, to the being ye revere;
Gaze into the empyrean, bow ye humbly to your God;
Proud is he to hear your pean, though he formed you from a sod!

Then I cried, and still they chanted: "Oh, he heard! 'Twas but his way
To put off (or so they vaunted) answers to some other day!
Wait a little, damned skeptic, wait a little; you shall see,
By a taste of hell prolleptic, what the Great One thinks of thee!"

Verily, I cried in answer, that were easy to be borne,
Though it fooled the tropic Cancer or the fevered Capricorn;
Knowledge that he had the power so to bind or so to loose
Would be worth it, though that hour I would curse him for its use.

Listen, priests, ye sons of profits; listen! though you thus consign
To your base and vulgar Tophets those who know not the divine,
Lo, amidst your organ-pealing, your tempestuous song and psalm,
Comes a breath of music stealing, most divinely still and calm.

Laugh, fools! sneer, fools! curse, fools! never doth it 'bate its sweeter chime,
Deepening and swelling ever to an ecstasy sublime;
Though you deem your louder singing its far-reaching potence mars;
Still it speeds, its grand way winging further out amid the stars.

Pull your loudest Diapason, crash forth all the myriad stops,
Sweep your pedal-thundering base on! still your earthquake it out-tops;
See, as its clear notes wax stronger, wheresoe'er its flood hath streamed;
Dead men rise, death's slaves no longer—the real host of the redeemed.

Backward reel the old phantasms that your wizardries maintain,
To their dark and noisome chasms, never thence to rise again;
Man for God and Joy for weeping, Truth for error, Love for strife—
Flood on flood of splendor leaping all the barriers of life. —M. W.

In Memoriam.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker,

Sir: One important consideration which induced me to make my late tour into the southwestern part of the state of Michigan was to visit the late residence of Elisha Flint, at Edwardsburg, in Cass county. Mr. Flint left this mundane sphere of life something over a year ago, and while I was in Kalamazoo the last time I received an urgent call from Mrs. Flint to visit their home once more, and I went, with the view of obtaining points and data about this good man's life history. Mrs. Flint has felt, as I felt, that something more than a passing journal notice ought to be published of such a truly noble example of human life as was manifest in the advanced and reformatory career of this very exemplary man.

To the philosophical and reformatory mind, the Koran, the Shaster, the Jewish or the Christian records, are not half so sacred as the beautiful and hopeful memory of our dearest and best relativs, or friends, who hav long walked in the pathways of life with us, and with whom we hav lived and labored in every effort to benefit and elevate the race. We read the record of the lives of those who hav been our intimate companions, and our helpers in the arduous struggles of life, and the lessons we derive from the sacred memories of incidents and circumstances come up with the most refining and elevating effect upon our own inmost lives.

Mr. Flint lived to about seventy-five years. He was born and raised in one of the central counties of New York state, but removed to Edwardsburg, Mich., about the year 1854. Mr. Flint was an early and an earnest abolitionist. He voted for "Birney." They hav also been activ in temperance, land, and labor reforms. And in the time of the great war of the Rebellion they were in the prime of a rich and ripening age, and they took an activ interest in every measure to ameliorate the condition of the poor soldiers, who were falling by the tens of thousands upon the fields of battle, or worse, suffering all the horrors of prison-life in the hostil hands of enemies. Under all these trying circumstances, the Flints were alive and activ in their sympathies and their efforts in behalf of that which they believed to be humane, patriotic, and philanthropic.

We can only ascertain who are in favor of free speech by observation under the most severe and trying tests. The Flints hav proved themselvs equal to every emergency in those most vitally important principles of Americanism. Under the late American inquisitions, when Anthony Comstock raided like a marauder upon the office of The Truth Seeker, and laid John A. Lant, E. H. Heywood, D. M. Bennett, and many others under arrest, and when the test ripened, and the R.-P. Journal and some other papers virtually took sides with the inquisitors, the Flints dropped their subscription to the R.-P. Journal and rallied at once under the banner of The Truth Seeker. And again, when D. M. Bennett was in Ludlow-street Jail, and R. B. Hayes proved recreant to his own convictions, and turned a deaf ear and a cold and heartless hand to the two hundred thousand petitioners for Mr. Bennett's release, the Flint's inquired of me if Mr. Bennett's lithograph, in life-size, could be obtained, as they wished to take Mr. Hayes's picture down from their parlor-walls, and place Mr. Bennett's in its place. And long before Mr. Flint passed beyond the shining river Mr. Bennett's picture was occupying the place so justly vacated for this substitute. And to-day the full-sized lithograph of D. M. Bennett hangs conspicuous on the walls of the Flint residence, as it does in many residences on this continent, in testimony of a fidelity to the cause of universal mental freedom.

In the former years of Mr. Flint's early life, when military drill was fashionable, he filled the position of captain. And hence, in his ripened age, he was known by the familiar title of "Cap. Flint." While there naturally would be some prejudice among the older and more conservativ or superstitious classes against the Flints on account of their advanced position in all enterprises of reform, Mr. Flint was always an especial friend and favorit with the youths and children, among whom he always manifested the utmost kindness and fraternal interest. And notwithstanding the advanced and radical position taken by the Flints in all matters of reform their whole life histor had been so signally marked with an even-handed consistency that they were accorded one of the largest meeting-houses of the place for the funeral services, and Mrs. Pearsall, of Disco, Mich., was engaged to speak upon the occasion. The house was overcrowded with an audience, many of whom had probably never heard so able an exposition of Liberalism upon a public rostrum before. I had been complimented with an invitation of fully ten years' standing to be present at Mr. Flint's funeral (if I outlived him), and to take some part in the funeral services, but by some oversight or mishap in the mails I failed to receive word in time, and I can now only pay my respects to those old-time and highly valued friends through these imperfect and inadequate testimonials. And although I hav written at considerable length, I trust you will giv place to this memorial tribute as early as possible in the columns of the Flints' favorit journal, The Truth Seeker.

Fraternally yours, C. S. Rowley.

Readers of The Truth Seeker know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume, which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he has visited. The every-day life of all na ions is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Gems of Thought.

PAUSE, O friend, ere thou doest wrong. Remember that it is not only the deed itself that will be thy condemnation, but the long train of events that may grow out of it. We are all living examples to others. We must lead those we influence either toward the good or the evil. We hav it in our power to go right or go wrong before we start, but we can never retrace a step after it is once taken.—Elmina D. Slenker.

FOR my part, I long ago espoused the cause of religious liberty, not because that cause was popular, but because it was just; and I am not disposed to abandon the principles to which I hav been true through my whole life in deference to a passing clamor. The day may come, and may come soon, when those who are now loudest in raising that clamor, may again be, as they hav formerly been, suppliants for justice. When that day comes I will try to prevent others from oppressing them, as I now try to prevent them from oppressing others. In the mean time I shall contend against their intolerance with the same spirit with which I mav hereafter hav to contend for their rights.—Macaulay's "Speech on Dissenters," Chapel Bill. 1844. [One of the noblest speeches of the many noble ones that Macaulay has left behind him. It is steeped in the philosophy of Locke and penetrated with the fire of Milton's "Arecopagitica." The occasion of the speech was temporary, and in itself of limited importance; but the principles involved in the discussion are for all times and seasons.—C. W. C.]

To go on joined to our idols when we are sufficiently awakened to suspect at least that they are idols is an immoral condition that is wide-spread and replete with baneful consequences.—Waters.

IN the long run, no doubt, it is almost always true that a man is what he makes himself. But, nevertheless, there is almost sure to be some period or other in his life during which he will be criticised and treated more according to the idea which his friends hav formed, as to his qualities and capabilities, than according to his real merits. And remembering not only this, but also how extremely liable our judgments are to err, let us beware of ascribing either good or bad rashly to any one: and as far or may be possible, let us abstain from judging one another needlessly at all.—Spectator, Aug. 20, 1881.

IT is often asserted to believe is the only safe way. If you wish to be safe, be honest. Nothing can be safer than that. No matter what his belief may be, no man, even in the hour of death, can regret having been honest. It never can be necessary to throw away your reason to save your soul. A soul without reason is scarcely worth saving. There is no more degrading doctrin than that of mental non-resistance. The soul has a right to defend its castle—the brain—and he who waves that right becomes a serf and slave.—Ingersoll.

No one can be a great thinker who does not recognize that as a thinker it is his first duty to follow his intellect to whatever conclusions it may lead. Truth gains more even by the errors of one who, with due study and preparation, thinks for himself, than by the true opinions of those who only hold them because they do not suffer themselvs to think.—Mill's Liberty.

TRUTH is compared in scripture to a streaming fountain; if her waters flow not in a perpetual progression, they sicken into a muddy pool of conformity and tradition. A man may be a searcher in the truth; and if he believes things only because his pastor says so, or the assembly so determins, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy.—Milton's Areopagitica.

To solicit and persuade one another are privileges which belong to us all; and the wiser or better man is bound to advise the less wise and good; but he is not only not bound, he is not allowed generally speaking, to coerce him.—Gladstone on Church and State.

FOR ourselvs, we own that we do not understand the common phrase, a good man but a bad king. We can as easily conceive a good man but an unnatural father, or a good man but a treacherous friend. We cannot, in estimating the character of an individual, leave out of our consideration his conduct in the most important of all human relations; and if in that relation we find him to hav been selfishly cruel and deceitful, we shall take the liberty to call him a bad man, in spite of all his temperance at table and all his regularity at church.—Macaulay's Essays.

THE kind of religion that this country would be the better for having in its governmental affairs is not that which takes the form of theological profession or of official prayers and Bible-readings, but that which has already crystallized into integrity and purity and nobility of character. We want men in the legislativ halls and in the executiv offices who will be servants of their country rather than of self; who will be impervious to any bribes addressed either to their avarice or their ambition; who care more for truth and justice than for any partisan advantage; who, besides being intellectually competent, are of clean reputation in both public and private life.—W. J. Potter.

THE leaves of autumn are in number millions; the girl goes into the field, and picks the fairest for her album; the rest drop upon the soil. Those that the girl preserved do nothing. Those that no one observed, fate takes care of; bare, lifeless, discolored, the torn and ragged things drop lightly upon the soil; the cold, shrill winds of autumn spread them about; the dripping, pattering rain soaks them into the ground; they will create in spring a more glorious vegetation. Which leaf is it that made the soil? Every leaf. Whose life has made the world? Every life.—O. B. Frothingham.

THE wind and the sun will make vinegar without any shouting to assist them.—George Eliot.

Odds and Ends.

THE traveler in England always notices a singular anomaly—the weather is always wet and the people are always dry.

"EVERY man according to his lights," as the butcher said when he rung in a bogus liver on a poor-paying customer.

"SAM," said an old colored man down at the post-office to another old codger, "what's the meaning of versa versa?" "It means tother from which," answered Sam, with great dignity. "I dunno," said the first one, "I think it means upside down." "No," retorted his friend, "I'se done yuah it means hind side defoah." A third old fellow came by just then, and they appealed the question to him. "I cannot desplain pezactly," he said, "so as to meet wid your compredehension, but wiser-versa am a 'propriation from de Latin and means wuss and wuss and mo' of it. I members stumblin ober it at college. It am a hard word to pronounce." He ambled along with his buck-saw, and the two who had referred to him looked after him with respect and admiration, wondering that "one small head could carry all he knew."

SHE SAT ON IT.

Miss Clara Fitzsimmons had traveled abroad,
And when she returned, she resolved to afford
All her friends the great pleasure of hearing her tell
How she flourished in London, and Paris as well.

When she gave her reception the house was well-filled
With sunflower mashers, whose glances oft killed
In a manner æsthetic the maidens so fair,
With their languishing looks and too utterly air.

While at supper, a dandy, whose head was quite light,
Drank a toast to the hostess, 'mid cheers of delight,
And leaning towards her, he said, with a smile,
"Of course, as you've traveled, you've trod the Green Isle?"

"Oh yes," replied Clara, "I was there for a day."
"Well then," said the fop, "I'm delighted to say
That when you were there, you kissed, I will swear,
The Blarney Stone famous they hav over there.

"And as your lips kissed it, suppose I kissed you;
That stone I'll be kissing by proxy, 'tis true."
And advancing, he coaxed her for one little smack,
But she, quite embarrassed, kept waving him back.

"Excuse me, Adolphus, pray loosen your hold;
You're not only fresh, sir, but terribly bold.
That stone, I assure you, I only kissed once,
For I sat squarely on it; so there now, you dunce!"

THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

Young King Solomon,
Like all mankind, with life before 'em,
Was a right bold and jolly man,
And thought of wives he'd take a quorum;
With now and then a sort of spouse
Who didn't stand on marriage vows,
To sugar-coat them o'er.
It was a conjugal idea
That might hav sulted such as we are,
With Jerusalem and all Judea
To foot the score,
Young King Sol—
Fol de rol lol;
If ever any ache or ill he had,
He soothed it with these balms of Gilead—
Young King Sol!
He drank, and danced, and played the 'cello,
Wrote songs, and sang, like a gay fellow,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol—
Young King Sol!

Brave King Solomon
Kept marrying till people wondered
To see a wise and holy man
Run up a score of seven hundred;
But, though he took the sugar-coats
Right merrily as antidotes,
He got an overdose.
Just think of his domestic bothers!
Seven hundred wives—three hundred others
Almost as bad—and all their mothers—
At once broke loose!
Brave King Sol—
Fol de rol lol;
He saw his load, and tried to back it;
But when he had to face the racket—
Brave King Sol!
He danced no more, nor played the 'celio,
But, like a Bashan bull would bellow,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol—
Brave King Sol!

Poor King Solomon,
In youth so gay and level-headed,
Became a melancholy man,
Being too much concubined and wedded:
Oh, pity him his thousand wives,
Ye generous married men, whose lives
Are miserable with one!
For surely he had come to hate 'em,
When he declared them, seriatim,
As vanitas vanitatum
Beneath the sun,
Poor King Sol—
Fol de rol lol;
He sank at last upon the stony
And cheerless road of matrimony—
Poor King Sol!
With somewhat of his fate before us,
Let's solomonly repeat the chorus:
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol—
Poor old Sol!

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

EXTERNAL APPLICATION,

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. ☞ Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notices from the Press.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Times.]

We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician, who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of those who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

[From the Star Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.]

TO INVALIDS AND OTHERS: The Banner seldom indorses any doctor or medicin, but it is free to say to all interested that Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., is not only a skilful and reputable practitioner, but one of the most successful physicians in the United States.
